The Book of the Discipline

I.B. Horner
Sacred Books of the Buddhists
VOLUMES X, XI, XIII, XIV, XX, XXV

THE BOOK OF THE DISCIPLINE
VINAYAPIṬAKAM

Translated by
I.B. HORNER, M.A.
FELLOW AND ASSOCIATE OF NEWNHAM COLLEGE, CAMBRIDGE

Supplementary translation by BHIKKHU BRAHMALI

Originally published by
PALI TEXT SOCIETY

This edition prepared by
BHIKKHU SUJATO for SUTTACENTRAL
Main Contents

I  The Analysis of Monks’ Rules (Bhikkhu vibhaṅga) 1
II  The Analysis of Nuns’ Rules (Bhikkunī vibhaṅga) 1049
III  Khandhaka 1337
IV  Parivāra 2423
Volume I

The Analysis of Monks’ Rules

(Bhikkhuviṃbhāṅga)
Contents of Volume I

Translator’s Introduction ........................................... 17
Editorial Note ......................................................... 68
Preface to the SuttaCentral Edition ............................... 70
Abbreviations .......................................................... 75
The translation of the Pārājika rules ............................ 77
Structural changes .................................................... 78
Variant numbering for bhikkhunī rules ......................... 80
Semantic markup ...................................................... 81
Formats .................................................................. 83

Monks’ Expulsion (Pārājika) 1 ...................................... 84
The origin of the Vinaya ............................................... 84
Origin story .............................................................. 100
First sub-story .......................................................... 100
First preliminary ruling .............................................. 112
Second sub-story ....................................................... 112
Second preliminary ruling ........................................... 113
Third sub-story .......................................................... 114
Final ruling ............................................................... 115
Definitions .............................................................. 115
Permutations ............................................................ 121
Permutations part 1 ..................................................... 121
Summary ............................................................... 121
Exposition part 1 ....................................................... 121
Monks’ Expulsion (Pārājika) 2

Origin story .................................................. 137
  First sub-story .......................................... 137
  Preliminary ruling ...................................... 143
  Second sub-story ...................................... 143
Final ruling .................................................. 144
Definitions .................................................. 144
Permutations ............................................... 146
  Permutations part 1 ..................................... 146
  Summary .................................................. 146
Exposition .................................................. 147
Permutations part 2 ..................................... 159
Permutations part 3 ..................................... 160
Non-offence clause ................................. 162
Case rulings ............................................... 163
  Case details ............................................ 163

Monks’ Expulsion (Pārājika) 3

Origin story .................................................. 185
  First sub-story .......................................... 185
  Preliminary ruling ...................................... 191
  Second sub-story ...................................... 191
Final ruling .................................................. 193
Definitions .................................................. 193
Permutations ............................................... 195
  Summary .................................................. 195
  Exposition ............................................... 196
Non-offence clause ................................. 203
Case rulings ............................................... 203
Case details ........................................ 204

Monks' Expulsion (Pārājika) 4 218
  Origin story ....................................... 218
  First sub-story .................................. 218
  Preliminary ruling .............................. 223
  Second sub-story ................................ 223
  Final ruling ..................................... 224
  Definitions ...................................... 224
  Permutations .................................... 226
    Summary ....................................... 226
    Definitions ................................... 227
    Exposition .................................... 228
  Non-offence clause ............................. 238
  Case rulings .................................... 238
    Case details, part 1 ........................... 239
    Case details, part 2 ......................... 247

Monks' Formal Meeting (Saṅghādisesa) 1 257
Monks' Formal Meeting (Saṅghādisesa) 2 264
Monks' Formal Meeting (Saṅghādisesa) 3 280
Monks' Formal Meeting (Saṅghādisesa) 4 288
Monks' Formal Meeting (Saṅghādisesa) 5 294
Monks' Formal Meeting (Saṅghādisesa) 6 311
Monks' Formal Meeting (Saṅghādisesa) 7 330
Monks' Formal Meeting (Saṅghādisesa) 8 335
Monks' Formal Meeting (Saṅghādisesa) 9 351
Monks' Formal Meeting (Saṅghādisesa) 10 358
Monks' Formal Meeting (Saṅghādisesa) 11 365
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Topic</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Monks’ Formal Meeting (Saṅghādisesa) 12</td>
<td>369</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Monks’ Formal Meeting (Saṅghādisesa) 13</td>
<td>374</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Monks’ Undetermined (Aniyata) 1</td>
<td>388</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Monks’ Undetermined (Aniyata) 2</td>
<td>394</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Translator’s Introduction</td>
<td>399</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The Nissaggiya Group</td>
<td>401</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The Pācittiya Group (Nos. 1–60)</td>
<td>417</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Monks’ Forfeiture (Nissaggiya) 1</td>
<td>444</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Monks’ Forfeiture (Nissaggiya) 2</td>
<td>453</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Monks’ Forfeiture (Nissaggiya) 3</td>
<td>463</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Monks’ Forfeiture (Nissaggiya) 4</td>
<td>469</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Monks’ Forfeiture (Nissaggiya) 5</td>
<td>474</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Monks’ Forfeiture (Nissaggiya) 6</td>
<td>480</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Monks’ Forfeiture (Nissaggiya) 7</td>
<td>487</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Monks’ Forfeiture (Nissaggiya) 8</td>
<td>490</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Monks’ Forfeiture (Nissaggiya) 9</td>
<td>494</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Monks’ Forfeiture (Nissaggiya) 10</td>
<td>498</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Monks’ Forfeiture (Nissaggiya) 11</td>
<td>506</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Monks’ Forfeiture (Nissaggiya) 12</td>
<td>509</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Monks’ Forfeiture (Nissaggiya) 13</td>
<td>511</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Monks’ Forfeiture (Nissaggiya) 14</td>
<td>514</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Monks’ Forfeiture (Nissaggiya) 15</td>
<td>518</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Topic</td>
<td>Page</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>--------------------------------------------</td>
<td>------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Monks’ Forfeiture (Nissaggiya) 16</td>
<td>524</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Monks’ Forfeiture (Nissaggiya) 17</td>
<td>528</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Monks’ Forfeiture (Nissaggiya) 18</td>
<td>533</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Monks’ Forfeiture (Nissaggiya) 19</td>
<td>538</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Monks’ Forfeiture (Nissaggiya) 20</td>
<td>541</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Monks’ Forfeiture (Nissaggiya) 21</td>
<td>545</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Monks’ Forfeiture (Nissaggiya) 22</td>
<td>549</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Monks’ Forfeiture (Nissaggiya) 23</td>
<td>556</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Monks’ Forfeiture (Nissaggiya) 24</td>
<td>564</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Monks’ Forfeiture (Nissaggiya) 25</td>
<td>568</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Monks’ Forfeiture (Nissaggiya) 26</td>
<td>571</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Monks’ Forfeiture (Nissaggiya) 27</td>
<td>574</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Monks’ Forfeiture (Nissaggiya) 28</td>
<td>580</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Monks’ Forfeiture (Nissaggiya) 29</td>
<td>585</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Monks’ Forfeiture (Nissaggiya) 30</td>
<td>589</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Monks’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 1</td>
<td>593</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Monks’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 2</td>
<td>600</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Monks’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 3</td>
<td>614</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Monks’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 4</td>
<td>618</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Monks’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 5</td>
<td>621</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Monks’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 6</td>
<td>625</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Monks' Expiation (Pācittiya)</td>
<td>Page</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>----------------------------</td>
<td>------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>28</td>
<td>716</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>29</td>
<td>719</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>30</td>
<td>724</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>31</td>
<td>727</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>32</td>
<td>730</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>33</td>
<td>738</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>34</td>
<td>744</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>35</td>
<td>749</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>36</td>
<td>754</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>37</td>
<td>757</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>38</td>
<td>760</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>39</td>
<td>763</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>40</td>
<td>766</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>41</td>
<td>769</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>42</td>
<td>773</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>43</td>
<td>776</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>44</td>
<td>779</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>45</td>
<td>782</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>46</td>
<td>784</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>47</td>
<td>790</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>48</td>
<td>795</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Monks’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 67 905
Monks’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 68 908
Monks’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 69 914
Monks’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 70 917
Monks’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 71 922
Monks’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 72 926
Monks’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 73 929
Monks’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 74 933
Monks’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 75 935
Monks’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 76 937
Monks’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 77 939
Monks’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 78 942
Monks’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 79 945
Monks’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 80 948
Monks’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 81 951
Monks’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 82 954
Monks’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 83 957
Monks’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 84 964
Monks’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 85 969
Monks’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 86 974
Monks’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 87 977
Monks' Expiation (Pācittiya) 88  979
Monks' Expiation (Pācittiya) 89  981
Monks' Expiation (Pācittiya) 90  984
Monks' Expiation (Pācittiya) 91  986
Monks' Expiation (Pācittiya) 92  987
Monks' Confession (Pāṭidesaniya) 1  990
Monks' Confession (Pāṭidesaniya) 2  994
Monks' Confession (Pāṭidesaniya) 3  997
Monks' Confession (Pāṭidesaniya) 4  1002
Monks' Training (Sekhiya) 1  1007
Monks' Training (Sekhiya) 2  1008
Monks' Training (Sekhiya) 3 & 4  1008
Monks' Training (Sekhiya) 5 & 6  1009
Monks' Training (Sekhiya) 7 & 8  1009
Monks' Training (Sekhiya) 9 & 10  1010
Monks' Training (Sekhiya) 11 & 12  1011
Monks' Training (Sekhiya) 13 & 14  1011
Monks' Training (Sekhiya) 15 & 16  1012
Monks' Training (Sekhiya) 17 & 18  1012
Monks' Training (Sekhiya) 19 & 20  1013
Monks' Training (Sekhiya) 21 & 22  1013
Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 66
Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 67
Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 68
Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 69
Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 70
Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 71
Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 72
Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 73
Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 74
Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 75
Monks’ Deciding of Legal Questions
Monks’ Conclusion
The present translation of the Vinaya-Piṭaka is based upon Hermann Oldenberg’s extremely careful edition of the Pali text of the Vinaya-Piṭaka, published in five volumes in the years 1879–1883. In the Introduction to Volume I of his edition, Oldenberg wrote (p. x) that he had been compelled to relinquish his original intention of adding a complete translation to the text. But in the years 1881, 1882, 1885 T.W. Rhys Davids and Oldenberg collaborated in the production of a partial translation, called Vinaya Texts, published in the Sacred Books of the East Series (Volumes XIII, XVII, XX) in three volumes.

The detailed handling, exposition and analysis of many important, interesting, difficult and obscure points make of Vinaya Texts a work of remarkable scholarship. In addition, the erudition of one who had had opportunities of investigating contemporary monasticism in Ceylon has been bestowed upon it. Indeed, Rhys Davids’ and Oldenberg’s translation can admit of supplement in only two respects, while in all others I am aware that my attempt at a critical translation compares but unfavourably with theirs.

In the first place, what is now needed, both for its own sake and in order to bring the Vinaya into line with, at least, the Sutta-Piṭaka, is a complete, as against a partial translation into English. This is one of the two respects in which Vinaya Texts can be supplemented. Secondly, our knowledge of various aspects of Buddhism has doubtless increased during the fifty-two years which separate the appearance of Volume III of Vinaya Texts and the appearance of Volume I of The Book of the Discipline. During this time the Pali Text Society has been founded, and has published all the Pali Canonical “books,” practically all the Commentaries and other post-Canonical “books”, together with a considerable number of translations, not to mention a Dictionary. This mass of material, not available to the original translators of the Vinaya, has made possible a comparison of passages, phrases and words occurring in scattered parts of the Canon, so that now a more definite and perhaps less tentative interpretation of the significance of some of them, as they appear in the Vinaya, can be presented. This is the second way in which Vinaya Texts can be supplemented. It is only by discovering what words and phrases signify in passages other than those with which one is at the moment concerned, that the general, and even the exceptional, meaning of those same words and phrases can be more or less accurately gauged. I have considered it desirable, in the light of the knowledge made accessible during the last fifty years by the issues of the Pali Text Society and certain books on Early Buddhism, to revise and remould some of the renderings in Vinaya Texts. Even so, one cannot fail to be impressed by the vision of the original translators, whose interpretations, sometimes no more than leaps in the dark, have often proved successful and unimpeachable.

There is reason to suspect that some words and phrases are peculiar to the Vinaya, or have a special connotation in it, but there can be no certainty upon this point, until the Concordance, which is being compiled under the auspices of Mrs. Rhys Davids, is brought to completion.

Since the study of Early Buddhism is admittedly still in its infancy, many of the rich and variegated treasures of its storehouse as yet await investigation. Hence, I am fully aware that The Book of the Discipline is nothing more than an interim translation, needed for the reasons given above, but in no way claiming to be final and definitive.

------------------

The word vinaya has come to be paired, as it were (although since precisely when we do not know), with the word dhamma. This is a word whose long history needs a detailed study, such as we have in W. Geiger’s Dhamma, 1920, while vinaya is considerably easier of definition. Whatever the exact meaning or meanings of dhamma may have been at one stage in the history of Early Buddhism or at another, or at one part of the Sayings or at another, it is a fair enough description to say that dhamma concerned the inner life of Gotama’s followers, their conscience, their mental training and outlook and, later, stood for the body of teaching that they were to believe and follow; and that vinaya was the discipline governing and regulating the outward life of the monks and nuns who had entered the monastic Orders, the foundation of which is attributed to Gotama. Dhamma may indeed be said to be all that vinaya is not.¹ Two Piṭakas are devoted to dhamma: the Sutta-Piṭaka and the (later) Abhidhamma-Piṭaka; one, the Vinaya-Piṭaka, as its name implies, to vinaya.²

I have called the present translation The Book of the Discipline, rather than The Basket (Piṭaka) of the Discipline, on the analogy of The Book (Nikāya) of the Kindred Sayings and The Book of the Gradual Sayings. What was originally an oral tradition of Sayings became, at some time, committed to palm-leaf manuscripts. Later still, these were “edited” to form the material of printed books. Today the early Sayings survive nowhere but in books.

Oldenberg began his edition of the text of the Vinaya-Piṭaka with the section known as the Mahāvagga. This, together with the Cūḷavagga to which he proceeded, constitutes the Khandhakas. He placed the Suttavibhaṅga after these, and ended with the admittedly later Parivāra. But properly speaking, the Pali Vinaya begins with the Suttavibhaṅga. The Vinaya of the Sarvāstivādin school “follows the same general arrangement,”³ as do apparently the Chinese Vinaya of the Mahīsāsaka school and the Dulva, or Tibetan Vinaya of the Mūlasarvāstivādins.⁴ Be this as it may, the Pali Vinaya is the only one with which we can concern ourselves here. Comparisons with the Vinaya of other schools must be left to one side, as must comparisons with the rules and discipline of pre-Sakyan sects and contemporary sects, including the Jain Orders of monks and nuns.¹

---

According to Rhys Davids and Oldenberg, the oldest portion of the Vinaya is the Pātimokkha, or list of 227 rules,² or courses of training to be observed. As this seems to be indisputably the case, it is only fitting that the Suttavibhāṅga should precede the Khandhakas. For the Suttavibhāṅga is that portion of the Vinaya which contains the Pātimokkha.

In their Vinaya Texts, Rhys Davids and Oldenberg open with the Pātimokkha. Buddhaghosa in his Commentary, the Samantapāsādikā (denoted as Vin-a in the footnotes to my translation),³ begins with the Suttavibhāṅga in extenso. I therefore follow the same plan, and mention it chiefly to indicate that my Volume I does not correspond to Oldenberg’s Volume I, but approximately to the first two-thirds of his Volume III. Considerations of length alone prevented me from including all his Volume III in my Volume I of The Book of the Discipline. On the other hand, this present volume corresponds to the opening portion of Volume I of Vinaya Texts. The chief difference between the presentation of the Suttavibhāṅga in Vinaya Texts and The Book of the Discipline is that, in the former the Suttavibhāṅga is cut down to comprise nothing more than the Pātimokkha rules themselves, all auxiliary material being omitted, while the latter, when finished, will contain, with very few exceptions,⁴ an unabridged translation of the entire Suttavibhāṅga.

The Vinaya, the Discipline, especially that portion of it called Suttavibhāṅga, appoints and decrees a definite standard of outward morality, comprised in courses of training laid down for the proper behaviour of monks and nuns. On the surface the Suttavibhāṅga is not much more than an attempt to restrain unsuitable behaviour; but in reality it also arrives, though in many cases by a long process of exclusion, at the kind of positive conduct to be pursued by the monk who wishes his life to be externally blameless, so far as his relations with his fellow monks, with the Order as a whole, and with the laity are concerned.

---

¹ See Jacobi, Jaina Sūtras, i.xixff. (Sacred Books of the East XXII). ² See S. Dutt, Early Buddhist Monachism, p. 92, and B.C. Law, History of Pali Literature, i.20f., for notes on variant numbers of the rules. Also Winternitz, History of Indian Literature, ii.23, n. 5, for numbers of rules recognised by various schools. ³ i.e., Vinaya-atṭhakathā, Commentary on the Vinaya. ⁴ See below, BD 1.xxxvii.

This limitation of the Suttavibhaṅga to an outward and objective field is amply indicated by the striking absence from it, of any passage stating that the observance of the courses of training “made known for monks by the lord” will conduce to the realisation of desirable subjective states. The gulf between this and the pre-eminently subjective attitude of the Sutta-Piṭaka is immense. Never once is it said, in the Suttavibhaṅga, that the courses of training should be followed so as to lead, for example, to the rejection of passion, of hatred, of confusion, to the destruction of the āsavas (cankers), to making the Way (one, fourfold, eightfold) become, to the mastery of dhamma, to the attainment of perfection. Always the recurrent formula of the Suttavibhaṅga declares that breaches of a course of training are “not fitting, not suitable, not worthy of a recluse, not to be done,” and so on, and that such lapses are not “for the benefit of non-believers nor for increase in the number of believers.” Thus a standard of conduct is imposed from outside, and for external, impersonal reasons, instead of insistence being laid, as in the Nikāya teaching, on the great subjective states attainable through a man’s own efforts of will.

The word Suttavibhaṅga means analysis or classification (vi-bhaṅga) of a sutta, a term here applied to each rule or course of training included in the Pātimokkha. The literal meaning of sutta (sūtra) is of course string or thread, and as such also appears in the Vinaya. But its meaning of rule or clause or article is apparently peculiar to this composition, and is, according to Dr. E.J. Thomas,¹ earlier than its meaning of separate discourse. That the word sutta, in the Vinaya, probably does bear the meaning of rule, as was suggested in Vinaya Texts,\(^1\) is indicated by various passages. For example, at Vin 1.65–68, a monk is not to receive the upasampadā ordination if he does not know the two Pātimokkhas\(^2\) rule by rule (suttato); at Vin 2.68, it is said: “This thing is in a rule (suttāgata) and comes up for recitation every half-month.”\(^3\) The thing (dhamma) here referred to is not in a Sutta, or Sutta-Piṭaka discourse, but does occur, as part of a course of training, in the Vinaya. Further, the Vinaya Commentary mentions, calling it a sutta,\(^4\) the statement allowing an ārāma (park) to monks. The one reference that I have come across to the compound Suttavibhaṅga in the Vinaya text\(^5\) (apart from its use as the title of the section bearing its name) is in association with sutta. Both these terms appear here to refer as clearly to Vinaya and not to Sutta-Piṭaka material, as do the others cited above.

¹ History of Buddhist Thought, p. 268, n. 2.

As the Suttavibhaṅga has come down to us,\(^6\) it is divided into two sections: Pārājika and Pācittiya. Between them, these two sections comprise 227 rules divided into the eight groups of the four Pārājikas, the thirteen Saṅghādisesas, the two Aniyatas, the thirty Nissaggiya Pācittiyas, the ninety-two Pācittiyas, the four Pāṭidesaniyas, the seventy-five Sekhiyas, and the Adhikaraṇasamatha rules.\(^7\) Only the first three groups are contained in Volume I of The Book of the Discipline. There is a corresponding Bhikkhunī-vibhaṅga, sometimes referred to as the Bhikkhunī-vinaya, or Discipline for Nuns, with its set of Pātimokkha rules. This will appear in a later volume of this translation.

The Suttavibhaṅga material is usually arranged in a series of four groups:

1. a story leading up to a rule;
2. a Pātimokkha rule, which always states the penalty incurred for breaking it;
3. the Old Commentary, the Padabhājaniya, on each rule, defining it word by word;

---

\(^1\) Volume i.xxviiiif. \(^2\) The one for the monks and the one for the nuns. \(^3\) See below, BD l.xi. \(^4\) Vin-a 81. \(^5\) Vin 2.97. \(^6\) For date of compilation of the Suttavibhaṅga see Vinaya Texts, i.xxi. \(^7\) Cf. B.C. Law, History Of Pali Literature, i.46f.
4. more stories telling of deviations from the rule, and showing either that they were not so grave as to entail the maximum penalty, or that they were reasonable enough to warrant, in certain circumstances, a modification or a relaxation of the existing rule, or that they were not such as to be rendered permissible by any extenuating circumstances.

Items (3) and (4) are sometimes reversed in position, and (4) is now and again absent altogether.

The Pātimokkha rules are the core of the Suttavibhaṅga. This list of rules, or list of courses of training, was recited twice a month on the uposatha (observance, Sabbath, or avowal) days, held on the nights of the new and the full moon. In Vedic times, the upavasatha was a fast day kept for the preparation of and the performance of the Soma sacrifice. According to the Pali tradition, paribbañkas, or wanderers belonging to other sects, also held sacred two, if not three, days in each month for the recitation of their Dhamma. It was in imitation of this popular custom that the Sakyan bhikkhus assembled on these same three days. Later, apparently, these were reduced to two, and were devoted to the recitation of the Pātimokkha rules.

This recitation served the double purpose of keeping the rules fresh in the minds of the monks and nuns, and of giving each member of the monastic community the opportunity, while the rules were being repeated or recited, to avow any offences that he or she had committed. After the avowal came the due punishment. In the Suttavibhaṅga, the monk is usually shown as avowing his offence to Gotama, or to one of the monks, or to a group of monks, directly [when] he had committed it, and not as waiting to avow it before the full congregation (saṅgha) of monks. He was thus “pure” for the uposatha ceremony, and could take his place at the meeting.

Oldenberg sees in the term Pātimokkha, freedom “from sins there named,” that is, in the list of rules called Pātimokkha. This is part of what amounted in Oldenberg to an obsession with “the doctrine regarding release from suffering, which forms so central an idea in the ancient Buddhist faith.”¹ But the monks were not asked, as Oldenberg states, whether they were “free from the sins there named.” The word for “free” or “freed” would have been vimutta. What they were asked was whether they were parisuddha, quite pure, pure in the matter of having kept the rules, therefore outwardly pure. I think that if Oldenberg had looked upon the Pātimokkha as a list of rules or courses of training, as I have called them above, and not as a “list of those offences which deserved punishment or some kind of expiation,”² he would not have been so much dominated by the idea of freedom from “sins.” Moreover, “sin” is not even a Sakyan conception.

---

1 Vin 1.104. 2 Vin 1.101. 3 Vin 1.104. 4 Not “read out,” as Oldenberg says, Vinaya Texts i.xv. 5 Vinaya Texts i.xv.

This is leading us up to the derivation of the word pāti- (pāṭi-) mokkha. Rhys Davids and Oldenberg, following Childers, refer it to pāṭi (Sanskrit, prati) + muc, and see in it “disburdening, getting free.”³ Buddhaghosa, too, at Visuddhimagga 16, derives it from muc, in the sense of being free from the punishments of niraya (hell) and other painful rebirths. But it was not the getting free that was of such importance as the being bound. This came first. Preceding the notion, if indeed it ever existed at the time when the Vinaya was compiled, that the monk should be free of sin or of the punishment for sin, came the assumption that the rules, as binding, should be followed and obeyed, and that a monk should be “bound by the restraint of the Pātimokkha” (Pātimokkhasañvarasañvuta).

S. Dutt is of the opinion that Pātimokkha means “bond.” He regards it as an external bond of union devised to convert the Sect of the Sakyaputtiya samaṇas into an Order.⁴ Rhys Davids and Steede in the Pali-English Dictionary say that it has the “sense of binding, obligatory, obligation,” and that the Sanskrit adaptation of the Pali should be pratimokṣya, “that which should be made binding,” and not prātimokṣa. Prātimokṣa, according to these lexicographers, is the same as the Pali Pātimokkha, “binding, obligatory,” from patimuñcati, to fasten, to bind.¹

¹ Vinaya Texts i.xiv. ² Vinaya Texts i.xv. ³ Vinaya Texts, i.xxviif. ⁴ Early Buddhist Monachism, p.89f.

Dr. E.J. Thomas, on the other hand, says that Pātimokkha is “in Sanskrit prātimoksha. In form it is an adjective formed from patimokkha, binding, from pati-muc- ‘to fasten or bind on (as armour),’ and thus should mean ‘that which binds, obligatory,’”² thus agreeing with the definition given in the Pali-English Dictionary, but not with the derivation.

The word is defined in the Mahāvagga of the Vinaya as the “face, head of all good states,”³ but as Winternitz pointed out this derivation “is quite impossible.”⁴ Winternitz himself was inclined to explain Pātimokkha as “that which is to be redeemed,”⁵ but unfortunately he did not support this statement, except by saying he thought that the correct translation of saṅgaraṁ Pātimokkhaṁ of Ja 5.25 should be “a promise to be redeemed.”

Nearly all these authorities agree that the term is borrowed from other sects, and dates from pre-Buddhist days.

The question of the composition of the Pātimokkha rules is one which, while being of the greatest interest, is not very likely to grow out of the speculative stage. This question has two sides to it: that of when and that of how the rules came to be formulated. I can only point out the existence of these problems, not attempting to solve them. The solution of the one would to a large extent elucidate the other.

The rules were either drawn up in their entirety in Gotama’s lifetime; or they were drawn up in their entirety after his parinibbāna (utter waning); or some were drawn up during his lifetime and others afterwards. The last assumption is that most generally favoured by scholars, who adduce “additions and modifications,” repetitions and inconsistencies, existing among the collection of rules.⁶ Again, if it were held that the rules were codified into their present shape after

¹ Cf. Vin 3.249, patimuñcati, to bind on or tie on a head-pad. ² History of Buddhist Thought, 15, n. 1. ³ Vin 1.103. ⁴ History of Indian Literature, ii.22, n. 2. ⁵ History of Indian Literature, ii.22, n. 2. ⁶ E.g. E.J. Thomas, History of Buddhist Thought, p.14.
Gotama’s parinibbāna, this would not at all necessarily mean that they were not known and enforced during his ministry. The question of how they were composed likewise suggests three alternatives: either that some actual event led up to the framing of each rule; or that they were all formulated in readiness to meet events, but before these had occurred; or that some had an historical source, while others owe their existence to precautionary imagination.

It is conceivable that not one of the Pātimokkha rules was framed until someone, lay-followers or the more dependable monks and nuns, had seen, heard or suspected a mode of behaviour which seemed to them unfitting in a member of one of Gotama’s Orders. Each rule is therefore very possibly the direct result of some actual event, and was not made with merely hypothetical cases of wrong-doing in mind. On detecting, even on suspecting that conduct unfitting in a recluse, unworthy of a monk had been perpetrated, the action was reported, as it is almost invariably stated, to Gotama, either by the errant monk himself or by those vigilant in the interests of the Order. The Suttavibhaṅga shows that if the action were found to be blameworthy, a course of training was set forth, a penalty was attached, and it henceforth became manifest that a breach of each rule of right conduct would incur a like penalty.

Prevention of unsuitable behaviour in monks and nuns seems to have rested on two bases. In the first place the presumption that a certain line of conduct had been forbidden by Gotama, apparently appealed to the purer-minded and more zealous monks. Secondly, the penalty, fixed commensurably with the breach of the rule, will doubtless have exercised a deterrent influence over the behaviour of some of those monks who were not susceptible to the dictates of loftier motives.

Although the framing of each major rule is without exception attributed to Gotama, it has never been suggested that at the inception of the Orders he thought over all the possible cases of wrong-doing and depravity of which the monks might be capable, and propounded a ready-made body of rules to meet every conceivable contingency.
It is, however, more likely that the majority of the rules grew up gradually, as need arose, and are the outcome of historical developments that went on within the Order. At the same time it would not have been impossible for the Sakyans to have borrowed at all events the outline of a compendium of rules from other sects. We cannot tell with any degree of accuracy the historical Order in which the rules were formulated. All that can be said is, that there is no need to imagine that offences were perpetrated and rules promulgated in the order in which they now appear in the Suttavibhaṅga.

Again, it is to my mind questionable whether all the offences, grave and petty, all the adroit evasions and twistings, all the cases of illness which prevented a rule from being carried out to the letter, all the multifarious detail of communal life, were reported to Gotama, who then pronounced his verdict, and either framed a new rule or altered an existing one.

The rules are doubtless ascribed to him so as to give them weight, but of what proportion he was in fact the author we can never know. We can merely judge that, as some of his disciples were competent to preach dhamma, so some would also have been competent to meet a case of wrong-doing by admonishment and rebuke, and by decreeing an appropriate penalty as a safeguard for the future. Indeed, in the Suttavibhaṅga, although by far the greater number of rules is said to have been enunciated by Gotama, many a sub-rule at least (as in Bu-Ss 9, Bu-Ss 10, Bu-Ss 11) is laid down without reference to the Founder. Although he remains the central figure in the Vinaya, any absence of reference to him is an indication either that some transgressions occurred and were legislated for after his parinibbāna (utter waning), or that, even while he was still alive, it was not thought necessary to trouble him with the entire mass of items, some of them very trivial, that was bound to arise in the organisation of “unenclosed” Orders of monks and nuns. This was the more complicated both because the members of the Orders were, and were recognised to be, at varying stages of spiritual development, and because their behaviour was not viewed solely as it affected internal policy, but also as it affected the laity.

For the believing laity, though naturally not to the forefront in the Vinaya, are in a remarkable way never absent, never far distant. They perpetually enter into the life of the Order as supporters, critics, donors, intensely interested; and themselves affected by Sakya, it seems that they were deeply anxious for its success. Thus the Vinaya does not merely lay down sets of rules whose province was confined to an internal conventional life. For this was led in such a way as to allow and even to encourage a certain degree of intercommunication with the lay supporters and followers, no less than with those lay people who were not adherents of the faith. What was important, was that the monks should neither abuse their dependence on the former, nor alienate the latter, but should so regulate their lives as to give no cause for complaint. With these aims in view, conduct that was not thought seemly for them to indulge in had to be carefully defined; and it became drafted in rule and precept.

Indian monasticism differs from Western in the important respect that the former stood in no need of fighting battles against temporal powers. The world in which Gotama’s Orders grew up was fully in favour of experiments in religious devotion. Such struggles as there were, were not between monks and the armies of hostile kings, not between monks and the active scorn of the world, but struggles, no less heroic in intention perhaps, to strengthen the monks against themselves and their human weaknesses, to endow them with goodness and virtue as the living witnesses to man’s desire for perfection, to fortify them for victory in the contest between the spirit and the flesh, between right and wrong—undying ideals to which many an ordinary layman ardently clung, but to which he could not himself aspire.

In the Vinaya literature that has come down to us, Gotama is nowhere shown as legislating for his lay-followers, as Mahāvīra did for his. Yet, even in the absence of a Vinaya for laymen, it is apparent that an attitude of toleration and common-sense admitted much that was permissible to the worldly section of the community that... was not considered to be fitting in monks. Had no difference been insisted upon, one of the most potent reasons for the existence and for the popularity of monks would have been rendered invalid. For one of the points of entering Gotama’s Order was to learn control of body, mind and speech. This, it was thought, was essential to spiritual progress, and was extremely hard to attain, unless the shackles of the household life had been laid aside. Then man, as monk, could more readily attain perfection and its fruit (arahattaphala), the goal of brahmacariya, the good, divine, holy or Brahma-life. Arahatta, as the goal, was at some time in the early history of the Order substituted for that other goal: an approach to Brahma, that Highest, an approach which India, in the sixth century B.C., held that each and every man was potentially capable of making. Because religion was understood in those days, men who, according to popular estimate, showed that they were on the Way to the Highest, were this regarded as Brahma or arahatta, were revered and not despised.

Yet, as in any others, the Vinaya shows that there were in Gotama’s Orders indolent, lax, greedy monks and nuns, those who were lovers of luxury, seekers after pleasure, makers of discord. We should, however, be greatly mistaken if we insisted upon regarding the Order as riddled by scandal, by abuses and by minor forms of wrong-doing. There is no doubt that these existed; but there is no justification, simply because they happen to be recorded, for exaggerating their frequency, or for minimising the probity and spiritual devotion of many men who, in Gotama’s days, were monks. Records of these are to be found in the Nikāyas, in the Thera-therī-gāthā; and, too much overlooked, there are in the Vinaya, the virtuous, moderate monks who, vexed and ashamed, complain of the misdemeanours of their fellows.

As historians, we must be grateful to these inevitable backsliders, for theirs is this legacy of the Pātimokkha rules. Had the Order contained merely upright, scrupulous monks and nuns—those who were steadfastly set on the goal of the Brahma-life, and those who had, in the circumstances, to voice their annoyance with the wrongdoers—in all likelihood the Vinaya, the Discipline, the Pātimokkha rules would not have come into being, and much of the early history of the Order would now be known to us solely through the indirect and fragmentary way of the Sutta-Piṭaka.

If monks behaved in a way that was censurable in monks, this does not necessarily mean that their conduct was wrong in itself. Various activities were not only permissible for lay-people, but were fully accepted to be such as could be unquestionably pursued by them. Marriage, negotiating for parties to a marriage, trading, the owning of possessions, are cases in point. Nor could we maintain that, before a particular course of training had been made known, the conduct of a monk was necessarily reprehensible if it resembled that which was legitimate for the laity. For all monks came into the Order from the laity. Therefore if it did not at once strike them that in certain respects their behaviour should change when their vocation changed, it is only natural that in the meantime they should have indulged in pursuits for which, as laity, they had attracted no adverse criticism.

I think it very likely that some of the courses of training for monks that are included in this volume were formulated as a result of this bringing over of lay-life into the religious life; for a difference between the two had to be made, and then maintained. Others most certainly were formulated as the result of behaviour which, whether evinced by a layman or a monk, would have been regarded as equally blameworthy; others, again, to prevent the monks from being an intolerable burden on the laity; while still others were formulated so as to preserve the harmony and well-being of the Order.

Now and again, monks, contemplating a certain action which they knew to be forbidden or which they knew to be wrong, are recorded to think: “There will be no blame for me.” Was this because they had done similar things while still “in the world” without incurring censure, and so thought that they would be immune from blame after they had gone forth? Or did they think that there was some reason why they personally would incur no offence for their deed? If so, spiritual pride had still to be humbled in them.

The Pātimokkha rules of the Pali Vinaya fall into eight sections, classified according to the gravity of the offence committed. Of these eight sections, only three are covered by the present volume. These are, first, the four Pārājika rules, framed to govern those offences, the most serious of all, which involve “defeat,” and whose penalty is expulsion from the Order; and secondly, the thirteen Saṅghādisesa rules, framed for the type of offence which is so grave as to necessitate a formal meeting of the Saṅgha, or whole community of monks present in the district or in the vihāra where the offence was committed. The penalties incurred for a Saṅghādisesa offence are chiefly that of being sent back by the monks to the beginning of the probationary period, together with that of undergoing the mānatta discipline. The terms pārājika, saṅghādisesa and mānatta are shortly discussed on BD 1.xxvi, BD 1.xxixff., BD 1.38, BD 1.195f. below.

Thirdly, included in this volume, are the two Aniyata rules, designed to meet offences whose nature is so “undetermined” that only individual circumstances can decide whether it is such as to involve defeat, or a formal meeting of the Order, thereby being linked with the two preceding sections of rules; or whether it is such as to require expiation (pācittiya). Because of this further possibility, the Aniyata rules are linked with the next group but one, the Pācittiya rules.

The first three Pārājika rules are levelled against the breach of a code of morality generally recognised and active among all civilised communities: against un-chastity, against the taking of what was not given, and against the depriving of life.

Evidently the aim of the strictures on unchastity, with which Bu-Pj 1 is concerned, was partly to bring the monks into line with members of other preceding and contemporary sects whose members, having renounced the household state, had to be celibate. This notion already had history behind it by the time the Sakyan Order of monks came into being. It was a notion based as much on common-sense, as on the conviction that restraint and self-taming were indispensable factors in the winning of the fruit of a monk’s life.

It is perhaps not necessary to believe that each or any of the many and curious forms of unchastity, mentioned in Bu-Pj\(^1\), ever was actually perpetrated by a monk. Such comprehensive treatment as is found is not needed either to support or to elucidate the meaning of the general rule. This was clear enough. It is possible, of course, that some of the delinquencies did occur, while others did not, but we do not know. In any case, it is also possible that at the time of the final recension, each rule was minutely scrutinised and analysed, and all the deviations from it, of which the recensionists had heard or which they could imagine, were formulated and added in some kind of order. For then there would be in the future no doubt of the class of offence (E.g. Pārājika, thullaccaya or dukkaṭa) to which any wrong behaviour that had been or should be committed, belonged, or of what was the statutory penalty for that offence. The smooth and detailed handling of some parts of the other Pārājika rules and of some of the Saṅghādisesa rules, likewise suggests that these are the outcome, not of events, so much as of lengthy and anxious deliberations. The recensionists had a responsible task. They were legislating for the future, and they would, I think, have been determined to define in as minute a way as possible the offence already stated in a general way in each major rule.

Stealing is ranked as a Pārājika (Bu-Pj\(^2\)), or the gravest kind of offence, not merely because civilisation agrees that, for various reasons, it is wrong to take something not given. It was particularly reprehensible for a Sakyan monk to steal, since at the time of his entry into the Order he morally renounced his claim to all personal and private possessions, and should henceforth have regarded anything he used as communal property, lent to him for his needs. In addition, it may be urged that if monks were restrained from stealing, any tendencies they may have had towards greed and gluttony, towards finery and luxury, towards carelessness in the use of their requisites, would have been reduced and perhaps eradicated, thus allowing a greater margin for the exercise of unfettered spiritual endeavour.
There is a point in Bu-Pj 2 to which I should like to draw attention. The rules concerned with taking what was not given show that stealing something of or above a definite, though small, value, namely, five māsakas,¹ is a more blameworthy offence than stealing something worth less than five māsakas. Five māsakas apparently constitute the lowest commercial value that an object can have, and anything less is presumably commercially valueless and therefore negligible. But all tendency towards acquisition had to be suppressed in the monks, all inclination to regard objects in the light of possible possessions to be checked. And further, it had to be remembered that monks might not know the exact value of some particular object.²

In Bu-Pj 2, the value in māsakas of the object stolen becomes the standard of moral transgression, and hence the criterion of the gravity of the offence committed: to steal something of more than five māsakas entails defeat; to steal something of the value of from one to four māsakas is said to be a grave offence;³ while to steal something worth less than one māsaka is called an offence of wrong-doing.⁴ Thus the gravity of the offence of stealing is shown to be to some extent dependent upon the value of the object stolen. At Vin 1.96, on the other hand, it is said to be an offence entailing defeat to steal even a blade of grass. These inconsistencies doubtless suggest that these rules were drawn up at different times.⁵

No doubt the depriving of life ranked as a Pārājika offence (Bu-Pj 3) partly because it is the very opposite of ahīṁsā, non-violence, non-injury, which was an idea prevalent in India before the advent of Sakya. Again, the teaching on rebirth and the allied teaching on karma, both pre-Sakyayan notions, would hold that the murderer, in consequence of his deed, obstructs his progress through the worlds, until he has worked off the fruit of his action. The problems of Freewill and Predetermination find no place in Indian philosophy. Man’s will is assumed to be free. Hence the murderer might have chosen otherwise: the deed of murdering was not pre-ordained. To incite a person to death was considered as bad as murdering him. For if praise of “the beauty of death” inspired him to die at will, if he cut himself off before he had done his time here, the fruits of past deeds, both good and ill, would still remain to be worked off by him.

¹ Below, BD 1.85. ² Below, BD 1.114. ³ Thullaccayā, a technical term. ⁴ Dukkaṭa, another technical term. ⁵ See Vinaya Texts, i.xxv, for plausible argument for the introduction of the new terms thullaccaya and dukkaṭa into the final recension of the Vinaya.

It may seem strange to a European living in the twentieth century that the offences of unchastity, stealing and murder receive the same legal punishment. But different ages have different values. In England, hanging was the penalty for sheep-stealing up to modern times. And the Pātimokkha rules relate to more than two thousand years ago, some of them being rooted in an even more remote antiquity. Besides, we must remember that they were for monks, and not only for Sakyan monks. The Jains had precepts corresponding to these first three Ālaya rules, as did the common precursors of Jain and Sakyan, the sañyāsins or brahmin ascetics and recluses.¹

Those who had gone forth into homelessness were to withstand all temptation and ambition offered by life “in the world,” they were to be beyond the reach of its quarrels, loves and hatreds. For, if they continued to behave as those who had not gone forth, their supporters would fall away, the non-believers would think but little of them, and the believers would not increase in number.

The injunctions against unchastity, the taking of what was not given, and against the depriving of life, besides corresponding to the brahmin and Jain precepts, also correspond to the first three Buddhist sīlas, moral “habits,” or precepts of ethical behaviour. These, however, run in reverse order from the Ālayakas, and begin with the precept of refraining from onslaught on creatures. Next comes refraining from taking what was not given, and thirdly the precept of refraining from unchastity (here called abrahmacariya, as it is in the Jain sutras). The fourth Ālaya, alone of the Ālayakas, does not find any corresponding matter among the sīlas. If the relation of the Ālayakas to the sīlas were worked out, some cogent reason for these discrepancies might emerge.

¹ See Jacobi, Jaina Sūtras, i.xxiii (Sacred Books of the East XXII).
At present I can only suggest that the fourth Pārājika, of which I have shortly spoken elsewhere,¹ is concerned more with a monk’s spiritual state than with his outward behaviour.² In this it differs from the silas, and more interesting still, from the other Pātimokkha rules. These are, with the striking exception of the fourth Pārājika, concerned with the here and now, with the regulation of certain aspects of community life, with matters affecting the Order, with the arrangement of various mundane affairs, with questions of conduct concerning the opposite sex and the lay followers, with questions of property.

The curious fourth Pārājika, concerned with the offence of “claiming a state or quality of further-men” (uttarimanussadhamma), seems to have been fashioned in some different mould, and to belong to some contrasting realm of values. It is by no means a mere condemnation of boasting or lying in general, for it is the particular nature of the boast or the lie which makes the offence one of the gravest that a monk can commit: the boast of having reached some stage in spiritual development, only attainable after a long training in the fixed and stable resolve to become more perfect, and to make the potential in him assume actuality. The seriousness of the offence of unfoundedly claiming a state of further-men is further emphasised by the statement at Pārājika 4 that, if a deliberate lie is uttered in connection with such a claim, then that lie constitutes an offence entailing defeat. Yet, in the Suttavibhaṅga, it is far more common to find that deliberate lying ranks as an offence requiring expiation (pācittiya), which is not nearly so grave as one “involving defeat.”

I have suggested elsewhere that the claiming of a state, or states, of further-men, to which the claimant was not entitled, could have only appeared as a most heinous offence to people by whom a teaching on becoming, on becoming more perfect, of going further, was held in much esteem. Perhaps the greatest of Mrs. Rhys Davids’ many contributionsto theinterpretation of Early Buddhism, is that this idea of becoming was of living power and force to Gotama’s early followers. If so, one may conclude, tentatively, that the fourth Pārājika belongs to an ancient Sakyan stratum, and that in this, other-worldly (lokuttara) matters were held to be as important as, if not more so than, worldly (loka) matters. For I think it possible that the Pārājikas are arranged in an ascending scale of gravity, in which the offence held to be the worst morally, though not legally, is placed last. Be this as it may, if spiritual progress and development had not been valued by the Sakyans, to whom this precept appears to be peculiar, the offence of untruly claiming the attainment of this or that advanced spiritual state could not have ranked as a Pārājika offence.

¹ Early Buddhist Theory of Man Perfected, p.111ff. ² The fifth Jain precept, to renounce all interest in worldly things, calling nothing one’s own (aparigraha), seems to be on a rather different basis from the other Jain precepts.

It should be remarked that talk on conditions of further-men, though not absent from the Sutta-Piṭaka, is at no place accentuated in it. There is, for example, a Saṁyutta passage, which is the exact parallel of a long Vinaya passage, with the noteworthy exception that in the former there is no reference to Moggallāna as one held by other monks to be claiming a state of further-men, an imputed claim which seems to be the pivot of the Vinaya passage.¹ I have chosen to translate pārājika by “defeat” chiefly, I admit, because Rhys Davids and Oldenberg rendered it in this way. They follow Buddhaghosa, who, to quote E.J. Thomas, ² “interprets pārājika as ‘suffering defeat,’ and the Mūlasarvāstivādins appear to do the same (Mahāvyutpatti 278, 279).” The editors of Vinaya Texts refer “the word to the passive of ji (to defeat) with parā prefixed.”³ B.C. Law also considers these four rules are concerned with “acts which bring about defeat.”⁴ Although it may be grammatically incorrect to refer pārājika to parā-ji,⁵ to my mind no more convincing derivation has so far been put forward. Burnouf’s idea⁶ (adopted by Childers⁷ and others) is that pārājika is derived from parā+aj, meaning a crime which involves the expulsion or exclusion of the guilty party. parā+aj may be a better source, grammatically speaking, for pārājika than is parā + ājī. Yet, that the sense intended is “defeat,” seems to me rather less doubtful than that it is expulsion, and ājī, though a Vedic root, meaning “to drive away,” is unknown as a root in Pali.

It might be argued that because in each promulgation of the Pārājika rules the words pārājiko hoti is followed by the word asaṁvāso, “not in communion,” this is because the two are complementary, asaṁvāso filling out the sense intended by pārājika. Such an argument would naturally increase the tendency to regard pārājika as a word standing for expulsion or exclusion, probably of a permanent nature.¹ But may it not be that pārājika and asaṁvāso represent not complementary, but disparate ideas, the not being in communion introducing a new notion, and one connected with and dependent upon not expulsion, but defeat?

If a monk were found to be unworthy to be in communion, unfit to take his part in the communal acts and jurisdiction, then he would have to be expelled. But equally, he would have to cease to be in communion (which would entail expulsion, either temporary or permanent), if he found that he was defeated in his endeavour “to achieve the end for which he entered the Order.”²

It is beyond all doubt that the punishment for breach of the Pārājika rules indeed involves expulsion. But it seems unnecessary to take the etymologically obscure pārājika itself to mean expulsion, when this notion is covered by the word asaṁvāso, with which, as I have said, pārājika is always coupled in the formulation of the Pārājika rules. In addition, it may be remarked that the Suttavībhaṅga has the verb nāseti (causative of nassati), meaning “to be expelled.”³

In such a very controversial case, I have preferred to follow the commentator. It appears very probable that many of these words: Pātimokkha, Pārājika itself, Saṅghādisesa, were adopted from pre-Buddhist sects, and thus had some tradition behind them. Now, it may well be that the commentator explained the word pārājika according to a meaning that for it and for him had become traditional. In which case, such an explanation will as truly enshrine something of the history of that word as later and inconclusive attempts at grammatical analysis. Moreover, the reference, in the third formulation of Pārājika 1, to not disavowing the training and not declaring weakness, together with the subsequent detailed analysis of these phrases (below, BD 1.42ff.), to my mind lends weight to the suggestion that a monk becomes one who is defeated (pārājiko hoti)¹ through his own inability or “weakness” to lead the Brahma-life.

---

¹ E.J. Thomas, History of Buddhist Thought, 16; Kern, Manual of Indian Buddhism, 85. ² B.C. Law, History of Pali Literature, i.47, n. 1; also cf. p.50. ³ E.g. Vin 3.33, Vin 3.40 = BD 1.50, BD 1.62 below.

Like the Pārājika rules, the Saṅghādisesas begin (in Bu-Ss 2–Bu-Ss 1 is in a category apart) with four rules connected with a monk’s conduct towards women. Then come two rules (Bu-Ss 6, Bu-Ss 7) in which injunctions for building a hut and a vīhāra on sites approved by other monks, are set forth. The point of these rules appears to be to prevent monks from begging building materials too greedily from the laity, and to prevent them from building anywhere where animal life would be endangered or destroyed. The force of the injunction that the hut or the vīhāra must have an open space round it, is difficult to interpret, and the Old Commentary gives no practical help. It probably means that no monk should live in a secret place. The laity, who had contributed to the building of the hut or vīhāra, would very likely wish to have seen that the monk was behaving in a way worthy of their gift, and hence his conduct and habits must be open to unhindered inspection.

Bu-Ss 8 and Bu-Ss 9 comprise rules against the defamation of one monk by another. Then come two against the making of a schism in the Order, while Bu-Ss 12 is concerned with the offence that a monk incurs if he is difficult to speak to. All such transgressions, leading to disharmony in the Order, would have made it hard for the Order to maintain itself and to progress. And if there had been repeated quarrels, discord and stubbornness, the Order would have become discredited among its lay supporters.

¹ On hoti = bhavati to become, see Mrs. Rhys Davids, To Become or Not to Become, p.18ff.

The twelfth Saṅghādisesa should be compared with the Anumāna Sutta.¹ The Old Commentary’s definition of dubbacajātika, “difficult to speak to” (Vin 3.178 = BD 1.311 below), is word for word the same as the Anumāna’s description of the monk whom his fellows consider unfit to be taught or, instructed.² Buddhaghosa states³ that the Ancients (porāṇā) called this Sutta the Bhikkhu-Pātimokkha. This leads us to wonder if the twelfth Saṅghādisesa indeed represents some specially ancient fragment of the Pātimokkha, and whether, while the rules were being shaped, refusal to take the training with deference and respect appeared amongst the earliest offences that a monk could commit.

The last and thirteenth Saṅghādisesa rule is against bringing families into disrepute. This, again, would make the Order unpopular among the lay followers. It must be remembered that it was considered highly important to propitiate these, to court their admiration, to keep their allegiance, to do nothing to annoy them. For without their active interest and support the Order could not have endured. It is true that, had it been disbanded, the Sakyaputtyas, as individuals, would not have come to starvation. For the “holy man,” be he samāna, sādhu, sañyāsin or fakir, in India always has had his physical needs fulfilled. And some Sakyaputtyas doubtless could have reverted to a household life; while others might have gone to dwell in the forests, there to subsist on fruits and roots (phalamūla), and to dress in bark and antelopes’ hides, as did some of their brahmin precursors and contemporaries. But, in fact, the Order became a powerful magnet, attracting men and women from many and various families, classes, trades and occupations, from the ranks of the Jains and Wanderers (paribbājaka). Historically, the success of the Early Buddhist experiment in monasticism must be in great part attributed to the wisdom of constantly considering the susceptibilities and criticisms of the laity.

¹ MN15. Buddhaghosa at Vin-a 742, says that this Sutta is one of the five spoken for the disciples of the four groups (i.e., monks and nuns, male and female lay-followers). ² MN i.95, line 12ff. ³ MN-a ii.67.

Like the meaning of pārājika, the meaning of saṅghādisesa is controversial. Again B.C. Law¹ and I follow Vinaya Texts in rendering saṅghādisesa as offences (or rules or matters) which require a formal meeting of the Order.

Now, one part of the penalty imposed for a breach of any one of the thirteen Saṅghādisesa rules, namely, a return to the beginning of the probationary period, has apparently led Kern, for example, to describe the Saṅghādisesas as offences “involving suspension and a temporary exclusion”²—from the Order or from taking part in its legal procedure is not made clear, though the latter must be meant. The other part of the penalty, namely, the necessity of undergoing the mānatta discipline, has apparently led E.J. Thomas,³ for example, to describe these offences as those which involve “a period of penance and reinstatement by the Assembly.” Burnouf suggests⁴ that saṅghādisesa means “that which should be declared to the Saṅgha from the beginning to the end.” He further states that the Chinese syllables, pho chi cha, the equivalents of ādisesa, are “probably altered.” This may be because the Pali had already been altered from some more definite phrase containing less ambiguity and obscurity. Childers suggests⁵ that this class of offence is so called because as much in the beginning (ādi) as in the end (sesa) a Saṅgha is required to administer the stages of penalty and ultimately rehabilitation.

Neither of the descriptions—suspension or penance—is contained etymologically in the word saṅghādisesa. That both were penalties incurred by this type of offence is indubitable. But by derivation, the compound saṅghādisesa could not possibly mean either suspension, mānatta discipline or reinstatement. Comparison with the Sanskrit brings us no nearer to an elucidation. For as Kern remarks,⁶ “Neither a Sanskrit Saṅghāvaśesa nor Saṅghātiśesa, i.e. remnant of the Saṅgha, renders a satisfactory meaning.”

In the circumstances it is best to allow that we are in the realm of ancient technicalities, whose exact significance the passage of time has dimmed. In a translation, we can, however, pay due regard to the only member of the compound saṅghādisesa which is neither grammatically obscure nor controversial. This is saṅgha, meaning for Sakya the Order, or any part of the whole Order resident within a certain boundary, district or vihāra. That the offence could not be settled without the intervention of the Order is a point for which there is the support of the Old Commentary. This states clearly that “it is the Order which places (the wrong-doer) on probation, it sends (him) back to the beginning, it inflicts the mānatta, it rehabilitates.”¹ Moreover, as noted by Childers, Rhys Davids and Oldenberg, this type of punishment had to be enforced, could only be enforced, by formal resolutions (saṅghakamma) carried at meetings of the Order.

It is just possible that kamma, most usually work, which the Old Commentary states is a synonym for this class of offence, has also a specialised sense of “proceedings, ceremony performed by a lawfully constituted Saṅgha of monks.” Such proceedings were formal in character, with motions and resolutions, and rules for their validity. Thus, if kamma were indeed a synonym for this class of offence, and if it means acts of a formal nature, then what saṅghādisesa means is a type of offence whose punishment must be meted out by some formal administration on the part of the Order.

It may well be that the penalty for every class of offence could be imposed, or came at some time to be regarded as effective, only as the result of the jurisdiction of the Order met together in solemn conclave. This, however, would not prove that the word saṅghādisesa does not contain some special reference to the Order as that instrument which, in this type of offence, administers the penalty. It is more than possible that some of the other rules were known and named before the codification of the Pātimokkha, but that the penalty for breaking them could be imposed by one or more individuals. Otherwise it could hardly have been necessary for the Old Commentary expressly to state that it is the Order, and not one man or many persons, which imposes the Saṅghādisesa penalties.¹

¹ See below, BD 1.196.

As S. Dutt shrewdly observes,² “It is significant that only one of the group of offences (Saṅghādisesa) is mentioned as coming within the disciplinary jurisdiction of the Saṅgha, and it is in the case of this group only that certain penalties to be imposed upon the bhikkhu, even against his will ... viz. Parivāsa and Mānatta, are laid down. In the case of the other offences it is nowhere stated or suggested in the Pātimokkha itself that the Saṅgha should have jurisdiction over them, and no mode of exercising such jurisdiction is defined, as in the case of the Saṅghādisesas.”

It is not impossible that originally the various Saṅghas, which were really sub-divisions of the whole Saṅgha, exercised their jurisdiction over each individual member only in the case of the Saṅghādisesa offences, only coming later to exercise such jurisdiction in the case of all classes of offence. If this is so, we do well, I think, to underline the formalities which the Saṅghādisesa offences entailed, and were very likely alone in so doing at first. For by this means some early feature of the Order’s history may be kept in mind.

The two Aniyatas, or undetermined matters, evince a remarkable amount of trust put in a woman lay-follower. Doubtless Visākhā was one of the most generous pātron of the Order, a great supporter of the faith, to whom the Order had full reason to be grateful. Here she is shown expostulating with Uḍāyin for what seemed to her unsuitable behaviour in a monk. The interesting thing is that both the Aniyata rules, generalised as are all the Pātimokkha courses of training from a particular case, allow a monk “to be dealt with” according to what a trustworthy woman lay-follower should say. Thus Visākhā, herself eminently trustworthy and single-minded in her efforts to improve conditions in the Order, is instrumental in bringing to all reliable women lay-followers the responsibility of procuring investigation into a monk’s conduct, if she has seen him sitting secluded with a woman. These two Aniyata rules indicate the respect and deference that was, at that time, paid to women. They were not scornfully brushed aside as idle gossips and frivolous chatter-boxes, but their words were taken seriously.

¹ See below, BD 1.196. ² Early Buddhist Monachism, p.105.

It may be pointed out here that the Vinaya shows, that if monks went astray, this was not always due to the baneful influence of women. For now and again monks took the initiative, and begged and cajoled laywomen and even nuns. Sometimes they got what they wanted, at others the women stood firm. When they asked lewd questions, women are shown as being innocent of their meaning.¹ It is also apparent from the two Aniyatas that women of the world might do certain things with impunity, but that those same things, if done by Sakyan recluses, were blameworthy. Their life was to be organised on a different basis, as Pārājika ¹ shows, from that of the laity, and a recognition of this, and attempts to preserve the difference, are visible in many parts of Vinaya III.

The Old Commentary, or Padabhājanīya, is now incorporated in the Suttavibhaṅga, and forms an integral part of it. Since it explains each Pātimokkha rule word by word, so that we get from it the meaning which the words possessed at all events at the time when the Old Commentary was compiled, this ancient exegesis, often of very great interest, is a most valuable critical apparatus. The purpose of the Old Commentary was evidently to make each rule absolutely clear, so that no misconception could arise through lack of lucid definition. Words not contained in the rule, but appearing in the stories, are not commented upon.

Rhys Davids and Oldenberg think that when the rules had been formulated and each word interpreted, some explanation was wanted as to how the rules originated. Thus, they hold, stories were invented to introduce each rule. Personally I do not think it necessary to take quite such a hard-and-fast view. For it seems to me possible that in some cases the story may be true, or may have had some historical foundation, so that the rule came to be made on account of the self-same events which, later, were recorded. In other cases, the story may quite possibly be an invention, the original reason for framing the rule and the name of the first wrong-doer involved having long been forgotten. It would now be very difficult to judge which stories may be more or less true and which may be purely fictitious.

¹ BD 1.219 below.

The point of the series of short stories or incidents, which usually follow the Old Commentary’s exegesis, is to show what exceptions could be made to a rule, what exemptions were permissible, what lesser and sometimes what graver offences were incurred, and what was an offence from which there could be no exemption since it tallied in all its main respects with that which had led to the framing of the rule. These stories are not invariably ascribed to any particular person, as are those introducing the rule. They not seldom attach the behaviour which needs consideration to “a certain monk.”

These stories reveal the existence of different grades of penalty for different types of offence against the main rules. Not merely are there five great classes of offences—Pārājika, Saṅghādisesa, Nissag- giya Pācittiya, Pācittiya and Pāṭidesaniya—there are also thullaccaya (grave) offences, and dukkaṭa offences (those of wrong-doing). These are of constant recurrence in the stories, or “Notes giving the exceptions to, and extensions of, the Rule in the Pātimokkha.”¹ Of rarer appearance are offences of wrong speech. One or other of these offences is said to be incurred if behaviour has approximated to that which a particular Pātimokkha rule has been designed to restrain, but which is, so far as can be judged, not so grave in nature as a breach of the rule itself, because of certain differences in its execution, or because of certain extenuating circumstances.

Sometimes the stories are grouped together to form a set. Although, where this occurs, each story may show no more than a minute variation from the others, they are all set out at length. Putting the gist of the stories into general terms, each one would then read something as follows: If this is done, but not that, though the other thing is done, such and such an offence is incurred. If this is done and that, but not the other thing, such and such an offence is incurred. If this is not done, but that is done, and the other thing is (is not) done, such and such an offence is incurred. And so on through permutation and combination of deeds done or not done, until the final case is achieved where no offence is incurred.

¹ Vinaya Texts i.xix.

These groups of stories are apt to be tedious to Western readers. I have therefore put them, when they occur, into a smaller type, as also other passages concerned with small shades of differences. Doubtless such meticulous detail was useful in defining exactly what was lawful and what was not lawful for monks to do, and in preventing the evasions which from time to time they seemed ready to attempt. As history, these stories are as interesting in evincing an Oriental love and management of detail as in revealing items of topical value in regard to manners and customs. The manner and time of their formulation are as problematical as those of the major rules.

At the end of each Pārājika, Saṅghādisesa and Aniyata Rule, general circumstances are stated where the breach of the rule is riot to be counted as an offence. The most comprehensive of these is when a monk is mad, in pain or a beginner. Others have a more specialised import. Thus, for example, there is said to be no offence if a monk had some course of behaviour forced upon him, but did not consent to it (as in Bu-Pj 1); if he did something accidentally, not intending to do it (as in Bu-Pj 3); if he did something unsuitable, being under a misapprehension (as in Bu-Pj 2).

The occasions when it is stated that no offence is incurred are all remarkable for their humane and lenient tone, for their reasonableness and common-sense. Thus there is no offence if something not given is taken for the sake of food (Bu-Pj 2.738), or is only taken for the time being (Bu-Pj 2.7.40), it being assumed, apparently, that there was the intention of returning it. Again, two occasions are recorded\(^1\) where a monk died, in the one case through being tickled,\(^2\) and in the other through being trod upon.\(^3\) Yet no murderous act was done, or the verdict would have been different, and not that “there is no offence involving defeat.” It seems probable that the monks who died were nervy, delicate or infirm, and received a shock or heart-attack resulting in their death, but had they been in normal health they would have come to no harm.

It must be admitted that several early literatures have a coarse side. That the translations of Pali canonical works have so far been not in the least offensive, is mainly, or it may be said only, because the Sutta-Piṭaka and the Abhidhamma-Piṭaka deal chiefly with spiritual matters. The Vinaya, on the other hand, being concerned with behaviour, is forced occasionally to go into some aspects of life irrelevant to the subject-matter of the other two Piṭakas. Such expositions are, however, almost entirely confined to Pārājika\(^1\) and Saṅghādisesa\(^1\).

With regard to this preservation of crude passages in the Vinaya, three points must be insisted upon. In the first place they were neither spoken nor written down for a general public, but were intended only for the devotees of celibacy. Secondly, the motive which led to their being uttered or written down was not a desire to shock, but the need to prevent unchastity. Thirdly, the pattern on which the compilers of the Suttavibhaṅga worked was one of almost unbelievable detail, for in their efforts to be lucid, case after case of possible or actual deviation from the general rule was investigated, penalised and perpetuated. Hence it cannot justly be said that the tendency to be detailed is greater or more insistent in one Pārājika, or in one

---

1 Vin 3.84 (=BD 1.145, BD 1.146 below). 2 āngulipatodaka. Pali-English Dictionary has “nudging with the fingers,” Critical Pali Dictionary “tickling with the fingers.” Dialogues of the Buddha i.113 has in the text “nudging one another with the fingers,” but Dialogues of the Buddha i.113, n. 3, in referring to the above Vinaya passage (= Vin 4.110) says: “It must there mean ‘tickling.’” gs iv.225 (AN iv.343) has “poking one another with the fingers.” 3 Or ottharati may mean to spread out, to stretch out.
Sanghādisesa, than in others. Such lack of restraint as is found may be embarrassing to us, but it must be remembered that early peoples are not so much afraid of plain speech as we are. No stigma of indecency or obscenity should therefore be attached to such Vinaya passages as seem unnecessarily outspoken to us. For they were neither deliberately indecent nor deliberately obscene. The matters to which they refer had to be legislated for as much as had matters of theft and murder, of choosing sites for huts and vihāras.

Nevertheless the differences in the outlook of an early society and a modern one may easily be forgotten or disregarded. I have therefore omitted some of the cruder Suttavibhaṅga passages, and have given abbreviated versions of others, while incorporating them in their unabridged state in Pali in an Appendix, and marking them by an asterisk in the text. Even in omitting or expurgating such passages, I yet think that they are interesting historically, scientifically and psychologically, even psycho-analytically, and that they might be of value to anyone making a detailed comparison of Eastern and Western Monachism.

Of the various forms of address recorded in Vin 3.1-194 (to which this volume of translation corresponds), the most frequent are bhagavā, bhante, bho, āyasma, āvuso, ayya, bhagini. I will do no more now than briefly indicate them, leaving a fuller investigation to the Introduction to the final volume, when all the Vinaya data for modes of address will be before us.

Only Gotama is recorded to be addressed as bhagavā. This, therefore, is a very honourable term, which I have rendered by “lord.”

Bhante, one of several vocative forms of bhavant, is of very frequent occurrence. When Gotama is addressed as bhante, I have used the rendering “lord.” In order to preserve this appellation for him alone, when the named and unnamed monks who are his disciples are addressed as bhante, I have used the rendering “honoured sir.”

Bho (plural bhonto), another vocative form of bhavant, appears to be a more familiar form of address than is bhante, and is used as between equals, or from a superior to an inferior. It is of fairly frequent occurrence, sometimes being followed by another vocative, such as a proper name. I have translated bho as “good sir.”

Āyasmā is not a form of address. It is an honorific designation, and is the most usual way in which monks and theras are referred to in the narrative, followed by their proper name. I have translated it as “the venerable.” Nuns are never designated by this term, nor are lay-people.

Āvuso may be said to be the habitual mode of address used between monks. The only other word that they appear to use in speaking to one another is bhante. They are also recorded to address laymen as āvuso, and this practice is sometimes reversed, although the laity seem more usually to have said bhante in speaking to the monks, sometimes combined with ayya. I have translated āvuso as “your reverence” and “reverend sir.” Since āvuso is masculine in form, it was never used in addressing nuns.

Ayya and ayyo (nominantive plural used as a vocative) are frequently used in speaking of a person and in addressing him, both directly and obliquely. It appears to be more flexible than the other terms noted above, both with regard to those who use it and with regard to those to whom it is applied. I have translated it as “master” if followed by a proper name, and as “the master” if this is not the case. It is not infrequently combined with bhante. Ayya was an epithet in use among the laity, as well as between the laity and the monks. But in the part of the Vinaya translated in this volume it does not happen that a lay-person is addressed as ayya by a monk, or that any monk is so addressed by a fellow-monk.

Although monks did not address their fellows in the Brahma-life as ayya, nuns use ayye (feminine, “lady, noble lady”) in speaking to one another. Laywomen also use this form of address in speaking to nuns and to other laywomen. Monks, however, never appear to address either nuns or laywomen as ayye.

1 Franke in Journal of the Pali Text Society, 1908, holds that the Cullavagga Council reports were invented exercises to show ways of address. His argument is based on the decree of DN ii.154, ascribed to the dying Gotama, after which seniors were to address juniors as āvuso, while juniors were to address seniors as bhante. The terms āvuso and bhante were also in use among the Jains, cf. Āyāraṅgasutta (PTS edition), e.g. p.106.

_Bhagini_, “sister,” is the most usual way in which monks are recorded to address both laywomen and nuns. Yet nuns do not, as far as is recorded, address one another as _bhagini_. Unluckily, in this portion of the Vinaya there are no records of intercommunication between nuns and laywomen, so we get here no indication of how they addressed one another.

From these short notes it will have emerged that the words _bhikkhu_ and _bhikkhunī_ do not occur as forms of address used between the two sections of the religious community, any more than that lay-people address monks and nuns with these terms. On the other hand, Gotama is sometimes recorded to address a monk as _bhikkhu_, and also to refer to individual monks in this fashion. And there is a certain story (Vin 3.131 = BD 1.220 below) in which a female wanderer addresses a monk as _bhikkhu_. In the narrative, monks are ordinarily spoken of as _bhikkhu_, unless the personal name of the monk concerned has been recorded. If it has, it is usually preceded by āyasmā, and never, I think, by _bhikkhu_. On the other hand, the narrative, if referring to a nun, consistently calls her _bhikkhunī_, and this description precedes her proper name, if this has been recorded. In this part of the Suttavibhaṅga there are no records showing Gotama speaking with nuns, so we have no means of knowing how he usually addressed them. When speaking of them, he is, however, recorded to have used the word _bhikkhunī_.

The translation of the term _bhikkhu_ presents many difficulties. I have selected the term “monk” and have rejected “mendicant, almsman, brother, friar,” not necessarily because “monk” is the most literal, but, for reasons which I will state shortly, it appears to me the best and most suitable rendering.

Although neither “monk,” nor the terms rejected, are precise equivalents for _bhikkhu_, I could not find sufficient grounds for leaving bhikkhu untranslated, as though it were untranslatable. Further, I became more and more convinced that where an English word is possible, where it coincides to some extent with the significance of the Pali, although the known facts of history preclude full identity of meaning, it is more desirable to use it than to leave the word untranslated. Untranslated words are balking to the English reader, and it is for the English reader that this series is primarily designed. But before giving the reasons which determined my choice of “monk” as the nearest equivalent for bhikkhu, a few words must be said about each of the terms that has not been selected.

“Mendicant,” literally “a beggar for alms,” from mendicare, to beg, mendicus, “a beggar,” is also doubtless etymologically correct¹ as a translation of bhikkhu. Yet, I think, it lays too much emphasis on one aspect only of the bhikkhu’s life, and ignores the other connotations of bhikkhu adduced by the Old Commentary,² as well as his functions of meditation and preaching. Moreover, in English it has no feminine, unless one falls back on the cumbersome “woman (or female) mendicant” as one is forced to say “woman (or female) slave” (dāsī) and “woman (or female) recluse” (samaṇī), a practice to be avoided as far as possible.

Professor B.M. Barua speaks of the bhikṣus as “Buddhist mendicants, monks or recluses,”³ a sentence which well shows the hesitation which all translators must feel in trying to translate the term bhikkhu. An objection here would be, though it is a fault into which we all fall, that “Buddhist” is an anachronism, since “Buddhist” and “Buddhism” are terms of a much later invention. “Sakyan mendicant” would be possible; and it is true that here, as in all the other translations for bhikkhu that are being considered, the word “Sakyan” is wanted in all cases where it is necessary to distinguish the monastic followers of Gotama from those adherents of other sects who were also known as bhikṣu. But I doubt if the Pali Canon demands the drawing of such a distinction, for in it, I believe, the term bhikkhu denotes exclusively the Sakyan bhikkhu. Moreover, if it came to the feminine, the phrase “Sakyan female mendicant” would be unwieldy, and it seems a pity to use three words where two should suffice.

---

¹ Introduction à l’History du Buddhisme indien, 2nd edition, p. 245, where he says that the sense of the word bhikkhu means exactly “one who lives by alms.” ² Vin 3.24. ³ Maskari as an Epithet of Gośāla, Indian History Quarterly, iii.2, p. 253.

“Almsman” has “almswoman” for its feminine, and is further doubtless etymologically correct. For bhikṣa and bhikṣuḥ (Sanskrit) are the noun and participle derived from the desiderative base of bhaj, to beg, to beg for alms. But again, like “mendicant,” it lays too strong a stress on one aspect only of what the words bhikkhu and bhikkunī came to stand for. For the Sakyan bhikkhu came to be much more than one dependent on others for the necessities of life. This is one of the reasons why I have not adopted Lord Chalmers’ rendering of “almsman”¹ here, as I have elsewhere.² Again, “almsman” may not inevitably mean one who asks for or who lives on alms, for it may also be used to mean a giver of alms. In addition, “almsman” would have a cumbersome translation in German and some other European languages. Hence I think that, as a possible rendering, it should be rejected.

“Brother” is, as a translation of bhikkhu, historically incorrect. It is the term by which bhikkhu is rendered in the Cambridge translation of the Jātakas, and the English title of the PTS translation of the Theragāthā reads “Psalms of the Brethren.” Thera is merely a bhikkhu of long standing. In spite of the recommendation for “brother” derived from its use in these works, the advance in Pali studies since the date of their publication shows that bhikkhu does not mean what “brother” means. It might be argued that the term “brother” draws attention to the bhikkhu’s relation to his fellow-members of the religious community, and that such a relation was explicitly recognised, in so far as bhikkhus addressed the bhikkunīs not as bhikkhunī but as bhagini, “sister.”

Yet against this argument we must set the fact that neither Order looked to anyone or to any kind of being as their “father” or their “mother.” Nor were the vihāras ruled over by anyone corresponding to an abbot, father or bishop. Power of authority was not vested in an individual, but in the Pātimokkha courses of training and the Order (Saṅgha) of monks. All that can be said is, that the bhikkhus were “brethren” to the extent that, apart from the three grades of theras (Elders), those of middle standing, and novices, no hierarchy existed among them, but terms of more or less equality.

¹ Further Dialogues of the Buddha. ² Women under Primitive Buddhism.

There is, besides, another argument, to my mind so insuperable as to extinguish the claims of “brother” as in any way a suitable term by which to render bhikkhu. For bhātar, the accepted word for “brother,” and one in current terminology, was never apparently regarded as synonymous with bhikkhu, and indeed never seems to have been connected with members of the Order. These are never recorded to address one another or laymen as bhāta. Nor do the laypeople so address them. Had “brother” been wanted, had it been able to fulfil some purpose in the monastic life, surely bhātar would have been used, for it was to hand. As it is, the word seems to have been restricted in its use to the relationship of blood-brothers,¹ and even among the laity bhāta was not used in address, but tāta (dear).

With this absence of bhātar as a term used in the religious life, it is curious that monks used its opposite, bhaginī. But it should be noted that they addressed laywomen as well as nuns as bhaginī. Hence the word bhaginī is clearly precluded from containing any unique reference to bhikkhunīs. Thus the two terms, bhaginī and bhikkhunī cannot be said to be precisely equivalent in meaning. The latter is applicable to women to whom the former is not applicable. Yet the implication remains, if words mean anything, that monks regarded women as “sisters,” while they did not regard men as “brothers.”
There must be some historical reason for this. I venture to suggest that the celibacy to which the monk was consecrated was answerable for his looking upon women as bhaginī. But I am not prepared to say that this is the whole story, although I believe that it may be the root of the matter.²

¹ E.g. at Thig.408, Ja.1308. ² Cf. sn iv.110, where, however, there is also mention of the “mother-mind” and “daughter-mind.”
“Friar,” although it has the English feminine “friarress,” does not appear to me such an acceptable rendering for bhikkhu as is “monk.” It is true that friars are much more than mendicants or almsmen, as a bhikkhu is, or came to be, much more than one who merely begs for alms. When, in the West, mendicancy became symbolic under St. Francis, the friars were to beg, as other poor men. The Sakyan bhikkhu, too, had to beg. Yet the growing belief that merit was to be acquired by giving in many cases inspired the laity to give before they had been begged. Hence begging did not take, such a high place in the duties of Gotama’s Order as it did in the West after St. Francis’ death; and I doubt if, in India, it was ever symbolic.

On the other hand, “friar,” being derived from la, is open to the same general objections as is “brother.” Moreover, the Western friar, a later development than the monk, and with the monastic tradition behind him, never aimed at saving himself. He was a brother to the whole world, and went about talking to people at the wayside, to birds and animals; while the prime concern of bhikkhus, however much they may have preached, was with the attainment of their own perfection.

Having now considered various arguments for and against mendicant, almsman, brother, friar as translations of bhikkhu, I will put forward the reasons which led me to choose “monk” for this term, and “nun” for bhikkhuni. It may be that only a profound study of Western Monachism could fully justify or condemn this choice, but from a superficial study it would appear that the similarities between a “monk” and a bhikkhu outweigh their differences. These similarities and differences must be judged by the historical associations of the two words. Etymologically they are not connected. Yet in the East and in the West there were these movements, comparable in a general way, though varying in detail, towards ordering and organising religious life in a fashion that necessitated its devotees renouncing their former modes of life and their former worldly pre-occupations.

The two words, monk and bhikkhu, are the outcome of certain and definite historical tendencies. Because these did not follow the same course of development in East and West, the two words, although comparable in meaning, are not synonymous. For each is the expression of a particular phase of that development. If this is borne in mind, if we remember that we are dealing with historical variations of a common tendency, it will seem to us less remarkable that Western terminology offers no equivalent with which the term bhikkhu can be made exactly to fit, and more remarkable that a study in comparisons is as possible as it is.

The Western monk, coming into Europe from the East, has, like the Buddhist bhikkhu, a long and complicated history, and monks of one century and Order differ considerably from monks of another century and Order. The word monk (monachus) is derived from monos, meaning “alone.” For originally monks abandoned the worldly life for the sake of that solitude in which, by meditation and contemplation, they could attempt to save their souls. Communion with God would enable their souls to be entered by God. Later the outward forms of monkdom changed, and monks came to live a communal life in convents, observing the Rule of the Order which they had entered, and taking the vows of poverty, chastity and obedience. It was the monk’s great work to go out into the world so as to save men and to bring men to God. A separate development, a still further change displaced the monk’s earlier ideal of finding his own salvation while leading the life of a hermit or anchorite in the desert. Moreover, as monasticism developed, century by century, the early communal poverty gave way to communal plenty. Monasteries became land-owners, monks became cultivators of the soil, makers of various kinds of produce, copyists of manuscripts, storehouses of learning, although by none of these activities was individual property or gain supposed to result.

Now the Buddhist bhikkhu did not live alone, but in communities; and there is nothing in the derivation of bhikkhu comparable to monos. bhikkhu, bhikṣu is from the desiderative base of bhaj, to beg, to beg alms. On the other hand, he did go into seclusion for meditation during the “day-sojourn” (divāvihāra, cf. siesta), and sometimes for longer periods he retreated to lonely spots far from the haunts of men. And possibly in his earlier history, as bhikṣu, he was one who lived alone, only gradually coming to live in a community, as the monk came later to lead a cenobitic life. Part of the moral duty of the Buddhist bhikkhu was, if he had talent that way, to go forth and give Dhamma for the sake of devas and mankind. In this he resembles certain Orders of Western Monachism which had as their mission the salvation of the world. The early Friars, too, did wayside teaching and preaching, but later this was regulated by authority and made orthodox. Monks, in Gotama’s Order, were certainly not segregated, and the Vinaya reveals all manner of inter-communication between the religious and the lay sections of society.

In order to give dhamma, the bhikkhu had to tour the countryside for nine months in each year. This would also prevent him from being a constant drain on the resources of the laity at any one place. But he was forbidden to travel during the three months of the rains. In this there was nothing similar to the Benedictine “vow of stability,” by which a monk undertook to remain permanently at one house. This vow was imposed because wandering ascetics had become a nuisance, whereas Buddhist monks had to stay in one fixed abode for the rains, lest in journeying during this season they should harm the young crops or destroy animal life. A motive such as the latter was far from the thoughts of Western monks, one of whose many activities was to tend the crops and dig the soil. Their view of life did not include a close kinship existing between men and animals, and even the Friars, who spoke to the animals as their “brothers,” did not suggest that a man might be undergoing rebirth as an animal (tiracchāna-gata).

It may also be supposed that the nine months of touring was made obligatory on a Buddhist monk in order to keep him healthy. The heaviest manual work he did was the washing, bleaching and beating of his robes, and now and again repairs to buildings. This was not because the entrants into the Order were weak, decrepit or sick. It was because the nature of the beliefs which they held made work on the land impossible for them. In the West, agriculture and all forms of manual labour were regarded as essentials in the main work. They served the further purpose of helping the conquest of the spirit in its perpetual battle with the flesh, and of sharpening and toughening the monks against the vice of accedia. The Eastern bhikkhu who, on account of the climate, might have been more prone to this was, I think it reasonable to hold, fortified against sloth and indolence by the discomforts of journeying on foot (for the use of vehicles was not allowed), no less than by preaching and by spiritual exercises.

The Buddhist bhikkhu has to renounce his worldly possessions before he is ordained, and after his ordination he should own no private property, but should regard his bowl and robe and other requisites as being the communal property of the Order, lent to him for his use. He should lead a life of chastity. He should be obedient to the Pātimokkha courses of training. In these particulars his case closely resembles that of an European monk. But, and here is a great difference between the Western monk and the bhikkhu, as understood in the sixth century B.C. in India: there were no vows for a Sakyan bhikkhu to take. He did not make any vows, did not bind himself by vows. If he attempted right behaviour, this was because his spiritual training had led to the taming of the self. But where this was of no avail, penalties were inflicted and the discipline was tightened, sometimes in ways which left no loop-holes for laxity.

If there were no initial vows, far less were there any “final vows,” making a return to life “in the world” extremely difficult, if not impossible. For even after the second ordination ceremony, the upasampadā; a bhikkhu was able, if he wished, to “leave the Order,” vibbhamati, as is the Vinaya word, and to “turn back to the low life of the layman,” hīnāyavattati, as is the Piṭakan expression. What was binding on the bhikkhu was the one rule, the Pātimokkha, under which he lived, the one training and the one work, as the definition of “in communion” at the end of each Pārājika rule shows, If he was not at one with these, he was defeated and expelled from the Order.
A bhikkhu goes for alms, he begs, silently, for alms; he is entirely dependent on the laity for food, robes, lodgings and medicine. In the great centuries of Western Monachism monks, far from being beggars for alms, were the donors of abundant charity. bhikkhus received alms, they did not give them. If a bhikkhu received no kaṭhina cloth at the time of its distribution, he wore rags taken from the dust-heap. Moreover, a mark of the bhikkhu is that he is one who wears the patchwork cloth (bhinnapaṭadhara). For even gifts of robe-material had to be made up, not whole, but in pieces, symbolical of a beggar’s rags. The “yellow robes” of a bhikkhu are comparable to the Western “habit,” the frock and cowl.

In looking for points of contact between “monks” and bhikkhus, their relation to the lay-followers might be adduced. In, for instance, a Cistercian abbey the brethren were divided into the monks (monachi) and the lay-brothers (conversi). The Buddhist Order also had its lay followers. But there, I think, the similarity between the Buddhists and the Cistercians ends. For the Buddhist lay-followers of the faith, in supporting the religious exponents and answering their call of poverty, did not regard them as the means of transmitting their gifts of charity to other needy laity. These gifts were made to and for the bhikkhus, and there the matter ended. Nor were the lay-followers organised as were the conversi. They did not live in the vihāras and they had no cloistral duties to perform. These were executed by those bhikkhus who had been duly appointed to various offices, such as that of food-distributor, assigner of lodgings, robe-distributor, silver-remover, and so forth, offices comparable to those of almoner, kitchener, cellarer of the Western convent, and which in Cistercian abbeys were performed by the conversi. The vihāras did not receive laity as guests; they only received monks from other districts. In Western monasteries the entertainment of lay-visitors was a very important matter.

The wide scope of meaning compressed into the word bhikkhu is doubtless an indication that the word was of gradual growth, its significance increasing as the object which it connoted acquired more and more aspects and characteristics. I think the plain historic fact is that originally bhikkhus were no more than “men of the scrap-bowl.” To this was added, for their greater merit, the meaning of men who, besides living on begged meats, had broken away from this or that undesirable state, and had assumed various distinguishing marks.

In spite of the differences between bhikkhu and monk, the affinities between them seem to me marked enough to warrant translating bhikkhu as “monk.” I have also chosen “monk” for various other reasons. In the first place, in the translations of Pali literature which have already appeared, no less than in several books on Early Buddhism, monk is a rendering that has been commonly adopted for bhikkhu. This word, therefore, has some tradition behind it, and hence will not arrest the reader’s attention with a sense of unfamiliarity. Secondly, in deciding upon the nearest English equivalent for bhikkhu, I had to take into account the fact that an easy feminine form would be required. “Nun” is a very convenient translation for bhikkhunī, and has, moreover, equivalents in other European languages. This is not a negligible point when comparing translations. Another reason for the choice of “monk” was that, in the period of Indian history under review, this word necessitates, in the last resort, the drawing of a distinction merely between the Sakyan monk and the Jain monk. Each of the other possible terms—almsman, mendicant, friar¹—might be applicable to the disciples of other sects; but these could hardly be termed “monks.”

The tremendous growth in the meanings and associations of both “monk” and bhikkhu clearly shows that in some cases it is impossible for the history of words to be contained in their etymology. I mention this tendency for words to grow and change, a tendency not of course peculiar to these two terms, simply to remind the reader that etymology is not an infallible guide to the developed meaning of terms. By the time the objects that such terms denote have passed through several phases, their historical meaning their significance in and for history, may have come to be more than their etymological meaning indicates, different from it, even the very reverse of it. The most that etymology can do in such cases is to point to the meanings that the words once, very likely originally, possessed. This is of undoubted importance. But to translate them according to that meaning, and without a due regard for the known facts of their evolution, would be grossly to neglect the significance that they came to acquire as a result of their historical development.

¹ “Brother” is hardly possible, as I have tried to show above.

In rendering samaṇa by “recluse” I am adopting what has come to be a fairly usual translation. I am aware that it is a far from happy one. It has no feminine form in English; its connotation of being segregated and living in isolation is misleading. For the Sakyan samaṇas were not segregated, in the sense of being confined within the vihāra precincts and forbidden to mix with the laity. They were restricted from following worldly occupations, for it was held that these should be given up when a man or woman went forth from the household state. But the Sakyan samaṇas were in no way anchorites or hermits. Nor do I think “ascetic”¹ a particularly suitable rendering. For nowhere is asceticism, as understood in the West, made of importance in Pali literature. The chief asceticism which it recognises is a taming, a training (damatha, from the root dam), the restraint of evil deeds, thoughts and words. Thus, although “ascetic” may, etymologically, be more correct than “recluse,” unless the Sakyan meaning of asceticism be thoroughly understood, and its Western connotations of bodily mortifications and austerities be dispelled, “recluse” comes nearer to the Pali than does “ascetic.” For there were times when the samaṇas went into seclusion for meditation. There are, besides, other words in Pali, such as tāpasa, literally burning, which more definitely connote an ascetic.

Mrs. Rhys Davids says that “monk” is our nearest word² to samaṇa, although she also puts forward another word, namely “re-treater,”¹ which perhaps is the best in the sense of preserving the history buried in the word samaṇa, śramaṇa. Doubtless “monk” could have been used for samaṇa, had this word not been selected as the most appropriate for bhikkhu. For from internal evidence, not only of the Suttavibhaṅga but of other parts of the Canon and the Commentaries,² it would appear that the Sakyan samaṇa was to all intents and purposes regarded as much the same as the Sakyan bhikkhu. The difference came to be more in the name than in the object, and may even have depended more on the person who used the term than on the person of whom it was used. This, in its turn, may depend on some earlier aspects of the history of the two terms.

¹ E.g. E.J. Thomas, History of Buddhist Thought, 72, 82, 89.
² The Birth of Indian Psychology and its Development in Buddhism, p.185; and cf. her Outlines of Buddhism, p.62, p.65.

The word samaṇa is not used as a direct form of address in the portion of the Suttavibhaṅga here translated. The brahmin of Ve-rañjā, before he became a lay-follower, does not address Gotama as samaṇa, although in speaking to him he uses this word of him (Vin 3.2 = BD 1.2 below); and Gotama, in this same conversation, is recorded to apply the term to himself. The schismatics also refer to Gotama in this way (Vin 3.171, Vin 3.172 = BD 1.296ff. below), but not in his presence. Monks are not recorded to address one another in this way, nor do the nuns employ the feminine samaṇī (vocative) when speaking to one another, nor the nominative samaṇī in speaking of one another. The laity, on the other hand, are sometimes recorded to speak of a particular monk by his personal name, coupled with the appellation samaṇa, such as samaṇa Udāyi (Vin 3.120 = BD 1.200 below). They also refer, so it is said, to monks as samaṇā, whether they admired them (Vin 3.119 = BD 1.200 below) or were vexed with them (Vin 3.120 = BD 1.200 below).

The curious thing is that the negative forms, asamaṇo, asamaṇī, occur quite often as terms of reproach, and meaning “not a true recluse.” On different occasions lay-people and monks are recorded to have reprimanded a monk for his bad behaviour by saying asamaṇo ’si tvam, “you are not a (true) recluse.” A nun is recorded to have rebuked another nun in the single phrase asamaṇī ’si tvam. This was evidently such a serious reproach as to send the person rebuked to Gotama to receive his verdict on the offence committed or imputed, as the case may have been. If the action performed by the monk or nun in question is found by him to be blameworthy, one of the words of censure put into his mouth is always assāmaṇaka, “not worthy of a recluse, not belonging to a recluse” (e.g. Vin 3.24 = BD 1.43 below).

² Canonical references very frequent. For commentaries see, e.g. AN-a iii.156 (Siamese edition), bhikkhū kaṇṭhādhiṁuttīkā ti samaṇā nām’ ete; and MN-a ii.4, where samaṇas are explained as those on the four ways to arahantship, thus being identified with bhikkhus.

A common designation of the monastic followers of Gotama was samaṇā Sakyaputtiyā, recluses (literally sons of the) Sakyans, or Sakyan recluses. This was also used of them by the laity (e.g. Vin 3.43, Vin 3.136, Vin 3.172 = BD 1.67, BD 1.234, BD 1.299 below), including those occasions where the monks had given them cause for complaint (Vin 3.44, Vin 3.73, Vin 3.119 = BD 1.70, BD 1.125, BD 1.200 below). In each definition that it gives of pārājika, the Old Commentary invariably states that the errant bhikkhu is become one who is not a samaṇa, not a Sakyaputtiya. These two words, asamaṇa and asakyaputtiya, are sometimes used together in other passages as terms of abuse (Vin 3.164f. = BD 1.283 below). It may also be noted that, as the monastic disciples of Gotama were called samaṇā Sakyaputtiyā, so the followers of Mahāvīra were called, even in the Pali canon, samaṇā Nigaṇṭhā, or to be exact, nigaṇṭhā nāma samaṇajātikā, a kind of recluse called nigaṇṭhas (Jains).

If the Sakyan samaṇa came to correspond with the Sakyan bhikkhu on the one side, on the other he came to correspond with brāhmaṇa, brahmin, in the meaning of this term as it grew into Sakya, and also into Jainism.² For the fact that samaṇa often appears in combination with brāhmaṇa in Pali canonical literature does not there, I think, necessarily imply any opposition between the two, any more than it does in Jaina literature.¹ According to Professor B.M. Barua,² there were various sects or groups or schools of Śramaṇa who broke away from the “later form of Brahmanic religion, superstition and mysticism.” So far there was opposition. But by the time that the Sakyaputtiyas were known as samaṇas, the term brāhmaṇa was also being incorporated into Sakyan usage, and was there receiving a new meaning.

---
¹ AN i.206 ² Jaina Sūtras, ii.138 (edited by Jacobi, Sacred Books of the East XLV): “He who has no worldly attachment after entering the Order, who does not repent of having become a monk ... him we call a brāhmaṇa.” Again at p.422: “The samaṇas or brāhmaṇas who say thus ... do not speak as samaṇas or Nigranthes.”

While brahmins as a class remained, brahmins by birth and occupation, brahmins forming sects of ascetics, living by various rules, the word brāhmaṇa was developing for Sakya the meaning of the best, the highest person, not because of birth and lineage, but because of spiritual endeavour and attainment. To this, samaṇa in public opinion was evidently equivalent. Had not the two words come to have some identity of meaning, not exactly the same things would have been said of them both, as is the case in a formula occurring now and again in this part of the Suttavibhaṅga (e.g. Vin 3.44, Vin 3.120 = BD 1.70, BD 1.200 below). On the other hand, the words samaṇa and brāhmaṇa occur in two other sentences at Vin 3.44, once separated by the disjunctive vā (or), once forming a compound. It is possible that some divergence between the two is intended here, as perhaps referring to members of different sects; in which case the two words would not be substitutes or synonyms for one another.³

I have left brāhmaṇa in its anglicised form of brahmin. The time is perhaps not yet ripe to draw an infallible distinction between brahmins as members of a sect opposed to Sakya, and brahmins as men, as monks, who had attained, or who had failed to attain, some of the ethical attributes and mental development inculcated by Sakya. A verse in the Dhammapada clearly identifies the three, for it ends: so brāhmaṇo so samaṇo sa bhikkhu (Dhp 142). To differentiate between the Sakyan and non-Sakyan uses of brāhmaṇa, as this word occurs in the Pali canon, would be to emphasise the new meaning which, under Sakya, accrued to brāhmaṇa, as a word adopted from earlier times.

¹ Cf. Jaina Sūtras, ii.140, and last note. ² Pre-Buddhistic Indian Philosophy, p.242. See also p.237ff. ³ On samaṇas see B.M. Barua, Pre-Buddhistic Indian Philosophy, p.242, and Ratilal Mehta, Asceticism in Pre-Buddhist Days, Indian Culture, iii.4.

For there is no doubt that the three terms—bhikkhu, brāhmaṇa and samaṇa—were, in their Sanskrit forms of bhikṣu, brāhmaṇa, śramaṇa, already in the terminology of pre-Sakyan days. Each word will therefore have some pre-Sakyan history, even though this is, in many respects, still obscure. Brāhmaṇa is of course a term of enormously long and complicated history, of indisputable antiquity. Professor B.M. Barua says that “śramaṇas became known, perhaps from the practice of begging, as bhikṣus (mendicants).” And referring to a passage in the Aṅguttara Commentary, he further points out that “by the bhikṣus must have been meant the members of the fourth Brahmanic order, that is, the Brahmanist ascetics in the fourth stage of efforts and fruitions who are designated bhikṣu, yati or parivrājaka in the Dharma-Sūtras and the Dharma-Sāstras.” It is worth while to mention that, according to Jacob’s Concordance, in the early Upāniṣads, śramaṇa appears but once, brāhmaṇa many times, and bhikṣu not at all. Śramaṇa occurs, however, in the Satapatha Brāhmaṇa.

If bhikkhu were equivalent in fact to samaṇa, and if this were, on some occasions at least, equivalent to the Sakyan usage of brāhmaṇa, it is not difficult to see why the life of monks continued to be called brahmacariya under Sakya. But as the most suitable translation of brahma has still to be decided upon, when it occurs in the compounds brahmacariya and brahmacārin, I have left it untranslated. The difficulty is to determine what was meant by the “best life.” Whether at one time brahma, as part of the compound brahmacariya, may not have possessed the deep and essential meaning of the All, the All-Real, the Highest that it possessed in the Upaniṣadic teaching is as yet a matter of controversy. I find it hard to believe that Sakya arose either in ignorance of this teaching or uninfluenced by it. And even if, as seems highly probable, brahmacariya and brahmacārin are words taken over by Sakya (and Jainism) from pre-Sakyan sects, it has still to be established that for these brahma did not contain some profound philosophical or religious significance.

---

1 Cf. interesting Jaina tradition that Mahāvīra’s parents were followers of the śramaṇas, Sacred Books of the East xxii.194. 2 History of Pre-Buddhist Philosophy, p. 240. 3 Maskarı as an Epithet of Gośāla, Indian History Quarterly, iii.2, p. 254. 4 Brahadāranyaka 4.3.22. 5 See Dialogues of the Buddha i.212–215. The word brahmacārin occurs once in the Rg Veda in the (later) Manḍala, Rg Veda 10.109. 6 Vin 3.164 = BD 1.282 below.

Besides brahmacariya and brahmacārin, I have left untranslated two other words of great importance. These are dhamma and tathāgata.

Dhamma is a word whose meaning appears to vary in varying contexts. It may mean something like what we should call “conscience,” that which should be done, in one passage; the externalised body of doctrine, in another; fashion, act (etena dhammena, Vin 3.133 = BD 1.225 below), in a third. Mrs. Rhys Davids has written at some length on the meaning of dhamma in her later works, to which I now refer the reader.

Anesaki, in his essay on Tathāgata,¹ closely connects the notion of tathāgata with that of Dhamma, but he comes no nearer to a conclusive translation of tathāgata than do others. For the very ambiguity of its derivation precludes any definitive meaning. This being the case, and because Anesaki has virtually shown that no empirical investigations of the uses of the term can bring us near to a meaning fixed once and for all, we must regard tathāgata as a term best left untranslated. I give here four ways in which it might be rendered:

1. The one thus-gone, or thus-going (tathā-gata), since gata may be taken as a present as well as a past participle;
2. The one thus-come, or thus-coming (tathā-āgata);
3. The truth-finder, used by Lord Chalmers in Further Dialogues of the Buddha, as the result of empirical considerations;
4. The Way-farer, a rendering suggested by Mrs. Rhys Davids,²

¹ Kataṁ Karaniyaṁ, Tokyo, 1934, p. 240ff.
and used by F.L. Woodward in Gradual Sayings, V.

In Pali literature the term is not applied exclusively to Gotama himself.

If the meaning of words is liable to vary in different contexts, it is wiser and less misleading not to translate those words until there has been some further advance in Pali criticism and interpretation.

Deva, devatā and yakkha are other words that I have not translated. This is partly because the nature of these beings has not yet been fully investigated or established; and partly because the little we do know of them leads us to suppose that they represent kinds of beings for whom in English there are no acceptable equivalents. For example, in canonical Pali, devas are no longer “gods,” as they were in the Vedic age; nor are they “angels.” Mrs. Rhys Davids has suggested that they were “brave and pious gentlemen who have passed as ‘devas’ to the next world only to come back one day as men.” There is no doubt that these three classes of being are regarded as having a close contact with the world of men. The word deva is often coupled with manussa, men, people (e.g. Vin 3.1). The earth-devas are recorded to have heard of Sudinna’s lapse, and to have communicated it to the other groups of devas (Vin 3.18 = BD 1.33 below). It is told how a devatā (feminine) belonging to Māra’s retinue came and encouraged Migalaṇḍika for having deprived the monks of life (Vin 3.69 = BD 1.118 below).

Neither do yakkhas seem far removed from the human sphere. Words like “fairies, sprites or goblins” do not accord at all well with the Indian way of thinking. There are the predatory yakkhas (or yakkhas in the form of beasts of prey) who killed some monks, and there is the story of the exorcist monk who deprived a yakkha of life (Vin 3.84 = BD 1.146 below). A monk is recorded to have had sexual intercourse with a yakkhinī (Vin 3.37 = BD 1.56 below), although the Old Commentary does not include this type of being among mātugāma, women-kind (e.g. Vin 3.121 = BD 1.202 below). It defines mātugāma as manussitthi, human women, and carefully and deliberately excludes yakkhis, petas, and female animals.

---

1. See gs v.xiii; Verses of Uplift, Sacred Books of the Buddhists VIII, p.81, n. 2.

Where the word peta, and the feminine petī, occur I have used the translation suggested by Mrs. Rhys Davids¹ of “departed one”. It appears that petas, departed ones, those who have gone on, gone before, were regarded as still endowed with life, and able to speak to men. There is the story of the body, inhabited by the peta (Vin 3.58 = BD 1.97 below), which rose up in the cemetery, by what the Commentary calls “the peta’s own power,” and pursued a monk, asking him not to remove his outer cloak from him. It is also curious that it was thought possible for a monk to commit an offence with petas, and that although an offence committed with petas, yakkhinīs and nāgīs (female serpents?) is as grave in nature as one committed with a human woman, these beings are excluded from the Old Commentary’s definition of “woman-kind.” It almost looks as if a peta means one who is quite recently dead, and whose mind and spirit still have power over the body, being not yet entirely dissociated from it.

I think that what emerges most clearly from the Vinaya references to devas, devatās, yakkhas and petas, is that there is a non-human world (cf. amanussagāma at Vin 3.46 = BD 1.74 below) whose various denizens penetrate the human world and participate in the affairs of men, as their counterparts are thought to do in India, Burma and Ceylon at the present day.

Where names of weights, measures and mediums of exchange occur, I have left them untranslated, and have given notes. All attempts to correlate English words to these would be wholly misleading, and would conjure up a set of wrong ideas.

Amongst the store of incidental knowledge that this part of the Vinaya brings to light, it should be noted that the word nibbāna occurs only twice, each time in the same stereotyped formula (Vin 3.20, Vin 3.111 = BD 1.35, BD 1.194 below). I have translated it as “waning.” Nothing more can be safely deduced from its virtual absence than the concentration of this portion of the Suttavibhaṅga on outward morality, on forms of behaviour to be regulated and guided by an external standard rather than by an appeal to the inner conscience, the inner morality which, in the India of the sixth century B.C., was held to be immanent in man.

¹ Indian Religion and Survival, p.35; and cf. p.59.

Besides this piece of negative information, a good many positive details, mostly concerning contemporary manners and customs, are brought to light in this part of the Suttavibhaṅga. There is, for example, mention of the punishments that a king could mete out to a thief, while there emerges the very fact that a king meted them out (Vin 3.46 = BD 1.72, BD 1.73 below); mention of some of the kinds of ornaments used (Vin 3.48, Vin 3.180 = BD 1.75f., BD 1.314 below); some of the kinds of games played (Vin 3.180 = BD 1.316 below); the sort of food-stuffs in common consumption; various kinds of animals, birds, insects, plants and flowers (Vin 3.48, Vin 3.49, Vin 3.52, Vin 3.58 = BD 1.79, BD 1.80, BD 1.87, BD 1.98 below); there is mention of the existence of customs, frontiers and customs’ houses (Vin 3.52, Vin 3.62 = BD 1.86, BD 1.104 below); smuggling, kidnapping of children, the kind of treatment given by monks to their ill comrades; there is evidence for the belief that trees may be inhabited by conscious beings; and there is the indication that Indians, then as now, appear to have no difficulty in dying at will. I have nothing to add to Rhys Davids’ and Oldenberg’s remarks on the knowledge and use of writing¹ at the time of the compilation of the Vinaya.

The following authorities, including the late Professor E.J. Rapson, kindly helped me on the difficult point of finding a translation for the term bhikkhu; their letters were most interesting, while showing a considerable diversity of opinion. I have much pleasure in tendering my thanks to all their writers: to Professor J. Przyluski, Mrs. Rhys Davids, Professor Otto Schrader, Professor Helmer Smith and Professor F.W. Thomas. Above all, I should like to express my gratitude to my friend, Miss A.M. Cooke, for her illuminating conversations on the Western monk. It remains for me to thank, especially and most sincerely, Mrs. Rhys Davids for entrusting the translation of the Vinaya to me, for her many rewarding suggestions, and for the help that she has generously bestowed upon the preparation of this volume.

¹ Vinaya Texts, i.xxii ff.

______________

(Note by Sujato: The following notes on the text do not apply to this SuttaCentral edition.)

An asterisk in the text denotes that the word or passage beside which it appears is given in full in Pali in the Appendix.

The page numbers, given in square brackets in the text, and corresponding to Oldenberg’s page numbers of his edition of the Vinayapiṭaka, are placed, not at the beginning of the pages to which the translation corresponds, but at the end. This has been done in order to introduce a certain consistency, for all Vinaya numbering—of section, sub-section and paragraph—is placed at the end.

I.B. Horner
Manchester, 1938.

EDITORIAL NOTE

At the translator’s request I say here a few words. Words of valediction for a work which is a genuine labour of love. Result though it be of strenuous, unfaltering research, the translation of an ancient thesaurus of monastic legality, as is the Pali Vinaya Piṭaka, is not of the class we call “best seller.” Labour and printing costs have been alike undertaken by my friend and colleague, the translator. And I am not a little proud to think that a book which my husband helped, in his early efforts, to bring in part before European readers, should now receive my blessing in its first complete form after this interval of over half a century.

It may interest some to learn, as to that translation in part, how the two translators divided the work. For living in different countries, each translating in his leisure moments, there seems to have been (more’s the pity!) very little if any collaboration. No correspondence survives revealing that any took place. On the fly-leaf of Volume I of Vinaya Texts, Sacred Books of the East XIII, there stands in Rhys Davids’ handwriting the following:

“Of the work I have translated the

- Pātimokkha i.1–90.
- Mahāvagga v and vi.22; ii.1–ii.81. 80pp.
  vi.32–vii.3. 43pp.
  viii.12–32. 49pp.
- Cullavagga i–iii 120pp.
Total: 800pp. out of 1230pp.

The rest, as is well known, was the work of that fastidiously careful scholar, Hermann Oldenberg.”

As she has stated in her Introduction, Isaline Horner begins her translation at the beginning, as Oldenberg did not, in his edition of the Pali text, published shortly before the birth of the Pali Text Society. The Sacred Books of the East translation was a large selection, not the complete work.

In the Vinaya, taking it by and large, we have the records of a great effort, put forth by the culture of North India during the sixth to the third century B.C., to “get rich quickly” in things, not of worldly experience, but of man’s spiritual fortune. The idea, in monasticism, was that the man, in striving to become a More than his worldly fellows, could best do so by making his life here a Less. By cutting out a great part of what our poets have called “life in the whole,” it was judged he would, by living a simplified remainder, progress much faster. Progress, that is, towards that waning out of repeated spans of life as he knew it here, or heard of it in the next world or worlds. This is surely to misunderstand life as we find it. An enemy army is not conquered by its being attacked in one section only. The monk admitted that he bore his enemy about with him in body and mind. And to shelter body and mind from opportunities of efforts towards a Better, such as life in its fullness alone could afford, was no sound method of seeking to grow. Man is but a less if he shirk much of life. Not along such lines does the Hand draw him which au fond de l’idéal fait signe. (Being in the depths of the evidence is ideal.)

It is doubtless true that the withdrawn life is not only good at times, but may, there or then, be necessary for the student. But I do not find this need expressing itself in Buddhist monastic literature as a motive for leaving the world. I may be wrong, and shall welcome correction. For the history of monasticism, especially of monasticism in what was perhaps its cradle, has yet to be written. And a complete translation of the Vinaya Piṭaka will bring such a work nearer the day when it can be written.

C.A.F. Rhys Davids

Preface to the SuttaCentral Edition

The Vinaya is one of humanity’s most extraordinary texts. Always reasonable, often surprising, and full of outrageous and entertaining stories, it offers a vision of an ideal community that is as relevant—and as challenging—as it has ever been. The Vinaya is thoroughly anarchist: no hierarchy, no power vested in individuals, consensus decision making, and property held in common. It is this that has allowed the Sangha the flexibility to adapt Vinaya practice in response to changing times and places. The Vinaya dispenses with power in favour of principle. It works because the monastic community wants to do the right thing, and are willing to work together with sincerity. Originating in a culture where torture and capital punishment were considered normal, the Vinaya envisages no punishment worse than expulsion from the community, while most “offences” may be settled with a simple confession to another monastic.

The treatment of women in the Vinaya is somewhat complex and controversial. However it must be borne in mind that the overriding purpose of the nuns’ Vinaya is so that women can set up and run independent spiritual communities, teaching and training themselves. And, as several Vinaya rules show, nuns were fully involved in building monasteries, teaching the lay community, and all other aspects of monastic life. There is no power of command by monks over nuns, and nowhere are the monks allowed to make Vinaya rulings for the nuns. The nuns were a self-governing community, fully autonomous except for a few occasions when they participated jointly in formal acts of the Sangha together with monks. But even on such occasions, the monks were not in control: the Vinaya is in control and the monks must act in accord with Vinaya.

In this and many other matters we see in the Vinaya a constant compromise and adjustment, as the ideals of the Dhamma run up against the realities of our profane world. The Vinaya does not shy away from the sordid, even the evil. A large proportion of the text documents the wicked behaviour of monastics. Yet it is essentially optimistic. It assumes that people will, by and large, tell the truth and try to do the right thing; and that, with the significant exception of the Pārājika rules, everyone deserves a second chance.

The voice of the Buddha runs like a thread of light through the entire Vinaya, informing every decision, and present on almost every occasion. Yet much of the Vinaya as we have it today originated later; I would put the main period of composition of the Vinayas at perhaps 100–200 years after the Buddha. We are fortunate to have many different recensions of Vinaya texts, a few of which are referred to by Horner in her introduction. Comparative studies of the Vinaya, while still inadequate, have come a long way since her time. One of the overwhelming findings of these studies is that, while the Pātimokkha texts of the different versions are almost identical, the background stories, detailed analyses, and case studies vary considerably. Together with the very strong evidence of massive editorial input in the text, for example in the artificial repetitions of nearly identical events, it is clear that the Vinaya texts as they stand constitute a complex, highly sophisticated literature that evolved and developed over a considerable period of time. While it is not possible to say with certainty exactly what originated with the Buddha, we will not stray too far from the truth if we assume that the rules, and some of the other material such as certain Saṅghakamas, originate from the Buddha himself, while most of the other material is the product of later generations. This later material is not a fixed recitation as the Pātimokkha was, but neither is it entirely invented; rather, it draws freely and creatively from earlier traditions.

In 2013, as work for SuttaCentral was gathering pace, we heard the good news that on 10 May the Pali Text Society had released a number of texts under a Creative Commons Attribution NonCommercial 3.0 licence. This release included the six volumes of the classic Vinaya translation by I.B. Horner, The Book of the Discipline. Crucially, the terms of the release permit derivative works, which meant that the way was open to create a new edition of this classic of 20th century Buddhist scholarship.

We immediately undertook to create a natively digital edition of this translation, which remains the only complete translation of the Vinaya into English. In doing so, we aimed to honor the work of I.B. Horner and the Pali Text Society, and to promote a greater awareness and understanding of the Vinaya for those who are not able to access the printed edition.

The process of creating this edition was this. First the text was scanned, ocr–ed, converted into a Word document, and proofread. This initial process was done by Ven Jaganātha assisted by Ven Nibbida. They then handed the project to me, and I engaged an IT firm, Hi-Tech Outsourcing Services, to convert the Word document into a detailed, clean, and semantic HTML/XML file, as well as doing another round of proofreading. This demanding project was handled with skill and good cheer by Jatin Patel and his team at Hi-Tech. Finally I went over the files, doing final touches like headings, ensuring that references were consistent, creating internal links, and further proofing. Ultimately the text is marked up in HTML5, closely related to the markup used on SuttaCentral, but with a few special features.

Horner’s translation is easy to criticize. It regularly relies on overliteral renderings, while at the same time there are many errors in rendering the Pali. The style is distractingly archaic, and it would be a mistake to attribute this to the passing of time since publication: it was already archaic when it was published. The Parivāra translation, for example, was published in 1966, the same year “Good Vibrations” and “Rainy Day Women # 12 & 35” were released; yet it unironically uses the phrase “Thou understandeth...”. Such archaisms indicate a gulf not in time but in culture. Horner belonged to a generation where Buddhist studies were the province of a European intellectual elite; while the popularization of Buddhism that began in that decade owed more to the Beach Boys and Bob Dylan than to the academic texts of the Pali scholars.

Perhaps the most glaring example of the gulf in time and culture between ourselves and Horner lies not in the style of the translation but in her doctrinal interpretations. Writing in the mid-20th century, Horner came under the influence of her teacher and mentor, Caroline Rhys-Davids, and her overbearing tendency to read every possible word and phrase as implying that the Buddha’s real teaching was of a “Self” that was made to “Become”. Thankfully, such interpretations have (mostly) disappeared from the Buddhist world, and exist now as relics of the West’s gradual and uncertain progress towards understanding the Dhamma, best discreetly passed over. I only mention this here because I suspect that some modern readers, unfamiliar with the historical context, will find such references confusing.

Despite this, with one important exception—the Pārājika rules, which I will discuss below—no substantive changes have been made to the text. Tempting though it has been to correct some long standing mistakes (nuns do not carry weapons!), I have endeavoured to recreate in digital form the work of I.B. Horner. Rather than attempting piecemeal corrections I felt it would be better to start with a faithful digital text, then undertake a thorough revision.

However, I have not been so conservative when it comes to the structure and referencing systems used in the text. Our goal has been to create an edition that is compatible with SuttaCentral, and many details have been standardized accordingly. In particular, the text incorporates a truly staggering quantity of references in the footnotes. Normally for SuttaCentral’s texts we exclude footnotes and similar material: we are presenting the ancient texts, not modern opinions. However, in this case I felt that the value of the notes was such that it would be a shame for them to be omitted from a digital edition. It is precisely the interconnectedness that marks the Vinaya as a sophisticated system, and nowhere have the relations between various parts of the text been delineated in as much detail as in Horner’s notes. We thus decided to include the notes in a separate digital edition, while the text on SuttaCentral will, as usual, be presented without notes.

This meant we had to sort out the nearly 12,000 internal cross-references, as well as over 7,000 external references. The internal references required a great deal of work to standardize. To start with, there is the problem that the entire text runs three distinct referencing systems in parallel:

1. The “volume and page” of the PTS Pali edition;
2. The “volume and page” of the English translation;
3. The “chapter and section” numbers, which are the same for both editions.

It is a shame that the editors of the Pali editions did not uniformly insist on a detailed “chapter and section” system, as we are now in the unfortunate situation where the academic standard is to reference the volume and page of the increasingly outdated PTS Pali paper editions.

The situation is more complex than that, however. For the original text placed the reference numbers at the end of the section they refer to, following the Pali tradition. Such an arrangement does not sit easily with the logic underlying modern documents, which are codified in systems such as HTML, and for this edition we have relocated all references to the beginning of the relevant section.

In addition, Horner often used highly abbreviated forms of ref-reference, making it difficult to tell exactly what level of section or subsection is being referred to. We have tried to eliminate this problem by spelling all references out in full. Once the references had been made (so far as possible) entirely explicit and consistent, it was a (relatively) simple matter to turn them into hyperlinks. Thus all of the internal cross references should, in theory, link to the correct place in the text. Any errors found in the references are likely to be the result of the digitizing process, rather than being in the original text, for errors of reference in the text are exceedingly rare (although I have silently corrected a very few).

ABBREVIATIONS

The abbreviations follow the system we use on SuttaCentral. While we do not arbitrarily violate accepted scholarly custom, the constraints of our environment force us to do some things differently. For SuttaCentral, each abbreviation must be:

- Unique across the entire corpus;
- Case insensitive;
- Without special characters such as diacriticals;
- Usually two, hopefully no more than three, characters long.

While it may take some getting used to, the system is quite powerful. “Bi-Pj 1” is “Bhikkhunī Pārājika 1”, “Kd 3.2.1” is “section 2, subsection 1 of the third Khandhaka”, and so on. I have also written in full all of the rarely-used abbreviations, including almost all abbreviations for things outside the Pali canon. Table 1 presents a list of abbreviations as used in this book.

Table 1: List of Abbreviations

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Abbreviation</th>
<th>Description</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>BD</td>
<td>The Book of the Discipline</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Vin</td>
<td>Pali Text Society’s Pali edition of the Vinayāpiṭaka</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bu</td>
<td>Bhikkhu</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bi</td>
<td>Bhikkhunī</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pj</td>
<td>Pārājika</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Abbr.</td>
<td>Title</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>-------</td>
<td>-------------------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ss</td>
<td>Saṅghādīsesa</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ay</td>
<td>Aniyata</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NP</td>
<td>Nissaggiya Pācittiya</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pc</td>
<td>Pācittiya</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pd</td>
<td>Pāṭidesanīya</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sk</td>
<td>Sekhiya</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>As</td>
<td>Adhikaraṇasamatha</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kd</td>
<td>Khandhaka</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Prv</td>
<td>Pārivāra</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>DN</td>
<td>Dīgha Nikāya</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>MN</td>
<td>Majjhima Nikāya</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SN</td>
<td>Saṁyutta Nikāya</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>AN</td>
<td>Āṅguttara Nikāya</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kp</td>
<td>Khuddakapātha</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dhp</td>
<td>Dhammapada</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ud</td>
<td>Udāna</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>It</td>
<td>Itivuttaka</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Snp</td>
<td>Sutta Nipāta</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Vv</td>
<td>Vimānavaṭṭhu</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pv</td>
<td>Petavatthu</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Thag</td>
<td>Theragāthā</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Thig</td>
<td>Therīgāthā</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tha-ap</td>
<td>Thera-apadāna</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Thi-ap</td>
<td>Therī-apadāna</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ja</td>
<td>Jātaka</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mnd</td>
<td>Mahāniddesa</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Cnd</td>
<td>Cūlaniddesa</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pt</td>
<td>Paṭisambhidhāmagga</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ne</td>
<td>Netti</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mil</td>
<td>Milindapañha</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ds</td>
<td>Dhammasaṅgaṇī</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Vb</td>
<td>Vibhaṅga</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pp</td>
<td>Puggalapaññatti</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kv</td>
<td>Kathāvatthu</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Translator’s Introduction

- Aṭṭhakathā (Commentary)
Vism Visuddhimagga
GS Gradual Sayings (PTS translation of the Aṅguttara)
KS Kindred Sayings (PTS translation of the Saṁyutta)

Note that in most references the “volume” is in Roman numerals. The exceptions are the main references, Vin and BD, where the automated linking of cross-references would be made more difficult using Roman numerals, and they are therefore in ordinary numerals. Thus Vin 2.34 means “Volume 2, page 34 of the PTS Pali edition of the Vinayapiṭaka”, while DN i.45 means “Volume 1, page 45 of the PTS Pali edition of the Dīgha Nikāya”. Where such texts appear without Roman numerals, they indicate a sutta number; thus MN 34 means “the thirty-fourth discourse of the Majjhima Nikāya”.

In addition, I have eliminated most of the abbreviations used by Horner. She abbreviated “translated” as “transld.”, for example, and peppered liberally through the text are countless other standard and non-standard abbreviations that serve little purpose except to make a difficult text more difficult.

The translation of the Pārājika rules

The single exception to the principle of preserving Horner’s translation lies in the Pārājika rules. Here we present a substantially revised translation by Ven. Brahmali. The reason for presenting this material here is, on my part, a little embarrassing: I lost the originals.

What happened was this. When preparing the text, in discussions with Ven. Brahmali, we agreed that this would be a wonderful chance to correct and improve the many long-standing problems with Horner’s translation. Yet we also wanted to honor her work by presenting it as is. So we decided to produce a faithful digital edition of her translation, and meanwhile, Ven. Brahmali undertook a substantive revision. Ven. Brahmali is a Pali scholar of some twenty years, was a major assistant to Bhikkhu Bodhi in the translations of the Saṁyutta and Aṅguttara Nikāyas, and has been teaching and practising the Vinaya for many years in a Sangha community; I cannot think of anyone better qualified to do this work. Yet it is, of course, a difficult and long process, and he has many other duties calling his attention, so we agreed to release the Horner translation first, and allow the revision to proceed at its own pace.

However, after handing the HTML files of the four Pārājikas to Ven. Brahmali, I neglected to keep copies, while he, making the unwarranted assumption that I was competent, proceeded to overwrite the files I gave him. Of course, we still had the original Word document, but it would be a long and dreary process to begin the markup process from scratch. In addition, as it happens, the first Pārājika is the place where Horner’s translation is the most deficient, due to her Edwardian sense of propriety. So I decided to include Brahmali’s translation of the four Pārājikas.

This creates some issues. First is that of consistency: Brahmali uses some different renderings of Vinaya terms. Hopefully this will not prove too confusing, and will be made up for by his more accurate and articulate translation. More problematic, his translation dispenses with the complex notes and cross-references of Horner’s edition, since there is no need to duplicate this work. However, it would be a shame to omit the notes from these important rules. So I have made the choice, admittedly imperfect, to include Horner’s notes with Brahmali’s translation. This occasionally results in incongruity, repetition, or omission; I hope the reader can forgive such infelicities under the circumstances. It should be borne in mind that this will not be the final version of Ven. Brahmali’s translation. While it is complete and careful as far as it goes, when translating the remainder of the Vinaya it is to be expected that he will want to make some corrections and modifications to this section.

Structural changes

Some structural changes have been made. I have introduced a fuller and more informative set of headings, which were lacking in some portions of Horner’s text, notably the Khandhakas. The detailed headings are based on those found in the Mahāsaṅgītī Pali edition used on SuttaCentral. These mostly break the text at obvious places, which usually, though not always, correspond to breaks of some kind in Horner’s edition, such as section numbers, spaces in the text, or notes on the end of sections. Occasionally, however, the breaks in the Mahāsaṅgītī break impose themselves on the text, forcing new paragraph breaks, as for example at the very beginning of the discourse on the eight wonderful qualities of the ocean (Kd 19.1.3); in Horner’s text the Buddha’s speech starts in the same paragraph as the introductory statement, whereas in the Mahāsaṅgītī edition the Buddha’s speech begins after a new heading.

In a few cases the Mahāsaṅgītī headings spell out the text in more detail, exposing the highly compressed form of Horner’s text in such instances. While this might seem to add a certain disjointedness to the text, as seen for example in Kd 11.11.1, it has the advantage of revealing with greater clarity the extreme formalism of the text’s structure.

In addition, the structure in a few cases has been adapted. Most importantly, the Khandhakas are now treated as such, rather than the artificial division of “Mahāvagga” and “Cullavagga”, which exist only as conveniences for the manuscript editions, and which have no counterparts in other Vinayas.

Two of Horner’s chapters in the Parivāra have been divided: her Chapter IV has become Prv.4 and Prv.5, and her Chapter VII has become Prv.8 and Prv.9. The numbering of other Chapters has been adjusted accordingly, and I have made minor changes to some of the wording so that the text remains comprehensible. This numbering is used in the Mahāsaṅgītī Pali edition used on SuttaCentral, and Horner’s extensive discussions of the problems with her numbering (see BD 6.xiii), which she based on Oldenberg’s Pali text, make it clear that the Mahāsaṅgītī numbering is preferrable. Table 2 contains a list of the changed numbering for the Parivāra chapters.

Many of the verses have been reformatted; in such cases I have merely tried to present Horner’s wording in a clear manner, and
Table 2: Changes in numbering for Parivāra Chapters

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Horner</th>
<th>SuttaCentral</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2</td>
<td>2</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>3</td>
<td>3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>4</td>
<td>4 and 5</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>5</td>
<td>6</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>6</td>
<td>7</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>7</td>
<td>8 and 9</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>8</td>
<td>10</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>9</td>
<td>11</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>10</td>
<td>12</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>11</td>
<td>13</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>12</td>
<td>14</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>13</td>
<td>15</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>14</td>
<td>16</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>15</td>
<td>17</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>16</td>
<td>18</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>17</td>
<td>19</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>18</td>
<td>20</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>19</td>
<td>21</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

have not tried to match the verses line by line with the Pali. In one or two cases—notably the lengthy passage at Kd 1.15.6—text mistakenly treated as prose has been formatted as verse (without changing the content).

In some cases, such as the Ekuttara of the Parivāra, I have treated the text as a list for clarity.

Variant numbering for bhikkunī rules

One area of difficulty is the numbering of the bhikkunī rules. The nuns incorporate many of the monks’ rules, but these are not marked in the Pali text. We only know the full list of nuns’ rules from the commentaries and the independent Nuns’ Pātimokkha texts. In most cases this does not affect the numbering. The Sekhiyas and Adhi-karaṇasamathas are identical for monks and nuns. The Pātidesanīyas are, on the other hand, completely different so there is no overlap. With the Pācittiyas and the Nissaggiya Pācittiyas, the nuns’ rules are listed at the start, and the monks’ rules added after, so they do not affect the numbering.

However, in the case of the Pārājikas and Sañghādisesas the numbering of the nuns’ rules is affected by the inclusion of the relevant monks’ rules. The numbering in Horner’s text ignored the monks’ rules and simply listed the nuns’ rules in sequence as found in the Pali. This follows the indications found at the end of each rule in the Pali text; however the Pali is not consistent, as elsewhere the rules are, as here, simply counted from one to eight (eg. Prv 2.1:Bi-Pj 6). When incorporated as a combined edition on SuttaCentral each number must be unique. I have therefore changed the numbering of the relevant rules for nuns as per Table 3.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Horner</th>
<th>SuttaCentral</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Bi-Pj.1</td>
<td>Bi-Pj.5</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bi-Pj.2</td>
<td>Bi-Pj.6</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bi-Pj.3</td>
<td>Bi-Pj.7</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bi-Pj.4</td>
<td>Bi-Pj.8</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bi-Ss.7</td>
<td>Bi-Ss.10</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bi-Ss.8</td>
<td>Bi-Ss.11</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bi-Ss.9</td>
<td>Bi-Ss.12</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bi-Ss.10</td>
<td>Bi-Ss.13</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Table 3: Changes in numbering of bhikkhunī rules

Semantic markup

One of the features of our text is that it incorporates semantic markup. (Of course this only applies to the HTML version.) This is especially beneficial in the Vinaya, which has such a detailed and technical structure. Thus rules are marked “rule”, terms defined as “term”, definitions as “gloss”, and so on. Some of this semantic markup is visible in the text, but not all. You can see, for example, that rules are bold, definitions are green, mnemonic verses are grey-on-grey, and so on. I tried to maintain a balance between readability and clarity of structure. Thus there is much semantic information that is hidden, but which can be exposed by a simple change to the css; it may also be used for delimiting searches and the like. Note that the addition of semantic tags is not complete. Table 4 contains a list of the semantic tags used in the text.
THE BOOK OF THE DISCIPLINE

Table 4: Semantic markup

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Term</th>
<th>Description</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>bhik-khuni</td>
<td>Matter concerning nuns.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>kamma</td>
<td>Formal acts of the Sangha and other codified statements spoken in the midst of the Sangha.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>jataka</td>
<td>Jātaka type material.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>sutta</td>
<td>Sutta type material.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>rule</td>
<td>Any class of rule.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>subrule</td>
<td>A rule subsumed under another rule.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>al-lowance</td>
<td>An allowance by the Buddha.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>uddana</td>
<td>Mnemonic summary, usually in verse form.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>term</td>
<td>Word or phrase to be defined.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>gloss</td>
<td>Definition of such a word or phrase.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>author</td>
<td>Author, editor, or translator of a secondary source.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>essay</td>
<td>Title of an article in a journal, etc. Note that we do not use “article” for this to avoid conflicting with the HTML5 <code>&lt;article&gt;</code> tag.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>book</td>
<td>Title of a book.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>journal</td>
<td>Title of an academic journal. These are usually spelled out in full.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>add</td>
<td>Material added to the text by the translator. Usually consists of instructions for expanding abbreviated text.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>gatha</td>
<td>Verse.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>namo</td>
<td>Words of homage.</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Much more can, and should, be done in this area, such as clearly marking all background stories, and so on. We hope to produce a more fully marked up edition in the future, but this will wait for further revisions of the translation by Ven. Brahmali.

FORMATS

In such a massive and complex text, I can hardly hope to have eliminated all mistakes. Despite the great help given by the many hands who have worked on this edition, I am all too conscious of what remains undone. Yet other duties call, and I cannot delay this publication indefinitely. Of course, one of the advantages of a digital edition is that it allows for progressive enhancement and correction. If you notice any mistakes, I would be grateful if you would point them out to me.

We have produced the text as HTML, and the ebook format EPUB, in addition to a PDF version produced with \LaTeX. My own experience with the various ebook formats is that they are erratic and unstable, and display quite differently on each device. This is particularly the case for a complex document such as this. We have, nevertheless, done our best to produce standards compliant and clean files, and they work well on the systems we have used for testing.¹ The PDF should, of course, work well everywhere. Since the base text is in clean HTML5, it can be readily adapted to other formats. If you make any substantive adaptations, or would like to see a different format, please let me know.

The licence of the text allows for a printed edition as long as it is for free distribution. The PDF we have produced is, however, optimized for the screen. If you would like to sponsor a printed edition, please contact me and I will help prepare a PDF to your specifications.

BHIKKHU SUJATO
Sydney, March 2014.

¹ One bug I am aware of: in the ebook reader Calibre, the popup footnotes will not work properly in the default “paged mode”; choose the “flow mode” and all should be well. (Incidentally, I have not had good results using Calibre to convert this file into other formats, as it dirties the code and breaks the footnotes.)
At one time the Buddha, the Master, was staying at Verañjā near Naḷeru’s Nimba tree with a great Sangha of five hundred monks. Now a brahmin of Verañjā was told:

“Sir, the recluse Gotama, the Sakyān, having gone forth from the Sakyān clan, is staying at Verañjā near Naḷeru’s Nimba tree with a great Sangha of five hundred monks. That Master Gotama has acquired a good reputation, thus:

‘He is indeed a Master, an arahant, fully awakened, accomplished in true knowledge and conduct, fortunate, knower of the worlds, unrivalled trainer of tamable people, teacher of gods and humans, the Awakened One, the Master. Having realised with his own direct knowledge this world with its gods, its lords of death and its supreme beings, this population with its recluses and brahmins, its gods and humans, he makes it known to others. He teaches a Dhamma that is good in the beginning, good in the middle and good in the end, with the right meaning and phrasing; he reveals a perfectly complete and pure spiritual life.’ Good indeed it is to see such arahants.”

Then the brahmin of Verañjā approached the Master, exchanged friendly greetings with him and sat down to one side.² He then said this to the Master:

“I have heard, good³ Gotama, that the recluse Gotama does not pay homage to brahmins who are worn, old, burdened with years, advanced in life, come to the last stage;¹⁴ nor that he stands up for them or offers them a seat. This is indeed so, for the good⁵ Gotama does not pay homage to brahmins who are worn, old, burdened with years, advanced in life, come to the last stage; nor does he stand up for them or offer them a seat. This, good Gotama, is not proper.”⁶

“Brahmin, in the world with its gods, its lords of death and its supreme beings, in this population with its recluses and brahmins, its gods and humans, I do not see one to whom I should pay homage, for whom I should rise up or to whom I should offer a seat. For if the Tathāgata should pay homage to anyone, rise up for him or offer him a seat, his head might even split asunder.”⁷

¹ All this is stock. ² Brahmali: The following is found in almost identical terms at AN 8.11. ³ Bho. This is the vocative, singular and plural, of bhavant. See Introduction, BD 1.xxxviii. ⁴ Also stock; cf., e.g., Mn i.82, Snp p.50, Snp p.92; Vin 2.188. ⁵ Bhavaṁ. ⁶ Na sampāṇṇaṁ eva. Vin-a 130 taṁ abhivādanādinaṁ akaraṇaṁ ayuitaṁ eva. Similar passages are at AN i.67 (AN-a: na yuttaṁ eva, na anucchavikaṁ eva). Translator at GS i.63 says “the idea here is ‘not the perfect gentleman’ or ‘bad form.’” See also AN iii.223; AN iv.173. ⁷ muddhāpi tassa vipateyya. Buddhaghosa explains at Vin-a 131: “the head of that man (tassa puggalassa) having been cut off from the neck, may it fall to the ground.” Same phrase occurs at DN i.143; DN iii.19; Dhp 72.

“The revered Gotama lacks taste.”

“There is indeed, brahmin, a way in which one could truly say of me, ‘the recluse Gotama lacks taste.’ For tastes for forms, sounds, scents, flavours, and tangible objects—these have been destroyed by the Tathāgata, cut off at the root, made like a palm-stump, so utterly done away with that they are incapable of future arising. This is a way in which one could truly say of me, ‘the recluse Gotama lacks taste.’ But that is not what you meant.”

“The revered Gotama is without enjoyment.”

“There is indeed, brahmin, a way in which one could truly say of me, ‘the recluse Gotama is without enjoyment.’ For enjoyments of forms, sounds, scents, flavours, and tangible objects—these have been destroyed by the Tathāgata, cut off at the root, made like a palm-stump, so utterly done away with that they are incapable of future arising. This is a way in which one could truly say of me, ‘the recluse Gotama is without enjoyment.’ But that is not what you meant.”

“The revered Gotama professes the doctrine of non-action.”

“There is indeed, brahmin, a way in which one could truly say of me, ‘the recluse Gotama professes the doctrine of non-action.’ For I teach the non-doing of misconduct by body, speech and mind. I teach the non-doing of manifold bad unwholesome actions. This is a way in which one could truly say of me, ‘the recluse Gotama professes the doctrine of non-action.’ But that is not what you meant.”

“The revered Gotama professes the doctrine of annihilation.”

“There is indeed, brahmin, a way in which one could truly say of

---

1 Bhavaṁ. 2 Arasarūpa. Vin-a 131 takes this to mean lack of good manners. Gotama is said not to show complete taste, which consists in paying reverence, making salutation, getting up from the seat and making a respectful greeting. cf. Taittirīya Upaniṣad ii.7. 3 Nibbhoga, or “property,” as at gs iv.118. Vin-a 134 says that greeting the aged is sāmaggiparibhoga. 4 For this passage to end of Bu-Pj 1.1.3 cf. Vin1.234–236 and AN iv.180ff., in both of which Gotama is represented as speaking with the General Sīha. The theory of non-action is usually attributed to Pūraṇa Kassapa, as at DN i.52f. The theory of kiriyavādin and akiriyavādin is also stated at AN i.62. 5 Ucchedavāda, or cutting off. cf. DN i.34. Rhys Davids refers to Katha Upaniṣad i.20, where the doubt as to whether, after a man is dead, he exists or not, is also voiced by Naciketas. Cf. also MN ii.228.
me, ‘the recluse Gotama professes the doctrine of annihilation.’ For I speak of the annihilation of sense desire, anger and confusion;¹ I speak of the annihilation of manifold bad unwholesome qualities. This is a way in which one could truly say of me, ‘the recluse Gotama professes the doctrine of annihilation.’ But that is not what you meant.”

“The revered Gotama is one who detests.”²

“There is indeed, brahmin, a way in which one could truly say of me, ‘the recluse Gotama is one who detests.’ For I detest misconduct by body, speech and mind, and the acquisition³ of manifold bad unwholesome qualities. This is a way in which one could truly say of me, ‘the recluse Gotama is one who detests.’ But that is not what you meant.”

“The revered Gotama is a disciplinarian.”⁴

“There is indeed, brahmin, a way in which one could truly say of me, ‘the recluse Gotama is a disciplinarian.’ For I teach the Dhamma for the disciplining of sense desire, anger and confusion; I teach the Dhamma for the disciplining of manifold bad unwholesome qualities. This is a way in which one could truly say of me, ‘the recluse Gotama is a disciplinarian.’ But that is not what you meant.”

“The revered Gotama is one who practises austerities.”⁵

“There is indeed, brahmin, a way in which one could truly say of me, ‘the recluse Gotama is one who practises austerities.’ For I say that bad unwholesome qualities—misconduct by body, speech and mind—are to be burned up.¹ He who has destroyed the bad unwholesome qualities that are to be burned up, who has cut them off at the root, made them like a palm-stump, done away with them so utterly that they are incapable of future arising—him I call one who practises austerities. The Tathāgata has destroyed the bad unwholesome qualities that are to be burned up, has cut them off at the root, made them like a palm tree, done away with them so utterly that they are incapable of future arising. This is a way in which one could truly say of me, ‘the recluse Gotama is one who practises austerities.’ But that is not what you meant.”

¹ cf. SN iv.252, definition of nibbāna. ² Jegucchi, one who loathes, or feels abhorrence. See Dialogues of the Buddha i.237, n. 2, and cf. MN i.77, MN i.78. ³ Samāpatti. ⁴ Venayika. Vin-a 135 says that the brahmin did not see the lord paying reverence and so forth, and said that he restrained these acts with regard to the “highest in the world,” therefore he thought him one to be restrained, one to be suppressed. At MN i.140 Gotama is represented as telling the monks that he is charged with being venayika. It here seems to mean annihilationist, for it is combined with: “he preaches the disintegration, the destruction and annihilation of existing creatures.” But as translator (gs iv.119, n. 4) remarks, we have natthika and ucchedavāda for nihilist and annihilationist. See loc. cit. for valuable remarks, and AN v.190. ⁵ Tapassi, connected with tapas, literally burnt up. It can also mean “one who has his senses under control.”

“The revered Gotama is withdrawn.”²³

“There is indeed, brahmin, a way in which one could truly say of me, ‘the recluse Gotama is withdrawn.’ He whose future conception in a womb, whose rebirth in a future life, is destroyed and cut off at the root, made like a palm-stump, so utterly done away with that it is incapable of future arising—him I call one who is withdrawn. The Tathāgata’s future conception in a womb, his rebirth in a future life, is destroyed and cut off at the root, made like a palm-stump, so utterly done away with that he is incapable of future arising. This is a way in which one could truly say of me, ‘the recluse Gotama is withdrawn.’ But that is not what you meant.”

“Brahmin, suppose there was a hen⁴ with eight or ten or twelve eggs, which she had properly covered, properly warmed and properly incubated. Is the first chick that hatches safely—having pierced through the egg-shell with the point of the claw on its foot, or with its beak—to be called the eldest or the youngest?”

“He is to be called the eldest, good Gotama, for he is the eldest of those.”

“Even so, brahmin, in this generation without understanding, being like an egg, covered over, I alone⁵ in the world have split the

---

¹ tapanīyā; cf. AN i.49 and “should be mortified” at GS iv.120. ² Brahmali: The Pali puns on the word apagabbha, which has the double meaning of “timid” and “not going to a womb”, i.e. not being reborn. “Withdrawn” is an attempt at capturing this. ³ apagabbha. Vin-a 136, the brahmin says that Gotama is either destined to be reborn again in a mother’s womb or not to arise in a deva-world. ⁴ cf. MN i.104.
eggshell of ignorance and reached the unsurpassed full awakening. I, brahmin, am the world’s eldest\(^1\) and best.\(^2\)

“Brahmin,\(^3\) I was firmly energetic and had clarity of mindfulness; my body was tranquil and my mind unified. Fully secluded from the five senses, secluded from unwholesome mental qualities, I entered and remained in the first jhāna, which consists of rapture and happiness born of seclusion, accompanied by movement of the mind. Through the stilling of the movement of the mind, I entered and remained in the second jhāna, which has internal confidence and unification of mind\(^4\) and consists of rapture and happiness born of samādhi. Through the fading away of rapture, I remained even-minded, mindful and clearly comprehending, experiencing happiness directly, and I entered and remained in the third jhāna of which the noble one declare, ‘he is even-minded, mindful, and abides in happiness.’ Through the abandoning of happiness and suffering and the earlier ending of joy and displeasure,\(^5\) I entered and remained in the fourth jhāna, which has neither suffering nor happiness and consists of purity of mindfulness and even-mindedness.\(^6\)

Then with the mind collected, clarified, purified, flawless, void of taints, grown soft and pliable, steady and imperturbable,\(^7\) I directed it\(^8\) to the knowledge of the memory of former lives. I recollected many past lives, that is to say, one birth,\(^9\) two births, three births, four births, five births, ten births, twenty births, thirty births, forty births, fifty births, a hundred births, a thousand births, a hundred thousand births, and many eons of world dissolution, many eons of \(^{1}\) Vin-a 140, on account of being the first-born among ariyas. In Vin-a 165 ariyas are defined as Buddhas, paccekabuddhas, and the disciples of Buddhas.

\(^{2}\) cf. DN ii.15, aggo, jeṭṭho, setṭho.
\(^{3}\) This passage to end of Bu-Pj 1.1.8 below = MN i.21, but the Majjhima omits the simile of the chick.
\(^{4}\) ekodibhāva.
\(^{5}\) Explained by the Commentary to mean bodily ease and bodily discomfort.
\(^{6}\) cf. AN i.53; SN v.318.
\(^{7}\) Vin 3.4; MN i.22, read āṇajjappatte with variant readings; AN ii.211; DN i.76; MN i.182 all read āṇeṭṭhappatte. This passage to end of Bu-Pj 1.1.8 below = MN i.22 = MN i.182–183, except that these omit the simile of the chick.
\(^{8}\) cf. AN ii.211; DN i.76ff.
\(^{9}\) cf. SN ii.122.
world evolution,¹ and many eons of both dissolution and evolution: “There I had such a name, such a family, such appearance,² such food, such experience of happiness and suffering, and such a life-span. Passing away from there I was reborn elsewhere, and there I had such a name ... and such a life-span. Passing away from there I was reborn here. Thus I recollected many past lives with their characteristics and particulars.” This was the first knowledge attained by me in the first watch of that night;³ ignorance was dispelled, understanding arose, darkness was dispelled, light arose, as it is for one who remains heedful, ardent and energetic.⁴ This, brahmin, was my first successful breaking forth like a chick’s from the eggshell.

Then with the mind collected, clarified, purified, flawless, void of taints, grown soft and pliable, steady and imperturbable, I directed it to the knowledge of the arising and passing away of beings. With the purified divine eye surpassing that of humans, I saw beings passing away and getting reborn, inferior and superior, beautiful and ugly, gone to good destinations⁵ and bad destinations,⁶ and I understood how beings fare according to their kamma: “These beings⁷ who engaged in misconduct by body, speech and mind, who abused the noble ones, held wrong view and acted accordingly,⁸ at the breaking up of the body after death, have arisen in the plane of misery, a bad destination, the abyss, hell. But these beings who engaged in good conduct of body, speech and mind, who did not abuse the noble ones, held right view and acted accordingly, at the breaking up of the body after death, have arisen in a good destination, a heaven world. Thus with the purified divine eye surpassing that of humans, I saw beings passing away and getting reborn, inferior and superior, beautiful and ugly, gone to good destinations and bad destinations, and I understood how beings fare according to their kamma.¹ This was the second knowledge attained by me in the middle watch of that night. Ignorance was dispelled, understanding arose, darkness was dispelled, light arose, as it is for one who remains heedful, ardent and energetic. This, brahmin, was my second successful breaking forth, like a chick’s from the eggshell.

¹ I follow Lord Chalmers’, translation at Further Dialogues of the Buddha i.15, for, although it is not perfect, it gives the idea that the process is eternally repeated. kS ii.86 reads “æon of involution ... of evolution”; GS iv.121, “rolling on and rolling back”; GS ii.145, “rolling up and rolling back.” The brahmanic idea is that as Viṣṇu sleeps on the giant cobra, he dreams the world; this is its out-rolling, its coming to be. When he awakes the world falls into nothingness, it is withdrawn, until the god sleeps and dreams again. ² Vin-a 160, evañvānaṁ ti odāto vā sāmo vā. ³ See Further Dialogues of the Buddha i.15, n. 1 for this night being occupied with the “chain of causation,” as at Vin 1.1. ⁴ pahitatta; see Mrs. Rhys Davids, The Birth of Indian Psychology and its Development in Buddhism, p. 295. ⁵ Vin-a 164, sugata ti sugatigate ... duggate ti duggatigate, literally gone to a good bourn, etc.; or, in a good bourn, etc. ⁶ Vin-a 164, sugata ti sugatigate ... duggate ti duggatigate, literally gone to a good bourn, etc.; or, in a good bourn, etc. ⁷ Bhonto. ⁸ kammamasādāna, translated at GS iii.295, “action’s moulding,” and at GS iv.122, “men who have acquired this karma.”

Then² with the mind collected, clarified, purified, flawless, void of taints, grown soft and pliable, steady and imperturbable, I directed it to the knowledge of the ending of the corruptions. I knew according to reality: This is suffering, this is the arising of suffering, this is the ending of suffering, this is the course leading to the ending of suffering. I knew according to reality: These are the corruptions, this is the arising of the corruptions, this is the ending of the corruptions, this is the course leading to the ending of the corruptions. When I knew and saw this, my mind was freed from the corruption of sense desire, my mind was freed from the corruption of existence, my mind was freed from the corruption of false views, my mind was freed from the corruption of ignorance.³ When it was freed, I knew,⁴ “It is freed,” and I understood that birth is ended, the spiritual life has been lived, the job has been done, there is no further state of existence.⁵ This was the third knowledge attained by me in the third watch of that night. Ignorance was dispelled, understanding arose, darkness was dispelled, light arose, as it is for one who remains heedful, ardent and energetic.⁶ This, brahmin, was my third successful breaking forth, like a chick’s from the eggshell.”

¹ This passage = SN ii.122f. ² For this passage cf. AN ii.211; MN i.23; MN iii.36. ³ These are the four āsavā. At MN i.23 and AN ii.211, AN iv.179 only three āsavas are mentioned. ⁴ Cf. GS ii.225, n. 2; GS iv.123. ⁵ One of the formulæ of arahantship ⁶ To here from Bu-Pj 1.1.5 above = MN i.21 (and of MN i.182–183).
When this had been said, the brahmin of Verañjā said to the Master:

“Good Gotama is the eldest; good Gotama is the best. Wonderful, good Gotama, wonderful. As one might set upright what had been overturned, or reveal what had been hidden, or show the way to one who was lost, or bring a lamp into the darkness so that those with eyes might see forms—even so has the good Gotama made the Dhamma clear in many ways. To good Gotama I go for refuge, and to the Dhamma and to the Sangha of monks. May the good Gotama accept me as a lay follower who from today has gone for refuge for life. May the good Gotama consent to spend the rains at Verañjā together with the Sangha of monks.” The Master consented by silence. Then the brahmin of Verañjā, understanding that the Master had consented, rose from his seat, paid homage to him and departed, keeping his right side towards him.

At that time Verañjā was short of food and stricken by hunger, with crops blighted and turned to straw. It was not easy to keep oneself going by collecting alms. Just then some horse-dealers from

---

¹ Here bhagavantaṁ; at AN iv.179 bhavantaṁ. ² Vin 1.236; MN i.24, MN i.488f., etc., for this stock passage. To here, from beginning of this Pārājika, cf. AN iv.173. ³ Burlingame, Buddhist Legends, ii.193, says that Jātaka no. 183 is derived from this Vinaya story; and that the Commentary on Dhp 83 is derived from this Jātaka; cf. Dhp-a ii.153ff. ⁴ Cf. below Bu-Pj 1.5.5; Bu-Pj 4.1.1.

The meaning of these four stock-phrases is doubtful: (1) Short of almsfood = dubbhikkhā; may also mean: (suffering from) famine. Vin-a 174, dullabhikkhā, almsfood (was) hard to get. (2) Difficult to obtain = dvihitikā; may also mean: crops were bad. See article in Pali-English Dictionary. (3) Suffering from famine = setaṭṭhikā; may also mean: i) (strewn with) white bones, ii) mildew. So translated at Vinaya Texts iii.326 Vin 2.256), where this word used in simile = AN iv.279, translated GS iv.185 (see GS iv.185 n. 2), “white-as-bones” (disease). (4) Food tickets were issued = salākāvuttā; may also mean: people subsisted on blades of grass. Vin-a 175 gives both meanings. GS i.142 = AN i.160: grown to mere stubs. At AN i.24 Kuṇḍadhāna is called “chief among those who are the first to receive a food ticket” (GS i.18). AN-a i.260f. apparently refers to a food ticket. Cf. Vin-a 174f., AN-a ii.257, SN-a iii.106. Also GS i.142, KS iv.228 (= AN i.160, SN iv.333) and their notes. ⁸ yāpetuṁ. Cf. description of Vesālī in opposite terms at Vin 1.238.
Uttarāpathaka entered the rains residence at Verañjā with five hundred horses. In the horse-pen they prepared patthā measure after patthā measure of steamed grain for the monks. The monks, having dressed in the morning, took their bowls and robes and entered Verañjā for alms. Being unable to obtain anything, they went to the horse-pen. Having brought the patthā measures of steamed grain back to the monastery, they pounded them and ate them. Venerable Ānanda, having crushed a patthā measure of the steamed grain on a stone, took it to the Master, and the Master ate it.

Now the Master had heard the sound of the mortar. Tathāgatas sometimes ask knowing, and knowing sometimes do not ask; they ask knowing the right time to ask, and they ask knowing the right time when not to ask. Tathāgatas ask when it is beneficial, not when... it is unbeneficial; in regard to what is unbeneficial, the Tathāgatas have destroyed the bridge. ¹² The Buddhas, the Masters, question the monks for two reasons: “We shall teach the Dhamma or lay down a training rule for the disciples.”

Then the Master addressed Venerable Ānanda: “Ānanda, what is this sound of a mortar?”

Then Venerable Ānanda informed the Master.

“Good, good, Ānanda, you who are superior people ³ have conquered ⁴ (the problems of famine), ⁵ later generations ⁶ will despise even rice and meat.”

Then Venerable Mahāmoggallāna ⁷ approached the Master, paid homage to him and sat down to one side. He then said to him:

“At present, Master, Verañjā is short of food and stricken by hunger, with crops blighted and turned to straw. It is not easy to keep oneself going by collecting alms. Master, the under-surface of this great earth is abounding with food, ⁸ and its taste is just like pure honey. ⁹ It would be good, Master, if I inverted the earth, ¹⁰ so that the monks might enjoy the nutritive essence of the water-plants.”

“But what will you do with those creatures, Moggallāna, who are

---

² Attha, in Sakyā the positive goal. The translators of Vin 1.158 at Vinaya Texts, i.327 translate atthasaññīhīta as “full of sense,” thus taking attha (quite unnecessarily) in its later, debased and narrowed meaning. The negative word anattha appears at Vin 1.10 in the First Utterance, the positive form being there absent. See GS iv., GS vii. and GS xix. ¹ Brahmalī: This seems to mean that Tathāgatas are unable to do what is unbeneficial due to their achievement of awakening, cf. Vin-a 1.180,7. ² Setughāta. Vin-a 1.180 says setu vuccati maggo. Thus if we follow Buddhaghosa in this interpretation of setughāta, the rendering “the bridge is pulled down for the Tathāgatas” of Vinaya Texts i.327 must be given up. Cf. AN i.220, where it seems to mean the breaking down of new actions; and cf. AN i.260; AN ii.145; DS 299ff. ³ Sappurisa. On prefix sa- see Mrs. Rhys Davids, Introduction to GS i.xf. ⁴ Vijitāṁ, also meaning conquered, subdued. Vin-a 1.180 says dubbhikkaṁ vijitaṁ lobho vijita icchācāro vijitv. ⁵ Brahmalī: See Vin-a 1.180,24. ⁶ Pacchimājanatā. Vin-a 1.181 says anāgāte; also that they will be sitting in the vihārā, getting food easily, but feeling nothing but contempt for it as being not to their liking. Cf. below, BD 1.66. ⁷ Generally paired with Sāriputta. At AN i.23 he is called chief among the disciples who have psychic power. Cf. Vin 1.39; Thag 382ff. ⁸ Brahmalī: See Vin-a 1.182,9. ⁹ For this simile cf. DN iii.87. ¹⁰ Vin-a 1.182 explains: so as to turn up the lowest level to the top. supported by the earth?”

“Master, I will make one of my hands broad, like the great earth, and I will make those creatures who are supported by the earth go there. Then with the other hand I will invert the earth.”

“Enough, Moggallāna, please do not invert the earth, or beings may become deranged.”

“It would be good, Master, if the whole Sangha of monks could go to Uttarakuru for alms.”

“Enough, Moggallāna, do not pursue this idea.”

Now while Venerable Sāriputta was in seclusion, he thought this: “For which Buddhas, for which Masters, did the spiritual life not last long? For which Buddhas, for which Masters, did the spiritual life last long?”

Then, in the evening, Venerable Sāriputta came out of seclusion and approached the Master. He paid homage to him, sat down to one side and said this: “Just now, Master, as I was in seclusion, I thought this: ‘For which Buddhas ... last long?’”

“Sāriputta, the spiritual life established by Master Vipassī, Master Sikhi and Master Vesabhū did not last long. But the spiritual life established by Master Kakusandha, Master Konāgamana and Master Kassapa did last long.”

“And what, Master, is the reason why the spiritual life established by Master Vipassī, Master Sikhi and Master Vesabhū did not last long?”

“Sāriputta, Master Vipassī, Master Sikhi and Master Vessabhū were disinclined to teach the Dhamma in detail to their disciples.

---

¹ Vipallāsa, from vi+pari+as, literally to throw round against. ² B.C. Law in his Geography of Early Buddhism, p.17, p.53, says that Uttarakuru “is alluded to in Pāli literature as a mythical region.” ³ Usually paired with Moggallāna. See Psalms of the Bretheren, p.340. At an i.23 he is called chief among the disciples “of great wisdom.” ⁴ Some of the 24 Buddhas. For Sikhi see sn i.155ff., and for all three Jā i.4ff.; DN ii.2ff. ⁵ The last three Buddhas before the present supreme Buddha. Cf. Jā i.43; Dhp-a i.84, Dhp-a iii.236; DN ii.2ff.
They had few discourses in prose and in prose and verse, few expositions, verses, inspired utterances, quotations, birth stories, amazing accounts and analyses; and training rules were not laid down and a Pātimokkha was not recited. After the disappearance of those Buddhas, those Masters, after the disappearance of the disciples enlightened under those Buddhas, those who were the last disciples—of various names, clans, and social strata, who had gone forth from various families—caused that spiritual life rapidly to disappear. It is just like various flowers, lying on a flat piece of wood without being tied together by a thread, are scattered about, whirled about and destroyed by the wind. Why is that? Because they are not held together by a thread. Even so, at the disappearance of those Buddhas, those Masters, at the disappearance of the disciples enlightened under those Buddhas, those who were the last disciples—of various names, clans and social strata, who had gone forth from various families—caused that spiritual life rapidly to disappear. Instead those Masters were untiring in exhorting their disciples, after reading their minds with their own.

Formerly, Sāriputta, while staying in a certain frightening jungle thicket, Master Vessabhū, the arahant, the fully Awakened One, exhorted and admonished a Sangha of a thousand monks, reading... their minds with his own, saying: ‘Think like this,¹ not like this;² pay attention like this,³ not like this;⁴ forsake this;⁵ having attained this,⁶ abide in it.’ Then, when those thousand monks had been exhorted and admonished by Master Vessabhū, the arahant, the fully Awakened One, their minds were freed from the corruptions without grasping.⁷ But if anyone not devoid of desire should enter that frightening jungle-thicket, usually their hair would stand on end. This is the reason why the spiritual life established by Master Vipassī, Master Sikhī and Master Vesabhū did not last long.”

“But what, Master, is the reason why the spiritual life established by Master Kakusandha, Master Konāgamana and Master Kassapa lasted long?”

“Sāriputta, Master Kakusandha, Master Konāgamana and Master Kassapa were diligent in teaching the Dhamma in detail to their disciples. They had many discourses in prose and in prose and in verse, many expositions, verses, inspired utterances, quotations, birth stories, amazing accounts and analyses; and training rules for their disciples were laid down and a Pātimokkha was recited. At the disappearance of those Buddhas, those Masters, at the disappearance of the disciples who were enlightened under those Buddhas, those who were the last disciples—of various names, clans and social strata, who had gone forth from various families—established that spiritual life for a long time. It is just like various flowers, lying on a piece of wood but being well tied together by a thread, are not scattered about, whirled about or destroyed by the wind. Why is that? Because they are well tied together by the thread. Even so, at the disappearance of those Buddhas, those Masters, at the disappearance of the disciples who were enlightened under those Buddhas, those who were the last disciples—of various names, clans and social strata, who had gone forth from various families—established that spiritual life for a long time.

¹ Vin-a 188, i.e. to the three vitakkā: viz., renunciation, benevolence and non-injury.
² Vin-a 188, to their opposites: viz., sensual pleasures, malevolence and injury.
³ Vin-a 188, i.e. to impermanence, sorrow and non-self. ⁴ Vin-a 188, i.e. to their opposites.
⁵ Vin-a 188, i.e. what is wrong. ⁶ Vin-a 188, i.e. what is right. ⁷ Anupādāya. time. This is the reason why the spiritual life established by Master Kakusandha, Master Konāgamana and Master Kassapa lasted long.”

Then Venerable Sāriputta got up from his seat, put his robe over one shoulder, put the palms of his hands together and said to the Master:

“This is the right time, Master,¹ to lay down training rules and recite a Pātimokkha, so that this spiritual life may persist and last for a long time.”

“Hold on, Sāriputta, the Tathāgata will know the right time for that. The teacher does not lay down training rules for his disciples and recite a Pātimokkha until the causes of corruption appear in the Sangha.² And they do not appear until the Sangha has attained long standing,³ great size⁴⁵⁶ or great learning.⁷ But when this happens, then the Teacher lays down training rules for his disciples and recites a Pātimokkha in order to ward off those causes of corruptions. Sāriputta, the Sangha of monks is devoid of immorality,⁸ devoid of danger, stainless, purified, established in the essence.⁹ The most backward¹⁰ of these five hundred monks is a stream-enterer, not liable to be reborn in any state of misery, assured, bound for awakening.¹¹

---

¹ Sugata. ² Vin-a 191, things belonging to the here and now and to the next world, the bonds of murder, bad conscience and the reproaching of others, and a variety of ill and woe. For this passage, cf. MN i.445. ³ Vin-a 194 quotes Kd 1.31. ⁴ Vin-a 194 quotes Bu-Pc 5; cf. MN-a iii.156. ⁵ lābhaggamahatta. Vin-a 194 lābhassa aggamahattaiṁ yo lābhassa aggo uttamo mahantabhāvo taṁ patthot iti attto. For list of “gains” see AN 1.38. At MN i.445 we find lābhaggam, translated Further Dialogues of the Buddha i.317 as “wealth.” ⁶ Vin-a 195 quotes Bu-Pc 41; cf. MN-a iii.156. ⁷ Vin-a 195 quotes Bu-Pc 68; cf. MN-a iii.157. ⁸ nirabbuda. Lokasmiṁ abbuda, translated at KS i.61 “a hell on earth,” and SN-a i.100 says that “thieves are those who cause ruin in the world.” At Vin-a 195 nirabbudo = niconco, free from thieves. It explains that here thieves mean those who are immoral, not being true samaṇas; but pretending to be, they steal the requisites of others. Therefore nirabbuda (free from ruin) means free from thieves, free from immorality. Nirabbuda recurs below, Vin 3.18. ⁹ Buddhaghosa says, Vin-a 195, that this consists of virtue, contemplation, wisdom, freedom, and knowledge and insight into freedom. ¹⁰ pacchimaka. At AN ii.80 and DN ii.155 Gotama is made to use this sentence in addressing Ānanda. The Commentary on AN ii.80 and at DN-a ii.593 say that by pacchimaka, Ānanda is meant. Our the Commentary (Vin-a 195) naturally does not refer to him. ¹¹ A usual formula for stream-entrants.
Then the Master addressed Venerable Ānanda: “Ānanda, it is the custom for Tathāgatas not to tour the country without having taken leave of those who invited them to spend the rains. Let us go to the brahmin of Verañjā and take leave.”

“Yes, Master.”

Then the Master dressed, took his bowl and robe and, with Venerable Ānanda as his attendant,¹ went to the dwelling of the brahmin of Verañjā and sat down on the prepared seat. Then the brahmin of Verañjā approached the Master, paid homage to him and sat down to one side. The Master then said to the brahmin of Verañjā:

“Brahmin, having stayed for the rainy season according to your invitation, we are taking leave of you. We wish to depart for a tour of the country.”

“It is true, good Gotama, that you have stayed for the rainy season according to my invitation, but a gift has not been given. That is not good, nor is it because we did not want to give. It happened because household life is busy and there is much to do. May the good Gotama consent to a meal tomorrow together with the Sangha of monks.”

The Master consented by keeping silence. Then the Master, having taught, roused, gladdened and delighted the brahmin of Verañjā with a talk on the Dhamma, rose from his seat and went away. Then, when the night was over, the brahmin of Verañjā prepared various kinds of delicious food² in his own home, and then informed the Master:

“It is time, good Gotama, the meal is ready.”

Then the Master, having dressed in the morning, took his bowl and robe and, together with the Sangha of monks, he went to the dwelling of the brahmin of Verañjā and sat down on the prepared seat. Then, with his own hands, the brahmin of Verañjā served various kinds of delicious food to the Sangha of monks with the Buddha at its head. When they were satisfied and the Master had eaten and finished his meal, he gave the Master a set of three robes and a pair of robes to each monk.¹ The Master instructed, roused, gladdened and delighted the brahmin of Verañjā with talk on the Dhamma, and then rose from his seat and departed.

¹ Pacchāsamaṇa, the junior monk who walks behind the senior on his rounds. Ānanda accompanies Gotama again at Vin 4.78. ² Defined at Vin 4.92.

The Master, having remained at Verañjā for as long as he liked, went to Payāgapatiṭṭhāna via Soreyya,² Saṅkassa³ and Kaṇṇakujja.⁴ There he crossed the river Ganges and proceeded to Benares. Having remained at Benares for as long as he liked, he set out for Vesālī on tour. Wandering on tour by stages, he arrived at Vesālī.⁵ There he stayed in the Great Wood, in the hall with the peaked roof.

The chapter on Verañjā is finished

ORIGIN STORY

FIRST SUB-STORY

At that time not far from Vesālī was a village called Kalandaka. There lived Sudinna, the son of a prominent merchant.⁶ Now Sudinna the Kalandaka⁷ went to Vesālī on some business together with many friends. At that time the Master was seated, surrounded by a great assembly of people, teaching the Dhamma. When Sudinna saw this, he thought:⁸ “Perhaps I should listen to the Dhamma?”⁹ Then Sudinna approached the assembly and sat down to one side.

As he was sitting there, Sudinna thought: “So far as I understand ¹ dussayuga, cf. Vin 1.278 and Vināya Texts ii.190, n.; MN i.215 = SN v.71. ² A town near Takkasila; mentioned also in connection with these other two towns at Vin 2.299.³ A town, said by Fausböll to be the locus of Dhp 181. At its gate Sāriputta interpreted a problem, on which Jātaka 134 is based. See Ja i.473.⁴ The modern Allahabad.⁵ Capital of the Vajji country. See B.C. Law, Geography of Early Buddhism, p.12f.⁶ Vin-a 202 says that as other people there were called Kalandaka(ka), Sudinna was also called “son of the great merchant” (saṭṭhiputta)—to distinguish him.⁷ Referred to at Vin 2.286 as “the first pārājika, promulgated at Vesālī on account of Sudinna with regard to sexual intercourse.” Referred to at Mil 170.⁸ Vin-a 202, “because having in former births been very meritorious, he was incited, a clansman’s son, bound to become” (bhabbakulaputta).⁹ This same story is told in practically the same words about Raṭṭhapāla at MN ii.55ff.

the Dhamma taught by the Master, it is no easy matter for one who lives in a house to lead the spiritual life that is utterly perfect and pure as a polished conch shell. Perhaps I should cut off my hair and beard, put on the yellow robes and go forth from home into homelessness?"

When the crowd had been taught, roused, gladdened and delighted by the Master with talk on the Dhamma, they rose from their seats, paid homage to the Master, circumambulated him with their right side towards him and departed. When the crowd had departed, Sudinna approached the Master, paid homage to him and sat down to one side. He then said to the Master:

"Master, so far as I understand the Dhamma taught by the Master, it is not an easy matter for one who lives in a house to lead the spiritual life that is utterly perfect and pure as a polished conch shell. Master, I wish to cut off my hair and beard, put on the yellow robes and go forth from home into homelessness. May the Master let me go forth."

"But, Sudinna, do you have your parents’ permission?"

"No, Master."

"Sudinna, Tathāgatas do not ordain a child without the parents’ permission."

"I will do whatever is necessary, Master, to get my parents’ permission."

Then Sudinna, having finished his business in Vesāli, returned to Kalandaka. There he approached his parents and said:

"Mother and father, in so far as I understand the Dhamma taught by the Master, it is no easy matter for one who lives in a house to lead the spiritual life that is utterly perfect and pure as a polished conch shell. I wish to cut off my hair and beard, put on the yellow robes and go forth from home into homelessness. Give me your permission to go forth."

His parents replied:

"But, Sudinna, you are our only child, dear and beloved, you live in comfort and are well cared for. Sudinna, you have no experience of suffering. Even if you died, we would not willingly be without you."
How can we, while you are still living, permit you to go forth from home into homelessness?"

A second time Sudinna said to his parents: “Mother and father ...” “... into homelessness?” A third time Sudinna said to his parents: “Mother and father ...” “... into homelessness?”

Thinking, “My parents do not permit me to go forth,” he lay down on the bare ground and said: “I will either die right here or go forth.” And he stopped eating and did not eat at the next seven meals.¹

Then his parents said: “Dear Sudinna, you are our only child, dear and beloved, you live in comfort and are well cared for; you have no experience of suffering. Even if you died, we would not willingly be without you. How can we, while you are still living, permit you to go forth? Get up, Sudinna, eat, drink and amuse yourself. Find delight in sensual pleasures and in doing meritorious actions.³ We do not allow you to go forth.” When they had said this, Sudinna was silent.

A second time and a third time the parents of Sudinna said: “... We do not permit you to go forth.” A third time Sudinna was silent.

Then the friends of Sudinna approached him and said: “Sudinna, you are your parents’ only child, dear and beloved. You live in comfort and are well cared for; you have no experience of suffering. Even if you died, your parents would not willingly be without you. How can they, while you are still living, allow you to go forth? Get up, Sudinna, eat, drink and amuse yourself. Find delight in sensual pleasures and in doing meritorious actions. Your parents will not allow you to go forth.”

When they had said this, Sudinna was silent. A second and a third time the friends of Sudinna said: “Sudinna, you are ...” and a third time Sudinna was silent.

Then the friends of Sudinna approached his parents and said: “Mother and father, Sudinna says that he will either die right there on the bare ground or go forth. If you do not allow Sudinna to go forth, then we will not allow you to go forth.”

¹ This passage omitted at MN ii.57, see MN ii.57, n. 7.
² Abhiramassu or “indulge in love”; but from the context I think not here. Cf. below, BD 1.114.
³ Vin-a 205, “giving gifts, cleansing the way to a good bourn, doing good actions.”
forth, he will die there. But if you allow him to go forth, you will see him again afterwards. And if he does not enjoy the going forth, what alternative¹ will he have but to come back here? Allow Sudinna to go forth.”

“We allow him,” they said.

Then the friends of Sudinna approached him and said: “Get up, Sudinna, your parents allow you to go forth from home into homelessness.”

Then Sudinna thought: “They say that my parents will allow me to go forth from home into homelessness.” And he rose, joyful, delighted and elated, stroking his limbs with his hands. Then Sudinna, having spent a few days regaining his strength, approached the Master, paid homage to him and sat down at one side. He then said to the Master:

“I am permitted by my parents, Master, to go forth from home into homelessness. May the Master allow me to go forth.”

Then Sudinna received the going forth in the presence of the Master, and he received the full ordination. And not long afterwards Venerable Sudinna practised these kinds of ascetic practises:² living in the wilderness, going on alms-round, wearing rags, going on continuous alms-round; and he dwelt depending on a certain village of the Vajjians.

At that time the Vajjians³ were short of food⁴ and stricken by hunger, with crops blighted and turned to straw, and it was not easy to keep oneself going by collecting alms. Now Venerable Sudinna thought to himself: “At present the Vajjians are short of food and stricken by hunger, with crops blighted and turned to straw, and it is not easy to keep oneself going by collecting alms. But I have many relations in Vesālī who are rich, have great wealth and property, much gold and silver,⁵ many resources and requisites, much wealth

¹ gati, literally going or bourn. ² Vin-a 206, dhutagune = kilesaniddhunanake gune.
³ Tribes belonging to one of the sixteen stock mahājanapadas (AN i.213, AN iv.252, an iv.256, AN iv.260). See E.J. THOMAS, The Life of Buddha, p.13, and, on the Vajjis or Vajjians, T.W. RHYS DAVIDS, Buddhist India, p.25. ⁴ Cf. above Bu-Pj 1.2.1, and below, Bu-Pj 4.1.1. ⁵ jātarūpa-rajata. See below, BD 1.28, n. 1.
Perhaps I should live in dependence on my relatives? Because of me my relations will be able to make offerings and make merit, the monks will obtain requisites and I will not go short of almsfood.”

Then Venerable Sudinna, having put his lodging in order, took his bowl and robe and set out for Vesālī, where he arrived by travelling in stages. There the Venerable Sudinna stayed in the hall with the peaked roof in the Great Wood. The relations of Venerable Sudinna heard that he had arrived in Vesālī and they brought him sixty offerings of barley as a gift of food. Then Venerable Sudinna, having given these sixty offerings of barley to the monks, dressed in the morning, took his bowl and robe and entered the village of Kalandaka for alms. As he was going about Kalandaka on a continuous alms-tour, he came to his own father’s house.

At that time the female slave of Venerable Sudinna’s relations wanted to throw away the previous evening’s porridge. But Venerable Sudinna said to her:

“If that is to be thrown away, sister, put it here in my bowl.”

As the slave-girl of Venerable Sudinna’s relations was putting the previous evening’s porridge into his bowl, she recognised his hands, feet and voice. She then went to his mother and said:

“Please know, madam, that the young master Sudinna is back.”

“If you speak the truth, I will make you a freed woman.”

Just then Venerable Sudinna was eating the previous evening’s porridge at the base of a certain wall. The Venerable Sudinna’s father,

---

1 For this stock phrase cf. AN ii.86; SN i.17. On prosperity of Vesālī, cf. Vin 1.268.
2 Vin-a 207 explains that each offering would feed ten monks, therefore sixty would feed six hundred.
3 Vin-a 208 explains that Sudinna had been a monk for eight years, so although the slave did not know him at once, she recognized the character of his hands, feet and voice.
4 yaghe.
5 aṇñataran kuḍḍamūlaṁ nissāya. Pali-English Dictionary calls kuḍḍamūla, “a sort of root.” But Vin-a 209 says it means “that in this district there are rooms in the houses of the large householders where there are seats prepared, and where those going for alms sit down and eat the gruel offered to them.” cf. MN i.62, where kuḍḍāṁ with variant reading kuḍḍamūlaṁ. MN-a iii.297= Vin-a 210. Lord Chalmers translates “under the hedge.” May mean “leaning against a wall.”
coming from work, saw him there. He approached him and said:
“But, Sudinna, isn’t there ... and you are eating old porridge! Isn’t there your own home to go to?”
“We went to your house, householder. That’s where we received this porridge.”
Then Venerable Sudinna’s father took him by the arm and said:
“Come, Sudinna, let’s go to the house.”
Then Venerable Sudinna went to his own father’s house and sat down on a prepared seat. And his father said to him: “Eat, dear Sudinna.”
“There is no need, householder, I have finished eating for today.”
“Then please come back for the meal tomorrow.”
Venerable Sudinna consented by keeping silent. He then rose from his seat and departed.
Then Venerable Sudinna’s mother had the ground smeared with fresh cow-dung, had two heaps made, one of gold coins¹ and the other of gold. The heaps were so large that a man standing on one side could not see a man standing on the other. Hiding these heaps with screens and preparing a seat between them surrounded by a curtain, she addressed Venerable Sudinna’s former wife:
“Daughter-in-law, adorn yourself in the way that our son Sudinna found you especially attractive.”
“Yes, madam,” she responded.
Then, in the morning, Venerable Sudinna dressed, took his bowl and robe and went to his father’s house, where he sat down on the prepared seat. His father approached him, uncovered the heaps and said:
“This dowry, dear Sudinna, the fortune from your mother, is yours. Another is the fortune from your father and another from your ancestors.² It is possible, Sudinna, to return to the low life, enjoy wealth and make merit. Come, Sudinna, please do so.”

¹ (This footnote proved troublesome to typeset due to its length, so it has been moved to an appendix with other long notes on page 2969.) ² It is curious that here there seem to be three heaps, whereas just above it is said that two were made.
“I am not able to do so, father, I cannot. I am enjoying¹ the spiritual life.”

A second and a third time Venerable Sudinna’s father repeated his request. Venerable Sudinna replied:
“If you would not get offended, householder, we could tell you what to do.”

“Speak, Sudinna.”

“Well then, householder, make some large bags of hemp-cloth, fill them with the coins and the gold, take them away in carts and dump them in the middle of the Ganges. And why? Because you would avoid the danger, fear,² terror, and (trouble with) protection that they will cause you.”

When he had said this, his father became displeased and thought,
“How could our son Sudinna speak like this.”

Then he addressed Venerable Sudinna’s former wife: “Well now, daughter-in-law, as you were dear and beloved by him, perhaps our son Sudinna will listen to you.”

Then the former wife of Venerable Sudinna took hold of his feet and said: “What are these nymphs like, my lord’s son, for whose sake you lead the spiritual life?”

“I do not lead the spiritual life, sister, for the sake of nymphs.”

Then the former wife of Venerable Sudinna thought:
“From today my lord’s son calls me ‘sister’” and she fainted on the spot.

Then Venerable Sudinna said to his father: “If, householder, there is food to be given, give it, but do not annoy me.”

“Eat, Sudinna,” he said.

Then, with their own hands, Venerable Sudinna’s mother and father served and satisfied him with various kinds of delicious food.

Then, when Venerable Sudinna had finished his meal, his mother said to him:
“This family, dear Sudinna, is rich, has great wealth and property,

¹ abhirata, to be translated in this context as above. But see below, BD 1.114.
² Chambhitatta, see below, BD 1.119, n. 3.
much gold and silver, many resources and requisites, much wealth in grain. It is possible, dear Sudinna, to return to the low life, enjoy wealth and make merit. Come, Sudinna, please do so.”

“Mother, I am not able to do so, I cannot. I am enjoying¹ the spiritual life.”

A second time ... a third time Venerable Sudinna’s mother said: “This family, Sudinna, is rich ... much wealth in grain. For this reason, dear Sudinna, beget offspring; do not let the Licchavis² take over our heirless property.”

“It is possible for me to do this,³ mother.”

“Where are you staying at present?”

“In the Great Wood,” he said. Then Venerable Sudinna rose from his seat and departed.

Then the mother of Venerable Sudinna addressed his former wife: “Daughter-in-law, as soon as you menstruate, please tell me.”

“Very well, madam,” she replied. Not long afterwards Venerable Sudinna’s former wife menstruated, and she reported it to Venerable Sudinna’s mother.

“Daughter-in-law, adorn yourself in the way that our son Sudinna found you especially attractive.”

“Very well, madam,” she replied.

Then Venerable Sudinna’s mother, together with his former wife, approached Venerable Sudinna in the Great Wood. There she said to him:

“This family, dear Sudinna, is rich, has great wealth and property, much gold and silver, many resources and requisites, much wealth in grain. For this reason, Sudinna, beget offspring; do not let the Licchavis take over our heirless property.”

“It is possible for me to do this, mother,” he said. He then took his former wife by the arm, plunged into the Great Wood and—there

¹ abhirato, here I think meaning simply as translated above. But see below, BD 1.114.
² Their capital was at Vesālī.
³ Vin-a 212 says that he said this thinking that if he had issue his relations would no longer bother him about looking after the property, and so he would be able to follow the dhamma of recluses at ease.
being no training rule and he seeing no danger—had sexual intercourse with his former wife three times. As a result she conceived.

The earth-gods cried out: “Good sirs, the Sangha of monks has been healthy¹ and free from danger. But Sudinna the Kalandaka has produced a tumour, has produced danger.”

The gods belonging to the heaven of the four great kings hearing the cry of the earth-gods in turn cried out ... the Tāvatiṁsa gods ... the Yāma gods ... the Tusita gods ... the gods who delight in creation ... the gods who control the creation of others ... the gods belonging to the retinue of the supreme beings in turn cried out:

“Good sirs, the Sangha of monks has been healthy and free from danger. But Sudinna the Kalandaka has produced a tumour, has produced danger.” Thus in that moment, in that instance, the report spread as far as the Brahmā-world.²

Then the pregnancy of Venerable Sudinna’s wife developed and she eventually gave birth to a son. Now the friends of Venerable Sudinna called this boy Bījaka³; they called Venerable Sudinna’s former wife Bījaka’s mother; they called Venerable Sudinna Bījaka’s father. After some time they both⁴ went forth from home into homelessness, and they realised arahantship.

But Venerable Sudinna was anxious and remorseful, and he thought: “Indeed, it’s a loss for me, it’s no gain; indeed, it’s badly gained by me, not well-gained: having gone forth in such a well-proclaimed Dhamma and training, I was not able for life to practice the perfectly complete and pure spiritual life.” And because of his anxiety and remorse, he became thin, haggard and pale, his veins protruding all over his limbs; he became sad, of sluggish mind, miserable, depressed, remorseful, weighed down with grief.⁵

Then the monks who were Venerable Sudinna’s friends said to him: “Formerly, friend Sudinna, you were handsome, your features rounded, your face a good colour, your skin clear. But now you are thin, haggard and pale, your veins protruding all over your limbs; and you are sad, of sluggish mind, miserable, depressed, remorseyful, weighed down with grief. Could it be, friend Sudinna, that you lead the spiritual life dissatisfied?¹

¹ nirabbuda, cf. above, BD 1.19, n. 4. ² Vin-a 215, brahmalokā-akanīṭṭhabrahmalokā, i.e. the worlds of the Elder Brahmā-devas. ³ Brahmalī: Literally, “Seed.” ⁴ Ibid.—i.e., Bījaka and his mother. ⁵ Stock.

“I do not, friends, lead the spiritual life dissatisfied. I have done an bad deed. I have had sexual intercourse with my former wife. That is why I am anxious ... I was not able for life to practice the perfectly complete and pure spiritual life.”

“Friend Sudinna, no wonder you are anxious,² no wonder you feel remorse, in that, having gone forth in such a well-proclaimed Dhamma and training, you were not able for life to practice the perfectly complete and pure spiritual life. Is not, friend, the Dhamma taught by the Master in various ways for the sake of dispassion, not for the sake of passion; for the sake of freedom from bondage, not for the sake of bondage; for the sake of non-grasping, not for the sake of grasping? When the Dhamma is taught by the Master for the sake of dispassion, how can you be intent upon passion? When the Dhamma is taught by the Master for the sake of freedom from bondage, how can you be intent upon bondage? When the Dhamma is taught by the Master for the sake of non-grasping, how can you be intent upon grasping? Friend, has not the Dhamma been taught in many ways by the Master for the waning of passion, for the subduing of intoxication, for the restraint of desire, for the abolition of clinging, for the annihilation of the round of existence,³ for the destruction of craving, for fading away, for cessation, for extinguishment?⁴ Has not the abandoning of sense pleasures been declared in many ways by the Master, the full understanding of the perception of sense pleasures, the abolishing of thirst for sense pleasures, the elimination of thoughts of sense pleasures, the stilling of the fever of sense pleasures? It will not, friend, give rise to confidence in those without it, nor increase the confidence of those who have it, but it will hinder

¹ anabhirato, Vin-a 217, “fretting, longing to be a householder ... but I find no delight (anabhirato) in making become the conditions of higher righteousness.” See below, BD 1.114, notes. ² = Vin 2.250. ³ Vin-a 218, tebhūmakavaṭṭaṁ ucchijjati (i.e. the kāma, rūpa and arūpa becoming). ⁴ Cf. AN ii.34, and various passages in SN v.
Having rebuked Venerable Sudinna in various ways, those monks told this matter to the Master. And in this connection the Master convened the Sangha of monks and questioned Venerable Sudinna:

“Is it true, Sudinna, that you had sexual intercourse with your former wife?”

“It is true, Master.”

The Buddha, the Master, rebuked him: “Foolish man, it is not suitable it is not becoming, it is not proper, it is unworthy of a recluse, it is not allowable, it is not to be done. How could you go forth in such a well-proclaimed Dhamma and training and not be able for life to practice the perfectly complete and pure spiritual life? Have I not taught the Dhamma in many ways for the sake of dispassion ... When the Dhamma has been taught by me for the sake of dispassion, how can you be intent upon passion? ... Have I not in many ways declared the abandoning of sense pleasures ... the stilling of the fever of sense pleasures? It would be better, foolish man, for your male organ to enter the mouth of a terrible and poisonous snake than to enter a woman. It would be better for your male organ to enter the mouth of a black snake than to enter a woman. It would be better for your male organ to enter a charcoal pit, burning, ablaze, afire, than to enter a woman. Why is that? Because for that reason you might die or experience deadly suffering, but you would not on that account, at the breaking up of the body after death, be reborn in the plane of misery, a bad destination, the abyss, hell. But for this reason, at the breaking up of the body after death, you might be reborn in the plane of misery, a bad destination, the abyss, hell.¹ Foolish man, you have practised what is contrary to the true Dhamma,² the common practice, the low practice,¹ the coarse practice, that which ends with a wash,² that which is done in private, that which is done wherever there are couples. You are the forerunner, the first performer of many unwholesome things. It will not give rise to confidence in those without it, nor increase the confidence of those who have it, but it will hinder confidence in those without it and it will cause some with confidence to change their minds.”

¹ Cf. below, BD 1.155. ² asaddkamma. Vin-a 221, “You would follow untrue Dhamma of inferior people.” On prefix sa- see Mrs. RHYS DAVIDS, introduction to gs i.ix.f.

Then the Master, having rebuked Venerable Sudinna in various ways, spoke in dispraise of being difficult to support and maintain, in dispraise of great desires, lack of contentment, socialising³ and laziness, but he spoke in praise in various ways of being easy to support and maintain, of desiring little, contentment, self-effacement,⁴ ascetic practices, serenity, decrease of defilements,⁵ and of the putting forth of energy.⁶ Having given a Dhamma talk on what was right and seemly, he addressed the monks:

“On account of this,² monks, I will lay down a training rule for the monks for the following ten reasons: for the well-being of the Sangha, for the comfort of the Sangha, for the restraint of recalcitrant people, for the ease of well-behaved monks, for the restraint of corruptions that pertain to the present life and for warding off corruptions that pertain to future lives, to give rise to confidence in those without it and to increase the confidence of those who have

---

¹ Vin-a 221, “outcastes (vasala) rain down evil dhamma; the dhamma of the outcaste, low men is outcaste, or it is a dhamma pouring out the kilesas.” Vasala at Sn 116ff. translated by Lord Chalmers, Suttanipāta, Harvard Oriental Series 37, as “wastrel.”
² Odakantika—i.e., following the sexual act. Vin-a 221 explains: udakakiccanăntikañ avasānañ assā ti, the water-libation (the cleansing, the washing) is at an end, finished for him. The word udakakicca occurs at Dn.115, but Dn-a is silent.
³ Sañganika = kilesa-sañganika, Vin-a 222.
⁴ Sallekhana = niddhunana, Vin-a 222.
⁵ Apacaya = sabbakilesāpacayabhūtā, Vin-a 222.
⁶ = Vin 1.45 = Vin 2.2 = Vin 3.171 = Vin 4.213, where this standing dhamma-talk is given. These are doubtless the subjects to be filled in where the text in so many places baldly states that Gotama “gave dhamma-talk.” All my renderings differ from those given at Vinaya Texts i.153, Vinaya Texts ii.331; Vinaya Texts iii.252. Cf. MN i.13. The Commentary on Vin 3.171 is silent.
⁷ I.e., Sudinna’s offence, Vin-a 223.
it, for the continuation of the true Dhamma¹ and for supporting the training.² And, monks, this training rule should be recited thus:

FIRST PRELIMINARY RULING

If a monk has sexual intercourse, he is expelled³ and not in communion.”

_Thus the Master laid down this training rule for the monks_

_The section on Sudinna is finished_

SECOND SUB-STORY

At one time a certain monk in the Great Wood near Vesālī won over a female monkey with food and had sexual intercourse with her. Then, in the morning, he dressed, took his bowl and robe and entered Vesālī for alms. Now at that time a number of monks who were engaged in touring the lodgings came to this monk’s dwelling. The female monkey, seeing those monks coming, went up to them and shook her buttocks in front of them, wagged her tail, presented her buttocks and made a gesture. Then the monks thought: “Undoubtedly this monk is having sexual intercourse with this monkey,” and they hid

---

¹ Vin-a 225 says that saddhamma is threefold: (1) the Tipiṭaka, all the utterances of the Buddha (cf. Kp-a 191ff.); (2) the thirteen scrupulous ways of life, the fourteen duties, virtue, contemplation, insight; (3) the four ariyan Ways and the four fruits of samaṇaship and nibbāna.
² Vin-a 226 says that Vinaya or discipline is fourfold: discipline by restraint, by rejection, by calm, by making known.
³ On derivation of pārājika, see Vinaya Texts i.3, n. 2. Editor takes it as “involving or suffering defeat,” either specifically as defeat in the struggle with Māra; or more probably defeat in the struggle against evil generally, defeat in the effort to accomplish the supreme goal of arahantship. Vin-a 259 gives pārājiko ti parājito, parājayam āpanno, defeated, fallen on defeat. “In this meaning pārājika exists for those people for whom there is an offence (āpatti) against the training. Whoever transgresses against the course of training, it defeats him (parājeti), therefore it is called a defeat. Whoever commits an offence, that defeats him, therefore that is called a defeat. The man, inasmuch as defeated, fallen on defeat, is thereby called a defeated one.” We thus get a neuter, feminine and masculine reference for pārājika. Childers says, “meriting expulsion.”
to one side. Then, when that monk had gone for alms in Vesālī and had returned with his almsfood, he ate one part himself and gave the rest to the female monkey. Having eaten the food, the monkey presented her buttocks to the monk. He then had sexual intercourse with her.

Then those monks said to that monk: “Friend, hasn’t a training rule been laid down by the Master? Why then do you have sexual intercourse with a monkey?”

“It is true, friends, that a training rule has been laid down by the Master, but it refers to human women, not to animals.”

“But, friend, that is just the same. It is not suitable, it is not becoming, it is not proper, it is not worthy of a recluse, it is not allowable, it ought not to be done. How could you go forth in this well-proclaimed Dhamma and training and not be able for life to practice the perfectly complete and pure spiritual life? Has not the Dhamma been taught in various ways by the Master for the sake of dispassion and not for the sake of passion¹ ... for the stilling of the fever of sense pleasures? Friend, it will not give rise to confidence in those without it ... and it will cause some with confidence to change their minds.”

Having rebuked that monk in various ways, they told this matter to the Master. The Master then had the Sangha of monks convened, and questioned that monk:

“Is it true, monk, that you had sexual intercourse with a monkey?”

“It is true, Master.”

Then the Master rebuked him, saying: (= Bu-Pj 1.5.11 above. Instead of a woman, read of a monkey) ... “... Foolish man, it will not give rise to confidence in those without it ... And so, monks, this training rule should be recited thus:

Second preliminary ruling

“If a monk has sexual intercourse, even with an animal,² he is expelled and not in communion.”

Thus the Master laid down this training rule for the monks.

¹ Cf. above, Bu-Pj 1.5.10. ² Cf. Vin 1.96.
The story of the female monkey is finished

Third sub-story

At that time a number of Vajjian monks from Vesālī ate, slept and bathed as much as they liked. Doing so and not paying proper attention, they had sexual intercourse, without first renouncing the training\(^1\) and disclosing their weakness. After some time they were affected by loss of relatives, by loss of property and by illness. They then approached Venerable Ānanda and said:

“Bhante Ānanda, we do not blame the Buddha, the Dhamma or the Sangha; we only blame ourselves. We were unfortunate, we had little merit: having gone forth in such a well-proclaimed Dhamma and training, we were unable for life to practice the perfectly complete and pure spiritual life. If, bhante Ānanda, we were now to obtain the going forth and the full ordination in the presence of the Master, we would have clarity about wholesome qualities and be devoted day after day to developing the aids to awakening.\(^2\) Bhante Ānanda, please inform the Master of this matter.”

“Yes, friends,” he replied. He then went to the Master and informed him of this matter.

“It is impossible, Ānanda, it cannot happen,\(^3\) that the Tathāgata

---

\(^1\) sikkhati apaccakkhāya, not having denied the teaching, not having said: “I renounce (formally) my submission to the discipline,” i.e. “I am no longer a monk.” Cf. Vinaya Texts i.275, n. 2, where editor thinks this is a formal renunciation of the Order as opposed to the Vinaya’s term vibbhamati, “he returns to the house.” Cf. AN iv.372, where among the nine Impossibles (abhabba) is that the monk who is an arahant should disavow the Buddha, dhamma or Order. At sn ii.231 a monk, assailed by passion, disavows the training and hināyatattati, the Sutta word for returning to the low life of the layman, and cf. sn ii.271.

\(^2\) Paccakkhāti is paṭi + akkhāti = ā + khyā, and not paṭi + akkh. The root akkh is purely theoretical and would certainly not explain the ā of paccakkhāti, paccakkhāya.

\(^3\) The term bodhipakkhiyadhamma, or as it is here bodhipakkhika, is not usually considered to belong to the earlier literature. The later literature and Commentaries reckon these states as thirty-seven. On their arrangement see Mrs. Rhys Davids, Sakya, p.395, and KS v.vi. Following Woodward’s translation at gs i.25 and see gs i.25 n. 6. Vin-a 229 elucidates anavakāso by kāraṇapaṭikkhepavacanaṁ.
should abolish a training rule that entails expulsion because of the Vajjians.”

The Master then gave a Dhamma talk and addressed the monks:
“Monks, if a monk, without first renouncing the training and disclosing his weakness, has sexual intercourse, he may not receive the full ordination. But, monks, if someone has sexual intercourse after first renouncing the training and disclosing his weakness, he may receive the full ordination.

“And so, monks, this training rule should be recited thus:

Final ruling

“If a monk, having entered upon the monks’ training and way of life, without first renouncing the training and disclosing his weakness, has sexual intercourse, even with an animal, he is expelled and not in communion.”

Definitions

A means: whoever, of such a kind, of such activity, of such social standing, of such name, of such family, of such conduct, of such behaviour, of such association,¹ who is an elder,² one who is new or one of middle standing:—this is called a monk.

Monk means: he is a monk because he lives on alms; a monk because he has gone over to living on alms; a monk because he is one who wears the patchwork cloth; a monk by convention; a monk on account of his acknowledgement; a “come, monk” monk; a monk because he was ordained by going to the three refuges; a good monk; a monk of substance; a trainee monk; a monk beyond training; a monk who is ordained by a complete Sangha through a procedure³ of one motion and three announcements,⁴ which is unchallengeable and fit to stand. The monk who is ordained by a complete Sangha through a procedure of one motion and three announcements, which is unchallengeable and fit to stand,¹ this sort of monk is meant in this case.

---

¹ For definition of gocara see Vb 247. ² Vin-1 239, therac is one who has completed ten years; nava, a novice, is one of four years standing; and majjhima is one of more than five years standing. ³ So Vin-a 243. ⁴ ๑าtticatuttha.

Training means: the three trainings are—training in the higher morality, training in the higher mind, training in the higher wisdom. The training in the higher morality is the training meant in this case.

Way of life means: whatever training rule is laid down by the Master: this is called way of life. One trains in this, and thereby one is called possessed of the mode of life.

Without first renouncing the training and disclosing his weakness means:

There is, monks, a disclosure of weakness without the training being renounced; and there is, monks, a disclosure of weakness together with the training being renounced.

“And how, monks, is there a disclosure of weakness without the training being renounced? Here, monks, a monk who is discontent, dissatisfied, desirous of abandoning the state of a recluse, disgusted, troubled and repelled² by monkhood, longing to be a householder, longing to be a lay-follower, longing to be a monastery attendant, longing to be a novice, longing to belong to another sect, longing to be a disciple of another sect, longing not to be a recluse, longing not to be a son of the Sakyan—he says and declares: ‘Perhaps I should renounce the Buddha?’ In this was, monks, there is a disclosure of weakness without the training being renounced.

Then further, discontent, dissatisfied ... longing not to be a son of the Sakyan, he says and declares: ‘Perhaps I should renounce the Dhamma?’ ... the Sangha ... the training ... the discipline ... the Pātimokkha ... the recital ... my preceptor ... my teacher ... being a disciple ... being a pupil ... our common preceptor ... our common teacher ... he says and declares: ‘Perhaps I should renounce my fellow monks?’ ... he says and declares: ‘Perhaps I should be a householder?’

¹ Cf. list of eighteen explanations of monk at Vb 245–246. ² For these three words, cf. DN i.213, where Gotama is made to use them in reference to the exercise of supernormal powers.
... ‘Perhaps I should be a lay-follower?’ ... ‘Perhaps I should be a monastery attendant?’ ... ‘Perhaps I should be a novice?’ ... ‘Perhaps I should be an adherent of another sect?’ ... ‘Perhaps I should be a disciple of another sect?’ ... ‘Perhaps I should not be a recluse?’ ... ‘Perhaps I should not be a son of the Sakyan?’ In this way, monks, there is a disclosure of weakness without the training being renounced.

“Then further, discontent, dissatisfied ... longing not to be a son of the Sakyan, he says and declares: ‘But if I renounced the Buddha’ ... he says and declares: ‘But if I were not a son of the Sakyan’ ... he says and declares: ‘Perhaps I should renounce the Buddha?’ ... he says and declares: ‘Perhaps I should not be a son of the Sakyan?’ ... he says and declares: ‘Well then, I should renounce the Buddha’ ... he says and declares: ‘Well then, I should not be a son of the Sakyan’ ... he says and declares: ‘I think I should renounce the Buddha’ ... he says and declares: ‘I think I should not be a son of the Sakyan.’ In this way, monks, there is a disclosure of weakness without the training being renounced.

“Then further, discontent, dissatisfied ... longing not to be a son of the Sakyan, he says and declares: ‘I remember my mother’ ... ‘I remember my father’ ... ‘I remember my brother’ ... ‘I remember my sister’ ... ‘I remember my son’ ... ‘I remember my daughter’ ... ‘I remember my wife’ ... ‘I remember my relations’ ... ‘I remember my friends’ ... ‘I remember my village’ ... ‘I remember my town’ ... ‘I remember my fields’ ... ‘I remember my land’ ... ‘I remember my gold coins’ ... ‘I remember my gold’ ... ‘I remember my profession’ ... he says and declares: ‘I remember my former laughter, chatter and amusement.’ In this way, monks, there is a disclosure of weakness without the training being renounced.

“Then further, discontent, dissatisfied ... longing not to be a son of the Sakyan, he says and declares: ‘I have a mother, she ought to be supported by me’ ... ‘I have a father, he ought to be supported by me’ ... ‘I have a brother ... I have a sister ... I have a son ... I have a daughter ... ‘I have a wife ... ‘I have relations ... he says and declares: ‘I have friends, they ought to be supported by me.’ In this way, monks, there is a disclosure of weakness without the training being renounced.

“Therefore, monks, there is a disclosure of weakness without the training being renounced.

“Then further, discontent, dissatisfied ... longing not to be a son of the Sakyan, he says and declares: ‘I have a mother, she will support me’ ... ‘I have a father, he will support me’ ... (as above) ... ‘I have friends, they will support me’ ... ‘I have a village, I will live by means of it’ ... ‘I have a town, I will live by means of it’ ... fields ... land ... gold ... he says and declares: ‘I have a profession, I will live by means of it.’ In this way, monks, there is a disclosure of weakness without the training being renounced.

“Then further, discontent, dissatisfied ... longing not to be a son of the Sakyan, he says and declares: ‘This is difficult to do’ ... ‘this is not easy to do’ ... ‘this is difficult’ ... ‘this is not easy’ ... ‘I cannot endure’ ... ‘I am unable’ ... ‘I do not enjoy myself’ ... ‘I take no delight.’¹ In this way, monks, there is a disclosure of weakness without the training being renounced.

“And how, monks, is there a disclosure of weakness together with the training being renounced? Here, monks, a monk who is discontent, dissatisfied ... longing not to be a son of the Sakyan, says and declares: ‘I renounce the Buddha.’ In this way, monks, there is a disclosure of weakness together with the training being renounced.

“Then further, discontent, dissatisfied ... longing not to be a son of the Sakyan, he says and declares: ‘I renounce the Dhamma’ ... ‘I renounce the Sangha’ ... the training ... the discipline ... the Pātimokkha ... the recital ... my preceptor ... my teacher ... being a disciple ... being a pupil ... our common preceptor ... our common teacher ... he says and declares: ‘I renounce my fellow monks’ ... he says and declares: ‘Consider me a householder’ ... ‘Consider me a lay-follower’ ... a monastery attendant ... a novice ... an adherent of another sect ... a disciple of another sect ... not a recluse ... ‘Consider me not a son of the Sakyan.’ In this way too, monks, there is a disclosure of weakness together with the training being renounced.

“Then further, discontent, dissatisfied ... longing not to be a son of the Sakyan, he says and declares: ‘I have no need of the Buddha’ ...

¹ See BD 1.114, n. 1.
'I have no need of my fellow monks.' In this way too, monks...

“Then further ... he says and declares: ‘No more of the Buddha for me’ ... ‘No more of my fellow monks for me.’ In this way too, monks...

“Then further ... he says and declares: ‘The Buddha is no of use to me’ ... ‘My fellow monks are of no use to me.’ In this way too, monks...

“Then further ... he says and declares: ‘I am well freed from the Buddha.’ ... I am well freed from my fellow monks.’ In this way too, monks ... being renounced.

“Or whatever other synonyms there are for the Buddha, for the Dhamma, for the Sangha, for the training ... for one’s fellow monks, for householders ... or for not being a son of the Sakyan; he speaks and declares by way of these indications, by way of these marks, by way of these signs. In this way, monks, there is a disclosure of weakness together with the training being renounced.

“And how, monks, is the training not renounced? Here, monks, if one renounces the training by way of these indications, by way of these marks, by way of these signs, but one is insane, then the training is not renounced. If one renounces the training in the presence of one who is insane, the training is not renounced. If one who is deranged renounces the training ... if one renounces the training in the presence of one who is deranged ... if one is overwhelmed by pain ... if one renounces the training in the presence of one who is overwhelmed by pain ... if one renounces the training in the presence of gods¹ ... if one renounces the training in the presence of an animal, the training is not renounced. If an Indian² renounces the training in the presence of a foreigner³ and he does not understand, the training is not renounced. If a foreigner renounces the training in the presence of a foreigner and he does not understand, the training is not renounced.

¹ Vin-a 255, from the earth devatās to the devatās of the Akaniṭṭha realm. ² Vin-a 255, ariyaka means the proper mode of speech, the language of Magadha. Note the form ariyaka. ³ milakkhu. Cf. Mlecchas, now a term for all non-caste people. Here perhaps the aboriginal inhabitants of India. Vin-a 255 says, nāma yo koci anariyako Andha-Damilādi, the people of Andha (i.e. the Telugus) and the Tamils, cf. Vb-a 387, Vb-a 388.
presence of an Indian ... if an Indian renounces the training in the presence of an Indian ... if a foreigner renounces the training in the presence of a foreigner and he does not understand, the training is not renounced. If he renounces the training as a joke ... he renounces the training by speaking too fast ... if he announces what he does not wish to announce ... if he does not announce what he wishes to announce ... if he announces to one who does not understand ... if he does not announce to one who understands ... or if he does not make a full announcement, the training is not renounced. In this way, monks, the training is not renounced.”

Sexual intercourse means: what is contrary to the true Dhamma, the common practice, the low practice, the coarse practice, that which ends with a wash, that which is done in private, that which is done wherever there are couples: this is called sexual intercourse.

Has means: organ with organ, genital with genital, even to the depth of a sesame seed, this is called has.

Even with an animal means: even having sexual intercourse with a female animal,¹ he is not a recluse, not a son of the Sakyan; how much less so with a woman: therefore it is called even with an animal.

He is expelled means: as a man with his head cut off is incapable² of living by (re-establishing) that bodily connection, so is a monk who has had sexual intercourse not a recluse, not a son of the Sakyan³:
therefore it is said that he is expelled.

Not in communion means: communion⁴ means: a common official action, the same recital, the same training—this is called communion. He does not take part in this—he is therefore called not in communion.

¹ Tiracchānagatitthi, literally a woman gone to the animals. Cf. below, BD 1.212.
² Abhabba. ³ Cf. Vin 1.96. ⁴ Samvāsa, literally living with, co-residence. It often refers to the household life, as at AN ii.57, AN ii.187; AN iii.164; AN iv.174; Snp 283, Snp 290; but in Vinaya it is a term of importance in religion.
Permutations

Permutations part 1

Summary

Exposition part 1

There is an offence entailing expulsion if he has sexual intercourse with a human female through three orifices, the anus, the vagina or the mouth ... with a non-human female ... with a female animal ... with a human hermaphrodite ... with a non-human hermaphrodite ... with an animal hermaphrodite through three orifices, the anus, the vagina or the mouth. There is an offence entailing expulsion if he has sexual intercourse with a human paṇḍaka through two orifices, the anus or the mouth ... with a non-human paṇḍaka ... with an animal paṇḍaka ... with a human male ... with a non-human male ... with a male animal though two orifices, the anus or the mouth.

Exposition part 2

Voluntary Sexual Intercourse

For a monk who, having the intention of association, lets his penis enter a human female through the anus ... through the vagina ... through the mouth, there is an offence entailing expulsion. For a monk who ... lets his male organ enter a non-human female ... a female animal ... a human hermaphrodite ... a non-human herm-

¹ Brahmal: The exact meaning of paṇḍaka is disputed. ² Brahmal: Contrary to the PTS edition, the Mahāsaṅgīti takes this as a separate paragraph.
aphrodite ... an animal hermaphrodite through the anus ... through the vagina ... through the mouth, there is an offence entailing expulsion. For a monk who, having the intention of association, lets his penis enter a human paṇḍaka ... a non-human paṇḍaka ... an animal paṇḍaka ... a human male ... a non-human male ... a male animal through the anus ... through the mouth, there is an offence entailing expulsion.

FORCED SEXUAL INTERCOURSE

Opponents who are monks, having brought a human female into a monk’s presence, insert his penis into her anus, her vagina or her mouth. If he agrees to the entry, if he agrees to having entered, if he agrees to remaining, if he agrees to the taking out,¹ there is an offence entailing expulsion. Opponents who are monks ... if he does not agree to the entry, but agrees to having entered, to remaining, to the taking out, there is an offence entailing expulsion.

Opponents who are monks ... if he does not agree to the entry nor to having entered, but to remaining and to the taking out ... entailing expulsion. Opponents who are monks ... if he does not agree to the entry nor to having entered nor to remaining, but to the taking out ... entailing expulsion. Opponents who are monks ... if he does not agree to the entry nor to having entered nor to remaining nor to the taking out, there is no offence.

Opponents who are monks, having brought a human female who is awake ... asleep ... intoxicated ... mad ... drunk ... dead but undecomposed ... dead and mostly undecomposed ... there is an offence entailing expulsion. Having brought one who is dead and mostly decomposed into the monk’s presence, they insert his penis into the anus ... the vagina ... the mouth. If he agrees to the entry, to having entered, to remaining, to the taking out, there is a serious offence ... if he does not agree, there is no offence.

(All this is repeated for a non-human female and a female animal; a human, a non-human and an animal hermaphrodite; a hu-

¹ Brahmalī: This does not mean that he consents to the ending of the act, but that he consents to the intercourse at this stage.
man, a non-human and an animal pañḍaka; a human male, a non-human male and a male animal; except that for the three categories of pañḍakas and the three categories of males only two orifices apply, the anus and the mouth.)

Opponents who are monks, having brought a human female into a monk’s presence, insert his penis into her anus ... her vagina ... her mouth, the female being covered, the monk uncovered ... the female uncovered, the monk covered ... the female covered, the monk covered ... the female uncovered, the monk uncovered. If he agrees to the entry, to having entered, to remaining, to the taking out, there is an offence entailing expulsion. ... If not, there is no offence. Opponents who are monks ... a human female who is awake ... asleep ... dead but mostly undecomposed ... entailing expulsion. Having brought one who is dead, but mostly decomposed into a monk’s presence, they insert his penis into the anus ... the vagina ... the mouth, the female being covered, the monk uncovered ... both being uncovered. If he agrees to the entry ... to the taking out, there is a serious offence. ... If not, there is no offence.

(All this is repeated for a non-human female and a female animal; a human, a non-human and an animal hermaphrodite; a human, a non-human and an animal pañḍaka; a human male, a non-human male and a male animal; except that for the three categories of pañḍakas and the three categories of males only two orifices apply, the anus and the mouth.)

(Vin 3.32–33, §§ 5, 6 are repetitions of §§ 3, 4 but reading “opponents who are monks, having brought a monk into the presence of a human female) ...”

As the sections on “opponents who are monks” have been explained in detailed, so should the following categories be explained: opponents who are kings, opponents who are thieves, opponents who are scoundrels, “lotus-scent” opponents.¹

¹ Uppalagandha, perhaps a sobriquet of some brigands. Vin-a 268 says they needed human hearts: except monks, men were rare. Monks should not be murdered, so the brigands led them astray by bringing women to them. Cf. It-a ii.57.
Permutations part 2

He enters an orifice through an orifice,¹ there is an offence entailing expulsion. He enters a non-orifice through an orifice ... entailing expulsion. He enters an orifice through a non-orifice ... entailing expulsion. He enters a non-orifice through a non-orifice, there is a serious offence.

A monk molests a sleeping monk: if he wakes up and consents, both should be expelled; if he wakes up but does not consent, the molester should be expelled. A monk molests a sleeping novice: if he wakes up and consents, both should be expelled;² if he wakes up but does not consent, the molester should be expelled. A novice molests a sleeping monk: if he wakes up and consents, both should be expelled; if he wakes up but does not consent, the molester should be expelled. A novice molests a sleeping novice: if he wakes up and consents, both should be expelled; if he wakes up but does not consent, the molester should be expelled.

Non-offence clause

There is no offence: for one who does not know, for one who does not consent, for one who is insane, for one who is deranged, for one who is overwhelmed by pain, for the first offender.

The section on covering is finished

¹ BrahmalI: The Pali word here translated “orifice” is magga, and it refers either to the anus or the genitals. The meaning of non-orifice, amagga, is not clear, but it could refer either to the mouth or to the situation described below in section Bu-Pj 1.10.9. However, since the final offence in this series of permutations is a thullaccaya, a serious offence, the latter possibility seems more likely.² nāsetabbo. I follow the rendering of Vinaya Texts 1.215, which seems to suit the context better than the “to atone” of the Pali-English Dictionary. Nāseti is the causative of nassati, to disappear, to come to an end. Cf. below, BD 1.62, BD 1.280.
MONKS’ EXPULSION (PĀRĀJīKA) 1

CASE RULINGS

Mnemonic List

The female monkey, and the Vajjians, householder and a naked one, adherents of other sects,
The girl, and Uppalavannā, then two about characteristics,/Mother, daughter, and sister, and wife, supple, long,
Two sores, and a picture, and a wooden doll,/Five with Sundara, five about charnel grounds, bones,
A female dragon and a female spirit, and a female ghost, a paṇḍaka, impaired, he touched,/The sleeping arahant in Bhaddiya, four about others in Sāvatthī,
Three in Vesālī, garlands,¹ the one from Bharukaccha in his dream,/Supabbā, Saddhā, a nun, a probationary nun, and a novice nun,
A prostitute, a paṇḍaka, a householder, one another, one who had gone forth when old, a deer.

Case Details

At one time a certain monk had sexual intercourse with a female monkey. He became anxious, thinking: “The Master has laid down a training rule. Perhaps I have committed an offence entailing expulsion.”² They informed the Master ... “You, monk, have fallen into an offence entailing expulsion.”

---

¹ This is printed as Mallā. But the section Bu-Pj 1.10.21 below to which this heading refers has nothing to do with the Mallians, but it does have to do with garlands, mālā. I have therefore rendered it thus above. Oldenberg suggests the emendation at Vin 3.269, mālā; but mallā may be correct (= malyā).

² Here and following: pārājikaṁ āpattīṁ āpanno, instead of the more usual āpatti pārājikassa.
At one time a certain monk, thinking he would avoid an offence, had sexual intercourse while looking like a layman. He became anxious … “… entailing expulsion.”

At one time a certain monk, thinking he would avoid an offence, had sexual intercourse while naked. He became anxious … “… entailing expulsion.”

At one time a certain monk, thinking he would avoid an offence, had sexual intercourse while dressed in a kusa-grass garment¹ … while dressed in a bark garment² … while dressed in a garment of wood shavings … while dressed in a hair blanket³ … while dressed in a horse-hair blanket … while dressed in a garment of owls’ wing … while dressed in a garment of antelope hide⁴ … He became anxious … entailing expulsion.”

Bu-Pj 1.10.4

Now at one time a certain monk who was an alms-goer saw a little girl lying on a bench. Being lustful, he inserted his thumb into her vagina. She died. He became anxious …” … Monk, there is no offence entailing expulsion, but there is an offence entailing suspension.”⁵

Bu-Pj 1.10.5

Now at one time a certain brahmin youth was in love with the ¹ At An i.240 = An i.295 = An ii.206 = Vin 1.305 = DN i.167 these various sorts of garments are given. At Vin 1.305 monks, including the one who was nagga are also given in this order. ² Cf. DN i.166–167 for these words. At Ja i.356 we get purisaṁ phalakaṁ katvā, translated “making this man my stalking-horse,” which editor suggests, Vinaya Texts ii.246, “may he a figure of speech founded on the use of this word andmean ’making him his covering.’” ³ As Ajita Kesakambalin, see DN i.55. ⁴ Vin-a 272, “with the hair and hooves.” ⁵ See below, BD 1.195, n. 1.

nun Uppalavaṇṇā.\(^1\) Then, when the nun Uppalavaṇṇā had entered the village for alms, he entered her hut and hid himself. The nun Uppalavaṇṇā, after her meal, when she had returned from almsround, washed her feet, entered her hut and sat down on the bed. Then that brahmin youth took hold of the nun Uppalavaṇṇā and raped her. The nun Uppalavaṇṇā informed the nuns. The nuns informed the monks,\(^2\) who in turn informed the Master. “There is no offence, monks, for one who does not consent.”

Now at one time the characteristics of a woman\(^3\) appeared on a certain monk. They informed the Master. He said: “Monks, I allow that very discipleship, that very ordination,\(^4\) those years as a monk, to be transferred to the nuns. Those offences that the monks have in common with the nuns are to be dealt with in the presence of the

---

\(^1\) Thig verse 224ff., Thig-a 190; Dhp-a ii.48ff. and AN-i.355–356 all relate how she had power in the sphere of light (cf. Dabba, in Bu-Ss 8 below), and say that she was born at Sāvatthī in the family of a great merchant. Dhp-a ii.49 tells much the same story as that given above, her assaulter there being a young kinsman, and it says that she went into the Dark Wood, because at that time forest-dwelling for nuns had not been forbidden. In Bu-NP 5 she is also said to have entered the Dark Wood. There is no doubt, I think, that the Uppalavaṇṇā of Vin 3.35 above and of Dhp-a are one and the same. That the Uppalavaṇṇā of the Therīgāthā is the same is less likely. For though some of the thoughts there attributed to her might be construed to be the outcome of her adventures, the main episode of her life as represented in the Therīgāthā is that of being her mother’s co-wife. Nothing is said of this surely very unusual situation in either Dhp-a or AN-a. Vin-a gives no story. It may be that Dhp-a and AN-a have welded the story of the two Uppalavāṇṇās into one story. Such a welding of two stories into one has a parallel in the story of Kīsāgotami, Psalms of the Sisters, p.109, with which cf. the story of Paṭācārā, Psalms of the Sisters, p.70. At AN i.24 Uppalavaṇṇā is called chief of the disciples who are nuns having psychic potencies; and at AN i.88 she and Khamā are taken as the standard and measure by which to estimate the disciples who are nuns. See Horner, Women under Primitive Buddhism, p.168f.

\(^2\) In no passage are the nuns recorded to tell the matter to the lord direct, but always through the medium of the monks. An exception to this is in the case of his aunt Mahāpajāpati. \(^3\) Itthiliṅga. \(^4\) Taṁ yeva upajīhaṁ taṁ eva upasampadaṁ, explained at Vin-a 273 as pubbe gahita[pajīhaṁ eva pubbe kātupasadāṁ eva ca anujānāmi, which seems to mean: I allow the teacher who was taken before, the upasampāda that was conferred before ... nuns. For those offences that the monks do not have in common with the nuns, there is no offence.”

At one time the characteristics of a man appeared on a certain nun. They informed the Master. He said: “Monks, I allow that very discipleship, that very ordination, those years as a nun, to be transferred to the monks. Those offences that the nuns have in common with the monks are to be dealt with in the presence of the monks. For those offences that the nuns do not have in common with the monks, there is no offence.”

At one time a certain monk, thinking he would avoid an offence, had sexual intercourse with his mother ... his daughter ... his sister. He became anxious ... He informed the Master. “You, monk, have fallen into an offence entailing expulsion.”

At one time a certain monk had sexual intercourse with his former wife. He became anxious ... “... entailing expulsion.”

At one time a certain monk had a supple back.¹ Tormented by discontent, he took his penis into his own mouth. He became anxious ... “... entailing expulsion.”

At one time a certain monk had a long penis. Tormented by discontent,² he inserted his penis into his own anus. He became anxious ... “... entailing expulsion.”

At one time a certain monk saw a dead body, and on the body was a sore next to the genitals. Thinking he would avoid an offence, he inserted his penis in the genital and it came out through the sore. He became anxious ... “... entailing expulsion.”

¹ Vin-a 177, he had formerly been a dancer. ² See below, BD 1.114, n. 1.
At one time a certain monk saw a dead body, and on the body was a sore next to the genitals. Thinking he would avoid an offence, he inserted his penis in the sore and it came out through the genitals. He became anxious ... “... entailing expulsion.”

At one time a certain lustful monk contacted the genitals of a picture\(^1\) with his penis. He became anxious ... “... Monk, there is no offence entailing expulsion; there is an offence of bad conduct.”

At one time a certain lustful monk contacted the genitals of a wooden doll\(^2\) with his penis. He became anxious ... “... bad conduct.”

At one time a monk called Sundara, who had gone forth from Rājagaha, was walking along a carriage-road. A certain woman said: “Wait a moment, honoured sir, I will pay homage to you.” As she was paying homage she held up his lower robe and took his penis into her mouth. He became anxious ... “... Monk, did you consent?”

“I did not consent, Master.”\(^3\)

“There is no offence, monk, for one who does not consent.”

Now at one time a certain woman, seeing a monk, said: “Come, honoured sir, have sexual intercourse.”

“Enough, sister, it is not allowable.”

“Come, honoured sir, I will make the effort, not you. In this way there will be no offence for you.” The monk acted accordingly. He became anxious ... “... entailing expulsion.”

At one time a certain woman, seeing a monk, said: “Come, honoured sir, have sexual intercourse.”

\(^1\) Lepacitta. Vin-a 278 says cittakammarūpa. \(^2\) Dārudhītalikā. Vin-a 278 says kaṭṭharūpa. \(^3\) Vin-a 278 says he was a non-returner, therefore he did not agree.
“Enough, sister, it is not allowable.”

“Come, honoured sir, you make the effort, not I. In this way there will be no offence for you.” The monk acted accordingly. He became anxious ... “... entailing expulsion.”

At one time a certain woman, seeing a monk, said: “Come, honoured sir ...” “... it is not allowable.”

“Come, honoured sir, rub inside but discharge outside ... rub outside but discharge inside. Thus there will be no offence for you.” The monk acted accordingly. He became anxious ... “... entailing expulsion.”

Now at one time a certain monk went to a charnel ground and saw an undecomposed body. He had sexual intercourse with it. He became anxious ... “... entailing expulsion.”

At one time a certain monk went to a charnel ground and saw a mostly undecomposed body ... “... entailing expulsion.”

At one time a certain monk went to a charnel ground and saw a mostly decomposed body ... “... Monk, there is no offence entailing expulsion; there is a serious offence.”

At one time a certain monk went to a charnel ground and saw a decapitated head. He inserted his penis into the wide open mouth, touching it with the penis. He became anxious ... “... You, monk, have fallen into an offence entailing expulsion.”

At one time a certain monk went to a charnel ground and saw a decapitated head. He inserted his penis into the wide open mouth, without touching it with the penis. He became anxious ... “Monk, there is no offence entailing expulsion; there is an offence of bad conduct.”
At one time a certain monk was in love with a certain woman. She died and her bones were thrown away and scattered in the charnel-ground. Then the monk went to the charnel ground, collected the bones and brought his penis into the (area of the) genitals. He became anxious ... “... Monk, there is no offence entailing expulsion; there is an offence of bad conduct.”

At one time a certain monk had sexual intercourse with a female dragon¹ ... with a female spirit² ... with a female ghost³ ... with a paṇḍaka. He became anxious ... “... entailing expulsion.”

At one time a certain monk’s faculties were impaired.⁴ Thinking he would avoid an offence because he felt neither pleasure nor pain, he had sexual intercourse. They informed the Master. “Monks, whether that foolish man felt anything or did not feel anything,⁵ there is an offence entailing expulsion.”

At one time a certain monk, intending to have sexual intercourse with a woman, felt remorse at the mere touch ... “Monk, there is no offence entailing expulsion, but there is an offence entailing suspension.”

At one time a certain monk was lying down in the Jātiyā Grove

¹ Vin-a 279 says “whether it is a young female nāgā (nāgamāṇavikā, cf. Ja iii.275 and Dhp-a iii.232, translated at Buddhist Legends, iii.57, as ‘dragon-maiden’) or a kinnari” (birds (?) living in the heart of mountains); cf. Thig-a 255. ² Vin-a 279, “the female yakkas are all devatās.” ³ Vin-a 279, “the nijjhāmatanāthika petas and so on are not to be approached, but there are petas who live in mansions; the demerit of these matures during the dark half of the month, but in the light half they experience bliss like devatās.” The nijjhāmatanāthika petas are consumed by thirst. At Mil 294 it is said that they do not derive benefit from offerings made by their living relatives. Cf. Mil 303, Mil 357. ⁴ upahatindriya. ⁵ vedayī vā ... na vā vedayī.
at Bhaddiya,¹ having gone there to spend the day. And he had an erection because of wind. A certain woman saw him and sat down on his penis; and having taken her pleasure, she departed. The monks, seeing the moisture,² informed the Master. “Monks, an erection occurs for five reasons: because of lust, because of excrement, because of urine, because of wind, because of being bitten by caterpillars. It is impossible, monks, it cannot be, that that monk had an erection because of lust. That monk is an arahant. There is no offence for that monk.”

At one time a certain monk was lying down in the Dark Wood at Sāvatthī, having gone there to spend the day. A certain woman cowherd saw him and sat down on his penis. The monk consented to the entry, to having entered, to remaining and to the taking out. He became anxious ... “You, monk, have fallen into an offence entailing expulsion.”

At one time a certain monk was lying down in the Dark Wood at Sāvatthī ... A certain woman goatherd saw him ... A certain woman gathering fire-wood saw him ... A certain woman gathering cow-dung saw him and down on his penis ... “... entailing expulsion.”

Now at one time a certain monk was lying down in the Great Wood at Vesālī, having gone there to spend the day. A certain woman saw him and sat down on his penis; and having taken her pleasure, she stood laughing nearby. The monk woke up and said: “Have you done this?”

“Yes, I did it.” He became anxious ...

“Monk, did you consent?”

“I didn’t even know, Master.”

“Monk, there is no offence for one who doesn’t know.”

¹ The capital of the Aṅga kingdom. Here lived Menḍaka, famed for his psychic potency, Vin 1.240ff. The town is mentioned also at Vin 1.189, Vin 1.190: An iii.36.
² kilinna.
At one time a certain monk, having gone to the Great Wood at Vesālī to spend the day, was lying down and resting his head against a tree. A certain woman saw him and sat down on his penis. The monk got up hastily. He became anxious ...

“Monk, did you consent?”
“I did not consent, Master.”
“There is no offence for one who does not consent.”

At one time a certain monk had gone to spend the day in the hall with the peaked roof in the Great Wood at Vesālī. He opened the door and lay down. And he had an erection because of wind. Now at that time a number of women, bringing scents and garlands, came to the monastery to look at the monastic dwellings. Then those women saw that monk and they sat down on his penis. Having taken their pleasure, they said, “what a bull of a man,” and they placed their scents and garlands and departed. The monks, seeing the moisture, informed the Master. “Monks, an erection occurs for five reasons: ...

¹ _akkamitvā pavaṭṭesi_. Vin-a 280 says that the monk, rising suddenly and giving a kick (_akkamitvā_), knocked her over in such a way that she rolled on the ground. The same expression recurs below, BD 1.138, in connection with a mortar. The Commentary on this passage, Vin-a 475 gives _akkamitvā_ in explanation of _ottharitvā_, which seems to mean “sitting on.” _Critical Pali Dictionary_ says that _akkamati_ is “to make a kick at one,” and in that connection cites the above passage. _Pali-English Dictionary_, evidently following the Commentary, gives “to rise” for this passage.

² _purisusabha_.

133
(as in Bu-Pj 1.10.17) ... There is no offence for that monk. I advise you, monks, when you are in seclusion during the day, to close the door.”

At one time a certain monk of Bharukaccha¹ dreamt that he had sexual intercourse with his former wife. He thought he was no longer a monk and that he would have to disrobe.² While on his way to Bharukaccha, he saw the Venerable Upāli³ and informed him of what had happened. Venerable Upāli said: “There is no offence, friend, since it was in a dream.”

At one time in Rājagaha there was a female lay-follower called Su-pabbā⁴ who had mistaken⁵ faith. She held the view that any woman who gives sexual intercourse gives the highest gift. Seeing a monk, she said: “Come, bhante, have sexual intercourse.”

“Enough, sister, it is not allowable.”

“Come, bhante, rub between the thighs, thus there will be no offence for you ... Come, bhante, rub against the navel ... the stomach ... the waist ... the throat ... the ear ... the coil of hair ... the spaces

¹ Bhārukacchako bhikkhu. Bharukaccha was a town, see Ja iii.188; and Psalms of the Bretheren, p. 194, Psalms of the Sisters, p. 103; here Vaḍḍha and his mother were said to have been born. Professor E. Müller, Journal of the Pali Text Society 1888, p. 63, says that Bharukacchaka is a monk; but he is mentioned nowhere but here. At Mil 331 the inhabitants of the town are called Bhārukacchakā. Psalms of the Sisters, p. 103, n. 1, calls it “a seaport on the north-west seaboard, the Bharo of today.”

² Vibbhamissāmi. Pali-English Dictionary, referring to the above passage, says “cohabiting.” But see below, BD 1.114, for an exact repetition of this phrase, where it is probably to be taken in its sense of “to leave the Order.” The question is, does the text of the above passage justify the Dictionary’s rendering? It is as easy to believe that the monk was merely returning to his former home as that he was declaring his intention of returning to his former wife. On the other hand, on BD 1.62 below, vibbhamissāmi possibly means “cohabit.” At BD 1.323 below, vibbhā possibly means “left the Order.” Doubtless this meaning carried the other with it. See also BD 1.114 and n. 3.

³ At an i.25 he is called “chief among those who know the disciplinary rules by heart,” quoted by Vin-a 283. Verses at Thag 249, see Psalms of the Bretheren 168. Cf. Vinaya Texts ii.276, n. 1; Mrs. Rhys Davids, Manual of Buddhism, p. 217.

⁴ Mentioned, I think, nowhere but here.

⁵ Brahmalī: Reading mudhā with the Mahāsāṅgīti, as against Buddha in the PTS edition.
between the fingers ... Come, bhante, having made an effort with my hand, I will make you discharge, thus there will be no offence for you.” The monk acted accordingly. He became anxious. “Monk, there is no offence entailing expulsion, but there is an offence entailing suspension.”

At one time in Sāvatthī there was a female lay-disciple called Saddhā who had mistaken faith. She held the view that any woman who gives sexual intercourse gives the highest gift. Seeing a monk, she said: “Come, bhante, have sexual intercourse.”

“Enough, sister, it is not allowable.”

“Come, bhante, rub between the thighs ... Come, bhante, having made an effort with my hand, I will make you discharge, thus there will be no offence for you.” The monk acted accordingly. He became anxious ... “Monk, there is no offence entailing expulsion, but there is an offence entailing suspension.”

At one time in Vesālī some Licchavi youths took hold of a monk and made him commit misconduct with a nun. Both agreed: both should be expelled.¹ Neither agreed: no offence for either.

At one time in Vesālī some Licchavi youths took hold of a monk and made him commit misconduct with a probationary nun ... with a novice nun. Both agreed: both should be expelled. Neither agreed: no offence for either.

At one time in Vesālī some Licchavi youths took hold of a monk and made him commit misconduct with a prostitute² ... with a paṇḍaka ... with a woman householder. The monk agreed: he should be expelled. The monk did not agree: there is no offence for him.

¹ nāsetabbo. Cf. above, BD 1.50. ² vesi, or low-caste woman.
At one time in Vesālī some Licchavi youths took hold of some monks and made them commit misconduct with one another. Both agreed: both should be expelled. Neither agreed: no offence for either.

-------------------

At one time a certain monk who had gone forth in his old age went to see his former wife. She said, “Come, bhante, leave the Sangha,”¹ and she took hold of him. The monk, stepping backwards, fell down on his back.² She, having pulled up his robe,³ sat down on his penis. He became anxious ... They informed the Master. He said:

“Monk, did you consent?”
“I did not consent, Master.”
“There is no offence for one who does not consent.”

-------------------

At one time a certain monk dwelt in the jungle. A young deer went to his place of urination, drank the urine and took his penis in its mouth. The monk consented. He became anxious ... He informed the Master. He said: “You, monk, have fallen into an offence entailing expulsion.”

The first offence entailing expulsion is finished.⁴

---

¹ vibbhaṁa, see above BD 1.60, n. 3. ² Vin-a 284, says that he stepped back to free himself from her grasp, but fell down as he was weak through old age. But he was a non-returner, one who had cut off passion and sense-desires, therefore he did not consent. ³ Ubbhujītvā. Cf. Vin 2.222. ⁴ samattam, instead of the more usual niṭṭhitam.
Monks’ Expulsion (Pārājika) 2

Origin story

First sub-story

At one time the Buddha, the Master, was staying at Rājagaha on Mount Vulture’s Peak. Now at that time a number of monks who were friends made grass huts on the slope of Mount Isigili¹ and entered the rains there. Among them was Venerable Dhaniya, the potter’s son. Then, after three months, when the rains (residence) was over, the monks demolished their grass huts, put away the grass and wood and departed to wander around the country. But Venerable Dhaniya spent the rains there, and the winter and the summer. Then, while Venerable Dhaniya was in the village collecting alms, women gathering grass and firewood demolished the grass hut and took away the grass and sticks. A second time Venerable Dhaniya collected grass and sticks and made a grass hut. A second time, while Venerable Dhaniya was in the village collecting alms, women gathering grass and firewood demolished the grass hut and took away the grass and sticks. And the same thing happened a third time. Then Venerable Dhaniya thought: “Three times this has happened. But I am well-trained and experienced in my own craft, the potter’s craft. Perhaps I should knead mud myself and make a hut consisting of nothing but clay?” Then Venerable Dhaniya did just that. He then collected grass, wood and cow-dung and baked his hut. It was a beautiful, lovely and charming little hut, and it was red just like a scarlet rain-mite.¹ And (when hit) it sounded just like the sound of a bell.

¹ One of the group of hills above Rājagaha, whence the other crests could be seen (MN iii.68ff.); a resort of the Order, Vin 2.76; where Godhika committed suicide, SN i.120; cf. DN ii.116.

Then the Master, descending from Mount Vulture’s Peak with a number of monks, saw the hut. He then addressed the monks:

“Monks, what is this beautiful, lovely and charming thing, which is red like a scarlet rain-mite?” The monks then informed the Master. The Buddha, the Master, was critical, saying:

“It is not suitable, monks, for that foolish man, it is not fit, it is not becoming, it is not worthy of a recluse, it is not allowable, it should not be done. For how could that foolish man make a hut out of nothing but clay? Certainly this foolish man can have no consideration, compassion and mercy for living beings.² Go, monks, and demolish this hut. Do not let future generations take up the destruction of living beings.³ And, monks, a hut consisting of nothing but clay should not be made. If one does, there is an offence of bad conduct.”⁴

“Yes, bhante,” the monks replied, and they went to that hut and demolished it. Then Venerable Dhaniya said to those monks:

“Why, friends, are you demolishing my hut?”

“Friend, the Master has asked us to.”

“Demolish it, friends, if the Lord of the Dhamma⁵ has said so.”

Then Venerable Dhaniya thought: “Three times, while I was in the village collecting alms, women gathering grass and firewood demolished my hut and took away the grass and sticks. And now my hut made of nothing but clay has been demolished at the Master’s request. Now the overseer of the wood-yard is a friend of mine. Perhaps I should ask him for wood and make a hut out of it?”

¹ Indagopaka, literally Indra’s cowherds. Commentary makes no remark. But cf. Thag 13 and Psalms of the Bretheren 18, n., where it is said that “according to the (Thag ) Commentary these are coral-red insects, alluded to in connection with recent rain, but said by some to be a red grass.” Note also here Sir Charles Eliot’s remark that the Russians call lady-birds, “God’s little cows.” Dhaniya’s hut might have been of a round kraal-like shape, suggesting a beetle’s back. Monier Williams’ Sanskrit-English Dictionary gives under indragopaka, “the insect cochineal of various kinds”; and St. Petersburgh Dictionary gives “Coccinelle.” The coccinels are, however, lady-birds. ² na hi nāma tassa moghapirisassa pāṇesu anuddayā anukampā avihesā bhavissati. This must refer to the small creatures in the mud which would be destroyed when the mud was baked. ³ (This footnote proved troublesome to typeset due to its length, so it has been moved to an appendix with other long notes on page 2970.) ⁴ Vin-a 289, “There was no offence for Dhaniya, because it was a first offence.” ⁵ dhhammasāmi, cf. SN iv.94; AN v.226.

Then Venerable Dhaniya approached the overseer of the wood-yard and said this: “Three times, friend, while I was in the village collecting alms, women gathering grass and firewood ... has been demolished at the Master’s request. Give me some wood, friend, I want to make a wooden hut.”

“There is no such wood, bhante, that I could give you. This wood is held by the king, and it is meant for the repair of the town and put aside in case of emergency. Only if the king gives it, may you take it.”

“Friend, it has been given by the king.”

Then the overseer of the wood-yard thought: “These recluses, sons of the Sakyan, are followers of dhamma, of just conduct, committed to the spiritual life, speakers of truth, virtuous, of good conduct. Even the king has faith in these. He would not¹ say something is given if it were not.” Then the overseer of the wood-yard said to Venerable Dhaniya: “You may take it, bhante.” Then Venerable Dhaniya had that wood broken up into pieces, removed it by means of carts and made a wooden hut.

Now the brahmin Vassakāra,² the chief minister of Magadha, while he was inspecting the works in Rājagaha, went to the overseer of the wood-yard and said to him: “What is going on: where is the wood held by the king that is meant for the repair of the town and put aside in case of emergency?”

“Sir,³ that wood was given by the king to master Dhaniya.”

Then the brahmin Vassakāra was upset: “How could the king give away the wood, which is meant for the repair of the town and put aside in case of emergency, to Dhaniya, the potter’s son?”

Then the brahmin Vassakāra went to King Seniya Bimbisāra of Magadha and said to him: “Is it true, sire, that the wood held by ¹ na arahati. ² At Vin 1.225 = DN ii.86 = Ud 87 he and Sunidha, another chief minister, were building a fortified town at Pāṭaligāma against the Vajjians. At DN ii.72 Ajātasattu, then King of Magadha, sent Vassakāra to tell Gotama that he (Ajāta⁴) was going to fight the Vajjins. ³ Sāmi.

the king, meant for the repair of the town and put aside in case of emergency, were given by the king to Dhaniya, the potter’s son?”

“Who said that?”

“The overseer of the wood-yard, sire.”

“Well then, brahmin, send for the overseer of the wood-yard.”

Then Vassakāra had the overseer of the wood-yard bound and taken by force.

Venerable Dhaniya saw the overseer of the wood-yard being bound and taken by force and said to him: “Friend, why is this happening to you?”

“Because of the business with that wood, bhante.”

“Go, friend, and I too will come.”

“Please come before I am done for, bhante.”

Then Venerable Dhaniya went to the dwelling of King Bimbisāra and sat down on the appointed seat. Then King Bimbisāra approached Venerable Dhaniya, paid homage to him and sat down to one side.

King Bimbisāra then said this to him:

“Is it true, bhante, that the wood held by the king, meant for the repair of the town and put aside in case of emergency, have been given by me to the master?”

“Yes, great king.”

“We kings are very busy—having given, we may not remember. Please remind me, bhante.”

“So you remember, great king, when you were first anointed, speaking these words: ‘Let the recluses and brahmins enjoy gifts of grass, sticks and water?’”

“I remember, bhante. There are recluses and brahmins who have a sense of shame, are scrupulous and desirous of training. They have a sense of conscience even in regard to small matters. What was uttered by me was meant¹ for these, and it concerned what is ownerless in the wilderness.² Yet you, bhante, imagine you can take wood not given to you by means of this trick? But how could one like me flog, imprison or banish a recluse or a brahmin living in my kingdom? Go, you are free because of your status,¹² but do not do such a thing again.”

¹ Tesaṁ mayā sandhāya bhāsitam. Sandhāya of text altered to saddhāya at Vin 5.260. Vin-a 295 reads sandhā. ² Vin-a 295 says: “that grass, wood, and water not owned in the jungle, this is the meaning intended by me.”

People criticised and denounced him: “These recluses, the sons of the Sakyan, are shameless, immoral, liars. They claim to be followers of dhamma, of just conduct, committed to the spiritual life, speakers of truth, virtuous, of good conduct. But there is no recluseship or brahminhood among these—it is lost to them. Where is recluseship and brahminhood among them? They have departed from it. They even deceive the king; what then other people?”

Monks heard the criticism of those people. Those monks who had few desires and a sense of shame, who were contented, scrupulous, and desirous of training, criticised and denounced Venerable Dhaniya: “How could he take wood belonging to the king that had not been given to him?” Then these monks informed the Master. And in this connection the Master convened the Sangha of monks and questioned Venerable Dhaniya:

“Is it true, Dhaniya, that you have taken wood belonging to the king that was not given to you?”

“It is true, Master.”

The Buddha, the Master, rebuked him: “Foolish man, it is not suitable, it is not becoming, it is not proper, it is not worthy of a recluse, it is not allowable, it is not to be done. How could you take wood belonging to the king that has not been given to you? This will not give rise to confidence in those without it,¹ nor increase the confidence of those who have it, but it will hinder confidence in those without it and it will cause some with confidence to change their minds.”

¹ Brahmi: “Loma,” literally “hair,” but here seems to be used idiomatically to refer to status or social position. ² Lomena. Vin-a 295 says that loma is the characteristic mark of pabbajjā. It is like the case of some evil-minded people, who wanting to eat flesh, take a goat with a fine coat. A clever man comes along and thinks that the goat’s coat is valuable, so giving the other people two goats, he himself takes the valuable one. Thus this goat is freed on account of its coat or hair (lomena). Similarly, although the man who has done the deed (referred to in the text) is worthy of flogging or binding, yet because he bears the mark of an arahan (arahaddhaja) he is scatheless. Therefore, on account of his hair (lomena, i.e., the down on the limbs) which is the sign of his having gone forth, he is freed, like the valuable goat.

Now at that time a certain former chief minister of justice who had gone forth among the monks was sitting near the Master. The Master said to him: “For what amount of theft, monk, does King Bimbisāra flog, imprison or banish a thief?”

“For a pāda,² Master, for the worth of a pāda³, or for more than a pāda.”

Now at that time in Rājagaha a pāda was worth five māsakas.⁴

¹ AN i.98. At GS i.84 appasanānāṁ is translated “to believers” in error. It is, of course, “to non-believers or unbelievers.” ² For pāda see RHYS DAVIDS, Ancient Coins and Measures of Ceylon, p. 2f., where he says “there is nothing to prove that it meant a coin at all; it may have been a weight ... recognised as a basis of calculation or a medium of exchange.” Vin-a 297 says, “then in Rājagaha a kahāpaṇa was (worth) twenty māsakas, therefore a pāda was (worth) five māsakas, and a pāda, because of this property, is to be called a quarter of a kahāpaṇa throughout the countryside.” At Vin 3.238, Vin 3.240, kahāpaṇa appears in definition of rajata (silver), rūpiya (silver), respectively, but I think that it need not necessarily mean silver literally, as the copper, wood and lac māsakas also appear in these definitions of rajata and rūpiya. See BD 1.72, n. for māsaka. At Vv-a 11=Dhp-a iii.108 we get a descending line, kahāpaṇa, adḍhapāda, māsaka, then kākanikā. For this last see RHYS DAVIDS, Ancient Coins and Measures of Ceylon, p.10. Owing to the uncertainty as to the exact nature of the coins kahāpaṇa, māsaka, pāda, if indeed they were coins at all, I think it better to leave them untranslated. All we can say is that the kahāpaṇa was the unit of exchange in Pali literature, and that the others were mediums of exchange of lesser value than the kahāpaṇa. To translate kahāpaṇa by “penny” and so on as does BURLINGAME, Buddhist Legends, ii.333f. brings us no nearer to the sense of the Pali. ³ pādārahaṁ. Here we have what is possibly an early use of arahain, when it simply meant “worth” or “value,” and not even so much as a “worthy person,” far less a saint or man perfected. ⁴ māsaka from māsa, a bean of the phaseolus, see below, BD 1.83, n. Enough has been said to show that usually twenty māsakas were reckoned to make a kahāpaṇa. As mentioned in foregoing note the copper, wood and lac māsakas are included in a definition of rajata and rūpiya. See also Vin-a 689–Vin-a 690, which speaks of māsakas made of skin, bone, fruits or seeds of trees, and says that some māsakas have figures stamped upon them. This passage goes on to say that, together with silver and gold, the gold māsaka and the silver māsaka are four things to be given up (by monks) See RHYS DAVIDS, Ancient Coins and Measures of Ceylon, p. 8, p.14. Cf. SN i.79.
Then the Master, having rebuked Venerable Dhaniya in several ways for being difficult to support ... “… And, monks, this training rule should be recited thus:

PRELIMINARY RULING

“If a monk takes by way of theft what has not been given to him—the sort of theft for which kings, having caught a thief, would flog, imprison or banish him, saying, ‘You are a robber, you are foolish, you have gone astray, you are a thief’—he too is expelled and not in communion.”

Thus the Master laid down this training rule for the monks

SECOND SUB-STORY

At one time the group of six monks went to the dyers’ spread (of dyed cloth)¹, carried off the dyers’ goods, took it to the monastery and divided it out. Other monks said:

“Friends, you have great merit, for many robes have accrued to you.”

“How is there merit for us, friends? Just now we went to the dyers’ spread (of dyed cloth) and carried off the dyers’ goods.”

“Friends, hasn’t a training rule been laid down by the Master? Why then do you carry off the dyers’ goods?”

“It is true, friends, that a training rule has been laid down by the Master, but it concerns the village, not the wilderness.”

“But, friends, that is just the same. It is not suitable, it is not becoming, it is not proper, it is not worthy of a recluse, it is not allowable, it should not be done. How could you carry off the dyers’s goods? It will not give rise to confidence in those without it, nor increase the confidence of those who have it, but it will hinder confidence in those without it and it will cause some with confidence to change their minds.”

¹ Brahmalī: See Vin-a 2.298,16.
Then those monks, having rebuked the group of six monks in various ways, informed the Master. And in this connection the Master convened the Sangha and questioned the group of six monks:

“Is it true, monks, that you went the dyers’ spread (of dyed cloth) and carried off the dyers’ goods?”

“It is true, Master.”

The Buddha, the Master, rebuked them: “it is not suitable, foolish men, it is not becoming, it is not proper, it is not worthy of a recluse, it is not allowable, it should not be done. How could you go to the dyers’ spread (of dyed cloth) and carry off the dyers’ goods? It will not give rise to confidence in those without it ... to change their minds.”

Then the Master, rebuking the group of six monks in various ways, spoke in dispraise of being difficult to support ... but he spoke in praise ... of the putting forth of energy. Having given a Dhamma talk on what was right and seemly, he addressed the monks ... “… And so, monks, this training rule should be recited thus:

Final ruling

“If a monk takes by way of theft from a village or from the wilderness what has not been given to him— the sort of theft for which kings, having caught a thief, would flog, imprison or banish him, saying, ‘You are a robber, you are foolish, you have gone astray, you are a thief’ — he too is expelled and not in communion.”

Definitions

A means: whoever, of such kind ...

Monk means: ... this sort of monk is meant in this case.

Village means: a village of one hut, a village of two huts, a village of three huts, a village of four huts, an inhabited village, an uninhabited village, ‘a fenced-in village, a village which is not fenced in, a ¹ samanussa pi gāmo amanusso pi gāma, or “a village that is inhabited or a village that is uninhabited.” See BD 1.147, n. 2 below.

disorganised village, and even a caravan that is camping for more than four months is called a village. The precincts of the village means: of a fenced-in village, the outward stone-throw of a man of average height standing at the threshold (of the village gate); of a village not fenced in, the outward stone-throw of a man of average height standing within the precincts of a house.¹

Wilderness means: leaving aside the village and the precincts of the village, what remains is called the wilderness.²

What has not been given means: what has not been given, nor let go of, nor thrown away; what is guarded, protected, regarded as “mine”, what belongs to others—this is called what has not been given.

By way of theft means: intending to steal, intending to carry off.

If (he) takes means: if (he) takes, if (he) takes away, if (he) carries off, if (he) interrupts the mode of movement, if (he) removes from its base, if (he) does not fulfill an obligation.³

The sort of theft means: a pāda, the worth of a pāda, or more than a pāda.

Kings means: kings of the earth, local kings, governors of islands, governors of border areas, judges, chief ministers, or whoever metes out physical punishment—these are called kings.

A thief means: one who takes by way of theft anything having the value of five māsakas or more than five māsakas that has not been given—he is called a thief.

Would flog means: they would flog with the hand, the foot, a whip, a cane, a rod, or by maiming.

---

¹ See Vism 71f., which goes into the question of fixing the village precincts at greater length. It adduces Vinaya evidence: a stone thrown by young men in a display or strength fixes the boundary. The standard throw decides this. The Visuddhimagga goes on to say that the Suttanta scholars say that the boundary is the fall of a stone thrown to drive away a crow. ² Quoted at Snp-a 83; and at Vism 73. Here Vibhaṅga definition is also collected: “it is jungle when one goes out by the gate pillars,” Vb 251. Suttanta views as to relation of jungle and village are also given at Vism 73. ³ saṁketa, see below Bu-Pj 2.4.30. ⁴ Brahmalī: See Vin-a 2.309,6.
Would imprison means: they would imprison by constriction with a rope, by constriction with fetters, by constriction with chains, by constriction to a house, by constriction to a town, by constriction to a village, by constriction to a small town, by being guarded.

Would banish means: they would banish from the village, small town, town, province or rural district.

You are a robber, you are foolish, you have gone astray, you are a thief means: this is censure.¹

He too means: this is said with reference to the preceding offence entailing expulsion.

Is expelled means: just as a fallen, withered leaf could not become green again, so a monk who takes by way of theft a pāda, the worth of a pāda or more than a pāda, which had not been given to him, is not a recluse, not a son of the Sakyan— he is therefore called one who is expelled.

Not in communion means: communion means: a common official action, the same recital, the same training— this is called communion. He does not take part in this— he is therefore called not in communion.

Permutations

Permutations part 1

Summary

Being in the earth, being on firm ground, being in the air, being above ground, being in water, being in a boat, being in a vehicle,

¹ Brahmali: Because of the way I have translated the rule I have had to leave out the next two definitions, neither of which relate to anything in my translation. Both defintions are found in the Pali and in I.B. Horner’s translation. However, since both of these definitions are verbatim repetitions of definitions already given under this rule (see the definitions of “The sort of theft” and “Should take” above), there is no loss of information.

² Abhabba.

³ Cf. Vin1.96, where it is said that a monk who has received the upasampadā ordination should abstain from taking what is not given him and from theft, even of a blade of grass.
carried as a burden, being in a park, being in a monastic dwelling, being in a field, being on a plot of land, being in a village, being in the wilderness, water, tooth-wood, forest tree, goods being carried, deposit, customs station, a living being, footless, two-footed, four-footed, many-footed, a spy, a keeper of entrusted property, a mutually agreed theft, an arranged action, the making of a sign.

Exposition

Being in the earth means: the goods are put down into the earth, buried, covered. If, intending to steal, he thinks, “I will take the goods that are in the earth,” and he seeks for a companion, he seeks for a hoe or a basket, or he goes (to the goods), there is an offence of bad conduct. If he breaks a piece of wood or a slender tree growing there, there is an offence of bad conduct. If he digs up the soil or removes it or lifts it up, there is an offence of bad conduct. If he touches the container, there is an offence of bad conduct. If he makes it quiver, there is a serious offence. If he moves it from its base, there is an offence entailing expulsion.

Putting his own vessel into (the container), if he touches something worth five māsakas or more than five māsakas, there is an offence of bad conduct. If he makes it quiver, there is a serious

---

1 dutiya, a second one, a mate or helper, a friend, associate or accomplice.
2 (This footnote proved troublesome to typeset due to its length, so it has been moved to an appendix with other long notes on page 2972.)
3 Dukkata, explained at Vin-a 313 as duṭṭha katena, badly, wrongly done; and transgressing being done is called dukkaṭa. This is not one of the worst transgressions.
4 Latā, a slender creeper.
5 Brahmali: Kumbhi, literally, “pot”, but here it functions as a container.
6 Phandāpeti, cf. MN i.404 phandato phandāpayato, translated at Further Dialogues of the Buddha i.291, “who sets folk quaking or causes another to do so.” The meaning probably is that he takes hold of the article so that it throbs, trembles or shakes—a worse offence than merely laying hold of it, but not so bad as removing it.
7 Thānā cāveta. Cf. Snp 442 mā maṁ thānā acāvayi, translated H.O.S. Vol. 37, “May he never beat me back,” and Sacred Books of the East, Volume X, “that he may not drive me away from my place.”
8 Brahmali: Vin-a 2.316,15.
offence. If he makes it enter his own vessel or takes it with his fist, there is an offence entailing expulsion.

If, intending to steal, he touches goods held together by a string, or a bracelet, a necklace, an ornamental girdle, a robe, or a turban, there is an offence of bad conduct.

If he makes it quiver, there is a serious offence. If, grasping it at the top, he pulls it, there is a serious offence. If while stroking it, he lifts it, there is a serious offence. If he removes the goods even as much as a hair's breadth over the rim of the container, there is an offence entailing expulsion.

If, intending to steal, he drinks, in one undertaking, ghee, oil, honey or molasses to the value of five māsakas or more than five

---

1 Thullaccaya, an offence whose nature is grave, Vin-a 314. 2 Attano bhājana-gaṭaṁ vā karoti. Cf. below, BD 1.85. Bhājanagaṭaṁ explained at Vin-a 316 to mean bhājane yeva hoti, as kumbhigaṭaṁ is kumbhiyaṁ, feminine locative. 3 Brahmalī: So that contact is broken with the other goods in the container; Vin-a 2.316,28. 4 Muṭṭhiṁ chindati, i.e., of kahāpanas. Vin-a 316; which also says, evam muṭṭhiṁ karonto muṭṭhiṁ chindati nāma, making a fist so is called detaching a handful so that no kahāpanas come out between the fingers. 5 Suttārūḷhaṁ. Vin-a 316, “putting on chains means, tying on chains, made of chains.” Cf. Vin 2.106 where the group of six monks wore similar things. 6 Pāmaṅga, at Vinaya Texts iii.69, “ear-drops.” Vin-a 316, “made of gold, made of silver, made of chains, strings of pearls and so on.” Otherwise Buddhaghosa of no help here. Cf. Vin-a 534. 7 Brahmalī: The next item occurring in I.B. Horner’s translation is “an ornamental string hanging from the ear,” but since this is not found in the Mahāsāṅgīti, I have left it out. Her note on this is: “Kaṇnasuttaka at Vin 1.286 seems to mean a clothes-line; but cf. Vin 2.143.” 8 Kaṭisuttaka. Not enumerated at Vin 2.136 where other special kinds of girdles are mentioned. The monks were forbidden to wear any of these things, Vin 2.107. The use of kaṭisuttaka, meaning a hip-string, is forbidden to the nuns at Vin 2.271. 9 koṭiyam gahetvā = ākāsaṭṭham akaronto, Vin-a 317. 10 gharisanto niharati, which according to Vin-a 317 means that when a big pot is brim-full, drawing it out and levelling a chain (pāmaṅga) across the mouth of the big pot, if he draws the chain further than the mouth, so that he drags off whatever goods rise higher than the level of the top of the pot, there is a pārājika offence. But if, in pulling the chain, he does not pull over any goods, as he does not pull the chain beyond the rim, there is a thullaccaya offence. See above, BD 1.77 n., on pāmaṅga. 11 payoga, an elastic term, meaning action, business, undertaking; cf. Vin 3.50 below, where it seems to mean occasion, occurrence, happening. 12 These, with fresh butter, navanīta, constitute the five kinds of medicine, cf. below, Vin 3.251.
māsakas, there is an offence entailing expulsion. In this case, if he destroys it, throws it away, burns it or renders it useless, there is an offence of bad conduct.

Being on firm ground\(^1\) means: the goods are put down on the firm ground. If, intending to steal and thinking, “I will steal the goods which are on the firm ground,” he either searches for a companion, or goes himself, there is an offence of bad conduct. If he touches them, there is an offence of bad conduct. If he makes them quiver, there is a serious offence. If he moves them from their base, there is an offence entailing expulsion.

Being in the air means: the goods are in the air.\(^2\) A peacock, a francolin partridge,\(^3\) a partridge, a quail,\(^4\) a robe,\(^5\) a turban or different varieties of gold—\(^6\) that falls to the ground when cut. If, intending to steal, he thinks, “I will steal the goods in the air,” and he either searches for a companion or goes himself, there is an offence of bad conduct. If he cuts off their course of movement,\(^8\) there is an offence of bad conduct. If he touches them, there is an offence of bad conduct. If he makes them quiver, there is a serious offence. If he moves them from their base, there is an offence entailing expulsion.

---

\(^1\) thalaṭṭhaṁ. Thala is solid ground, firm ground, as opposed to water; dry ground—i.e., high, raised or sloping as opposed to low ground; or a plateau as opposed to a low-lying place. Vin-a 322 explains by bhūmitale vā pāsādapab-batatatalādisu vā. \(^2\) ākāsagataṁ, gataṁ being an elastic termination of some fixed significance. \(^3\) kapiñjara, possibly with this meaning, cf. Kv 268 (kapiñjala) and J a vi.538. \(^4\) vaṭṭako. Pali-English Dictionary says a “cart,” vaṭṭakā being “quail.”

\(^5\) Blown by the force of the wind and extended on the ground, Vin-a 324. \(^6\) BRAHMALI: This renders hiraññaṁ vā suvaṇṇaṁ vā. These are two different words for gold, the exact distinction between them being unclear. \(^7\) hiraññaṁ vā suvaṇṇaṁ vā. While people are putting on, e.g. a necklace or while a goldsmith is making a salakā, if it falls from the fastener, and the thief makes off with it, Vin-a 324. But for these two words, hirañña and suvaṇṇa, cf. above BD 1.28, n. \(^8\) BRAHMALI: Presumably this refers to something moving through the air, perhaps especially birds.
Being above ground means: the goods are found above ground. On a bed, on a bench, on a bamboo pole for hanging robes from, on a cord for hanging robes from, on a peg in the wall, on an elephant tusk peg, in a tree, or even if just fastened to a bowl stand. If, intending to steal, he thinks, “I will steal the goods that are found above ground,” and he either searches for a companion or goes himself, there is an offence of bad conduct. If he touches them, there is an offence of bad conduct. If he makes them quiver, there is a serious offence. If he moves them from their base, there is an offence entailing expulsion.

Being in the water means: the goods are deposited in the water. If intending to steal, he thinks, “I will steal the goods in the water,” and he either searches for a companion or goes himself, there is an offence of bad conduct. He either dives into the water or emerges from it, there is an offence of bad conduct. If he touches the goods, there is an offence of bad conduct. If he makes them quiver, there is a serious offence. If he moves them from their base, there is an offence entailing expulsion.

If intending to steal, he touches either a blue, red, or white lotus which is growing there, or the sprout of a lotus, or a fish or a turtle to the value of five māsakas or more than five māsakas, there is an offence of bad conduct. If he makes them quiver, there is a serio-

1 Vehāsaṭṭhaṁ. There is usually little difference between vehāsa and ākāsa, which is part of the word explained in the preceding paragraph. Both usually mean “air” or “atmosphere.” But it is clear in this context that some greater difference is intended. In this paragraph, beginning “Being above ground,” the goods are shown to come into contact with something standing on or supported by the earth, and are not, as “in the air,” freed, like a bird, from the earth’s support. Vehāsaṭṭhaṁ, with bhūmigataṁ, occurs at DN i.115, and is translated at Dialogues of the Buddha i.i.47 “above the ground,” which I follow, and at Dialogues of the Buddha ii.94, “housed in treasury chambers.” DN-i.1.284=MN-i.iii.420 says “completing terraces and turrets (pāsā-daniyyūhādāyo) and putting (it there) is called ‘above the ground.’” 2 vehāsagataṁ.

3 cīvaravāṁsa. This and the next, cīvararajju, are often found together in Vinaya; cf. Vin 1.47 and Vin 1.286 where these things were prescribed for the monks. 4 bhit-tikhila. Vin-a 327, something knocked against the wall, driven straight in, or something that was there originally. 5 nāgadanta. Vin-a 327 says that this is curved.

6 Vin-a 328: this may be a support on a tree or on a fence or on a stick. 7 tatthajātaka, literally born there.
ous offence. If he moves them from their base, there is an offence entailing expulsion.

A boat means: that by which one crosses.¹ Being in a boat means: the goods are deposited in a boat. If intending to steal, he thinks, “I will steal the goods which are deposited in the boat,” and he either searches for a companion or goes himself, there is an offence of bad conduct. If he touches them ... there is an offence entailing expulsion.

If intending to steal, he thinks, “I will steal the boat” ... or goes himself, there is an offence of bad conduct. If he touches it, there is an offence of bad conduct. If he makes it quiver, there is a serious offence. If he loosens the moorings, there is an offence of bad conduct. If, having loosened the moorings, he touches it, there is an offence of bad conduct. If he makes it quiver, there is a serious offence. If he makes it move up or down, or across the water even for as much as a hair’s breadth, there is an offence entailing expulsion.

A vehicle² means: a litter, a two-wheeled carriage, a cart, a chariot.³ Being in a vehicle means: the goods are deposited in a vehicle. If intending to steal, he thinks, “I will steal the goods deposited in the vehicle” ... or goes himself, there is an offence of bad conduct. If he touches them ... there is an offence entailing expulsion.

If intending to steal, he thinks, “I will steal the vehicle” ... or goes himself, there is an offence of bad conduct. If he touches it ... there is an offence entailing expulsion.

A burden means: a burden carried on the head, a burden carried on the back, a burden carried on the hip, one hanging down. If intending to steal, he touches the burden on the head, there is an offence of bad conduct. If he makes it quiver, there is a serious offence. If he lowers it to the back, there is an offence entailing expulsion. If intending to steal, he touches the burden on the back, there is an offence of bad conduct. If he makes it quiver, there is a serious offence. If he lowers it to the hip, there is an offence entailing expulsion. If intending to steal, he touches the burden on the hip, there is an offence of bad conduct. If he causes it to quiver, there is a serious offence. If he takes it with his hands, there is an offence entailing expulsion. If intending to steal a burden in the hand, he deposits it on the ground, there is an offence entailing expulsion. Intending to steal, he takes it from the ground, there is an offence entailing expulsion.

¹ Vin-a 332, here meaning even a washerman’s tub or a sheaf of bamboos. ² yāna, a way, the act of going, so a vehicle. Earlier, in the Brāhmaṇas and Upaniṣads, it had meant a way, rather than the means of going, as devayāna, pitṛyāna, the way to the devas, the way to the ancestors. DASGUPTA, History of Indian Philosophy i.125 sees the word as “career”. This rendering was adopted by E.J. THOMAS, History of Buddhist Thought, p.178, in referring to later (Mahāyāna) teaching. The above definition clearly rules out “career” for this passage. ³ Cf. Vin 4.339 where two more are added: sivikā pāṭaṅkī, palanquin and sedan-chair.

A park means: a park with flowers, an orchard. Being in a park means: the goods are deposited in the park in four places: in the earth, on the firm ground, in the air, above the ground. If intending to steal, he thinks, “I will steal the goods in the park” … or goes himself, there is an offence of bad conduct. If he touches them … there is an offence entailing expulsion.

If intending to steal, he touches a root growing there, or a piece of bark, a leaf, a flower, or a fruit to the value of five māsakas or more than five māsakas … there is an offence entailing expulsion.

If he claims the park, there is an offence of bad conduct. If he evokes doubt in the owner as to his ownership, there is a serious offence. If the owner thinks, “I won’t get it back,” and he gives up the effort of reclaiming it, there is an offence entailing expulsion. If he resorts to the law and defeats the owner, there is an offence entailing expulsion. If he resorts to the law\(^1\) but is defeated,\(^2\) there is a serious offence.

---

¹ Brahmalī: The word ārāma, “park”, also includes monasteries. ² tatthajātaka, cf. BD 1.80, n. 5; Vin-a 337f., applies this adjective only to mūla. ³ Bark was used for medicine or dye; to harm a tree with valuable bark was a pārājika, Vin-a 338. ⁴ Such as jasmine and lotus. ⁵ Vin-a 338, i.e. belonging to someone else, saying, ’It is mine’; in this attempt to take what is not given, there is a dukkaṭa. ⁶ Brahmalī: Vin-a 2.338,16. ⁷ Brahmalī: Vin-a 2.338,21. ⁸ dhuraṁ nikkhipati, or “throws off his responsibility.” ⁹ dhammaṁ caranto. Vin-a ii.339: bhikkhusanghe vā rājakule vā vinicchayaṁ karonto; but the judges having descended to false witnesses pervert justice and conquer the keeper.

Being in a monastic dwelling\(^3\) means: the goods are deposited in a monastic dwelling in four places: in the earth, on the firm ground, in the air, above the ground. If, intending to steal, he thinks, “I will steal the goods in the monastic dwelling” ... or goes himself, there is an offence of bad conduct. If he touches them ... there is an offence entailing expulsion.

If he claims the monastic dwelling ... but is defeated, there is a serious offence.

A field means: where grain or vegetables grow.\(^4\) Being in a field means: the goods are deposited in a field in four places: in the earth, on the firm ground, in the air, above the ground. If, intending to steal, he thinks, “I will steal the goods deposited in the field” ... or goes himself, there is an offence of bad conduct. If he touches them ... there is an offence entailing expulsion.

If, intending to steal, he touches the grain or the vegetables which grow there to the value of five māsakas or more than five māsakas ...

---

\(^1\) Here Vin-\(a\) 339 says, “but if proceeding with the investigation by means of Vinaya and Dhamma and the master’s teaching, he accomplishes his own defeat ... he falls into a thullaccaya.”
\(^2\) parajjati.
\(^3\) Note that this paragraph and Bu-\(P\)j 2.4.14 below do not begin by saying: “a vihāra means;”, “a village means;”, as do the others here.
\(^4\) There are seven sorts of grain (pubbaṇṇa) and seven kinds of pulses or cereals (aparaṇṇa). Cnd 314 distinguishes these two sorts of grain: pubbaṇṇa (natural) and paraṇṇa (prepared). To the first, here called dhañña, belong sāli and vihi (rice sorts), yava (barley), godhūma (wheat), kaṅga (millet), varaka (beans), kudrūsaka. At Dialogues of the Buddha iii.70 n.1 translator says kudrūsaka is a “kind of rye.” At DN iii.71 it is said that as now sāli and curry (maṁsodana) are the highest kinds of food, so when man's life-span is reduced to ten years, kudrūsaka will become the highest food. At Vin 4.264 these kinds of grain are catalogued under āmaka-dhañña, “raw” grain, corn in its natural, unprepared state. At DN i.5 = AN ii.209 it is said that Gotama is one who abstains from accepting this āmakadhañña. Mnd 248, in defining khetta gives a rather different series of seven grains; sāli, vihi, mugga (kidney-bean), māsa (a bean, Phaseolus indicus or radiata), yava, godhūma, tila (sesame plant). Mil 106 again varies slightly: sāli, vihi, yava, taṇḍula (rice-grain), tila, mugga, māsa. AN iv.108 = AN iv.112 includes tila, mugga, māsa under aparāṇṇa. A list of provisions for a journey at Vin 1.244 includes taṇḍula, mugga, māsa. Ja v.106 says that hareṇukā ti aparāṇṇajā ti.
there is an offence entailing expulsion.

If he claims the field ... but is defeated, there is a serious offence.

If he shifts a post, a cord, a fence, or a boundary, there is an offence of bad conduct. When one action of the shifting remains, there is a serious offence. When the last action of the shifting is completed, there is an offence entailing expulsion.¹

A plot of land means: the plot of land of a park or a monastery, the plot of land of a monastic dwelling. Being on a plot of land means: the goods are deposited on a plot of land in four places: in the earth, on the firm ground, in the air, above the ground. If, intending to steal, he thinks, “I will steal the goods on the plot of land” ... or he goes himself, there is an offence of bad conduct. If he touches them ... there is an offence entailing expulsion.

If he claims the plot of land ... but is defeated, there is a serious offence.

If he shifts a post, a cord, a fence, or a boundary, there is an offence of bad conduct. When one action of the shifting remains, there is a serious offence. When the last action of the shifting is completed, there is an offence entailing expulsion.

Being in a village means: the goods are deposited in a village in four places: in the earth, on the firm ground, in the air, above the ground. If, intending to steal, he thinks, “I will steal the goods the village” ... or he goes himself, there is an offence of bad conduct. If he touches them ... there is an offence entailing expulsion.

The wilderness means: any wilderness which is owned by people.² Being in the wilderness means: the goods are deposited in the wilderness in four places: in the earth, on the firm ground, in the air, above the ground. If, intending to steal, he thinks, “I will steal the goods in the wilderness” ... or he goes himself, there is an offence of bad conduct. If he touches them ... there is an offence entailing expulsion.

¹ Ekaṁ payogaṁ anāgate, āpatti thullaccayassa; tasmin payoge āgate, āpatti pārājikassa. Note the use of accusative and locative. Vin-a 341 says, “desiring to make a field for himself using the enclosure of another person’s field, he digs in the wood. Each time he uses a piece, there is a dukkaṭa offence (payoge payoge dukkaṭam); when one piece is still to come, there is a thullaccaya offence (ekasmiṁ anāgate thullaccayam); when that piece has come, there is a pārājika (tasmiṁ āgate pārājikaṁ).” Commentary goes on to say that if by these means one is able to enclose a field for himself, then there is a dukkaṭa with the first payoga, and finally (avasāne) there is one of two things: a thullaccaya according to one, a pārājika according to the other. ² BRAHMALLI: See Vin-a 2.342,4.

If, intending to steal, he touches a piece of wood belonging there, or a creeper or grass, to the value of five māsakas or more than five māsakas ... there is an offence entailing expulsion.

Water means: in a vessel, in a pond, or in a reservoir. If, intending to steal, he touches it ... there is an offence entailing expulsion. Putting his own vessel into (the container holding the water), if he touches water to the value of five māsakas or more than five māsakas, intending to steal it, there is an offence of bad conduct. If he makes it quiver, there is a serious offence. If he puts it into his own bowl,¹ there is an offence entailing expulsion.

If he breaks the embankment, there is an offence of bad conduct. Having broken the embankment, if he empties water to the value of five māsakas or more than five māsakas, there is an offence entailing expulsion. If he empties water to the value of more than one māsaka but less than five māsakas, there is a serious offence. If he empties water to the value of a māsaka or less than a māsaka, there is an offence of bad conduct.

Tooth-wood means: either cut or uncut. If, intending to steal, he touches what has a value of five māsakas or more than five māsakas, there is an offence of bad conduct. If he makes it quiver, there is a serious offence. If he moves it from its base, there is an offence entailing expulsion.

Forest tree, “the oldest tree, but here (idha) all are taken for the use of people.” means: Whatever tree is owned by people. If, intending to steal, he fells it, for each blow there is an offence of bad conduct. When one blow remains (before the tree is felled), there is a serious offence. When that last blow is completed, there is an offence entailing expulsion.²

¹ attano bhājanagataṁ karoti, cf. above, BD 1.77. ² Vin-a 347 ³ Cf. above, Bu-Pj 2.4.12, Bu-Pj 2.4.14.
Goods being carried means: the goods of another are being carried. If, intending to steal, he touches them ... there is an offence entailing expulsion.

If he thinks, “together with the carrier I will carry off the goods,” and he makes the carrier move one foot, there is a serious offence. If he makes him move the second foot, there is an offence entailing expulsion.

If he thinks, “I will seize the fallen goods,” and he makes them fall, there is an offence of bad conduct. If, intending to steal, he touches the fallen goods to the value of five māsakas or more than five māsakas ... there is an offence entailing expulsion.

Deposit means: goods deposited with oneself. If one is told, “give me the goods,” and one says, “I am not getting them,” there is an offence of bad conduct. If he evokes doubt in the mind of the owner (as to whether he will get them back), there is a serious offence. If the owner thinks, “he won’t give them to me,” and he gives up the effort of getting them back, there is an offence entailing expulsion.

If he resorts to the law and defeats the owner, there is an offence entailing expulsion. If he resorts to the law but is defeated, there is a serious offence.

Customs station means: it is established by a king in a mountain-pass, at a ford in a river or at the gate of a village, so that tax shall be received from a person entering there. If, intending to steal, and having entered there, he touches goods that have a (tax) value to the king of five māsakas or more than five māsakas, there is an offence of bad conduct. If he makes them quiver, there is a serious offence. If he goes beyond the customs station with one foot, there is a serious offence. If he goes beyond the customs station with his second foot, there is an offence entailing expulsion.

If, standing within the customs station, he makes the goods fall outside the customs station, there is an offence entailing expulsion.

If he avoids the customs station, there is an offence of bad con-

---

¹ harañaka, from √hr, to bring, convey, carry, fetch.
² Cf. above, Bu-Pj 2.4.10.
³ BRAHMALI: See Vin-a 2.358,29.
duct.

Creature means: a human being. If, intending to steal, he touches him ... there is an offence entailing expulsion. If he thinks, “I will take him away on foot,” and he makes him move the first foot, there is a serious offence. If he makes him move the second foot, there is an offence entailing expulsion.

Footless means: snakes and fish. If, intending to steal, he touches what has the value of five māsakas or more than five māsakas ... there is an offence entailing expulsion.

Two-footed means: humans and birds. If, intending to steal, he touches them ... there is an offence entailing expulsion. If he thinks, “I will take them away on foot,” and he makes them move the first foot, there is a serious offence. If he makes them move the second foot, there is a serious offence. If he makes them move the third foot, there is a serious offence. If he makes them move the fourth foot, there is an offence entailing expulsion.

Four-footed means: elephants, horses, camels, cattle, asses, domesticated animals. If, intending to steal, he touches them ... there is an offence entailing expulsion. If he thinks, “I will take them away on foot,” and he makes them move the first foot, there is a serious offence. If he makes them move the second foot, there is a serious offence. If he makes them move the third foot, there is a serious offence. If he makes them move the fourth foot, there is an offence entailing expulsion.

---

"Brahmali: According to the commentary, this refers to slaves; see Vin-a 2.361.11. " Vin-a 363 says there are three kinds of creatures born with wings: those with wings of down (loma), such as peacocks and partridges; those with wings of skin, such as bats; those with wings of bone, such as bees. ³ ³ ³ ³ "Oṭṭha, “camel” in Classical Sanskrit. This word appears in another list of animals at Mil 32, there translated “camels.” Morris, Journal of the Pali Text Society 1887, p. 150, for oṭṭhiyādhi suggests “female elephant,” a rendering followed by Francis and Neil in translating Jā iii.385. Here the oṭṭhiyādhi is made to speak of feats done by her in battle with words which, however, ring equally true if they came from a camel. Oṭṭha can hardly mean “elephant” here, since the ordinary word hatthi is included in the list. Monier Williams, Sanskrit Dictionary, Oxford, 1872, has sa ... a buffalo; a bull with a hump; a camel; a cart, a waggon; ... (i), f. a she-camel; an earthen vessel in the shape of a camel.” ⁴ ⁴ ⁴ ⁴ " Brahmalı: Pasuka. According to the commentary, this last term includes all four-footed animals; see Vin-a 2.363.23.
Many-footed means: scorpions, centipedes, caterpillars. If, intending to steal, he touches what has the value of five māsakas or more than five māsakas ... there is an offence entailing expulsion. If he thinks, “I will take them away on foot,” and he makes them move, there is a serious offence for each leg that moves. When the last leg moves, there is an offence entailing expulsion.

A spy means: having spied out goods, if he describes them and says, “steal such and such goods,” there is an offence of bad conduct. If he takes those goods, there is an offence entailing expulsion for both.

A keeper of entrusted property means: guarding goods that have been brought to him to the value of five māsakas or more than five māsakas, and intending to steal, he touches them ... there is an offence entailing expulsion.

A mutually agreed theft means: if many have agreed together but only one steals the goods, there is an offence entailing expulsion for all of them.

An arranged action means: if one makes an arrangement for before the meal or for after the meal, for the night or for the day, saying, “take those goods according to this agreement,” there is an offence of bad conduct. If he takes those goods according to that agreement, there is an offence entailing expulsion for both. If he takes those goods before or after the time of the agreement, there is no offence for the instigator, but an offence entailing expulsion for the thief.

The making of a sign means: he makes a sign. If he says, “when I wink, raise my eyebrow, or raise my head, at that sign steal the goods,” there is an offence of bad conduct. If, at that sign, he steals the goods, there is an offence entailing expulsion for both. If he steals the goods before or after the sign, there is no offence for the instigator, but an offence entailing expulsion for the thief.

---

¹ Brahmalī: Uccāliṅgapāṇakā. The exact meaning is uncertain. ² “examining them and considering them.” Vin-a 365. ³ I.e., to another as goods put carelessly or unguarded in other houses or vihāras. ⁴ ubhinnaṁ pārājikassa, for he both incites others and assists in the theft himself. ⁵ “He puts them into a sack or a well.” Vin-a 366. ⁶ Samvidahitvā, also below, Bu-Pj 2.734. ⁷ Saṁketakamma.

PERMUTATIONS PART 2

If a monk tells a monk, “steal such and such goods,” there is an offence of bad conduct. If he steals them, thinking they are the ones he has been asked to steal, there is an offence entailing expulsion for both. If a monk tells a monk, “steal such and such goods,” but he steals something else, thinking they are the ones he has been asked to steal, there is no offence for the instigator, but there is an offence entailing expulsion for the thief. If a monk tells a monk, “steal such and such goods,” and he steals them, thinking they are something else than what he has been asked to steal, there is an offence entailing expulsion for both. If a monk tells a monk, “steal such and such goods,” but he steals something else than what he has been asked to steal, thinking it is something else, there is no offence for the instigator, but there is an offence entailing expulsion for the thief.¹

If a monk tells a monk, “tell such and such to tell such and such to steal such and such goods,” there is an offence of bad conduct. In informing the next person, there is an offence of bad conduct. If the (potential) thief agrees, there is a serious offence for the instigator. If he steals these goods, there is an offence entailing expulsion for all of them.²³ If a monk tells a monk, “tell such and such to tell such and such to steal such and such goods,” there is an offence of bad conduct. If he tells someone else than the one he was told to tell, there is an offence of bad conduct. If the (potential) thief agrees, there is an offence of bad conduct. If he steals these goods, there is no offence for the instigator, but there is an offence entailing expulsion for the conveyor of the message and the thief.

If a monk tells a monk, “steal such and such goods,” there is an offence of bad conduct. Having gone, he returns, saying, “I am not able to steal those goods,” and if he tells him again, “when you are able, then steal those goods,” there is an offence of bad conduct. If he steals the goods, there is an offence entailing expulsion for both.

¹ Brahmalī: The ellipses points found in I.B. Horner’s translation and in the PTS original used by her have been filled in in accordance with the Mahāsaṅgīti.
² Brahmalī: That is, altogether four people.
³ Vin-a 369, sabbesaṁ catunnam pi janānaṁ pārājikaṁ.

If a monk tells a monk, “steal such and such goods,” there is an offence of bad conduct. If, having told him, he regrets it, but does not say⁴ to him, “do not steal,” and he then steals those goods, there is an offence entailing expulsion for both.

If a monk tells a monk, “steal such and such goods,” there is an offence of bad conduct. If, having told him, he regrets it and says, “do not steal,” but the other says, “I have been told by you,” and he then steals those goods, then there is no offence for the instigator, but an offence entailing expulsion for the thief.

If a monk tells a monk, “steal such and such goods,” there is an offence of bad conduct. If, having told him, he regrets it and says to him, “do not steal,” and he says, “very well,”² and desists, there is no offence for either.

Permutations part 3

For one who steals there is an offence entailing expulsion when five factors are fulfilled: it is the possession of another; one perceives it as such; it is a valuable possession worth at least five māsakas; one has the intention to steal; if one touches it, there is an offence of bad conduct / if one makes it quiver, there is a serious offence / if one makes it move from its base, there is an offence entailing expulsion.

For one who steals there is a serious offence when five factors are fulfilled: it is the possession of another; one perceives it as such; it is an ordinary possession worth more than one māsaka but less than five māsakas; one has the intention to steal; if one touches it, there is an offence of bad conduct / if one makes it quiver, there is an offence of bad conduct / if one makes it move from its base, there is a serious offence.

For one who steals there is an offence of bad conduct when five factors are fulfilled: it is the property of another; one perceives it as such; it is an ordinary possession worth one māsaka or less; one has the intention to steal; if one touches it, there is an offence of bad conduct / if one makes it quiver, there is an offence of bad conduct / if one makes it move from its base, there is an offence of bad conduct.

---

¹ na sāveti, causative of suṇāti, to hear. ² suṭṭhu.

For one who steals there is an offence entailing expulsion when six factors are fulfilled: one does not perceive it as one’s own; one does not take it on trust;¹ one does not borrow it; it is a valuable possession worth at least five māsakas; one has the intention to steal; if one touches it, there is an offence of bad conduct / if one makes it quiver, there is a serious offence / if one makes it move from its base, there is an offence entailing expulsion.

For one who steals there is a serious offence when six factors are fulfilled: one does not perceive it as one’s own; one does not take it on trust; one does not borrow it; it is an ordinary possession worth more than one māsaka but less than five māsakas; one has the intention to steal; if one touches it, there is an offence of bad conduct / if one makes it quiver, there is an offence of bad conduct / if one makes it move from its base, there is a serious offence.

For one who steals there is an offence of bad conduct when six factors are fulfilled: one does not perceive it as one’s own; one does not take it on trust; one does not borrow it; it is an ordinary possession worth one māsaka or less; one has the intention to steal; if one touches it, there is an offence of bad conduct / if one makes it quiver, there is an offence of bad conduct / if one makes it move from its base, there is an offence of bad conduct.

For one who steals there is an offence of bad conduct when five factors are fulfilled: it is not the possession of another; but one perceives it as the possession of another; it is a valuable possession worth at least five māsakas; one has the intention to steal; if one touches it, there is an offence of bad conduct / if one makes it quiver, there is an offence of bad conduct / if one makes it move from its base, there is an offence of bad conduct.

¹ Brahmalī: This means he has a prior agreement with the owner whereby he has permission to take his possessions or certain of his possessions.
is an offence of bad conduct.

For one who steals there is an offence of bad conduct when five factors are fulfilled: it is not the possession of another; but one perceives it as the possession of another; it is an ordinary possession worth more than one māsaka but less than five māsakas; one has the intention to steal; if one touches it, there is an offence of bad conduct / if one makes it quiver, there is an offence of bad conduct / if one makes it move from its base, there is an offence of bad conduct.

For one who steals there is an offence of bad conduct when five factors are fulfilled: it is not the possession of another; but one perceives it as the possession of another; it is an ordinary possession worth one māsaka or less; one has the intention to steal; if one touches it, there is an offence of bad conduct / if one makes it quiver, there is an offence of bad conduct / if one makes it move from its base, there is an offence of bad conduct.

Non-offence clause

There is no offence if one perceives it as one’s own; if one takes it on trust; if one borrows it;¹ if it is the property of a ghost² or an animal; if one perceives it as discarded;³ if one is insane; if one’s mind is unhinged; if one is overwhelmed by pain; if one is the first offender.⁴

The first section on stealing is finished

¹ I.e., with intention to give it back; Vin-a 372, paṭidassāmi paṭikarissāmi; cf. Vin 3.66 = Vin 2.174, where the lord is represented as allowing monks to take away temporarily. ² petaporīgahe = pittivisaye, Vin-a 372, the realm or world of the departed. Mrs. Rhys Davids, Indian Religion and Survival (London, 1934), p. 35, says peta, “a word which, meaning literally ‘gone before,’ is held to be a corruption of the older term pitṛ-, or fathers’ world.” Vin-a 372 says, “having done his time in the world of the departed where he had arisen and being reborn in that existence, all the devas of the retinue of the Four Firmament Devas go to destruction as departed ones: for these there is no guilt in that realm.” ³ Vin-a 373. If he knows that these rags have no owner (assāmika) there is no offence in taking them; but if they have an owner, he should give them to him, having had them fetched. ⁴ Buddhaghosa says (Vin-a 373) that Dhaniya was the beginner, and there was no offence for him.
Case rulings

Mnemonic list
Five are told with dyers, and four with blankets, Five indeed with darkness, and five with carrying, / Five with speech, another two with wind,
Fresh, the dropping of a kusa-grass ticket,¹ in the sauna² is the tenth, /
Five are told with animal kills, and five without grounds, Shortage of food, and boiled rice and meat, pastries, cakes, sweetmeats, /
With requisites, bag, cushion, bolster, a bamboo robe-rack, on not coming out,
And taking food on trust, another two on perceiving as one’s own, /
Seven on not regarding as taking, and seven where they did take,
Seven where they took from the Sangha, and another two with flowers, /
Three on taking messages,³ three on taking jewels past,
And pigs, deer, fish, and setting a vehicle in motion, /
Two on a piece of flesh, two on wood, discarded, two on water,
Step by step, by arrangement, it did not amount (to five māsakas), /
Four handfuls at Sāvatthi, two on scraps of meat, two about grass,
Seven on dividing the belongings of the Sangha, and seven on non-owners,
Wood, water, clay, two on grass,
seven on taking by theft the belongings of the Sangha,
One should not take away what has an owner,
one may borrow what has an owner, /
Campā and in Rājagaha, and Ajjuka at Vesāli,
And Benares, and Kosambī, and Sāgalā with Dalhika.

Case details
At one time the group of six monks went to the dyers’ spread (of dyed cloth) and carried off the dyers’ goods. They became anxious and thought, “The Master has laid down a training rule. Could it be that we have fallen into an offence entailing expulsion?”⁴ They informed the Master ... “You, monks, have fallen into an offence entailing expulsion.”

¹ A blade (or blades) of the kusa grass cast to give the proper distribution of robes. Vin-a 378.
² Text here reads jantagghena, but at Vin 3.58, where the story is given we get jantāghare.
³ vuttavādino.
⁴ Cf. Bu-Pj 1.10.1.
At one time a certain monk, having gone to the dyers’ spread (of dyed cloth) and seeing a valuable garment, had the intention to steal it. On account of this he became anxious: “There is no offence, monk, for the arising of a thought.”

At one time a certain monk, having gone to the dyers’ spread (of dyed cloth) and seeing a valuable garment, had the intention to steal it. On account of this he became anxious: “Monk, there is no offence entailing expulsion, but there is an offence of bad conduct.”

At one time a certain monk, having gone to the dyers’ spread (of dyed cloth) and seeing a valuable garment, had the intention to steal it. On account of this he became anxious: “... but there is a serious offence.”

At one time a certain monk, having gone to the dyers’ spread (of dyed cloth) and seeing a valuable garment, had the intention to steal it. On account of this he became anxious: “You, monk, have fallen into an offence entailing expulsion.”

At one time a certain monk who was an almsgoer saw a valuable blanket¹ and had the intention to steal it... intending to steal it, he touched it... intending to steal it, he made it quiver... intending to steal it, he moved it from its base. On account of this he became anxious: “You, monk, have fallen into an offence entailing expulsion.”

At one time a certain monk, seeing some goods during the day, took note of them, thinking, “I will steal them at night,” and he stole them, thinking they were the ones he had seen. ... but he stole something else, thinking they were the ones he had seen. ... and he stole them, thinking they were something else.² ... but he stole something else, thinking it was something else. On account of this he became anxious ... “... expulsion.”

¹ uttarattharāṇa. ² Which he had originally thought of stealing.

At one time a certain monk, seeing some goods during the day, took note of them, thinking, “I will steal them at night,” but he stole his own goods, thinking they were something else. On account of this he became anxious ... “Monk, there is no offence entailing expulsion, but there is an offence of bad conduct.”

At one time a certain monk carrying the goods of another on his head touched the burden intending to steal it ... intending to steal it, he made it quiver ... intending to steal it, he lowered it onto his shoulder ... intending to steal it, he touched the burden on the shoulder ... intending to steal it, he made it quiver ... intending to steal it, he lowered it onto his hip ... intending to steal it, he touched the burden on the hip ... intending to steal it, he made it quiver ... intending to steal it, he took hold of it with his hands ... intending to steal the burden in his hands, he deposited it on the ground ... intending to steal it, he took it from the ground. On account of this he became anxious ... “You, monk, have fallen into an offence entailing expulsion.”

At one time a certain monk, having spread out his robe in the open air, entered his dwelling. A second monk, thinking, “let not this robe be lost,” put it aside. Having come out of his dwelling, the first monk asked the monks, “Friends, who has taken my robe?” The second monk said, “I have taken it.” The first monk seized him and said, “You are no longer a recluse.” The second monk became anxious. He informed the Master. The Master said, “what was your intention?”

“Master, it was just a way of speaking.”

“There is no offence, monk, since it was just a way of speaking.”

¹ The first monk. ² The second monk. ³ āpatti here followed by locative instead of genitive.
At one time a certain monk, putting down his robe on a bench ... putting down his sitting cloth on a bench ... putting his bowl under a bench, entered his dwelling. A second monk, thinking, “let not this bowl be lost,” put it aside. Having come out, the first monk asked the monks, “Friends, who has taken my bowl?” The second monk said, “I have taken it.” The first monk seized him ... “There is no offence, monk, since it was just a way of speaking.”

At one time a certain nun, having spread out her robe on a fence, entered her dwelling. A second nun, thinking, “let not this robe be lost,” put it aside. Having come out, the first nun¹ asked the nuns, “Ladies,² who has taken my robe?” The second nun³ said, “I have taken it.” The first nun seized her and said, “You are no longer a recluse.” On account of this the second nun became anxious. She informed the nuns. The nuns informed the monks. The monks informed the Master ... “There is no offence, monks, since it was just a way of speaking.”

At that time a certain monk, seeing a robe blown up during a whirlwind, took hold of it, thinking, “I will give it to the owners.” The owners reprimanded the monk, saying, “You are no longer a recluse.” On account of this he became anxious ... “What was your intention, monk?”

“I did not intend to steal it, Master.”

“Monk, there is no offence for one who does not intend to steal.”

At one time a certain monk, intending to steal it, took hold of a turban blown up during a whirlwind, thinking, “lest the owners see it.” The owners reprimanded the monk, saying, “You are no longer a recluse.” He became anxious ... “You, monk, have fallen into an offence entailing expulsion.”

¹ The first nun. ² ayye. ³ The second nun.
At one time a certain monk went to a charnel ground and took the rags from a fresh corpse. But the ghost was still dwelling in that body. Then the ghost said to the monk, “Bhante, do not take my robe.” The monk took no notice and went away. Then the body got up and followed closely behind that monk. The monk entered his dwelling and closed the door, and the body fell down at that very place. He became anxious ... “Monk, there is no offence entailing expulsion. But a monk should not take rags from a fresh corpse. If one does, there is an offence of bad conduct.”

At one time, when robes belonging to the Sangha were being distributed, a certain monk, disregarding his kusa-grass ticket and intending to steal, took a robe. He became anxious ... “... entailing expulsion.”

At one time when Venerable Ānanda was in a sauna, thinking that the inner robe of another monk was his own, he put it on. That monk said, “Why, friend Ānanda, did you put on my inner robe?” “Friend, I thought it was my own.” They informed the Master. He said: “There is no offence, monks, for one who perceives it as his own.”

At one time a number of monks, descending from Mount Vulture’s Peak and seeing the remains of a lion’s kill, had it cooked and ate it. They became anxious ... “Monks, there is no offence when it is the remains of a lion’s kill.”

1 BRAHMALI: Defined by commentary as still warm; see Vin-a 2.374, 29. 2 peta. See above, BD 1.92, n. 3 “On account of its longing for a cloak,” Vin-a 374—i.e probably naked and needing a cloak. 4 Through the peta’s own power, Vin-a 374. 5 At the closed door the peta, being devoid of desire for the cloak, left the body, and went according to its deed, Vin-a 374. 6 Still warm. Vin-a 374, 29. 7 BRAHMALI: Kusa-grass was apparently used as robe tickets. 8 jantāghara. 9 This shows that vegetarianism was not (at this time) enjoined; cf. below, BD 1.297, BD 1.298.
At one time a number of monks, descending from Mount Vulture’s Peak and seeing the remains of a tiger’s kill ... seeing the remains of a panther’s kill ... seeing the remains of a hyena’s kill ... seeing the remains of a wolf’s kill, had it cooked ... “Monks, there is no offence when it is the property of an animal.”

At one time, when rice belonging to the Sangha was being distributed, a certain monk said without grounds,¹ “give me a portion for another,” and he took it away. He became anxious ... “Monk, there is no offence entailing expulsion, but there is an offence entailing confession² for deliberately lying.”³

At one time, when food belonging to the Sangha was being distributed, a certain monk ... when cakes belonging to the Sangha were being distributed, a certain monk ... when sugar-cane belonging to the Sangha was being distributed, a certain monk ... when certain fruits belonging to the Sangha were being distributed, a certain monk said without grounds, “give me a portion for another,” and he took it away. He became anxious ... “Monk, there is no offence entailing expulsion, but there is offence entailing confession for deliberately lying.”⁴

At one time a certain monk, entering a rice kitchen⁵ during a shortage of food and intending to steal, stole a bowlful of rice. He became anxious ... “... expulsion.”

At one time a certain monk, entering a slaughterhouse during a shortage of food and intending to steal, stole a bowlful of meat. ... “... expulsion.”⁶

¹ amūlaka. ² Pācittiya, discussed in forthcoming volume. ³ He must therefore have eaten it himself, the “for another” being only an excuse. ⁴ He must therefore have eaten it himself, the “for another” being only an excuse. ⁵ odaniyaghara. ⁶ Again the fault is not in eating meat, it is in stealing.
At one time a certain monk, entering a bakery during a shortage of food and intending to steal, stole a bowlful of baked cakes ... intending to steal, stole a bowlful of cakes ... intending to steal, stole a bowlful of sweet-meats. He became anxious ... “... expulsion.”

At one time a certain monk, seeing a requisite during the day, took note of it, thinking, “I will steal it at night.” He took it, thinking it was the one he had seen ... He took something else, thinking it was the one he had seen ... He took it, thinking it was something else than what he had seen ... He took something else, thinking it was something else than what he had seen. He became anxious ... “... expulsion.”

At one time a certain monk, seeing a requisite during the day, took note of it, thinking, “I will steal it at night.” He took his own requisite, thinking it was something else. He became anxious ... “Monk, there is no offence entailing expulsion, but there is an offence of bad conduct.”

At one time a certain monk, seeing a bag on a bench and thinking, “if I take it from here I shall be expelled,” took it by moving the bench. He became anxious ... “... expulsion.”

At one time a certain monk, intending to steal, stole a cushion belonging to the Sangha. He became anxious ... “... expulsion.”

At one time a certain monk, intending to steal, stole a robe from a bamboo robe-rack.¹ He became anxious ... “... expulsion.”

¹ Here cīvaravaṁsa is not in conjunction with cīvararajju, the cord or rope for hanging the robes on.
At one time a certain monk stole a robe in a dwelling, thinking, “if I come out from here I shall be expelled,” and he did not come out from that dwelling. They informed the Master. He said, “Monks, whether that foolish man comes out or not, there is an offence entailing expulsion.”

—

At one time two monks were friends. One of them went into the village for alms. The second monk, when food belonging to the Sangha was being distributed, took his friend’s portion. Taking it on trust, he ate it. Finding this out, the first monk\(^1\) reprimanded him, saying, “You are no longer a recluse.” He became anxious ...

“Monk, what was your intention?”
“I took it on trust, Master.”
“There is no offence, monk, for one who takes on trust.”

—

At one time a number of monks were making robes. When food belonging to the Sangha was being distributed, having taken their shares,\(^2\) they put them down.\(^3\) A certain monk, thinking that it was his own, ate another monk’s portion.\(^4\) He, finding this out, reprimanded him, saying, “You are no longer a recluse.” He became anxious ... “... Monk, what was your intention?”

“I thought it was my own, Master.”
“There is no offence, monk, for one who perceives it as his own.”

—

At one time a number of monks were making robes. When food belonging to the Sangha was being distributed, having brought a certain monk’s share with the bowl of another monk, it was put down. The monk who was the owner of the bowl ate the food, thinking it was his own. Finding this out, the owner of the food reprimanded him ... “There is no offence, monk, for one who perceives it as his own.”

---

\(^1\) The first monk.
\(^2\) \textit{paṭivisa}.
\(^3\) \textit{Upanikkhitā honti}. \textit{Upanikkhatta} is the participle of the perfect passive of \textit{upanikkhipati}.
\(^4\) \textit{paṭivisa}.

170
At one time mango thieves cut down some mangoes, collected them in a bundle and left. The owners pursued them. The thieves, seeing the owners, dropped the bundle and ran away. Some monks, perceiving them as discarded, had them offered\(^1\) and ate them. The owners reprimanded these monks, saying, “You are no longer recluse.” They became anxious and informed the Master.

“Monks, what was your intention?”
“Master, we perceived them as discarded.”
“Monks, there is no offence for one who perceives them as discarded.”

At one time rose-apple thieves... bread-fruit thieves... jack-fruit thieves... palm-fruit thieves... sugar-cane thieves... thieves of tim-barūka fruit cut some of them down, collected them in a bundle and left. The owners... “There is no offence, monks, for one who perceives them as discarded.”

At one time mango thieves cut down some mangoes... left. Some monks, intending to steal them and thinking, “lest the owners see them,” ate them. The owners reprimanded the monks, saying, “You are no longer recluse.” They became anxious... “You, monks, have fallen into an offence entailing expulsion.”

At one time a certain monk, intending to steal, took a mango belonging to the Sangha... a rose-apple... a bread-fruit... a jack-fruit

\(^1\) Brahmali: Offered in the sense that a non-monk gave them the fruit, not in the sense that the owners actually gave it away. This was presumably to avoid falling into pācittiya 40 for eating food that has not been properly given.
... a palm-fruit ... a sugar-cane ... intending to steal, took a timbarūka fruit belonging to the Sangha. He became anxious ... “... expulsion.”

At one time a certain monk went to a flower-garden and, intending to steal, took a flower worth five māsakas that had already been plucked. He became anxious. ... “... expulsion.”

At one time a certain monk went to a flower-garden and, intending to steal, picked a flower worth five māsakas and took it away. He became anxious ... “... expulsion.”

At one time, as he was going to the village, a certain monk said to another monk, “Friend, I can take a message¹² to the family that supports you.” He went there and brought back a robe that he used it himself. The other monk, finding out about this, reprimanded him, saying, “You are no longer a recluse.” He became anxious ... “Monk, there is no offence entailing expulsion. But, monks, you should not say, ‘I can take a message.’ If one does, there is an offence of bad conduct.”

At one time a certain monk was going to the village. Another monk said to him, “Friend, please take a message to the family that supports me.” He went there and brought back a pair of robes. He used one himself and gave the other to the other monk. The other monk, finding out about this, reprimanded him, saying, “You are no longer a recluse.” He became anxious ... “Monk, there is no offence

¹ BRAHMALI: Vutto vajjemī, literally “I, spoken to (by you), could say.” It is not clear exactly what this means and it is possible that it simply refers to the conveying of greetings.
² Vutto vajjemī ti. Vin-a 382 says that this means, “being spoken to by you, I speak on your behalf.” Hence the one who takes the message of greeting will be treated at the house in the same way as is the regular diner there. Thus vutto vadeti means: to greet somebody on the part of somebody. The offence would seem to lie in the substitution of one monk for another. Vin-a 382 implies that it is allowed for one monk to take greetings from another if he is going to ask for something definite.
entailing expulsion. But, monks, you should not say, ‘please take a message.’ If one does, there is an offence of bad conduct.”

At one time, as he was going to the village, a certain monk said to another monk, “Friend, I can take a message to the family that supports you.” He replied, “please do so.” He went there and brought back an āḷhaka measure of ghee, a tulā measure of sugar and a dona measure of husked rice, which he ate by himself. The other monk, finding out about this, reproved him, saying, “You are no longer a recluse.” He became anxious ... “Monk, there is no offence entailing expulsion. But, monks, you should not say, ‘I can take a message;’ nor should you say, ‘please take a message.’ If one does, there is an offence of bad conduct.”

---

¹ See RHYS DAVIDS, Ancient Coins and Measures of Ceylon, p.18–p.20. Vin-a 702 gives a discussion on the āḷhaka, from which it appears that it was a very variable measure: “‘takes half an āḷhaka of grue’ means: takes the gruel made from two nāḷis of uncooked rice according to the Magadha nāḷī. In the Andha Commentary a Magadha nāḷī is said to be thirteen and a half palas (a weight). The nāḷī in use in the Island of Ceylon is larger than the Tamil nāḷī. The small Magadha nāḷī is the right measure. In the Great Commentary it is said that one Sinhalese nāḷī is equal to one and a half of this Magadha nāḷī.” At Snp-a 476 it is said that four patthas make an āḷhaka, reckoning by the Kosala patthas, and that four āḷhaka make a dona. See Ancient Coins and Measures of Ceylon, p.18, and cf. above, BD 1.12, on pattha. This word āḷhaka is the same as that which occurs in the name of one of the games, pattāḷhaka, Vin 3.180, DN i.6, MN i.166. The various Commentaries always explain as paṇṇanāḷika, a nāḷika measure of leaves. Nāḷika = nāḷi. At AN ii.55 = AN ii.337 āḷhaka is used in connection with the “ocean.” It is therefore a liquid as well as a dry measure. It is translated as “gallon” at gs ii.64, and as “pailful” at gs iii.237. At Vin 1.240 it occurs in the compound āḷhakathālikā, translated at Vinaya Texts ii.122, “pint pots.” At AN iii.369 it occurs again in this same compound; translated at gs iii.262, “as big as pipkins,” with commentarial exegesis, n. 6, taṇḍulāḷhakassa bhattapacana-thāḷikā, which seems to mean “a small bowl for cooking food to the extent of an āḷhaka of unboiled rice.” Same compound āḷhakathālikā occurs at Dhp-a iii.370, with variant reading bhattathālikā, as though the bowl of an āḷhaka’s capacity were being identified with a bowl of food. ² Tulā is some kind of measure. At SN ii.236 = AN i.88 Khemā and Up-palavanṇā are called the tulā pamāṇa (measure) of the disciples who are nuns. Tulā at AN-a ii.157 simply seems to mean standard or weight. The Abhidhānappadipikā § 481 (a late work), says that a tulā is a hundred palas.
At one time a certain man, carrying a valuable jewel, was going along a main road together with a certain monk. Then the man, seeing a customs station, put the jewel into the monk’s bag without his knowing it. Having gone past the customs station, he retrieved it. The monk was remorseful ...

“Monk, what was your intention?”
“I did not know, Master.”
“There is no offence, monk, for who does not know.”

At one time a certain man, taking a valuable jewel ... seeing a customs station, he pretended to be ill and gave his own bag to the monk. When the man had passed the customs station, he said to the monk, “Give me my bag, bhante, I am not ill.”

“Why then, friend, did you say so?”
Then the man informed the monk. He became anxious ... “There is no offence, monk, for who does not know.”

At one time a certain monk was going along a main road together with a caravan. A certain man won that monk over with a gift. Seeing a customs station, he gave the monk a valuable jewel, saying, “Bhante, please take this jewel past the customs.” So the monk took the jewel past the customs station. He became anxious ... “... expulsion.”

At one time a certain monk out of compassion released a pig trapped in a snare. He became anxious ...

“What was your intention, monk?”
“I was motivated by compassion, Master.”
“There is no offence for one who is motivated by compassion.”

At one time a certain monk released a pig trapped in a snare,

¹ āmisena upalāpetvā, literally cajoling with a reward. ² Literally, “I am one who has a sense of compassion.”
intending to steal it, thinking, “lest the owners see it.” He became anxious ... “... expulsion.”

At one time a certain monk out of compassion released a deer trapped in a snare ... released a deer trapped in a snare, intending to steal it, thinking, “lest the owners see it.” ... out of compassion released fish trapped in a fish-net ... released fish trapped in a fish-net, intending to steal them, thinking, “lest the owners see them.” He became anxious ... “... expulsion.”

At one time a certain monk, seeing some goods in a vehicle, thought, “If I take these from here I will be expelled.” So he took them by setting the vehicle in motion. He became anxious ... “... expulsion.”

At one time a certain monk, thinking, “I will give it to the owners,” seized a piece of flesh taken up by a hawk. The owners reprimanded that monk, saying, “You are no longer a recluse.” He became anxious ... “There is no offence, monk, for one who does not intend to steal.”

At one time a certain monk, intending to steal and thinking, “lest the owners see it,” seized a piece of flesh taken up by a hawk. The owners reprimanded the monk, saying, “You are no longer a recluse.” He became anxious ... “... expulsion.”

At one time some men who had put a raft together placed it on the river Aciravati.¹ When the bindings were destroyed, they went away, the sticks being spread all over. Some monks, perceiving them as discarded, got them out of the water. The owners reprimanded those monks, saying, “You are no longer recluses.” They became anxious ... “Monks, there is no offence for one who perceives them as discarded.”

¹ B.C. Law, Geography of Early Buddhism, p. 36: “Aciravati is the river Rapti in Oudh, on which the town of Sāvatthī was situated.”
At one time some men who had put a raft together placed it on the river Aciravatī. When the bindings were destroyed, they went away, the sticks being spread all over. Some monks, intending to steal and thinking, “lest the owners see it,” got them out of the water. The owners reprimanded the monks, saying, “You are no longer recluse.” They became anxious ... “You, monks, have fallen into an offence entailing expulsion.”

At one time a certain cowherd, hanging his robe on a tree, went to relieve himself. A certain monk, thinking it was discarded, took it. Then the cowherd reprimanded that monk, saying, “You are no longer a recluse.” He became anxious ... “There is no offence, monk, for one who thinks it is discarded.”

At one time, as a certain monk was crossing a river, a robe that had escaped from the hands of dyers, stuck to his foot. The monk took hold of it, thinking, “I will give it to the owners.” The owners reprimanded that monk, saying, “You are no longer a recluse.” He became anxious ... “There is no offence, monk, for one who does not intend to steal.”

At one time, as a certain monk was crossing a river, a robe that had escaped from the hands of dyers stuck to his foot. The monk took hold of it, intending to steal and thinking, “lest the owners see it.” The owners reprimanded the monk, saying, “You are no longer a recluse.” He became anxious ... “... expulsion.”

At one time a certain monk, seeing a pot of ghee, ate it little by little. He became anxious ... “Monk, there is no offence entailing expulsion, but there is an offence of bad conduct.”
At one time a number of monks, having made an arrangement, went away, thinking, “we will steal these goods.” One of them stole the goods. The others said, “We are not expelled; the one who took it is expelled.” They informed the Master. He said, “You, monks, have fallen into an offence entailing expulsion.”

At one time a number of monks, having made an arrangement and having stolen some goods, shared them out. When it was being shared out, none of them received a share that amounted to five māsakas. They said, “We are not expelled.” They informed the Master. He said, “You, monks, have fallen into an offence entailing expulsion.”

At one time, when Sāvatthī was short of food, a certain monk, intending to steal, took a handful of rice belonging to a shopkeeper. He became anxious ... “... expulsion.”

At one time, when Sāvatthī was short of food, a certain monk, intending to steal, took a handful of kidney-beans ... a handful of beans ... a handful of sesamum belonging to a shopkeeper. He became anxious ... “... expulsion.”

At one time thieves in the Dark Wood near Sāvatthī, having killed a cow, eaten some flesh and put the remainder aside, went away. Some monks, perceiving it as discarded, had it offered and ate it. The thieves reprimanded those monks, saying, “You are no longer recluses.” They became anxious ... “There is no offence, monks, for one who perceives it as discarded.”

At one time thieves in the Dark Wood near Sāvatthī, having killed a pig ... “... for one who perceives it as discarded.”
At one time a certain monk went to a meadow and, intending to steal, took some cut grass worth five māsakas. He became anxious ...

“... expulsion.”

At one time a certain monk went to a meadow and, intending to steal, cut grass worth five māsakas and took it away. He became anxious ...

“... expulsion.”

At one time some visiting monks divided up the mangoes belonging to the Sangha and ate them. The resident monks reprimanded those monks, saying, “You are no longer recluses.” They became anxious. They informed the Master.

“What was your intention, monks?”

“We thought they was meant for eating, Master.”

“There is no offence, monks, for one who thinks it is meant for eating.”

At one time some visiting monks divided up the rose-apples belonging to the Sangha ... the bread-fruit belonging to the Sangha ... the jack-fruit ... the palm fruits ... the sugar-cane ... the timbarūsaka fruits belonging to the Sangha and ate them. The resident monks ... “There is no offence, monks, for one who thinks it is meant for eating.”

At one time the keepers of a mango-grove gave a mango to some monks. The monks, thinking, “They have the authority to guard, but not to give,” had scruples and did not accept it. They informed the Master. He said, “There is no offence, monks, when it is a gift from a guardian.”

¹ saṁvidahitvā, also above, Bu-Pj 2.4.29, where the rule is laid down. ¹ Āvāsika.

² Issara.
At one time keepers of a rose-apple grove ... a timbarūsaka grove gave timbarūsaka fruit to some monks. The monks, thinking, “they have the authority to guard ...” ... “There is no offence, monks, when it is a gift from a guardian.”

At one time a certain monk, having borrowed a piece of wood belonging to the Sangha, used it to shore up the wall of his own dwelling. The monks reprimanded that monk, saying, “You are no longer a recluse.” He became anxious and informed the Master. He said, “monk, what was your intention?”

“I was borrowing it, Master.”

“There is no offence, monk, when one is borrowing.”¹

At one time a certain monk, intending to steal, took water belonging to the Sangha ... clay belonging to the Sangha ... intending to steal, took a pile of tiṇa-grass belonging to the Sangha. He became anxious ... “... expulsion.”

At one time a certain monk, intending to steal, set fire to a pile of tiṇa-grass belonging to the Sangha. He became anxious ... “There is no offence entailing expulsion, but there is an offence of bad conduct.”²

At one time a certain monk, intending to steal, took a bed belonging to the Sangha. He became anxious ... “... expulsion.”

At one time a certain monk, intending to steal, took a bench belonging to the Sangha ... took a cushion ... a pillow ... a door ... a window³ ... intending to steal, took a rafter⁴ belonging to the Sangha. He became anxious ... “... expulsion.”

¹ Cf. below, BD 1.110. ² BRAHMALI: Because it was not moved from its base, says the Commentary; see Vin-a 2.389,25. ³ ālokasandhi, cf. Vin 1.48; Vin 2.209 = Vin 2.218. ⁴ gopanāsi, cf. AN i.261; MN i.86.
At one time the furnishings and requisites for a dwelling\(^1\) belonging to a certain lay follower\(^2\) were used elsewhere by some monks. That lay-follower became vexed, annoyed and angry, and said, “how can those venerables use elsewhere requisites belonging somewhere else?” They informed the Master. “Monks, one should not use elsewhere requisites belonging somewhere else. If one does, there is an offence of bad conduct.”

---

At one time some monks, having scruples about taking requisites\(^3\) to the uposatha hall or to a meeting place, sat down on the ground. Their limbs and robes were covered with dust. They informed the Master.\(^4\) “Monks, I allow you to borrow.”\(^5\)

---

At one time at Campā\(^6\) a nun who was a pupil of the nun Thullanandā went to the family who supported the nun Thullanandā and said, “The lady\(^7\) wants to drink\(^8\) rice-gruel containing the three pungent ingredients.”\(^9\) When it was ready, she took it away and enjoyed

---

\(^1\) Vihāraparibhoga. See Vin 2.174.
\(^2\) Thus he could not give them to senior monks coming in, Vin-a 391.
\(^3\) Vin-a 390, a couch or chair.
\(^4\) Part of the story seems to be omitted.
\(^5\) = Vin 2.174. See also above, BD 1.109. Tāvalālika, translated at Vinaya Texts iii.217 as “for a certain time only”; and at Dialogues of the Buddha ii.195 = Buddhist Suttas, second edition, p.241 (translation of Ja i.393), as “only for a time … as temporary” (word occurring twice). At Vinaya Texts ii.154, n. 7, editor says tāvakālika means “only for a time, temporary, on loan,” and translates it by “on loan” at Vinaya Texts ii.347 (= Vin 2.174). At Ja i.121 the word is used of a cart taken on hire. Cf. Vin 4.286, when it is not considered an offence to give recluses robes temporarily.

\(^6\) The ancient capital of Āṅga.
\(^7\) Ayyā.
\(^8\) Pātuṁ, infinitive of pivati, balanced by khādituṁ in the next story.
\(^9\) Tekaṭulayāgu. Vin-a 391 says “made with either tila (sesamum), taṇḍula (rice-grain), mugga (kidney-beans), or tila, taṇḍula, and māsa (a bean), or tila, taṇḍula and kulattha (a kind of vetch), or any one prepared grain with tila and taṇḍula, making three (ingredients).” Cf. above, BD 1.83, n. 4. The word tekaṭulayāgu also occurs at Vin 1.210, where Gotama is said to make this gruel of tila, taṇḍula and mugga. Editor at Vinaya Texts ii.68, n. 2, says kaṭu means pungent, and that these three substances are explained to be ginger and two kinds of pepper. Apparently the gruel could be made of three kinds of grain and flavoured with three spices. But Vin-a 391 says: “It is said that they make this (gruel) mixing these three (prepared grains) in milk and four parts of water and adding ghee, honey and molasses.”
it herself. When the nun Thullananadā found out about this, she reprimanded her, saying, “You are no longer a recluse.” She became anxious. She then informed the nuns, who in turn informed the monks, who then informed the Master. “Monks, there is no offence entailing expulsion, but in a deliberate lie there is an offence entailing confession.”

________________________

At one time in Rājagaha a nun who was a pupil of the nun Thullananandā went to the family who supported the nun Thullananandā and said, “The lady¹ wants to eat a honey-ball.”² When it was ready, she took it away and enjoyed it herself. When the nun Thullananandā found out about this, she ... “Monks, there is no offence entailing expulsion, but in a deliberate lie there is an offence entailing confession.”

________________________

At one time in Vesāli the householder who was the supporter of Venerable Ajjuka had two children living with him, a son and a nephew. That householder said to Venerable Ajjuka, “Bhante, please point out this location³ to the one of these two boys who has faith and confidence.”

At that time the householder’s nephew had faith and confidence, and so Venerable Ajjuka pointed out that location to him. He then established a household with that wealth and made a gift. Then the householder’s son said to Venerable Ānanda:

“Bhante Ānanda, who is the father’s heir, the son or the nephew?”

“The son, friend, is the father’s heir.”

“Bhante, this master Ajjuka has pointed out our wealth to our cohabitant.”

“Friend, Venerable Ajjuka is no longer a recluse.” Then Venerable Ajjuka said to Venerable Ānanda:

“Friend Ānanda, please investigate.” At that time Venerable Upāli⁴ was siding with Venerable Ajjuka. Then Venerable Upāli said to

¹ Ayyā. ² Madhugolaka. Pali-English Dictionary gives only one reference to golaka at Thig-a 255; and under kilā-golaka to Vism 256 (cf. Khp-a 53). Vin-a 391 defines madhugolaka as atirasapūva, which seems to mean a “very tasty cake.” ³ Okāsa. ⁴ See above, BD 1.60, n. 4.
Venerable Ānanda:

“Friend Ānanda, when one is asked by the owner to point out a location to so-and-so, and one does so, what offence has one committed?”

“Bhante, one has not committed any offence, not even one of bad conduct.”

“Friend, Venerable Ajjuka was asked by the owner to point out a location to so-and-so, and he did so. Friend, there is no offence for Venerable Ajjuka.”

Now at that time in Benares the family that supported Venerable Pilindavaccha¹ was oppressed by thieves, and two children were kidnapped. Venerable Pilindavaccha having bought these children back by his psychic power placed them in a large house. People saw those children and said:

“This is the majesty of the psychic power of master Pilindavaccha,” and they placed confidence in Venerable Pilindavaccha. The monks became vexed, annoyed and angry, and said, “How can this Venerable Pilindavaccha bring back children who have been kidnapped by thieves?” They informed the Master. He said: “Monks, there is no offence in the area of psychic powers for one who possesses them.”

At one time the two monks Paṇḍaka and Kapila² were friends. One lived in a village and one at Kosambi. Then, while the first monk was going from the village to Kosambi, as he was crossing a river, a lump of fat that had escaped from the hands of pork-butchers stuck

¹ Vin 1.206ff. = Vin 3.248ff. recounts the feats he did by his mystic potency in Rājagaha when Bimbisāra was King of Magadha. At AN i.24 he is called “chief among the disciples who are dear and delightful to the devas.” At Ud 28 objections are raised to his “foul talk.” I think he is probably the same as the Pilinda-Vaccha of Theragāthā; see Psalms of the Bretheren ix and Psalms of the Bretheren p.14, n. 4; Psalms of the Bretheren p.15, n. 2. We learn from Commentary on Theragāthā that Pilinda was his name, Vaccha the name of his clan (cf. Vana-Vaccha, Psalms of the Bretheren xiii), and that he was waited on by a deva and acquired the Gandhāra charm. For this, see DN i.213; JA iv.498.

² Mentioned, I think, nowhere but here. Naturally not the Kapila to whom MN-a i.91 refers as the depraved monk (cf. Vin 3.107), reborn with his saṅghāṭi-robe flaming.
to his foot. He took hold of it, thinking, “I will give it to the owners.” The owners reprimanded him, saying, “You are no longer a recluse.”

Then a woman cowherd who had seen him crossing said, “Come, bhante, have sexual intercourse.” Thinking, “I am no longer a recluse,” he had sexual intercourse with her.

When he arrived in Kosambi, he informed the monks and they informed the Master. He said, “Monks, there is no offence entailing expulsion for stealing,¹ but there is an offence entailing expulsion for having sexual intercourse.”

Now at that time at Sāgalā,² a monk who was the disciple of Venerable Daḷhika, being tormented by discontent,³ took a turban⁴ from a shopkeeper. He then said to Venerable Daḷhika, “Bhante, I am no longer a recluse, I will leave the Sangha.”⁵

“But what have you done, friend?” He told him. Having had the turban brought, Venerable Daḷhika valued it, and it was not worth five māsakas. “Friend, there is no offence entailing expulsion,” and

¹ For he did not intend to steal it. ² See Mil p. 1, for description of a city of this name. A Sāgalā, capital of the kingdom of the Maddas, is mentioned at Ja iv.230; Ja v.283, Ja v.285, Ja v.289f.; Ja vi.471. ³ (This footnote proved troublesome to typeset due to its length, so it has been moved to an appendix with other long notes on page 2972.) ⁴ Veṭhana, possibly a wrap or a cloak, as at Ja vi.12, taken as a disguise. A wrap to put over the “yellow robes” would have been a better disguise than a turban, but could a wrap possibly have been worth less than five māsakas? A turban, on the other hand, would have hidden the shaven head, but that is all. Perhaps it was meant symbolically. ⁵ Vibbhamissāmi. On those occasions when anabhīrati is in connection with sexual desire, it would look as if vibbhamissāmi should then be translated, “I will co-habit,” and not as “I will leave the Order.” But except for the occurrence anabhīrati in the above story, I see doubtful justification for such a rendering of vibbhamissāmi here. For the point of the story is that the monk has taken something worth less than five māsakas, which does not rank as a theft. However, we must remember that in the preceding story the offence is shown to be that of sexual intercourse, and not that of taking what was not given. Something of the same sort may have been here originally, but left out by a redactor.
he gave a talk on the Dhamma. That monk was delighted.¹

The second offence entailing expulsion is finished

¹ abhirami, aorist of abhiramati. I cannot help thinking that this word in this rather curious ending of the second Pārājika is meant to balance the an-abhirati with which this story began. Abhiramati and abhirati both derive from abhi + ram. It is most rare to find it said that a monk, when told that there is for him no offence, “was delighted,” and I more than ever believe that there are omissions in the text as we have it. I do not believe that the monk “was delighted” that he had committed no offence. I believe that in his appropriated veṭhana, he enjoyed himself (a meaning of abhiramati), or even fell in love (another meaning, cf. Snp 718, Snp 1085), which would balance the anabhirati of the opening sentence. I think, in fact, that this story was meant to end up in exactly the same way as the preceding one. But as the material for this is wanting, I have left the phrase as “was delighted.”
At one time the Buddha, the Master, was staying at Vesālī in the hall with the peaked roof in the Great Wood. At that time the Master talked in many ways to the monks on the subject of unattractiveness,¹ he spoke in praise of unattractiveness, he spoke in praise of developing (the perception of) unattractiveness,² he spoke thus and thus³ he spoke in many ways in praise of the attainment of unattractiveness.⁴ Then the Master addressed the monks:

“Monks, I wish to go into solitary retreat for half a month. No one is to approach me except the one who brings me almsfood.”⁵

“Yes, Master,” the monks replied, and accordingly no one approached the Master except the one to take him almsfood.

Then the monks thought, “The Master has talked in many ways on the subject of unattractiveness,” and they dwelt intent upon the practice of developing (the perception of) unattractiveness in its many different aspects. As a consequence they became troubled by their own bodies, ¹ ashamed of them, loathing them. Just as a young woman or man, fond of adornments ² and with head washed, ³ would be ashamed, humiliated and disgusted if the carcase of a snake, a dog or a man were hung around their neck, just so those monks were troubled by their own bodies, ashamed of them and loathed them. They took their own lives, ⁴ took the lives of one another, and they approached Migalāṇḍika, ⁵ a sham recluse, ⁶ the recluse lookalike, and said, “Friend, please kill us. This bowl and robe will be yours.” Then Migalāṇḍika, hired ⁷ for a bowl and robe, killed a number of monks.

¹ Vin-a 393f. Cf. Buddhist Psychological Ethics, 2nd edition, p. 63, n. 2. ² asubhabhāvanā, Vin-a 394 says, avatassa cittassa bhāvanā vaḍḍhanā phātikammaṁ, and goes on to say that the monk intent upon the impure attains the first musing, and then making insight to grow, he reaches the highest goal (uttamattha), arahantship. ³ ādissa ādissa, explained at Vin-a 394: evam pi ittham piti punappuna vavatthānaṁ katvā. ⁴ BRAHMALI: According to the commentary, Vin-a ii.396,18, this refers to the state where the mind no longer inclines towards sexuality. ⁵ As at Sn v.320, where the subject of asubha, the impure or “the unlovely,” also occurs, but with some omissions and variations.

He then took his blood-stained knife to the river Vaggumudā, ⁸ and while he was washing it he became anxious and remorseful: “Indeed, it’s a loss for me, it’s no gain; indeed, it’s badly gained by me, not well-gained. I have made much demerit because I have killed

¹ sakena kāyena, translated at KS v.284 “as to this body.” ² = DN i.80 = Vin 2.255 = MN ii.19; this simile omitted at SN v.320. ³ Vin-a 399, “washed, together with the head.” ⁴ attanāpi attānaṁ jīvitā voropenti. Vin-a 399 says, “like that man, having no desire for the carcase, the monks being desirous of quitting (pariccajati) their own bodies, taking the knife attanā pi... voropenti.” This is probably a way of saying that they committed suicide, cf. SN v.320, satthahārakaṁ parijesanti ... satthaṁ āharanti. Or the phrase might possibly mean that “the self deprives the Self of life”—i.e., there may be some notion lingering on from the Upaniṣad philosophy that this kind of slaying affects the Ātman, the All-Real, the Self. Some other attā couples of sayings occur in the Aṅguttara Nikāya—e.g., at AN i.57, AN i.149; AN iv.405; AN v.182, and at SN ii.68, and seem to have this implication. ⁵ Vin-a 399 calls him Migaladdhika, with variant reading as in the text. He is not mentioned at SN v.320, nor as far as I know at any other passage. ⁶ Vin-a 399, samaṇakuttaka = samaṇavesadhāraka, one who wears a recluse’s dress. “Having shaved his head and put on one yellow robe and another over his shoulder, depending on the vihāra, he lived on a substance of broken-meats.” ⁷ bhaṭa, Commentary is silent. If bhaṭa means soldier, cf. Sacred Books of the East translation of Mil 234, Mil 240, the sense would be that he hit about him with a knife, and perhaps stifled the monks with his robe. But bhaṭa can also mean “hireling, servant.” There seems to be no verb in Pali of which it is the past participle. It is connected with the Epic and Classical Sanskrit bhaṭa, which is connected with bhṛta. Monier Williams, Sanskrit-English Dictionary, gives for this: “hired, kept in pay, paid; possessed of, endowed with, having earned, acquired, gained ...” ⁸ Vin-a 399 says, “a river considered by people to be lovely (vaggu-matā, mata from maññati), renowned for merit. He went there saying, ‘There I will wash away this evil.’” monks who were virtuous and of good conduct.”

Then a certain god\(^1\) of Māra’s retinue, walking across the water,\(^2\) said to Migalaṇḍika, “Well done, superior man;\(^3\) it is a gain for you, it is well-gained. You have made much merit, because you bring those across who have not yet crossed.”\(^4\)

Then Migalaṇḍika thought, “So it seems it is a gain for me, that it is well-gained by me, and that I have made much merit by bringing those across who have not yet crossed.” He then went from dwelling to dwelling, from dormitory to dormitory,\(^5\) and said, “Who has not yet crossed? Whom do I bring across?” And those monks\(^6\) who were not free from desire became fearful and terrified,¹ with their hair standing on end, but not so those who were free from desire. Then Migalaṇḍikā killed a monk, on a single day he killed two monks, on a single day ... three ... four ... five ... ten ... twenty ... thirty ... forty ... fifty ... on a single day he killed sixty monks.

\(^1\) Vin-a 400 says, “not a well-known earth-devatā, a holder of false views, on the side of Māra, taking Māra’s part.” \(^2\) abhijjamāne udake gantvā. Vin-a 400 says, “coming as though walking on the earth’s surface.” This power of walking on the water is one of the forms of iddhi, see DN i.78. Bhijjamāna is present participle of bhijjati, passive of bhindati + a, not being broken, or divided, therefore firm, unruffled, undivided, unbroken, undisturbed. But the reading at DN i.78 = AN i.170 is udake pi abhijjamāno gacchati, he goes on the water without breaking it (Dialogues of the Buddha i.88 and cf. AN i.255), but this loses the passive aspect of the verb. At DN i.212 we get udake abhijjamānaṁ gacchantāṁ. However at MN i.34 = MN i.494 the reading is (as at Vin 3 above) udake pi abhijjamāne, translated Further Dialogues of the Buddha i.24, “on the water’s unbroken surface.” Thus, there is a good deal of variation in the reading of abhijjā°. See Ps.2.208 which reads “māne, and says that as ordinary people walk on the earth, so the psychic person (iddhimā) walks on the unbroken water, having first reflected on it. Vism 396, in explaining how by will-power such a person transforms the water to earth, quotes this Paṭisambhidā-magga passage. \(^3\) sappurisa. On prefix sa- see GS i.ix. \(^4\) atīṇṭhe tāresi, Vin-a 401, “You free them from saṁsāra … those who are not dead are not freed from saṁsāra, those who are dead are freed.” Tarati, to cross, was frequently used in connection with ogha, the flood, mahogha, the great flood. The flood was later broken up into four floods, which became identified with the four āsavas. But the commentarial exegesis, as above, which is not rare, shows the view that to be across was to be across nothing more nor less than saṁsāra, the round of death and rebirth. This is what, in the monkish outlook of the commentator, it was highly desirable to stop. Cf. Snp 571, tiṇṇo tāres’ imaṁ pajaṁ. \(^5\) = Vin 1.216 = Vin 1.247. On parīvēna, cell, see Vinaya Texts iii.109, n. 3, where editor says that it is here doubtless a cell used as a cooling room, after the steam bath. But at Vinaya Texts iii.203 editor takes parīvēna to mean “a number of buildings,” in n.1 saying that “here it evidently included several vihāras.” \(^6\) Tasmiṁ samaye.

At the end of that half-month, the Master arose from seclusion and addressed Venerable Ānanda: “Ānanda, why is the Sangha of monks so diminished?”

“It is because the Master talked to the monks in many ways on the subject of unattractiveness—he spoke in praise of unattractiveness, in praise of developing (the perception of) unattractiveness, and in many ways in praise of the attainment of unattractiveness. And, Master, those monks thought, ‘The Master has talked in many ways on the subject of unattractiveness,’ and so they dwelt intent upon the practice of developing (the perception of) unattractiveness in its many different aspects. As a consequence they became troubled by their own bodies, ashamed of them, loathing them. Just as a young woman or man, fond of adornments and with head washed, would be ashamed, humiliated and disgusted if the carcase of a snake, a dog or a man were hung around their neck, just so these monks were troubled by their own bodies, ashamed of them, loathing them. They then took their own lives, took the lives of each other, and they approached Migalaṇḍikā, the recluse lookalike, and said, ‘Friend, please kill us. This bowl and robe will be yours.’ Then, Master, hired for a bowl and robe, Migalaṇḍikā killed a monk ... on a single day he killed sixty monks. Master, please give another instruction² for the

---

¹ Chambhitatta. Cf. DN i.49. Pali-English Dictionary says that here DN-a i.50 wrongly explains it by sakala-sarīra-calanaṁ. Vin-a 401 reads, “beginning with the flesh of the heart, the body trembled (sarīracalanaṁ)”; it speaks of those being devoid of passion as being khīṇāsava. It also gives thambhitatta as a synonym of chambhitatta. Pali-English Dictionary says that this meaning of thambhitatta as fluctuation, unsteadiness, is late, and is caused by misinterpretation of chambhitatta.
² Pariyāya. Vin-a 402 explains it by kammaṭṭhāna, basis for meditation.
Sangha of monks to be established in final knowledge.”¹

“Well then, Ānanda, call together in the assembly-hall all the monks that dwell near Vesālī.”

“Yes, Master,” he said. And when he had done so, he approached the Master and said, “Master, the Sangha of monks is assembled. Master, please do what you think² is appropriate.”

Then the Master went to the assembly-hall, sat down on the prepared seat, and said:

“Monks,³ the samādhi by mindfulness of breathing, when developed and cultivated,⁴ is peaceful and sublime,⁵ an exalted state of happiness, and it stops and settles bad, unwholesome qualities on the spot,⁶ whenever they arise. Just as a big storm, when it arises out of season⁷ in the last month of the hot weather,⁸ stops and settles the dust and dirt in the atmosphere—even so the samādhi by mindfulness of breathing, when developed and cultivated, is peaceful and sublime, an exalted state of happiness, and it stops and settles bad, unwholesome qualities on the spot, whenever they arise. And how is the samādhi by mindfulness of breathing developed and cultivated in this way?

As to that, monks, a monk sits down in the wilderness, at the foot of a tree, or in an empty hut; he crosses his legs, straightens his body, and establishes mindfulness in front of him.⁹ Simply mindful, he breathes in;\(^1\) simply mindful, he breathes out. When he breathes in long, he knows it; and when he breathes out long, he knows that. When he breathes in short, he knows it; and when he breathes out short, he knows that. While breathing in, he trains\(^2\) in having the full experience (of the breath); while breathing out, he trains in having the full experience (of the breath). While breathing in, he trains in calming the activity of the body\(^3\); while breathing out, he trains in calming the activity of the body. While breathing in, he trains in experiencing rapture; while breathing out, he trains in experiencing rapture. While breathing in, he trains in experiencing happiness; while breathing out, he trains in experiencing happiness. While breathing in, he trains in experiencing the activity of the mind; while breathing out, he trains in experiencing the activity of the mind. While breathing in, he trains in calming the activity of the mind; while breathing out, he trains in calming the activity of the mind. While breathing in, he trains in gladdening the mind; while breathing out, he trains in gladdening the mind. While breathing in, he trains in unifying the mind; while breathing out, he trains in unifying the mind. While breathing in, he trains in contemplating impermanence; while breathing out, he trains in contemplating impermanence. While breathing in, he trains in contemplating fading away; while breathing out, he trains in contemplating fading away. While breathing in, he trains in contemplating cessation; while breathing out, he trains in contemplating cessation. While breathing in, he trains in contemplating relinquishment; while breathing out, he trains in contemplating relinquishment.

Monks, when the samādhi by mindfulness of breathing is developed and cultivated in this way, it is peaceful and sublime, an exalted

\(^1\) Cf. DN ii.291 = MN i.56 for this passage, also MN iii.82, MN iii.89, and Ps.i.177, quoted Vism 272. \(^2\) Sikkhāti, Vin-a 411, ghaṭati vāyamati, and goes on to say he trains himself in the three trainings: the higher morality, the higher thought, the higher wisdom. \(^3\) Brahmalī: That is, the breath.
state of happiness, and it stops and settles bad, unwholesome qualities on the spot, whenever they arise."

And in this connection the Master convened the Sangha of monks and questioned the monks:

"Monks, is it true that some monks have taken their own lives, have killed one another, and have said to Migalaṇḍika, ‘Friend, please kill us. This bowl and robe will be yours’?"

"It is true, Master."

The Buddha, the Master, rebuked them: “Monks, it is not suitable for these monks, it is not becoming, it is not proper, it is not worthy of a recluse, it is not allowable, it should not be done. How could those monks take their own lives ... and say ... ‘ ... This bowl and robe will be yours’? It will not give rise to confidence in those without it ... And, monks, this training rule should be recited thus:

Preliminary ruling

If a monk intentionally kills a human being or searches for someone to kill him, he too is expelled and not in communion.”

Thus the Master laid down this training rule for the monks

Second sub-story

At one time a certain lay-follower was ill. His wife was beautiful and pleasant, and the group of six monks had fallen in love with her. Then those monks said to each other: “Friends, if this lay-follower lives, we won’t get this woman. Come, let us praise the beauty of death to him.” So they went to that lay follower and said:

“Friend, you have done what is good¹ and wholesome; you have made a shelter from fear.² You have not done anything bad; you have not been greedy and immoral. What need have you of this wretched,

¹ Cf. AN ii.174, AN ii.175; It p.25. ² katabhūrtatāna, Vin-a 436 says that he has gained protection against the dread beings have at the time of dying, possibly by means of a charm (parittā) as is suggested by the Commentary on AN ii.174.
difficult life? Death is better for you than life. When you have passed away, at the breaking up of the body after death, you will be reborn in a happy destination, in a heaven world.¹ There² you will amuse yourself and enjoy the five types of heavenly sensual pleasures.”³

Then that lay-follower thought, “The Masters have spoken the truth, for I have done what is good and avoided what is bad, and after death I will be reborn in a happy destination.”

He ate various types of detrimental food, he drank detrimental drinks,⁴ and because of this he became seriously ill⁵ and died.

His wife criticised and denounced them: “These recluses, the sons of the Sakyan,⁶ are shameless, immoral, liars. They claim to be followers of dhamma, of just conduct, committed to the spiritual life, speakers of truth, virtuous, of good conduct. But there is no recluseship or brahminhood among these—it is lost to them. Where is recluseship and brahminhood among them? They have departed from it. They praised the beauty of death to my husband. Because of them my husband has died.”

And other people criticised and denounced them: “These recluses ... Because of them that lay-follower has died.

Monks heard the criticism of those people. Those monks who had few desires and a sense of shame, who were contented, scrupulous, and desirous of training, criticised and denounced the group of six monks: “How could they praise the beauty of death to that lay-follower?” Then those monks informed the Master ...

“Is it true, monks, that you praised the beauty of death to that lay-follower?”

“It is true, Master.”

The Buddha, the Master, rebuked them: “Foolish men, it is not

---

¹ J. PRZYLUSKI, Le Concile de Rājagṛha, p. 368, where he says that in the oldest (Buddhist) period svarga (Pali, sagga) and brahmaloka are synonymous terms. This seems here borne out by next sentence in text. It has been suggested, and confuted by J. PRZYLUSKI, Le Concile de Rājagṛha, p. 371, that Asoka spoke only of svarga, and not of nirvāṇa, because he addressed the laity, and not monks. ² I.e., in a deva-world, Vin-8 436. ³ Cf. AN v.273. ⁴ Cf. Vin 1.44 for these four items. ⁵ Kharo ābādho uppaṃjī = DN ii.127. ⁶ As below, BD 1.200, BD 1.223.
suitable, it is not becoming, it is not proper, it is not worthy of a recluse, it is not allowable, it should not be done. How could you praise the beauty of death to that lay-follower? This will not give rise to confidence in those without it ... And so, monks, this training rule should be recited thus:

Final ruling

“If a monk intentionally kills a human being or searches for someone to kill him¹ or praises death or incites someone to die, saying, ‘Good man, what use to you is this wretched, difficult life? Death is better for you than life.’ If, thinking² and intending³ thus, he praises death in various ways or incites someone to die, he too is expelled and not in communion.”

Definitions

A means: whoever, of such kind ...

Monk means: ... this sort of monk is meant in this case.

Intentionally means: knowing, perceiving, having intended,⁴ having come to a conclusion, he transgresses.

Human being⁵ means: from the mind’s first arising,⁶ from the

---

¹ satthahārakam vāssa pariyeseyya. For lack of any better interpretation, explanation of Vin-a 441 is followed here. Cf. SN iv. 62; MN iii.269. ² iticittamano, so the mind and thought; Vin-a 442 says, “so the mind, (or heart, citta), so the thought; ‘death is better for you than life’ here means: the mind set on death, thought set on death, wherefore thought is called the illustration of mind. From this meaning the two are as if one, therefore, no division is to be seen; as the mind so the thought, as the thought so the mind.” This last phrase = BD 1.127 below, the old the Commentary on this passage. ³ cittasaṅkappa, intention of mind. On saṅkappa, as a term of “awareness, thought, reflection, purpose,” see Mrs. Rhys Davids, The Birth of Indian Psychology and its Development in Buddhism, p.55ff., p.273ff. ⁴ = Vin 4.290, and = Vin 3.112 in explanation of saṅcetanika. At Vin 2.91 it is said that whatever transgression is committed like this, is called a legal question whether an offence be wrong. ⁵ Manussaviggaha. ⁶ Vin-a 437 paraphrases by paṭhamaiṁ paṭisandhiṁciṁtaṁ, the mind being first reinstated.
time of consciousness becoming first manifest in a mother’s womb, until the time of death—in between these; this is called a human being.

If (he) kills means: he cuts off the faculty of life, brings it to an end, interrupts its duration.

Or searches for someone to kill him means: a knife, a dagger, an arrow, a cudgel, a stone, a sword, poison or a rope.

Or praises death means: he shows the danger in living, and speaks in praise of death.

Or incites someone to die means: he says, “take a sword, or eat poison, or die by hanging yourself with a rope.”

Good man, means: this is a form of address.

What use to you is this wretched, difficult life means: wretched life means: the life of the poor is wretched compared to the life of the rich; the life of the impoverished is wretched compared to the life of the wealthy; the life of humans is wretched compared to the life of gods. Difficult life means: for one whose hands are cut off, for one whose feet are cut off, for one whose hands and feet are cut off, for one whose ears are cut off, for one whose nose is cut off, for one whose ears and nose are cut off. Because of this sort of wretchedness and because of this sort of difficult life, one says, “death is better for you than life.”

Thinking means: mind and thought are equivalent.

Intending means: perceiving death, intending death, aiming at death.

In various ways means: in manifold manners.

If he praises death means: he shows the danger in living and speaks in praise of death, saying, “When you have passed away, at the breaking up of the body after death, you will be reborn in a happy destination, in a heaven world. There you will amuse yourself and enjoy the five types of heavenly sensual pleasures.”

¹ Cf. Vb 123. ² Satthahāraka as we have seen is literally “sword-carrier,” so that this definition probably implies “carrying a knife ... carrying a rope.” Cf. below, BD 1.133, where these items are grouped together under “a trap.” ³ dujjīvita.
If he incites someone to die means: he says, “Take a sword, or eat poison, or die by hanging yourself with a rope; or fall into a lake, into a pit, or off a cliff.”¹

He too means: this is said with reference to the preceding offences entailing expulsion.²

Is expelled means: just as an ordinary stone which has been broken in half cannot be put together again,³ so a monk who has intentionally killed a human being is not a recluse, not a son of the Sakyan⁴—he is therefore called one who is expelled.

Not in communion means: communion means: a common official action, the same recital, the same training—this is called communion. He does not take part in this—he is therefore called not in communion.

Permutations

Summary

Oneself, having resolved,⁵ by a messenger, by a series of messengers, by a messenger who does not follow instructions,⁶ by a messenger gone and returned again.

Not in private, but perceiving it as private; in private, but perceiving it as not private; in private, and perceiving it as private.

He praises by means of the body; he praises by means of speech;

¹ Vin-a 443, papātā ti pabbatantare và thalantare. ² Vin-a 443 says, “like the blame-worthy man who has fallen into defeat, having committed sexual intercourse, and having taken what was not given.”³ This is the only Pārājika where, in the simile, the word abhabba does not occur.⁴ Cf. Vin 1.97, where it is said that a monk who has received the upasampadā ordination should not deprive any living being (pāṇa) of life, even down to an ant or a worm.⁵ Adhiṭṭhāyā. Adhiṭṭhātha or adhiṭṭhahati, adhiṭṭhātā, adhiṭṭheti is a word of wide meaning. Critical Pali Dictionary includes above passage under “to determine, resolve, wish.” Vin-a 445 explains adhiṭṭhahitvā by saṃīpe ṭhatvā. On the “volitional force” of adhiṭṭhāna consult Mrs. Rhys Davids, The Birth of Indian Psychology and its Development in Buddhism, p. 112. Adhiṭṭhita used in connection with robes at Vin 3.196.⁶ Brahmalī: See Vin-a 2.449,28.
he praises by means of both the body and speech; he praises by means of a messenger; he praises by means of a writing.¹

A pit, a piece of furniture,² placing near, medicine, arranging a sight, arranging a sound, arranging a smell, arranging a taste, arranging a touch, arranging dhamma, announcement, instruction, making an arranged action,³ making a sign.

Exposition

Bo-Pj 3.4.2
BD 1.129

Oneself means: one oneself kills by means of the body or by means of something attached to the body or by means of something released.

Having resolved means: having resolved, he tells someone: hit thus, strike thus, kill thus.

By a Messenger

Vin 3.75

If a monk tells a second monk, “Kill so-and-so,” there is an offence of bad conduct. If the second monk kills that person,⁴ thinking he is the one he was told to kill, there is an offence entailing expulsion for both.

If a monk tells a second monk, “kill so-and-so,” there is an offence of bad conduct. If the second monk kills someone else, thinking he is the one he was told to kill, there is no offence for the instigator, but there is an offence entailing expulsion for the murderer.

If a monk tells a second monk ... If the second monk kills that person, thinking it is someone else than the one he was told to kill, there is an offence entailing expulsion for both.

If a monk tells a second monk ... If the second monk kills someone else, thinking it is someone else than the one he was told to kill, there is no offence for the instigator, but there is an offence entailing expulsion for the murderer.

By a Series of Messengers

If a monk tells a second monk, “tell so-and-so to tell so-and-so to kill so-and-so,” there is an offence of bad conduct. In informing the next person, there is an offence of bad conduct. If the (potential) murderer accepts, there is a serious offence for the instigator. If he kills that person, there is an offence entailing expulsion for all of them.

---

¹ Lekhāya. Lekhā means literally a scratching, therefore a writing. See below, BD 1.131, n. 1. ⁲ Apassena. ³ Saṁketakamma. See above, BD 1.88. ⁴ Taṁ.

196

BY A MESSENGER WHO DOES NOT FOLLOW INSTRUCTIONS

If a monk tells a second monk, “tell so-and-so to tell so-and-so to kill so-and-so,” there is an offence of bad conduct. If the second monk tells someone else than the one he was told to tell, there is an offence of bad conduct. If the (potential) murderer accepts, there is an offence of bad conduct. If he kills that person, there is no offence for the instigator, but there is an offence entailing expulsion for the conveyor of the message and for the murderer.

BY A MESSENGER GONE AND RETURNED AGAIN

If a monk tells a second monk, “kill so-and-so,” there is an offence of bad conduct. He goes, but returns, saying, “I was not able to kill him.” If the first monk tells him again, “when you are able, then kill him,” there is an offence of bad conduct. If the second monk kills that person, there is an offence entailing expulsion for both.

If a monk tells a second monk, “kill so-and-so,” there is an offence of bad conduct. He then becomes remorseful, but does not say, “do not kill him.” If the second monk then kills that person, there is an offence entailing expulsion for both.

If a monk tells a second monk, “kill so-and-so,” there is an offence of bad conduct. He then becomes remorseful and says, “do not kill him.” If the second monk replies, “I have been told by you to do so,” and then kills that person, there is no offence for the instigator, but there is an offence entailing expulsion for the murderer.

If a monk tells a second monk ... He then becomes remorseful and says, “do not kill him.” If the second monk replies, “very well,” and desists, there is no offence for either.

Not in private, but perceiving it as private, he says aloud, “if only so-and-so were killed,” there is an offence of bad conduct. In pri- vate, but perceiving it as not private, he says aloud, “if only so-and-so were killed,” there is an offence of bad conduct. Not in private, and perceiving it as not private, he says aloud, “if only so-and-so were killed,” there is an offence of bad conduct. In private, and perceiving it as private, he says aloud, “if only so-and-so were killed,” there is an offence of bad conduct.

He praises by means of the body means: in making a gesture with the body,\(^1\) which effectively says, “Whoever dies thus,\(^2\) receives wealth, fame or goes to heaven,” there is an offence of bad conduct. If, because of that praise, the target person thinks, “I shall die,” and he does what is painful, there is a serious offence.\(^3\) If he dies, there is an offence entailing expulsion.

He praises by means of speech means: in saying, “whoever dies thus ...” ... If he dies, there is an offence entailing expulsion.

He praises by means of the body and speech means: in making a gesture with the body and saying, “whoever dies thus ...” ... If he dies, there is an offence entailing expulsion.

He praises by means of a messenger means: in giving instructions to a messenger, saying, “whoever dies thus, receives wealth, fame or goes to heaven,” there is an offence of bad conduct. If, having heard the messenger’s instruction, the target person thinks, “I shall die,” and he does what is painful, there is a serious offence. If he dies, there is an offence entailing expulsion.

\(^{1}\) Kāyenavikāraṁ karoti (dasseti, Vin-a 452, with variant reading karoti), literally he makes an (expressive) gesture.

\(^{2}\) According to Vin-a 452, by taking a sword or by drinking poison, as at BD 1.127 above.

\(^{3}\) BRAHMALI: That is, the pain that arises as he tries to kill himself.
He praises by means of a writing means: in writing:¹ “Whoever dies thus, receives wealth, fame or goes to heaven,” there is an offence of bad conduct for each character.² If, having seen the writing, the target person thinks, “I shall die,” and he does what is painful, there is a serious offence. If he dies, there is an offence entailing expulsion.

A pit means: in digging a pit for people, thinking, “falling into it someone will die,” there is an offence of bad conduct. If a person falls into it, there is an offence of bad conduct. If, when he has fallen, he experiences pain, there is a serious offence. If he dies, there is an offence entailing expulsion.

In digging a non-specific pit, thinking, “whatever falls in will die,” there is an offence of bad conduct. If a person falls into it, there is an offence of bad conduct. If, when he has fallen, he experiences pain, there is a serious offence. If he dies, there is an offence entailing expulsion.

¹ lekhaṁ chindati, Vin-a 452, “he cuts syllables (akkharaṇī) on a leaf or a book (pot-thake, cf. Sanskrit pustaka). Cf. Ja ii.90, akkharaṇi chinditā, here on a kāṇḍa, a stalk or cane. Lekhaṁ chindati could not therefore here mean “destroys the letter” as Pali-English Dictionary says. Cf. rūpāṇi chindatā at Vin-a 690 in connection with cutting a figure on the wooden māsaka. Lekhā therefore does not necessarily mean writing as we have it today. At Vin 4.7 lekha is one of the three “high crafts” (or occupations, sippa). At Vin 1.77 = Vin 4.128 Upāli’s parents decide against letting him learn lekhā on the grounds that his fingers will become painful. At Vin 4.305 it is said to be no offence for a nun to learn writing (lekhaṁ pariyāpuṇāti). Lekha is the writing, the letter; lekhā the line, the tracing (cf. Ja 6. 56). Vin-a 867 explains by akkharaṇī likhantassa. Cf. Vin-a 739 lekha ti akkharalekha, letters: syllables or letters; see next note for akkha-ra.

² akkharaṇya, or “for the syllables and syllables” so “for each syllable.” Critical Pali Dictionary says that akkha-ra is opposed to pada, word. Akkha-ra seems to be connected with aksara of the Upaniṣads, the Imperishable—perhaps because the letters when engraved could faintly emulate the Imperishable (Veda).
expulsion. If a spirit, ghost or animal in human form\(^1\) falls into it, there is an offence of bad conduct.\(^2\) If, when it has fallen, it experiences pain, there is an offence of bad conduct. If it dies, there is a serious offence. If an animal falls into it, there is an offence of bad conduct. If, when it has fallen, it experiences pain, there is an offence of bad conduct. If it dies, there is an offence entailing confession.\(^3\)

A piece of furniture means: if he places a dagger in a piece of furniture, smears the furniture with poison or makes it weak, or if he places it near a lake, a pit or a cliff, thinking, “falling down, he will die,” there is an offence of bad conduct. If the target person experiences pain on account of the dagger or the poison or the fall, there is a serious offence. If he dies, there is an offence entailing expulsion.

Placing near means: if he places a knife, a dagger, an arrow, a club, a stone, a sword, poison or a rope\(^4\) near him, thinking, “using this he will die,” there is an offence of bad conduct. If the target person thinks, “using that, I shall die,” and he does what is painful, there is a serious offence. If he dies, there is an offence entailing expulsion.

Medicine means: if he gives ghee, butter, oil, honey or molasses,\(^5\) thinking, “having tasted this, he will die,” there is an offence of bad conduct. When the target person tastes it and experiences pain, there

---

\(^1\) Tiracchānagatamanussaviggaha, literally a man taking up the form of one going as an animal. This is obviously meant to be something different from tiracchānagata, going as an animal, just below. The former probably refers to an animal who has the power to put on human form in this life; for this is a belief which existed at that time. Cf. the rule which forbids an animal in human form to be ordained, Vin 1.86, Vin 1.87. The latter, going as an animal, or just an animal, is a fairly forceful expression in connection with the belief in rebirth, meaning that someone is going as an animal in this rebirth.

\(^2\) Vin-a 455 says, “It was dug for a man, (therefore) he is not guilty of the death of yakkhas and so forth who fall into it.” In the Vinaya, yakkhas constantly appear as the denizens of some sphere or other, not far removed from the realm of mankind. The same is true of the petas, or departed ones.

\(^3\) Brahmalī: That is, a pācittiya offence, according to Bu-Pc 61.

\(^4\) Cf. above, BD 1.126, where these items are grouped together under “should look about so as to be his knife-bringer.”

\(^5\) These are the five kinds of medicine, cf. Vin 3.251.
is a serious offence. If he dies, there is an offence entailing expulsion.

Arranging a sight\(^1\) means: in arranging a dreadful and terrifying sight, thinking, “seeing this and becoming terrified, he will die,” there is an offence of bad conduct. If the target person sees it and becomes terrified, there is a serious offence. If he dies, there is an offence entailing expulsion. In arranging a lovely sight, thinking, “seeing this and then not being able to obtain it, he will wither and die,” there is an offence of bad conduct. If the target person sees it and then withers because of not obtaining it, there is a serious offence. If he dies, there is an offence entailing expulsion.

Arranging a sound means: in arranging a dreadful and terrifying sound, thinking, “hearing this and becoming terrified, he will die,” there is an offence of bad conduct. If the target person hears it and becomes terrified, there is a serious offence. If he dies, there is an offence entailing expulsion. In arranging a lovely and heart-stirring\(^2\) sound, thinking, “hearing this and then not being able to obtain it, he will wither and die,” there is an offence of bad conduct. If the target person hears it and then withers because of not obtaining it, there is a serious offence. If he dies, there is an offence entailing expulsion.

Arranging a smell means: in arranging a disgusting and repulsive smell, thinking, “smelling this, he will die from disgust and aversion,” there is an offence of bad conduct. When the target person smells it and experiences suffering because of disgust and aversion, there is a serious offence. If he dies, there is an offence entailing expulsion. In arranging a lovely smell, thinking, “smelling this and then not being able to obtain it, he will wither and die,” there is an offence of bad conduct. If the target person smells it and then withers because of not obtaining it, there is a serious offence. If he dies, there is an offence entailing expulsion.

Arranging a taste means: in arranging a disgusting and repul-

\(^1\) It is curious that the five senses are all equally powerful here, and that the last three are not grouped together under muta, sensed, felt, thought or imagined, as sometimes occurs in the older literature, e.g. Vin 4.2. It is also curious that these five senses have the power to cause death. Was it really believed that people died because of a bad smell or loud noise? \(^2\) Hadayaṁgama, cf. DN i.4.
sive taste, thinking, “tasting this, he will die from disgust and aversion,” there is an offence of bad conduct. When the target person tastes it and experiences suffering because of disgust and aversion, there is a serious offence. If he dies, there is an offence entailing expulsion. In arranging a lovely taste, thinking, “tasting this and then not being able to obtain it, he will wither and die,” there is an offence of bad conduct. If the target person tastes it and then withers because of not obtaining it, there is a serious offence. If he dies, there is an offence entailing expulsion.

Arranging a touch means: in arranging a painful and harsh physical contact, thinking, “touched by this, he will die,” there is an offence of bad conduct. When the target person makes contact with it and experiences pain, there is a serious offence. If he dies, there is an offence entailing expulsion. In arranging a pleasant and soft physical contact, thinking, “touched by this and then not being able to obtain it, he will wither and die,” there is an offence of bad conduct. If the target person is touched by it and then withers because of not obtaining it, there is a serious offence. If he dies, there is an offence entailing expulsion.

Arranging dhamma means: in talking about hell¹ to one destined to go to hell, thinking, “hearing this and becoming terrified, he will die,” there is an offence of bad conduct. When the target person hears it and becomes terrified, there is a serious offence. If he dies, there is an offence entailing expulsion. In talking about heaven to someone of good behaviour,² thinking, “hearing this and being intent on it,³ he will die,” there is an offence of bad conduct. When the target person hears it, becomes intent on it and thinks, “I shall die,” and he does what is painful, there is a serious offence. If he dies, there is an offence entailing expulsion.

Announcement means: if, being asked, he says, “die in this way;⁴ he who dies like this receives wealth, fame or goes to heaven,” there is an offence of bad conduct. If, because of that announcement, the target person thinks, “I shall die,” and he does what is painful, there is a serious offence. If he dies, there is an offence entailing expulsion.

¹ Niraya. ² Adhimutta. Cf. below, BD 1.148. ³ Kalyāṇakamma. ⁴ Evaṁ marassu.

Instruction means: if, without being asked, he says, “die in this way; he who dies like this receives wealth, fame or goes to heaven,” there is an offence of bad conduct. If, because of that instruction, the target thinks, “I shall die,” and he does what is painful, there is a serious offence. If he dies, there is an offence entailing expulsion.

An arranged action means: if he makes an arrangement for before the meal or for after the meal, for the night or for the day, telling another person, “kill that person according to this arrangement,” there is an offence of bad conduct. If the other person kills that person according to that arrangement, there is an offence entailing expulsion for both. If he kills him before or after the arranged time, there is no offence for the instigator, but there is an offence entailing expulsion for the murderer.

Making a sign means: he makes a sign. If he says to another person, “when I wink, raise my eyebrow, or raise my head, at that sign kill that person,” there is an offence of bad conduct. If, at that sign, the other person kills that person, there is an offence entailing expulsion for both. If he kills him before or after the sign, there is no offence for the instigator, but there is an offence entailing expulsion for the murderer.

Non-offence clause

There is no offence if it was unintentional, for one not knowing, for one not aiming at death, for one who is insane, for the first offender.

The first section on expulsion in relation to human beings is finished

Case rulings

MNEMONIC LIST
Praising, sitting down, with pestle, and with mortar; gone forth when old,¹ a falling out,² first,³ experimental poison, / and three with making sites, another three with bricks,
An adze, and a rafter, a platform, descent, fell off,/ Sweating, and nose treatment, massage, and by bathing, and by smearing,
Making get up, making lie down,⁴ death through food and drink,/
Child by a lover, and co-wives, he killed the mother, the child, both,
He killed neither,⁵ crushing, heating, barren, fertile,/ Tickling, in restraining, a spirit, and sent to a predatory spirit, Thinking it was him he gave a blow,⁶ talk on heaven, and on hell,/
Three trees at Āḷavī, three others with forest about fires,
Do not keep in misery, not as you, buttermilk, and salty medicine./

Case details

At one time a certain monk was ill. Out of compassion the monks praised the beauty of death to him. He died. They became anxious and said, “Could it be that we have fallen into an offence entailing expulsion?” They informed the Master. He said: “You, monks, have fallen into an offence entailing expulsion.”

---

¹ vuddhapabbañjītā usually “those long gone forth, old monks.” ² Oldenberg, Vin 3.271f. gives variant readings vuddhapabbajitā ca bhissanno, “jitā sinno, and “jītābhisanno and he says, “I do not know how to correct bhissanno or sinno.” The final ā of “jitā may possibly belong to bhissanno, then = abhisanno, meaning “full of, overflowing with” (old monks, Bu-Pj 3.5.4), or a “falling out” (of meat, Bu-Pj 3.5.5). Sinna as past participle of sijjati usually means “wet with perspiration, boiled,” but it cannot mean that here. The word does not appear again in the stories below. Possibly one group has been omitted. ³ Text reads aggañ. Oldenberg proposed an emendation to lāggañ, doubtless thinking of vilagga in Bu-Pj 3.5.5, but aggañ refers to agga (-kārika) of Bu-Pj 3.5.6. ⁴ Text, maraññañ. ⁵ ubho na miyyare. Cf. na miyyare at Snp 575. ⁶ pahari.
bench,\(^1\) crushing a boy who was concealed by a rag. The boy died, and the monk became anxious. ... “Monks, there is no offence entailing expulsion. But a monk should not sit down on a seat without checking it. If one does, there is an offence of bad conduct.”

____________________________

At one time a certain monk was preparing a seat in a refectory among the houses. When he took hold of a pestle high up, a second pestle fell down hitting\(^2\) a certain boy who then died. He became anxious ... “What was your intention?”

“I did not intend it, Master.”

“There is no offence, monk, when it is unintentional.

____________________________

At one time a certain monk was preparing a seat in a refectory among the houses. He stepped\(^3\) on the requisites belonging to a mortar,\(^4\) which fell and hit\(^5\) a certain boy, who then died. He became anxious ... “There is no offence, monk, when it is unintentional.”

\(^1\) Ottharitvā; this word occurs again below in the next paragraph and also at BD 1.146 below. Vin-a 475 on this latter passage explains by akkamitvā, and goes on to say that a monk having fallen down was dragged along by some others, and one having got on to his stomach sat there. But cf. BD 1.59, n. 1, above for akkamitvā, meaning “kicking, making a kick at.” At Mil 121 ottharati is used in connection with the waves of the sea: they “flow” (so translated Sacred Books of the East xxxi.182), meaning they flow again over the spot whence they had rolled back. It there has the sense of covering over or covering up. Pali-English Dictionary under ottharati says, “see also avattharati “for both of which it gives much the same meanings. I think it possible that ottharati (as here and in next paragraph below, and again below at BD 1.146) and avattharati as at next note below, have the sense of dealing roughly with someone, even by mistake. Avatthāsi occurs, again, BD 1.140, where it also seems as if it means “hit” (with locative). Both words certainly seem to include the sense of hard, sitting hard enough or hitting hard enough to cause death. \(^2\) avatthāsi. \(^3\) akkamitvā pavaṭṭesi. Akkamitvā here seems to be in its meaning of “to tread on.” We get the same expression in Vin 3.38, above, BD 1.59, where it seems to mean “rising, he knocked her over,” and I should like to add hard, rising hard or suddenly. See above, BD 1.137, n. 4. \(^4\) bhaṇḍikā. This is a comprehensive word meaning a heap of goods, a collection. At Jaiii.41 it is variant reading for gaṇḍikā, which as “executioner’s block” could not make sense here. “Mortar-requisites” would include the pestle. \(^5\) ottharitvā see above, BD 1.137, n. 4.
At one time a father and son had gone forth among the monks. When the time was announced¹ the son said to his father, “Go, bhante, the Sangha is waiting for you,” and seizing him by the back, he pushed him away. Falling down, he died. He became anxious. ...

“What was your intention?”

“I did not mean to cause his death, Master.”

“There is no offence, monk, for one who is not aiming at death.

At one time a father and son had gone forth among the monks. When the time was announced² the son said to his father, “Go, bhante, the Sangha is waiting for you,” and meaning to cause his death he seized him by the back and pushed him away. Falling down, he died. He became anxious ... “... expulsion.”

At one time a father and son had gone forth among the monks. When the time was announced the son said to his father, “Go, bhante, the Sangha is waiting for you,” and meaning to cause his death he seized him by the back and pushed him away. Falling down, he did not die. He became anxious ... “There is no offence, monk, entailing expulsion, but there is a serious offence.”

At one time while a certain monk was eating some meat³ got stuck in his throat. A certain monk hit him on the neck. The meat came out together with blood, and the monk died. He became anxious ... “There is no offence, monk, for one who does not mean to cause death.”

¹ kāleārocite. ² kāleārocite. ³ maṁsa; again showing that the monks were not vegetarians. Cf. above, BD 1.98.
on the neck. The meat came out together with blood, and the monk died. He became anxious ... “... expulsion.”

At one time while a certain monk was eating some meat got stuck in his throat. A certain monk, meaning to cause his death, hit him on the neck. The meat came out together with blood, but the monk did not die. He became anxious ... “There is no offence entailing expulsion, but there is a serious offence.”

At one time a certain monk who was an almsgoer received poisoned almsfood. He brought it back and gave the first portion to the monks. They died. He became anxious ... “What was your intention, monk?”
“I did not know, Master.”
“There is no offence for one who does not know.

At one time a certain monk gave poison to a certain monk, with the purpose of investigating it. That monk died. He became anxious ... “What was your intention, monk?”
“My purpose was to investigate it, Master.”
“There is no offence entailing expulsion, but there is a serious offence.”

At one time the monks of Ālavī were preparing a site for a dwelling. A certain monk who was below lifted up a stone. The stone, being badly held by a second monk who was above, fell on the head of the monk who was below, and he died. The second monk became anxious ... “There is no offence, monk, when it is unintentional.”

At one time the monks of Ālavī were preparing a site for a dwelling. A certain monk who was below lifted up a stone. A second monk who was above, aiming to kill the one who was below, dropped the stone on his head. He died … he did not die. The second monk became anxious … “There is no offence entailing expulsion, but there is a serious offence.”

---

1 avatthāsi, cf. above, BD 1.137, n. 4.

______________

At one time the monks of Āḷavī were erecting a wall¹ for a dwelling. A certain monk who was below lifted up a burnt brick. The brick, being badly held by a second monk who was above, fell on the head of the monk who was below. He died. The second monk became anxious … “There is no offence, monk, when it is unintentional.”

______________

At one time the monks of Āḷavī were erecting a wall for a dwelling. A certain monk who was below lifted up a burnt brick. A second monk who was above, intending to cause the death of the monk who was below, dropped the burnt brick on his head. He died … he did not die. The second monk became anxious … “There is no offence entailing expulsion, but there is a serious offence.”

______________

At one time the monks of Āḷavī were doing building work. A certain monk who was below lifted up an adze. The adze, being badly held by a second monk who was above, fell on the head of the monk who was below. He died. The second monk became anxious … “There is no offence, monk, when it is unintentional.”

______________

At one time the monks of Āḷavī were doing building work … lifted up an adze. A second monk who was above, meaning to cause the death of the monk who was below, dropped the adze on his head. He died … he did not die … The second monk became anxious … “… serious offence.”

______________

¹ Kuḍḍa. At Vin 4.266 three kinds of walls are mentioned: īṭṭhakā° (of tiles or bricks, as here), silā° (of stones), dāru° (of wood).
At one time the monks of Āḷavī were doing building work. A certain monk who was below lifted up a rafter. The rafter, being badly held by a monk who was above ... (three cases as above) ... “... serious offence.”

At one time the monks of Āḷavī, doing building work, were putting together a platform.¹ A certain monk said to a second monk, “Friend, put it together by standing here.” Putting it together by standing there, he fell down and died. The first monk became anxious ... “What was your intention, monk?”

“I did not mean to cause his death, Master.”

“There is no offence for one who is not aiming at death.”

At one time the monks of Āḷavī, doing building work, were putting together a platform. A certain monk, meaning to cause his death, said to second monk, “Friend, put it together by standing here.” Putting it together by standing there, he fell down and died ... fell down and did not die. The first monk became anxious ... “There is no offence entailing expulsion, but there is a serious offence.”

At one time a certain monk, having made a roof for a dwelling, was coming down. A second monk said to that monk, “Friend, come down here.” Coming down at that place, he fell down and died. The second monk became anxious ... “There is no offence, monk, for one who is not aiming at death.”

At one time a certain monk, having made a roof for a dwelling, was coming down. A second monk, meaning to cause his death, said to him, “Friend, come down here.” Coming down at that place, he fell down and died ... fell down and did not die ... “There is no offence entailing expulsion, but there is a serious offence.”

¹ Aṭṭaka. Vin-a 466 calls it vehāsamañca, literally a bed above the ground, probably a platform or scaffold up a tree, such as hunters use. It is the diminutive of aṭṭa, a watch-tower, Vin 3.200.
At one time a certain monk who was tormented by discontent climbed Mount Vulture’s Peak, fell down the cliff and hit a certain basket-maker. He died, and the monk became anxious ... “There is no offence entailing expulsion. But, monks, one should not jump off. If one does, there is an offence of bad conduct.”

At one time the group of six monks, having climbed Mount Vulture’s Peak, threw down a stone for fun. Hitting a certain cowherd, it killed him.¹ They became anxious. ... “There is no offence entailing expulsion. But, monks, you should not throw down stones for fun. If one does, there is an offence of bad conduct.”

At one time a certain monk was ill. The monks made him sweat by heating him. He died. They became anxious. ... “There is no offence, monks, for one who is not aiming at death.”

At one time a certain monk was ill. The monks, meaning to cause his death, made him sweat by heating him. He died ... he did not die. They became anxious. ... “There is no offence entailing expulsion, but there is a serious offence.”

At one time a certain monk had a headache.² The monks gave him medical treatment through the nose.³ He died. They became anxious. ... “There is no offence, monks, for one who is not aiming at death.”

¹ māresuñ. We should say “it” (the stone), but the Pali regards the men as the agents of the cowherd’s death. ² sīsābhītāpa, literally “heat in the head,” cf. Vin 1.204, where Pilindavaccha is mentioned as suffering this ailment. ³ natthuñ adaṁsu = natthukamma as at Vin 1.204. DN-a i.98, explained telañ yojetvā nā karaṇañ. At DN i.12 this treatment is included among the low arts by which some samanças and brahmmins earn a wrong livelihood, but at Vin 1.204 it is allowed by Gotama, with details of how best to apply the drug to be taken through the nose. Cf. Dhp-a i.12.
At one time a certain monk had a headache. The monks, meaning to cause his death, gave him medical treatment through the nose. He died ... did not die. They became anxious. ... “There is no offence entailing expulsion, but there is a serious offence.”

By-Pj 3.5.16

At one time a certain monk was ill. The monks massaged him. He died ... (three cases as above) ... “... but there is a serious offence.”

At one time a certain monk was ill. The monks bathed him. He died ... “... but there is a serious offence.”

At one time a certain monk was ill. The monks anointed him with oil. He died ... “... but there is a serious offence.”

At one time a certain monk was ill. The monks made him get up.¹ He died ... “... but there is a serious offence.”

At one time a certain monk was ill. The monks made him lie down. He died ... “... but there is a serious offence.”

At one time a certain monk was ill. The monks gave him food ... they gave him drink. He died ... “... but there is a serious offence.”

At one time a certain woman whose husband was living away from home became pregnant by a lover. She said to a monk who was supported by her family, “Master, please find a method of abortion.” “All right, sister,” he said, and he gave her a method of abortion. The child died. He became anxious. ... “You, monk, have fallen into an offence entailing expulsion.”

¹ Or, “raised him” (to a sitting position).
At one time a certain man had two wives, one who was barren and one who was fertile. The barren one said to a monk who was supported by her family, “If she should bring forth a child, bhante, she will become mistress of the whole household. Master, please find a method of abortion for her.” “All right, sister,” he said, and he gave her a method of abortion. The child died, but the mother did not die. He became anxious ... “... expulsion.”

At one time a certain man had two wives ... he gave her a method of abortion. The mother died, but the child did not die. He became anxious ... “There is no offence entailing expulsion, but there is a serious offence.”

At one time a certain woman who was pregnant said to a monk who was supported by her family, “Master, please find me a method of abortion.” “Well then crush¹ it, sister,” he said. She crushed it and caused an abortion. He became anxious ... “... expulsion.”

At one time a certain woman who was pregnant ... “Well then heat yourself, sister,” he said. She heated herself and caused an abortion. He became anxious ... “... expulsion.”

At one time a certain barren woman said to a monk who was supported by her family, “Master, please find me some medicine to help me become pregnant.” “All right, sister,” he said, and gave her some medicine. She died. He became anxious ... “There is no offence entailing expulsion, but there is an offence of bad conduct.”

212
At one time a certain fertile woman said to a monk who was supported by her family, “Master, please find me some medicine to help me not get pregnant.” “All right, sister,” he said ... “... but there is an offence of bad conduct.”

At one time the group of six monks made one of the group of seventeen monks laugh by tickling him with their fingers. Being unable to breathe, he died. They became anxious ... “There is no offence entailing expulsion.”

At one time the group of seventeen monks, while doing some work, covered one of the monks of the group of six. He died. They became anxious ... “There is no offence entailing expulsion.”

At one time a certain monk who was an exorcist killed a spirit. He became anxious. ... “There is no offence entailing expulsion, but there is a serious offence.”

At one time a certain monk sent a certain monk to a dwelling

---

1 maddasu, crush, bruise. Cf. Ja iii.121.
1 Cf. Vin 4.110, where this story also appears; tickling with the fingers is there said to be a pācittiya offence. The seventeen monks are also mentioned at Vin 4.41. At Vin 1.77 = Vin 4.128, the boy Upāli is said to have seventeen friends. See Introduction, p. xxxvi, n. 2.
2 kammaṁ karissāma, possibly idiomatic, “we will do (for him)”, “we will have some fun.”
3 ottharītvā = ākkamitvā, Vin-a 475. See above, BD 1.137.
4 bhūtavejjaka; bhūtavijjā mentioned at DN i.9 as a “low art.” Bhūtavidyā (translated by R.E. Hume as “Demonology”) also occurs at Chāndogya Upaniṣad 7.2.1 = Chāndogya Upaniṣad 7.7.1.
5 The monk learned in exorcism, in freeing a person possessed by a yakkha may cut off a clay doll’s head; then the yakkha dies, killed by him. But he may kill not only the yakkha but Sakka, king of the Devas; therefore it is a grave offence. Vin-a 475. At Sn i.206 some Sakka is called a yakkha. Ks i.263, n. 3 says, “there is no tradition, revealed in the Commentary that Sakka, ruler of the Thirty-[three] Gods, is meant.” He was a (eko) yakkha belonging to Māra’s faction, Sn-a i.302.
inhabited by predatory spirits.¹ The spirits killed him. He became anxious ... “There is no offence, monk, for one who is not aiming at death.”

At one time a certain monk, meaning to cause his death, sent a certain monk to a dwelling inhabited by predatory spirits. The spirits killed him ... the spirits did not kill him. “There is no offence entailing expulsion, but there is a serious offence.”

At one time a certain monk sent a certain monk to a wilderness inhabited by beasts of prey² ... to a wilderness inhabited by robbers. The beasts of prey ... the robbers ... killed him. He became anxious ... (three cases each time as above) ... “... but there is a serious offence.”

At one time a certain monk, thinking he was that person, killed that person ... thinking he was that person, killed someone else ... thinking he was someone else, killed that person ... thinking he was someone else, killed someone else. He became anxious ... “… expulsion.”

At one time a certain monk was possessed by a spirit.³ Another monk gave him a blow.⁴ He died. The other monk became anxious ... “There is no offence, monk, for one who is not aiming at death.”

¹ vāḷayakkha. Vin-a 475, “In this vihāra a predatory (vāla), fierce yakṣa dwelt; it was his vihāra.” At AN i.iii.256 vāḷayakkhas are said to be one of the five dangers of Madhurā. See GS iii.188, n. 3. Mr. E.M. Hare translates vāḷayakkhā as “bestial yakṣhas.” Cf. yakṣha eating men and cattle at DN ii.346. Term may mean “yakṣha in form of a beast of prey.”² Vin-a 476: “In all of these wilds there are beasts of prey and snakes ... in all of those there are robbers.” Five kinds of wilds (kantāra) mentioned at Ja i.99, SN-a i.324; four kinds at Cnd 630.³ amanussena: amanussa is a yakṣha, a spirit, a ghost. At Vin 1.277 it is said that Kāka, a slave, was born amanussena. Word occurs at DN i.116, SN i.91, and also above, BD 1.74. Vin-a 298 says, they are either yakṣhas or men who, having departed, desire to return.⁴ Vin-a 476 “saying, ‘I will drive the yakṣha away,’ he gives him (i.e., the monk) a blow. One should not give a person possessed by a yakṣha a blow, but should bind a palm-leaf or protecting thread on his arm or leg.”
At one time a certain monk was possessed by a spirit. Another monk, meaning to cause his death, gave him a blow. He died ... he did not die. The other monk became anxious ... “There is no offence entailing expulsion, but there is a serious offence.”

At one time a certain monk gave a talk about heaven to a man of good behaviour. He became keen on it¹ and died. The monk became anxious ... “There is no offence, monk, for one who is not aiming at death.”

At one time a certain monk, meaning to cause his death, gave a talk about heaven to a man of good behaviour. He became keen on it and died ... he became keen on it, but did not die ... “There is no offence entailing expulsion, but there is a serious offence.”

At one time a certain monk gave a talk about hell to a man destined to go to hell. Being terrified, he died ... (the same three cases) ... “... but there is a serious offence.”

At one time the monks of Āḷavī, while doing building work, felled a tree. A certain monk said to another monk, “Friend, fell it standing here.” While he was felling it standing there, the tree fell on him and killed him ... (three cases) ... “... but there is a serious offence.”

At one time the group of six monks set fire to a forest. Some people were burnt and died ... (three cases) ... “... but there is a serious offence.”

¹ adhimutto. Critical Pali Dictionary, referring to this passage says, “impressed with the idea.” Cf. above, BD 1.135.
At one time a certain monk went to the place of execution and said to the executioner: “Friend, do not keep him in misery.¹ Kill him with a single blow.” “All right, bhante,” he said, and he killed him with a single blow. He became anxious. “You, monk, have fallen into an offence entailing expulsion.”

At one time a certain monk went to the place of execution and said to the executioner: “Friend, do not keep him in misery. Kill him with a single blow.” “I will not do as you ask,” he said, and deprived him of life. He became anxious ... “Monk, there is no offence entailing expulsion, but there is an offence of bad conduct.”²

At one time a certain man whose hands and feet had been cut off was in his relatives’ house surrounded by his relations. A certain monk said to those people, “Friends, do you desire his death?” “Indeed, bhante, we do desire it.” “Then you should make him drink buttermilk.”³

They made him drink buttermilk and he died. The monk became anxious ... “You, monk, have fallen into an offence entailing expulsion.”

At one time a certain man whose hands and feet had been cut off was in his family’s house, surrounded by his relations. A certain nun said to those people, “Friends, do you desire his death?” “Indeed, honoured lady, we do desire it.”

¹ mā yimaṁ kilamesi. ² Apparently not a grave offence because the executioner was not influenced by the monk’s words. The monk only transgressed in uttering the words, attempting to hasten the man’s death. ³ takka. Vin-a 478, “buttermilk of a cow, a buffalo, a goat, hot, cold, flavoured or unflavoured.” At Vin 1.244 it is included in the five products of the cow (pañca gorasā).
“Then you should make him drink salty medicine.”¹
They made him drink salty medicine and he died. She became anxious. She then informed the nuns, who in turn informed the monks, who then informed the Master. He said, “Monks, that nun has fallen into an offence entailing expulsion.”

_The third offence entailing expulsion is finished_

¹ _loṇasuvīraka_. Vin-a 478, “a medicine made of all tastes.” Buddhaghosa gives a long description of the things mixed together to form it: various kinds of myrobalan (astringent and intoxicant), all the seven grains and pulses, gruel, the fruit of the plantain, and all fruits, the jungle creeper, sprouts of various trees, fish and meat, honey and molasses, rock-salt, alkaline and bitter medicines. Then, letting it mature for two or three years, it is the colour of the juice of the rose-apple and is good for various diseases (mentioned here, _cf._ also _AN_ v.110), but further than that (ca uttaraṁ) if decaying, it is no longer a medicine. At Vin 1.210 it is called _sovīraka:_ here the lord allows the use of it to one who is sick, and to one who is not sick the use of it mixed with water as a medicine.
Monks’ Expulsion (Pārājika) 4

Origin story

First sub-story

At one time¹ the Buddha, the Master, was staying near Vesālī in the hall with the peaked roof in the Great Wood. At that time a number of monks who were friends had entered the rains on the banks of the river Vaggumudā.² Just then Vajjī was short of food³ and stricken by hunger, with crops blighted and turned to straw, and it was not easy to keep oneself going by collecting alms. Then those monks thought this:

“At present Vajjī is short of food and stricken by hunger, with crops blighted and turned to straw, and it is not easy to keep oneself going by collecting alms. By what means might we, united and in harmony, have a comfortable rains and get almsfood without problems?”

Some said, “Well, friends, we could undertake work for the householders, and they will give something in return. In this way, being united and in harmony, we will spend the rains in comfort and have no problems getting almsfood.”

Some said, “Friends, there is no need to undertake work for the householders. Let us instead act as messengers for them,⁴ and they will give something in return. In this way, being united and in harmony, we will spend the rains in comfort and have no problems getting almsfood.”

¹ From here to towards the end of Bu-Pj 4.1.2 below, cf. Vin 4.23–25, where it is a pācittiya for a monk to tell of his knowledge of conditions belonging to the further-men, even if he possessed this knowledge. If he does not possess it, it is a pārājika offence to speak of it, as here at Bu-Pj 4. ² Mentioned at Ud 25; it is also here said that some monks spent vassa on its banks. ³ Cf. above, Bu-Pj 1.2.1; Bu-Pj 1.5.5. ⁴ dūteyyam harāma.

Some said, “Friends, there is no need to undertake work for the householders, nor to act as messengers for them. Let us instead praise one another’s super-human achievements¹ to the householders: ‘Such a monk obtains the first jhāna, such a monk the second jhāna, such a monk the third, such a monk the fourth; such a monk is stream-enterer, such a monk a once-returner, such a non-returner, such an arahant; such a monk has the three true knowledges,² and such the six direct knowledges.’³ Then they will give to us. In this way, being united and in harmony, we will spend the rains in comfort and have no problems getting almsfood. Indeed, friends, this is the better way, that we praise one another’s super-human achievements to the householders.”

Then those monks praised one another’s super-human achievements to the householders: “Such a monk obtains the first jhāna ... such a monk has the six direct knowledges.” And those people thought: “It is a gain for us, it is well-gained, that such monks have come to us for the rains. Such monks as these, who are virtuous and of good character, have never before entered the rains with us.” Then they gave such food and drink to those monks that they did not even eat and drink themselves, or give to their parents, to their wives and children, to their slaves, servants and workers, to their friends and companions, or to their relatives. In this way those monks were handsome, with rounded features, bright faces and clear skin.⁴

Now it was the custom⁵ for monks who had finished keeping

---
¹ uttarimanussadhamma, on this term, see BD1, Introduction, xxivf. ² tevijjo—i.e., he has knowledge of his own previous rebirths, of the arising and passing away of beings, and of the destruction of the cankers. It is a term handed down from the Upaniṣads, where it meant knowledge of the three Vedas. ³ chalabhiñño—i.e., psychic power, clairaudience, knowledge of the thoughts of other beings, knowledge of previous rebirths, clairvoyance, and knowledge of destruction of the cankers. Cf. AN iii.15; DN i.77ff.; and see GS III Introduction viii for these being originally five. ⁴ A stock phrase. ⁵ For the beginning of this paragraph cf. Vin 1.158.
the rains to go and see the Master. So when the rains was finished and the three months had elapsed, those monks put their lodging in order, took their bowls and robes and departed for Vesālī. Walking by stages, they arrived at Vesālī and went to the hall with the peaked roof in the Great Wood. There they approached the Master, paid homage to him and sat down to one side.

At that time the monks who had spent the rains in that region were thin, haggard and pale, their veins protruding all over their limbs. But the monks from the banks of the Vaggumudā were handsome, with rounded features, bright faces and clear skin. It is the custom for Buddhas, for Masters, to exchange friendly greetings with incoming monks. And so the Master said to them:

“I hope you are keeping well, monks, I hope you are comfortable;
I hope you spent the rains at ease, in concord and harmony, without dispute, and that you had no trouble getting almsfood?”

“We are keeping well, Master, we are comfortable; we spent the rains at ease, in concord and harmony, without dispute, and we had no trouble getting almsfood.”

Tathāgatas sometimes ask knowing, and knowing sometimes do not ask ... Buddhas, Masters, question the monks for two reasons, thinking, “we shall teach the Dhamma or lay down a training rule for the disciples.” Then the Master said to those monks:

¹ senāsanaṁ saṁsāmetvā, translated at Vinaya Texts i.326, “set their places of rest in order.” I closely follow Chalmers’ “packed away their bedding” at Further Dialogues of the Buddha i.104, because I prefer “away” rather than “up” which suggests the possibility of their taking their bedding with them when vassa was over.
“Places of rest” is, I think, misleading: much teaching of the laity went on during vassa, which could therefore only be regarded as a time of leisure in so far as there was no travelling from vihara to vihara. ² This is all stock-phrase. Dubbanḍa: CHALMERS, Further Dialogues of the Buddha ii.65 translates “ill-looking,” while at Vinaya Texts i.186 it is translated “discoloured.” ³ uppaṇḍuपण्डत, Chalmers, Further Dialogues of the Buddha ii.65, “jaundiced,” and Vinaya Texts i.186, “(... his complexion has become) more and more yellow.” ⁴ dhamanisanthagatta, CHALMERS, Further Dialogues of the Buddha ii.65, “their veins standing out like Kaccikhamani, cf. Vin 1.204, Vin 1.205, where na kkhamaniyo hoti is used of a disease which had not become better. ⁷ Bhagavā. ⁸ = Vin 1.158 = Vin 3.6.
“In what way, monks, did you spend the rains at ease, without having any trouble getting almsfood?” Then those monks informed the Master.

“But had you really obtained those super-human achievements?”

“No, Master.”

The Buddha, the Master, rebuked them:

“It is unsuitable, foolish men, it is not becoming, it is not proper, it is not fitting for a recluse, it is unallowable, it is not to be done. How could you for the sake of your stomachs praise one another’s super-human achievements to householders? It would be better for your bellies to be cut open with a sharp butcher’s knife than for you to praise one another’s super-human achievements to householders. Why is that? For that reason, foolish men, you may incur death or death-like suffering, but not on that account would you at the breaking up of the body after death be reborn in the plane of misery, a bad destination, the abyss, hell. But for this reason you might. This is not for the benefit of non-believers ...” and having thus rebuked them and given a talk on the Dhamma, he addressed the monks:

“Monks, there are these five great gangsters to be found in the world. What five? A certain great gangster thinks like this: ‘When indeed will I, with a following of a hundred or a thousand men, wander among villages, towns and the seats of kings, killing and making others kill, destroying and making others destroy, tormenting and making others torment,’ and after some time he does just that. Just so, monks, a certain bad monk thinks like this: ‘When indeed will I, with a following of a hundred or a thousand people, go on tour among villages, towns and the seats of kings, being honoured, respected, revered and worshipped by both householders and those gone forth, and obtain robes, almsfood, lodgings and medicines,’ and after some time he does just that. This is the first great gangster found existing in the world.

Again, a certain bad monk learns the Dhamma and training pro-

---

1 Kacci pana vo bhūtan ti. 2 Cf. above, BD 1.36. 3 Cf. AN i.153; AN iii.128. 4 idhā ti imasmiṃ sattaloke, Vin-a 482.
claimed by the Tathāgata and takes it as his own. This is the second great gangster found existing in the world.

Again, a certain bad monk groundlessly accuses someone who lives the spiritual life in purity of not being celibate.¹ This is the third great gangster found existing in the world.

Again, a certain bad monk takes valuable goods and requisites belonging to the Sangha—a monastery, the land of a monastery, a dwelling, the land for a dwelling, a bed, a bench, a cushion, a pillow, a brass vessel, a brass jar, a brass pot, a brass receptacle, an adze, a hatchet, an axe, a spade, a chisel, a creeper, bamboo, muñja-grass, babbaja-grass, tiṇa-grass, clay, wooden articles, earthenware articles²—and uses these to win over and create a following among householders. This is the fourth great gangster found existing in the world.

But in this world with its gods, its lords of death and its supreme beings, among this population with its recluses and brahmins, its gods and humans, this the greatest gangster: he who untruthfully³ and groundlessly⁴ boasts about a super-human achievement. Why is that? Monks, you have eaten the country’s almsfood by theft.”

Whoever should declare himself to be other than he truly

¹ Vin-a 484 says, suddhañ ca brahmaçařīniṁ is a monk whose cankers are destroyed.
Parisuddham brahmaçařiyam carantan means lead the best (highest) life free from the kilesas ... Amūlakena abrahmacariyena anuddhaṁseti, means he censures and blames this man for a pārājika offence. ² At Vin 2.170 all these items are grouped into five categories of things which are not transferable by the Order or by a group or by an individual. At Vin 2.122 a brass pot is one of the three kinds of water-vessels allowed. At Vin 2.143 all kinds of brassware are allowed to the Order except weapons, all kinds of wooden articles except divans (Vin 1.192), long-armed chairs (Vin 1.192), bowls (Vin 2.112) and shoes (Vin 1.188); all kinds of earthenware except katakas (foot scrubbers, see Vinaya Texts iii.130, n. 3), and large earthen vessels to be used as huts to live in. See Vinaya Texts iii.156 for these references, This last item is the only one not mentioned in previous rules. At Vin 3.211 injunctions are given to monks setting out on a journey as to what to do with their wooden and earthenware articles. At Vin 1.190 it is a dukkaṭa offence for monks to make foot coverings of tiṇa-, muñja- or babbaja-grass. ³ Asanta. ⁴ Abhūta.
MONKS’ EXPULSION (PĀRĀJIKĀ) 4

Has eaten this by theft, like a cheater who has deceived, Many’ yellow-necks of bad qualities, uncontrolled and Wicked, by their wicked deeds, in hell they are reborn. Better to eat an iron ball heated like a blazing fire, Than for the immoral and uncontrolled to eat the country’s alms.

Then the Master, having rebuked the monks from the banks of the Yaggumudā in various ways for being difficult to maintain, difficult to support ... “... And, monks, this training rule should be recited thus:

Preliminary ruling

If a monk falsely claims for himself a super-human achievement, knowledge and vision² worthy of the noble ones, saying: “This I know, this I see”, but after some time—whether examined or not, but having committed the offence³ and desiring purification—should say, ‘friends, not knowing I said that I know, not seeing that I see; what I said was empty and false,’ he too is expelled and not in communion.”

Thus the Master laid down this training rule for the monks

Second sub-story

At one time a number of monks, thinking they had seen what they had not, attained what they had not, achieved what they had not,

¹ From here to end of verses = Dhp 307, Dhp 308 = It 43 = It 90 (last three lines only at It 90). I follow Mrs. Rhys Davids, translated at Sacred Books of the Buddhists VII. ² Alamariyañanadassana. Vin-a 489 says that the highest ariyan purity is knowledge and insight. Alaṁ is explained pariyattaṁ, sufficient, enough, so that alaṁ means “intent on enough ariyan knowledge and insight for the destruction of the kilesas.” ³ Apanna, cf. below, Old Commentary explanation, BD 1.160, and Vin-a 492, “because he has fallen (āpanno) into defeat, therefore, putting monkdom to one side, he cannot become one to arrive at musing and so forth ”—musing, etc., being given in explanation of states of further-men, see below, BD 1.159.
realised what they had not, declared final knowledge\(^1\) based on overestimation.\(^2\) After some time their minds inclined\(^3\) to sense desire, anger and confusion. They became anxious, thinking, “The Master has laid down a training rule; yet we ... declared final knowledge based on overestimation. Could it be that we have fallen into an offence entailing expulsion? They informed Venerable Ānanda, who informed the Master. He said: “Ānanda, these monks declared final knowledge based on overestimation, thinking they had seen what they had not ... but this is negligible.\(^4\)

And so, monks, this training rule should be recited thus:

Final ruling

If a monk falsely claims for himself a super-human achievement, knowledge and insight worthy of the noble ones, saying: “This I know, this I see,” but after some time—whether examined or not, but having committed the offence and desiring purification—should say, ‘friends, not knowing I said that I know, not seeing that I see; what I said was empty and false,’ except if it is through overestimation, he too is expelled and not in communion.”

Definitions

Bu Pj 4.3.1

A means: whoever, of such kind ...

Monk means: ... this sort of monk is meant in this case.

Falsely means: although a certain wholesome quality is non-

---

\(^1\) Añña. Cf. above, BD 1.120, n. 2. \(^2\) Adhimāna, pride, arrogance. \(^3\) Namati, in translation; cittaṁ is the subject. Cf. SN i.137 \(^4\) Tañ ca kho etañ abbohārikan ti. Same phrase occurs again below, BD 1.196. Because Vin-a 488 says that the phrase means that “it does not belong to the business and is not a form of offence”, I take the ti after abboharika to mean that the phrase was uttered by Gotama and not by the monks. The word seems to mean “not to the point, irrelevant.” See Points of Controversy, p. 361, n. 4.
existent, not factual, not to be found in himself, and he does not see it or know it, he says, “I have this wholesome quality.”

A super-human achievement means: jhāna, emancipation, samādhi, attainment, knowledge and insight, development of the path, realisation of the fruits, abandoning the defilements, a mind without hindrances, delighting in solitude.

For himself means: either he presents these good qualities as in himself, or he presents himself as among these good qualities.

Knowledge means: the three true knowledges.

Insight means: knowledge and insight are equivalent.²

If (he) claims means: if he proclaims to a woman or a man, to a householder or one gone forth.

This I know, this I see means: “I know these qualities, I see these qualities; these qualities are in me, and I conform to these qualities.”

After some time means: the moment, the second, the instant when the claim is completed.

Examined means: he is examined in regard to what he has acknowledged: “What was attained by you, how was it attained by you, when was it attained by you, where was it attained by you? Which defilements have you destroyed? Which qualities did you gain?”

Not means: nothing being said.

Having committed the offence means: having bad desires, being habitually desirous, claiming a non-existent, non-factual super-human achievement, he has committed an offence entailing expulsion.

Desiring purification means: he desires to be a householder, a lay follower, a monastery attendant or a sāmaṇera.³

Friends, not knowing I said that I know, not seeing that I see ¹ Maggabhāvanā, or making the (four) ways (to arahanship) become. But see Old Commentary’s definition, below, BD 1.161.

² Repeated at Vin-a 489. ³ Vin-a 492 says, “Inasmuch as being a house-man, a lay-follower, a park-keeper, or a probationer he is able (bhabba) to set going the way to heaven through giving, the refuges, morality and the restraints, or the way to freedom through musing and freedom, therefore the state of a householder and so on is called pure; therefore desiring this purity, he is said to be one desiring purity.”
means: “I do not know these qualities, I do not see these qualities; these qualities are not found in me, and I do not conform to these qualities.”

What I said was empty and false, means: what I said was empty, what I said was false, what I said was untruthful:¹ I said it without knowing.

Except if it is through overestimation means: setting aside overestimation of oneself.

He too means: this is said with reference to the preceding offences entailing expulsion.

Is expelled means: just as a palm tree with the crown cut off is incapable² of further growth, just so a monk with bad desires, who is habitually desirous, having claimed a non-existent, non-factual super-human achievement, is not a recluse, not a son of the Sakyan³—he is therefore called one who is expelled.

Not in communion means: communion means: a common official action, the same recital, the same training—this is called communion. He does not take part in this—he is therefore called not in communion.

---

Permutations

Summary

Bu-Pj 4.4.1

A super-human achievement⁴ means: jhāna, emancipation, sam-ādhi, attainment, knowledge and insight, development of the path, realisation of the fruits, abandoning the defilements, a mind without hindrances, delighting in solitude.

¹ Abhūta ² abhabba. ³ Cf. Vin 1.97, where it is also said that the monk is not even to say that he delights in solitude. ⁴ This definition = that given above, BD 1.159. From here to end of Bu-Pj 4.4.1 below = Vin 4.25–26.
Definitions

Jhāna means: the first jhāna, the second jhāna, the third jhāna, the fourth jhāna.

Emancipation means: emptiness emancipation, signless emancipation, desireless emancipation.¹

samādhi means: emptiness samādhi, signless samādhi, desireless samādhi.

Attainment means: emptiness attainment, signless attainment, desireless attainment.

Knowledge and insight means: the three higher knowledges.

Development of the path means: the four focuses of mindfulness, the four right efforts, the four bases of psychic potency, the five faculties, the five powers, the seven factors of awakening, the noble eightfold path.²

Realisation of the fruits means: realisation of the fruit of stream-entry, realisation of the fruit of once-returning, realisation of the fruit of non-returning, realisation of the fruit of arahantship.

Abandoning the defilements means: the abandoning of sense desire, the abandoning of anger, the abandoning of confusion.³

A mind without hindrances means: the mind without sense desire, the mind without anger, the mind without confusion.

Delight in solitude means: Because of the first jhāna there is

---

¹ Vin-a 493 says that void means void of passion, hatred and confusion. “Signless” and “in which there is no hankering” are also explained with reference to these three. At Ps.ii.35 the long homily begins: “Monks, there are these three kinds of freedom: that of the void, that of the signless, that in which there is no hankering.” Cf. sn iv.295 (where appañihīta is translated “aimless”) Cf. Vism 658, Atthagālinī 223, where in the translation appañihīta is rendered “unhankered” and “undesired” respectively. At Mil 333, Mil 337 the translation is given as “the freedom (or concentration) in which no low aspirations remain.” In translation of Ds 351, Ds 507ff. appañihīta is rendered “unaimed at.” ² This is the usual order in which these thirty-seven things helpful to enlightenment, as they are called in the Commentaries, appear. But another order is sometimes given. See Mrs. Rhys Davids, Sakya 395 and ks V., vi. ff. ³ Cf. sn iv.251, where the definition of nibbāna is ragakkhaya, dosakkhaya, mohakkhaya (instead of pahāna, as above) – sn iv.252 in definition of arahatta. Vin-a 494 says, “passion and hatred are destroyed by the third Way, confusion by the fourth Way.” delight in solitude, because of the second jhāna ... because of the third jhāna ... because of the fourth jhāna there is delight in solitude.

Exposition

FIRST JHĀNA

For one who deliberately lies, saying, “I attained the first jhāna,” there is an offence entailing expulsion when three conditions are fulfilled: before he has lied, he knows he is going to lie; while lying, he knows he is lying; after he has lied, he knows he has lied.¹

For one who deliberately lies, saying, “I attained the first jhāna,” there is an offence entailing expulsion when four conditions are fulfilled: before he has lied, he knows he is going to lie; while lying, he knows he is lying; after he has lied, he knows he has lied; in misrepresenting his view (of what is true).

For one who deliberately lies, saying, “I attained the first jhāna,” there is an offence entailing expulsion when five conditions are fulfilled: before he has lied ... in misrepresenting his view (of what is true); in misrepresenting his belief (of what is true).

For one who deliberately lies, saying, “I attained the first jhāna,” there is an offence entailing expulsion when six conditions are fulfilled: before he has lied ... in misrepresenting his view (of what is true); in misrepresenting his belief (of what is true); in misrepresenting his acceptance (of what is true).

For one who deliberately lies, saying, “I attained the first jhāna,” there is an offence entailing expulsion when seven conditions are fulfilled: before he has lied ... in misrepresenting his view (of what is true); in misrepresenting his belief (of what is true); in misrepresenting his acceptance (of what is true); in misrepresenting his acceptance (of what is true).

¹ Here are three tenses of the verb bhaṇati: bhaṇissāṁ, bhaṇāmi, bhaṇitaṁ. Cf. Vin 4.2ff. to end of Bu-Pj 4.4.2 below. Cf. MN i.414 where Gotama speaks to Rahulā on “conscious lying.” This Rahulovada is famous as being alluded to in an Asoka Edict; see HULTZSCH, Corpus Inscriptionum Indicarum, vol. i, 1925, p. 172, p. 173.
sentiment (of what is true).¹

For one who deliberately lies, saying, “I am attaining the first jhāna,” there is an offence entailing expulsion when three conditions are fulfilled ... in misrepresenting his sentiment (of what is true).

For one who deliberately lies, saying, “I have attained the first jhāna,” there is an offence entailing expulsion when three conditions are fulfilled ... in misrepresenting his sentiment (of what is true).

For one who deliberately lies, saying, “I obtain the first jhāna,” there is an offence entailing expulsion when three conditions are fulfilled ... in misrepresenting his sentiment (of what is true).

For one who deliberately lies, saying, “I master the first jhāna,” there is an offence entailing expulsion when three conditions are fulfilled ... in misrepresenting his sentiment (of what is true).

For one who deliberately lies, saying, “I have realised the first jhāna,” there is an offence entailing expulsion when three conditions are fulfilled ... in misrepresenting his sentiment (of what is true).

As the first jhāna has been expounded in detail, so all (below) should be expanded

OTHER INDIVIDUAL ATTAINMENTS

For one who deliberately lies, saying, “I attained the second jhāna ... the third jhāna ... the fourth jhāna ... I am attaining ... I have attained ... I obtain ... I master ... I have realised the fourth jhāna,” there is an offence entailing expulsion when three conditions are fulfilled ...

¹ These four psychological modalities are added to the three tenses of the verb bhaṇati. They are diṭṭhi, khanti, ruci, bhāva, which I have translated as opinion, approval, pleasure, intention, respectively. They are, as it were, added on to the three modes of the verb, thus making seven constituents. Buddhaghosa at Vin-a 400 points out a contradiction in the Parivara (Vin 5.136), which attributes eight aṅga (literally limbs, thus constituents) to a lie, for it adds (Vinidhaya-) saññaṁ, knowledge, to the above seven. These expressions also occur at Vin 2.295; Vin 4.2ff. Cf. also Vb 245 where these with ādāya, a casually taken-up belief (cf. Vin 1.70), instead of bhāva are given in definition of idha, here, now. And cf. Mnd 64f. where laddhi, a religious belief, view, especially an heretical view, is substituted for bhāva. Three of these terms occur below at BD 1.305.
For one who deliberately lies, saying, “I attained the emptiness emancipation ... the signless emancipation ... the desireless emancipation¹ ... I am attaining ... I have attained ... I obtain ... I master ... I have realised the desireless emancipation,” there is an offence entailing expulsion when three conditions are fulfilled ...

For one who deliberately lies, saying, “I attained the emptiness samādhi ... the signless samādhi ... the desireless samādhi ... I am attaining ... I have attained ... I obtain ... I master ... I have realised the desireless samādhi,” there is an offence entailing expulsion when three conditions are fulfilled ...

For one who deliberately lies, saying, “I attained the emptiness attainment² ... the signless attainment ... the desireless attainment ... I am attaining ... I have attained ... I obtain ... I master ... I have realised the desireless attainment,” there is an offence entailing expulsion when three conditions are fulfilled ...

For one who deliberately lies, saying, “I attained the three true knowledges ... I have realised the three true knowledges,” there is an offence entailing expulsion when three conditions are fulfilled ...

For one who deliberately lies, saying, “I attained the four focuses of mindfulness ... the four right efforts ... the four bases of psychic potency ... I have realised the four bases of psychic potency,” there is an offence entailing expulsion when three conditions are fulfilled ...

For one who deliberately lies, saying, “I attained the five faculties ... the five powers ... I have realised the five powers,” there is an offence entailing expulsion when three conditions are fulfilled ...

For one who deliberately lies, saying, “I attained the seven factors of awakening ... I have realised the seven factors of awakening,” there is an offence entailing expulsion when three conditions are fulfilled ...

For one who deliberately lies, saying, “I attained the noble eightfold path ... I have realised the noble eightfold path,” there is an offence entailing expulsion when three conditions are fulfilled ...

For one who deliberately lies, saying, “I attained the fruit of stream-entry ... the fruit of once-returning ... the fruit of non-returning ... arahantship ... I have realised arahantship,” there is an offence entailing expulsion when three conditions are fulfilled ... For one who deliberately lies, saying, “I have given up sense desire, I have renounced sense desire, I have let go of sense desire, I have abandoned sense desire, I have relinquished sense desire, I have forsaken sense desire, I have thrown aside sense desire ... I have given up anger, I have renounced anger, I have let go of anger, I have abandoned anger, I have relinquished anger, I have forsaken anger, I have thrown aside anger ... I have given up confusion, I have renounced confusion, I have let go of confusion, I have abandoned confusion, I have relinquished confusion, I have forsaken confusion, I have thrown aside confusion,” there is an offence entailing expulsion when three conditions are fulfilled ...

¹ See above, BD 1.161. ² Cf. Vin 4.26ff.

For one who deliberately lies, saying, “my mind is free from the hindrance of sense desire,” there is an offence entailing expulsion when three conditions are fulfilled ...

For one who deliberately lies, saying, “my mind is free from the hindrance of anger ... confusion,” there is an offence entailing expulsion when three conditions are fulfilled ... when seven conditions are fulfilled: before he has lied he knows he is going to lie; while lying, he knows he is lying; after he has lied, he knows he has lied; in misrepresenting his view (of what is true); in misrepresenting his belief (of what is true); in misrepresenting his acceptance (of what is true); in misrepresenting his sentiment (of what is true).

The simple (permutations series) is finished

COMBINATIONS OF TWO ATTAINMENTS

For one who deliberately lies, saying, “I attained the first jhāna and the second jhāna ... the first jhāna and the third jhāna ... the first jhāna and the fourth jhāna ... the first jhāna and the emptiness emancipation ... the first jhāna and the signless emancipation ... the first jhāna and the desireless emancipation ... the first jhāna and the emptiness samādhi ... the first jhāna and the signless samādhi ...
the first jhāna and the desireless samādhi … the first jhāna and the emptiness attainment … the first jhāna and the signless attainment … the first jhāna and the desireless attainment … the first jhāna and the three true knowledges … the first jhāna and the four focuses of mindfulness … the first jhāna and the four right efforts … the first jhāna and the four bases of psychic potency … the first jhāna and the five faculties … the first jhāna and the five powers … the first jhāna and the seven factors of awakening … the first jhāna and the noble eightfold path … the first jhāna and the fruit of stream-entry … the first jhāna and the fruit of once-returning … the first jhāna and the fruit of non-returning … the first jhāna and arahantship … the first jhāna and I have given up sense desire, renounced it, let it go, abandoned it, relinquished it, forsaken it, thrown it aside … the first jhāna and I have given up anger, renounced it, let it go, abandoned it, relinquished it, forsaken it, thrown it aside … the first jhāna and I have given up confusion, renounced it, let it go, abandoned it, relinquished it, forsaken it, thrown it aside … the first jhāna and my mind is free from the hindrance of sense desire … the first jhāna and my mind is free from the hindrance of anger … the first jhāna and my mind is free from the hindrance of confusion … I am attaining the first jhāna and my mind is free from the hindrance of confusion … I have attained the first jhāna and my mind is free from the hindrance of confusion … I obtain the first jhāna and my mind is free from the hindrance of confusion … I master the first jhāna and my mind is free from the hindrance of confusion … I have realised the first jhāna and my mind is free from the hindrance of confusion, ”there is an offence entailing expulsion when three conditions are fulfilled … when seven conditions are fulfilled: before he has lied, he knows he is going to lie; while lying, he knows he is lying; after he has lied, he knows he has lied; in misrepresenting his view (of what is true); in misrepresenting his belief (of what is true); in misrepresenting his acceptance (of what is true); in misrepresenting his sentiment (of what is true).”

The permutation of one part is finished

232
For one who deliberately lies, saying, “I attained the second jhāna and the third jhāna ... the second jhāna and the fourth jhāna ... the second jhāna and my mind is free from the hindrance of confusion,” there is an offence entailing expulsion when three conditions are fulfilled ...

For one who deliberately lies, saying, “I attained the second jhāna and the first jhāna ... I have realised the second jhāna and the first jhāna,” there is an offence entailing expulsion when three conditions are fulfilled ... when seven conditions are fulfilled ...

The contracted permutation is finished

Thus each item is to be dealt with in the same way as the contracted permutation. In brief:

For one who deliberately lies, saying, “my mind is free from the hindrance of confusion and I attained the first jhāna ... the second jhāna ... the third jhāna ... the fourth jhāna ... the emptiness emancipation ... my mind is free from the hindrance of confusion and it is free from the hindrance of anger,” there is an offence entailing expulsion when three conditions are fulfilled ... when seven conditions are fulfilled ...

That which is based on one item is finished

The (sections) based on two items, three items, four items, five items, six items, seven items, eight items, nine items and ten items is to be given in detail in the same way as the (section) based on one item. This is the section based on all items:

COMBINATION OF ALL ATTAINMENTS

For one who deliberately lies, saying, “I attained the first jhāna and the second jhāna and the third jhāna and the fourth jhāna and the emptiness emancipation and the signless emancipation and the desireless emancipation and the emptiness samādhi and the signless samādhi and the desireless samādhi and the emptiness attainment and the signless attainment and the desireless attainment and the three true knowledges and the four focuses of mindfulness and the four right efforts and the four bases of psychic potency and the five faculties and the five powers and the seven factors of awakening and the noble eightfold path and the fruit of stream entry and the fruit of once-returning and the fruit of non-returning and arahantship
... I am attaining ... I have attained ... and I have given up sense desire, renounced it, let it go, abandoned it, relinquished it, forsaken it, thrown it aside; and I have given up anger, renounced it, let it go, abandoned it, relinquished it, forsaken it, thrown it aside; and I have given up confusion, renounced it, let it go, abandoned it, relinquished it, forsaken it, thrown it aside; and my mind is free from the hindrance of sense desire; and my mind is free from the hindrance of anger; and my mind is free from the hindrance of confusion,” there is an offence entailing expulsion when three conditions are fulfilled
... when seven conditions are fulfilled: before he has lied, he knows he is going to lie; while lying, he knows he is lying; after he has lied, he knows he has lied; in misrepresenting his view (of what is true);
in misrepresenting his belief (of what is true); in misrepresenting his acceptance (of what is true); in misrepresenting his sentiment (of what is true).

Section based on all items is finished

MEANING TO SAY ONE THING, BUT SAYING SOMETHING ELSE

For one who deliberately lies, meaning to say, “I attained the first jhāna,” while actually saying,¹ “I attained the second jhāna,” when the listener understands there is an offence entailing expulsion when there are three characteristics; when the listener does not understand there is a serious offence when three conditions are fulfilled
... For one who deliberately lies, meaning to say, “I attained the first jhāna,” while actually saying, “I attained the third jhāna ... the fourth

¹ vattukama, cf. Vism 522 = Vb-a 130. Oldenberg says, Vin 3.272, “the MSS. constantly read vatthukāmo, vatthuvisārakassa” (below). “I have no doubt that I was right in correcting vattuk°, vattuv°.” This is borne out by Vīn-a 500f.
“jhāna” ... there is a serious offence when three conditions are fulfilled ... For one who deliberately lies, meaning to say, “I attained the first jhāna,” while actually saying, “my mind is free of the hindrance of confusion” ... there is a serious offence when three conditions are fulfilled ... when seven conditions are fulfilled: before he has lied ... in misrepresenting his sentiment (of what is true).

The permutation of one part based on one expanded item is finished

For one who deliberately lies, meaning to say, “I attained the second jhāna,” while actually saying, “I attained the third jhāna ... the first jhāna” ... there is a serious offence when three conditions are fulfilled ... when seven conditions are fulfilled ...

The contracted permutation based on one expanded item; the root in brief

For one who deliberately lies, meaning to say, “My mind is free of the hindrance of confusion,” while actually saying, “I attained the first jhāna” ... there is a serious offence when three conditions are fulfilled ... For one who deliberately lies, meaning to say, “My mind is free of the hindrance of confusion” ... while actually saying, “My mind is free of the hindrance of anger” ... there is a serious offence when three conditions are fulfilled ... when seven conditions are fulfilled ...

The (section) based on one expanded item is finished

The (sections) based on two items, three items ... ten items are to be done just so. This is the (section) based on all items:

For one who deliberately lies, meaning to say, “I attained the first jhāna ... and my mind is free of the hindrance of anger,” while actually saying, “My mind is free of the hindrance of confusion,” when the listener understands there is an offence entailing expulsion when there are three characteristics; when the listener does not understand there is a serious offence when three conditions are fulfilled ... when seven conditions are fulfilled ... For one who deliberately lies, meaning to say, “I attained the second jhāna and the third jhāna and the fourth jhāna and the emptiness emancipation ... and arahantship and I have given up sense desire, renounced it, let it go, abandoned it, relinquished it, forsaken it, thrown it aside; and I have given up anger ... and I have given up confusion ... and my mind is free from the hindrance of sense desire ... of anger ... of confusion,” while actually saying, “I attained the first jhāna,” when the listener understands there is an offence entailing expulsion when there are three characteristics; when the listener does not understand there is a serious offence when three conditions are fulfilled ... when seven conditions are fulfilled ... For one who deliberately lies, meaning to say, “I attained the third jhāna and the fourth jhāna ... and my mind is free from the hindrance of confusion and I attained the first jhāna,” while actually saying, “I attained the second jhāna” ... there is a serious offence when three conditions are fulfilled ... when seven conditions are fulfilled ... For one who deliberately lies, meaning to say, “My mind is free from the hindrance of confusion and I attained the first jhāna and the second jhāna and the third jhāna and the fourth jhāna ... and my mind is free from the hindrance of sense desire,” while actually saying, “My mind is free from the hindrance of anger,” when the listener understands there is an offence entailing expulsion when there are three characteristics; when the listener does not understand there is a serious offence when three conditions are fulfilled ... when seven conditions are fulfilled ...

The section based on all expanded items is finished. The expanded permutation is finished

GROSS HINTING
For one who deliberately lies, saying, “He who lived in your dwelling attained the first jhāna ... is attaining ... has attained ... obtains the first jhāna ... masters the first jhāna ... has realised the first jhāna,” when the listener understands there is a serious offence when three conditions are fulfilled; when the listener does not understand there is an offence of bad conduct when three conditions are fulfilled ... when seven conditions are fulfilled: before he has lied ... in misrepresenting his sentiment (of what is true) ... For one who deliberately lies, saying, “he who lived in your dwelling attained the second jhāna ... the third jhāna ... the fourth jhāna ... the emptiness emancipation ... arahantship ... is attaining arahantship ... has realised arahantship” ... bad conduct when three conditions are fulfilled ... For one who deliberately lies, saying, “he who lived in your dwelling, that monk has given up sense desire ... has given up anger ... has given up confusion, renounced it, let it go, abandoned it, relinquished it, forsaken it, thrown it aside; that monk has a mind free from sense desire ... free from anger ... free from confusion” ... bad conduct when three conditions are fulfilled ... For one who deliberately lies, saying, “he who lives in your dwelling attained the first jhāna in an empty dwelling ... the second jhāna ... the third jhāna ... the fourth jhāna ... is attaining ... has attained ... obtains the fourth jhāna in an empty dwelling ... masters ... has realised the fourth jhāna in an empty dwelling” ... bad conduct when three conditions are fulfilled ... when seven conditions are fulfilled: before he has lied ... in misrepresenting his sentiment (of what is true).

The remainder should be expanded in the same way

For one who deliberately lies, saying, “he who made use of your dwelling ... who made use of your robes ... who made use of your almsfood ... who made use of your lodgings ... who made use of your medicinal requisites for the sick ... who has made use of your dwelling ... who has made use of your robes ... who has made use of your almsfood ... who has made use of your lodgings ... who has made use of your medicinal requisites for the sick ... because of whom you gave a dwelling ... because of whom you gave robes ... because of whom you gave almsfood ... because of whom you gave lodgings ... because of whom you gave medicinal requisites for the sick ... he attained the fourth jhāna in an empty dwelling ... he has realised the fourth jhāna in an empty dwelling,” when the listener understands there is a serious offence; when the listener does not understand there is an offence of bad conduct when three conditions are fulfilled ... when seven conditions are fulfilled: before he has lied, he knows he is going to lie; while lying, he knows he is lying; after he has lied, he knows he has lied; in misrepresenting his view (of what is true); in misrepresenting his belief (of what is true); in misrepresenting his acceptance (of what is true); in misrepresenting his sentiment (of what is true).

The abbreviated fifteen are finished

NON-OFFENCE CLAUSE

There is no offence (if one makes the claim) because of overestimation; for one not intending to make a claim; for one who is insane; for one who is deranged; for one who is overwhelmed by pain; for the first offender.¹

CASE RULINGS

Mnemonic list

Because of overestimation, in the wilderness, alms, a preceptor,² behaviour, Fetters, qualities in private, a dwelling, attended on, / Not difficult, energy, and then of death, fear friend, remorse,³ right, By energy, by being intent on exertion,⁴ then on feeling, two on enduring, /

¹ Vin-a 502 says that the monks from the banks of the Vaggumuda were beginners, therefore there was no offence for them. ² Upajjhā, a short form of upajjhāya, found in Vin 1.94; Vin 3.35; at Vin 4.326 upajjhā is feminine. ³ Vippaṭisārī: “strongly remembering something against (oneself), so generally ‘remorse,’” thus gs iii.125, n. 2 (on AN ii. 165 = PP 64). Cf. Vin 2.249 = AN ii.197 for the refrain: “there’s no need for remorse in thee,” which is the result of being exhorted on five scores on which no remorse ought to be set up. See gs iii.145. The word is also sometimes translated “regret, repentance.” Although I have translated kukkuccaṁ hoti as “was remorseful” and although kukkucca and vippaṭisārī are often found together, I keep “remorseful” also for vippaṭisārī, for “regret” seems not forceful enough, and “repentance” is now by Westerners associated with “repenting of a sin”—an idea foreign to Buddhism. Vippaṭisārī comes near to “bad conscience,” which is also remembering something against oneself. Words for conscience are sadly lacking in Pali, but this may be an attempt to express the idea of it, emerging in the sixth century B.C.
Five stories on a brahmin, three on declaring final knowledge, House, rejected sense-pleasures, then delight, set out, / Bones and lump are both\(^1\) cattle-butchers, the morsel is a poultry butcher, the sheep-butcher is flayed, The pig-butcher has swords, a deer-hunter knives, the torturer arrows, the horse trainer needles, / The slanderer is sewn, the corrupt magistrate has testicles that are a burden, An adulterer is submerged in a pit, the eater of dung was a wicked brahmin, / The flayed woman was an adulteress, the ugly woman was a fortune-teller, The sweltering woman scattered coals on a co-wife, the beheaded one was an executioner, / A monk, a nun, a probationary nun, a novice monk, a novice nun, These having gone forth in the training of Kassapa did bad deeds just then,\(^2\) / The Tapodā in Rājagaha, a fight, and on the plunging of elephants, The monk Sobhita, arabhant, can recall five hundred eons.

CASE DETAILS, PART 1

At one time a certain monk declared final knowledge\(^3\) because of overestimation. He became anxious, thinking, “The Master has laid down a training rule. Could it be that I have committed an offence entailing expulsion?” He informed the Master ...

“There is no offence, monk, when it is due to overestimation.”

At one time a certain monk lived in the wilderness because he

---

\(^1\) These two on feeling, if that means physical pain, seem to be included in the next, “on giving in.” Or, and this is more likely and was suggested by Oldenberg, Vin 3.272, “two stories appear to be wanting”, i.e those corresponding to ārādhana and vedanā. \(^2\) Ubho. \(^3\) Añña.
THE BOOK OF THE DISCIPLINE

wanted\(^1\) people to esteem him.\(^2\) People esteemed him. He became anxious ...

“Monk, there is no offence entailing expulsion. But, monks, one should not live in the wilderness because of a wish.\(^3\) If one does, there is an offence of bad conduct.”

____________

At one time a certain monk was going for alms because he wanted people to esteem him. People esteemed him. He became anxious ...

“Monk, there is no offence entailing expulsion. But, monks, one should not go for alms because of a wish. If one does, there is an offence of bad conduct.”

____________

Bu-Pj 4.8.3

At one time a certain monk said to another monk, “Friend, those who are pupils of our preceptor are all arahants.” He became anxious ...

He informed the Master.

“What was your intention, monk?”

“I wanted to make a claim, Master.”

“Monk, there is no offence entailing expulsion, but there is a serious offence.”

____________

BD 1.174

At one time a certain monk said to another monk, “Friend, those who are the students of our preceptor are all of great psychic potency, of great power.” He became anxious ...

“... but there is a serious offence.”

____________

Bu-Pj 4.8.4

At one time a certain monk walked up and down because he wanted people to esteem him ... stood because he wanted people to esteem him ... sat because he wanted people to esteem him ... laid

\(^1\) Paṇidhāya, gerund of paṇidhāhāti. Vin-a 502, paṭṭhanaṁ katvā, making a wish, cf. Ja i.68. For paṇidhāya, cf. AN iii.249 = AN iv.461, translated in Gradual Sayings as “set on gaining.” Sn-a i.99 on Sn i.42 explains paṇidhāya by ṭhapetvā, establishing.

\(^2\) Vin-a 502, “May people esteem me living in the jungle as being at the stage of arahanship, or of a learner, then I will become revered by the world, venerated, respected, worshipped.

\(^3\) Vatthabbaṁ, from √vas, to live, to dwell.
down because he wanted people to esteem him. People esteemed him. He became anxious ... He informed the Master ...

“Monk, there is no offence entailing expulsion. But, monks, one should not walk up and down ... stand ... sit ... lie down because of a wish. If one does, there is an offence of bad conduct.”

______________

At one time a certain monk claimed a super-human achievement to another monk: “Friend, I have abandoned the fetters.” He became anxious ... He informed the Master ...

“You, monk, have fallen into an offence entailing expulsion.”

______________

At one time a certain monk claimed a super-human achievement in private.¹ Another monk, knowing the mind of that monk, rebuked him: “Don’t speak like that, friend, you haven’t got it.” He became anxious ... He informed the Master ...

“Monk, there is no offence entailing expulsion, but there is an offence of bad conduct.”

______________

At one time a certain monk claimed a super-human achievement in private. A god rebuked him: “Bhante,² don’t speak like that, you haven’t got it.” He became anxious ... He informed the Master ...

“Monk, there is no offence entailing expulsion, but there is an offence of bad conduct.”

______________

At one time a certain monk said to a certain lay-follower: “Friend, whatever monk lives in your dwelling is an arahant.” Now he lived in that dwelling.³ He became anxious ...

“What was your intention, monk?”

“I wanted to make a claim, Master.”

¹ According to Vin-a 503 he said, “I am an arahan,” but as he did this not (really) believing it in his mind (na manasā cintitaṁ), it was a dukkāta offence. ² Note the way a fellow-monk uses āvuso in addressing a monk, while a non-monk, lay people, and, as here, a devatā, use bhante, honoured sir. ³ I.e., the lay-follower’s.
"There is no offence entailing expulsion, but there is a serious offence."

At one time a certain monk said to a certain lay-follower: "Friend, the one you attend on with the requisites of robes, alms-food, lodgings and medicines for the sick, he is an arahant." Now he was the one who was attended on with those requisites. He became anxious ...

"... but there is a serious offence."

At one time a certain monk was ill. The monks said to him: "Venerable Sir, do you have any super-human achievement?"

"Friends, it is not difficult to attain."

He became anxious and thought, "Those who are true disciples of the Master may speak thus, but I am not such a disciple.¹ Could it be that I have committed an offence entailing expulsion?" He informed the Master.

"What was your intention, monk?"

"I did not intend to make a claim, Master."

"There is no offence for one who does not intend to make a claim."²

At one time a certain monk was ill. The monks said to him: "Venerable Sir, do you have any super-human achievement?"

"Friends, it is not difficult to declare final knowledge.” He became anxious ... He informed the Master.

"What was your intention, monk?"

"I did not intend to make a claim, Master.”³

"There is no offence for one who does not intend to make a claim.”

¹ = below, BD 1.180. ² Anullapanádhippáyassa. Vin-a 502 says, kohaññe icchācāre athatvā, not wanting to have his needs filled by hypocrisy (or deceit). Critical Pali Dictionary gives, “not intending to show off, to impose,” under anulla°. ³ Vin-a 503, “it is not difficult for a virtuous man, who has set insight going to declare profound knowledge, he is competent to attain arahanship.” But this monk did not reckon himself in this category.
At one time a certain monk was ill. The monks said to him: “Venerable Sir, do you have any super-human achievement?”

“Friends, an achievement is to be reached by one who is energetic.” He became anxious ... He informed the Master ...

“There is no offence for one who does not intend to make a claim.”

At one time a certain monk was ill. The monks said to him, “Friend, do not be afraid.”

“Friends, I am not afraid of death.” He became anxious ...

“There is no offence for one who does not intend to make a claim.”

At one time a certain monk was ill. The monks said to him: “Venerable Sir, do you have any super-human achievement?”

“Friends, an achievement is to be reached by one who is rightly intent.”² He became anxious ...

“There is no offence for one who does not intend to make a claim.”

At one time a certain monk was ill ...

“Friends, an achievement is to be reached by one who is energetic.”³ He became anxious ...

“There is no offence for one who does not intend to make a claim.”

At one time a certain monk was ill ...

¹ Vippaṭisārī, cf. above, BD 1.171, n. 3. Vin-a 504, “let the monk in whom remorse arises be afraid, but I am not remorseful, the moral precepts are completely pure, why then should I be afraid of death?” ² Sammā payutta. ³ As above, BD 1.176.
“Friends, an achievement is to be reached by one who is intent on exertion.”¹ He became anxious ...

“There is no offence for one who does not intend to make a claim.”

At one time a certain monk was ill. The monks said to him:

“We hope, friend, that you are bearing up, we hope that you are comfortable?”

“Friends, it is not possible for just anyone to endure this.” He became anxious ... He informed the Master ...

“There is no offence for one who does not intend to make a claim.”

At one time a certain monk was ill ...

“Friends, it is not possible for an ordinary person to endure this.”² He became anxious ...

“Monk, what was your intention?”

“I intended to make a claim, Master.”

“There is no offence entailing expulsion, but there is a serious offence.”

At one time a certain brahmin invited the monks: “Let the good sirs, the arahants, come.”³

They became anxious and said: “But we are not arahants, and yet this brahmin addresses us as if we were. What should we do?” They informed the Master.

“Monks, there is no offence in regard to what is spoken in faith.”

At one time a certain brahmin invited the monks: “Let the good sirs, the arahants, be seated ... Let the good sirs, the arahants, eat ...

¹ Yuttayoga. This word also occurs at Ja i.65 and is translated “devout” (Buddhist Birth Stories, second edition, p.178). Yuñjati (of which yutta is past participle) occurs at Ja iv.131, Ja v.369, with ghaṭatī vāyamati, all meaning to strive, to endeavour. Yoga (yogya) has sense of “fit for.” ² Vin-a 504, surrounding him. ³ āyantu, from ā + ā and meaning āgacchantu. Vin-a 504, “Whoever said this would also have said: ‘Prepare seats for all the arahans, give water for washing the feet, let the arahans wash their feet.’”
Let the good sirs, the arahants, be satisfied ... Let the good sirs, the arahants, go” ...

They became anxious and said ...

“Monks, there is no offence in regard to what is spoken in faith.”¹

At one time a certain monk claimed a super-human achievement to another monk: “Friend, I have abandoned the corruptions.” He became anxious ...

“You, monk, have fallen into an offence entailing expulsion.”

At one time a certain monk ... “Friend, I have these qualities.” He became anxious ...

“You, monk, have committed an offence entailing expulsion.”

At one time a certain monk ... “Friend, I conform to these qualities.” He became anxious ...

“You, monk, have committed an offence entailing expulsion.”

At one time the relations of a certain monk said to him: “Come, bhante, live in a house.”

“Friends, one like me is incapable of living in a house.” He became anxious ...

¹ Pasādabhaññe. Apart from the meaning of this very rare word, it is noteworthy that it is in the locative, instead of, as is usually the case after āpatti and anāpatti, in the genitive. Vin-a 504 says, “The meaning being: instigated (samussāhitassa) through his own power of faith, being one who goes by faith.” Cf. for bhañña (for which Pali-English Dictionary refers to bhā) Ja v.317, Ja v.318. The former of these passages reads bhaññaṁ with variant reading haṁñaṁ, bhūjiṁ, and the latter explains by saying bhā tīratanas’ etam nāmaṁ. But I think that here bhañña derives from ḍbhāś, to speak, and not from ḍbhās, to shine. At An ii.31; Sn iii.72; Mn iii.78 we find Ukkalā vassa-bhañña. Ks iii.63 translates vassa-bhañña as “preachers in retreat” — i.e., during vassa, the rains. But Sn-a ii.279 says vasso ca Bhañño ca, and evidently means that these are names of people in certain districts, like Ukkalajanapada-vāsino; while Mn-a iv.136 declares this to be the case: Vasso ca Bhañño cā ti dve janā. Cf. Points of Controversy 95, n. 2. I do not, however, think that the pasāda-bhaññe of Vinaya above can refer to the Bhañña people.
“There is no offence, monk, for one who does not intend to make a claim.”

At one time the relations of a certain monk said to him: “Come, bhante, enjoy the pleasures of the senses.”

“Friends, the pleasures of the senses have been rejected by me.”

He became anxious ...

“There is no offence, monk, for one who does not intend to make a claim.”

At one time the relations of a certain monk said to him: “Come, bhante, enjoy yourself.”

“Friends, I am enjoying myself with the highest enjoyment.”

He became anxious, thinking: “Those who are true disciple of the Master may speak thus, but I am not such a disciple. Could it be that I have committed an offence entailing expulsion?” He informed the Master.

“Monk, what was your intention?”

“I did not intend to make a claim, Master.”

“There is no offence for one who does not intend to make a claim.”

At one time a number of monks entered the rains in a certain monastery, making this agreement: “Whoever sets out from this monastery first, we will know as an arahant.”

A certain monk thought, “let them know me as an arahant,” and he set out first from that monastery. He became anxious. He informed the Master ...

“You, monk, have fallen into an offence entailing expulsion.”

1 Vin-a 505, āvāṭā ti āvāritā nivāritā paṭikkhitā ti attho. Had they in truth been rejected he would have been an arahant. Before they attained this supreme state, monks were not indifferent to the beauties of nature, as for example some of the Theragāthā show. 2 On abhirati and abhiramati see above, BD 1.114. 3 Vin-a 505, “the monk says, ‘Because there is no lack of exposition and questionings on the teaching, and because I enjoy this state of things, I say I am enjoying myself with the highest enjoyment.’” 4 = above, BD 1.175.
At one time the Buddha, the Master, was staying at Rājagaha in the Bamboo Grove at the squirrels’ feeding place. Now at that time Venerable Lakkhana and Venerable Mahāmoggallāna were staying on Mount Vulture’s Peak. Then, in the morning, Venerable Mahāmoggallāna dressed, took his bowl and robe, approached Venerable Lakkhana and said: “Friend Lakkhana, let us enter Rājagaha for alms.”

“Yes, friend,” Venerable Lakkhana replied.

Then, as he was descending from Mount Vulture’s Peak, Venerable Mahāmoggallāna smiled at a certain place. Venerable Lakkhana said to him: “Friend, why are you smiling?”

“This is not the right time, friend, for this question. Ask me in the presence of the Master.”

Then, after their meal and after returning from alms-round, Venerable Lakkhana and Venerable Mahāmoggallāna approached the Master and sat down to one side. Venerable Lakkhana then said to Venerable Mahāmoggallāna:

“Just now, as the Venerable Mahāmoggallāna was descending from Mount Vulture’s Peak, he smiled at a certain place. Why, friend, did you smile?”

“As I was coming down from Mount Vulture’s Peak, I saw a skeleton flying through the air, and vultures, crows and hawks were in

---

¹ Sn ii.254–262 from here to end of Bu-Pj 4.9.3 below. ² Vin-a 506 = Sn-a ii.216, “He from among a thousand Jaṭilas (matted hair ascetics) received the ‘Come, monk’ for upasampadā ordination. He attained arahanship at the end of the Discourse on Burning. He should be called one great disciple (eko mahā-sāvako). Inasmuch as he is endowed with this mark and is possessed of a Brahma-like existence, he is called Lakkhana. Mahā-Moggallāna, the second great disciple, attained arahanship on the seventh day after he had gone forth into homelessness.” This mention of Moggallāna as second to Lakkhana is curious, for in the Suttas he is only ever linked with Sāriputta. See Vin 1.33ff. for the story of the conversion of the Jaṭilas. ³ Vehāsagata, or going above ground, cf. above, BD 1.79, n. 7. ⁴ Vin-a 507 calls these yakka vultures, yakka crows and yakka hawks, probably meaning that these birds eat flesh. Cf. the predatory yakkhas, above, BD 1.146.
close pursuit, striking it\(^1\) between the ribs,\(^2\) while it uttered cries of distress. Then, friend, I thought how amazing and astounding it is that such a being should exist, such a spirit, such a state of existence.”\(^3\)

The monks criticized and denounced him: “Venerable Mahāmoggallāna is claiming a super-human achievement.”\(^4\)

Then the Master addressed the monks:

Monks, there are disciples who possess vision and knowledge,\(^5\) such that they can see, know and witness such a thing. Previously I too have seen that being, but I didn’t speak about it. If I had, others would not have believed me and that would have been for their harm and suffering for long time. That being, monks, was a cattle butcher\(^6\) in this very Rājagaha. As a result of his deeds he was tormented\(^7\) in

---

\(^1\) Vitudenti. Vin-a 507 reads vituddhentī ti vinivijhitvā gacchanti vitudanti ti (variant reading vitudenti ti) vā pātho. SN i.255 reads vitacchentī vibhajentī, as in the cases below, with variant reading vitudenti for vitacchenti and omitting vibhajenti. \(^2\) Pāṣula, with variant reading pāṣula; SN ii.255 reads phāṣula. \(^3\) Attabhāvapaṭilābha. \(^4\) Omitted at SN ii.255. \(^5\) Cakkhubhūta, bhūta being past participle of bhavati. At AN v.226 the tathāgata is called cakkhubhūto nāṇabhūto (as above) and dharmabhūto brahmabhūto, translated at CS v.157 “he has become the eye, he has become knowledge,” etc. Vin-a 508 says, cakkhubhūtaṁ jataṁ uppannaṁ tesañi cakkhubhūtaṁ, bhūtacakkhukā uppanacakkhukā. Cakkhuṁ uppadetvā viharantipī eva nayo. AN-a on AN v.226 (Siamese edition) says, cakkhubhūto cakkhu viya bhūto nibbatto. Nāṇabhūto ti nāṇasabhāvo. (AN-a also explains bhūta in dhammadhāma and brahma by sabhāva.) \(^6\) Vin-a 508, “at the time of his passing from the Pit (naraka) his outward appearance was a mass of bones ... he has arisen as a departed one (peta) who is a skeleton.” Of his deeds, tassa kammassa explained Tassa nāṇācetananāhi ayūhi tassa aparāpiyarikammassa. \(^7\) paccitvā, passive of pacati. Paccati is literally to be boiled or cooked, Pali-English Dictionary saying, “Nearly always applied to the torture of boiling in niraya, where it is meant literally.” But I think that the idea (found in the active) of ripening and maturing for the next rebirth is also intended. The context brings out this point. One was not condemned to eternal damnation. Vin-a 508 also emphasises this by saying that through what remained of the result of his deeds after his reinstatement (paṭisandhi) in naraka, he took on reinstatement again-among the petas. I have translated paccitvā literally, since for lack of an English word to express the idea of being boiled to a ripeness which entails a change, it seems to me preferable to “has been punished” (ks ii.170), as this conveys the idea still less of the past deeds maturing until the individual is ready for a new rebirth.
hell for many years, for many hundreds of years, for many thousands of years, for many hundreds of thousands of years. And now, because of the remaining result of his actions, he is experiencing such a state of existence. Moggallāna spoke truly. There is no offence for Moggallāna.”¹

“As I was coming down from Mount Vulture’s Peak, I saw a lump of flesh flying through the air, and vultures, crows and hawks were in close pursuit, tearing at it and pulling it to pieces, while it uttered cries of distress.” ...

“Monks, that being was a cattle-butcher in this very Rājagaha. ...”

“As I was coming down from Mount Vulture’s Peak, I saw a morsel of flesh flying through the air, and vultures, crows and hawks were in close pursuit, tearing at it and pulling it to pieces,² while it uttered cries of distress.” ...

“Monks, that being was a poultry butcher³ in this very Rājagaha. ...”

“As I was coming down from Mount Vulture’s Peak, I saw a flayed man flying through the air, and vultures, crows and hawks were in close pursuit, tearing at him and pulling him to pieces, while he uttered cries of distress.” ...

“Monks, that being was a sheep-butcher⁴ in this very Rājagaha. ...

¹ Omitted at SN ii.256. ² Cf. MN i.364, where the simile is possibly taken from this Vinaya passage. MN i.364 reads, vitaccheyyuṁ virajeyyuṁ, translated Further Dialogues of the Buddha i.261, “to tear and rend it.” Virajenti is a variant reading for vibhajenti at both Vin 3.105 above and SN ii.256, and it would not seem unintelligible in these contexts. ³ Vin-a 509, “at the time of his passing from the Pit (naraka) his outward appearance was a piece of flesh, therefore he arose as a departed one who is a piece of flesh.” ⁴ orabbhika, Vin-a 509, elake vidhitvā, having skinned them during his life, afterwards his appearance was that of a skinless ram’s body, and therefore he has arisen as a departed one who is flayed (nicchavipeto).
“As I was coming down from Mount Vulture’s Peak, I saw a man who had body hairs of swords flying through the air. Again and again those sword went in and out of his body, while he uttered cries of distress.” ...

“Monks, that being was a butcher of pigs¹ in this very Rājagaha. ...

“As I was coming down ... I saw a man with body hairs of knives flying through the air. Again and again those knives went in and out of his body, while he uttered cries of distress.”...

“Monks, that being was a deer-hunter² in this very Rājagaha. ...

“As I was coming down ... I saw a man with body hairs of arrows flying through the air. Again and again those arrows ...

“Monks, that being was a torturer³ in this very Rājagaha. ...

“As I was coming down ... I saw a man with body hair of needles flying through the air. Again and again those needles ...”

“Monks, that being was a horse trainer⁴ in this very Rājagaha. ...

As I was coming down ... I saw a man with body hair of needles flying through the air. Again and again those needles ...

“Monks, that being was a horse trainer⁴ in this very Rājagaha. ...)
through his mouth, entered his mouth and came out through his breast, entered his breast and came out through his stomach, entered his stomach and came out through his thighs, entered his thighs and came out through his calves, entered his calves and came out through his feet, while he uttered cries of distress.” ...

“Monks, that being was a slanderer in this very Rājakha...”

“As I was coming down... I saw a man who had testicles like pots¹ flying through the air. When he walked, he had to lift his testicles on to his shoulder, when he sat down he sat on top of his testicles. Vultures, crows and hawks were in close pursuit, tearing at him and pulling him to pieces, while he uttered cries of distress.” ...

“Monks, that being was a corrupt magistrate in this very Rājakha. ...”

“As I was coming down... I saw a man, head and all, submerged in a dung-pit...”

“Monks, that being was an adulterer in this very Rājakha. ...”

“As I was coming down... I saw a man, head and all, submerged in a dung-pit and eating dung with both hands...”

“Monks, that being was a wicked brahmin in this very Rājakha. At the time of Kassapa, the fully Awakened One, he invited the Sangha of monks to a meal. He filled a trough with dung, announced the time and said: ‘Sirs, eat as much as you like and take the rest away with you.’...”

¹ kumbhaṇḍa. Note word-play on aṇḍa. Vin-a 510 = sn-a ii.220 says, kumbhamattā mahāghaṭappamāṇā aṇḍā ahesuṁ, while Ja iii.147 defines as kumbhamattarahass-aṅgā mahodarā yakkhā. Our Commentaries say that as he had made others suffer by his secret wrong-doing, so now he suffers in his secret organs. At DN-a i.73 a kumbhaṇḍa is placed on the back of a horse as a sign of instability. Kumbhaṇḍī at Vism 183, in connection with latā, creeper, translated “pumpkin.” This is evidently the secondary meaning of the word.

251
“As I was coming down ... I saw a flayed woman flying through the air. Vultures ... were pulling her to pieces, while she uttered cries of distress.”

“Monks, this woman was an adulteress¹ in this very Rājagaha. ...”

“As I was coming down ... I saw a foul-smelling and ugly woman flying through the air. Vultures ... were pulling her to pieces ...”

“Monks, that woman was a fortune-teller² in this very Rājagaha. ...”

“As I was coming down ... I saw a woman who was roasting, sweltering and sooty³ flying through the air ... while she uttered cries of distress.” ...

“Monks, this woman was the chief queen of the King of Kālinga. Being the jealous sort, she threw out her rival⁴ and scattered a brazier of burning coals over her. ...”

“As I was coming down ... I saw the headless trunk of a body flying through the air. Its eyes and mouth were on its chest. Vultures ... were pulling it to pieces while it uttered cries of distress.” ...

“Monks, that being was an executioner called Hārika⁵ in this very Rājagaha. ...”

“As I was coming down ... I saw a monk flying through the air.

¹ Inasmuch as she got her pleasures with other men, not with her own husband, she is reborn flayed so as to undergo a painful contact, being deprived of pleasant touch. Vin-a 510.  ² Vin-a 511, deceiving the people by taking gifts of flowers and perfumes from them, saying, “now there will be increase for you.”  ³ upakkaṁ okilinīṁ okiriṇīṁ. Buddhaghosa at Vin-a 511 says, “she fell on to a heap of coals ... therefore, she is shrivelled by the agonising fires, okiliṁ, and her body inflamed, drop upon drop oozing from her body, okiriṇĩ, and surrounded by charcoal; from below the charcoal was on both sides of her, like the red flowers of the kiṁsuka tree; the charcoal fell from the air on her.”  ⁴ She was a dancer who had pleased the King by massaging him.  ⁵ Vin-a 512, for a long time he had beheaded thieves at the king’s command. Therefore he was reborn headless.
His outer robe was ablaze and burning,¹ his bowl was ablaze and burning, his waistband was ablaze and burning, his body was ablaze and burning, and he was uttering cries of distress.”...

“Monks, during the time of the Buddha Kassapa’s dispensation, that monk was a bad monk.”²

“As I was coming down ... I saw a nun ... I saw a probationary nun ... a novice monk ... a novice nun³ flying through the air. Her outer robe was ablaze and burning, her bowl was ablaze and burning, her waistband was ablaze and burning, her body was ablaze and burning, and she was uttering cries of distress. Then, friend, I thought how amazing and astounding it is that such a being should exist, such a spirit, such a state of existence.”

The monks criticised and denounced him: “Venerable Moggallāna is claiming a super-human achievement.”⁴

Then the Master addressed the monks:

“Monks, there are disciples who possess vision and knowledge such that they can see, know and witness such a thing. Previously, monks, I too have seen this novice nun, but I did not speak about it. If I had, others would not have believed me and that would have been for their harm and suffering for long time. During the time of Buddha Kassapa’s dispensation, that novice nun was a bad novice nun. As a result of her deeds, she was tormented in hell for many years, for many hundreds of years, for many thousands of years, for many hundreds of thousands of years. And now, because of the remaining result of her actions, she is experiencing such a state of existence. Moggallāna spoke truly. There is no offence for Moggallāna.”

Then Venerable Mahāmoggallāna addressed the monks:

¹ Quoted at MN-i.91, and said to refer to the monk Kapila. Vin-a mentions no names. ² He went about enjoying himself to his heart’s content, therefore he was boiled in hell for an interval between Buddhas, and then arising in a peta-world he arose with an existence like a monk. ³ Feminine in Table of Contents, above, BD 1.172. ⁴ Omitted at SN ii.261.
“Friends, this stream the Tapodā flows from a lake with beautiful water—cool, sweat and pure—with lovely and charming fords, with an abundance of fishes and turtles, and with blooming lotuses the size of wheels. And yet the Tapodā is hot.”

The monks criticised and denounced him: “How can the Venerable Mahāmoggallāna say, ‘Friends, this stream the Tapodā flows from a lake of beautiful water ... And yet this Tapodā is hot.’ Venerable Mahāmoggallāna is claiming a super-human achievement.” And they informed the Master.

“Monks, the Tapodā flows from a lake of beautiful water ... with blooming lotuses the size of wheels. But the Tapodā runs between the two great hells,¹ that is why it is hot. Moggallāna spoke truly. There is no offence for Moggallāna.”

At one time King Seniya Bimbisāra of Magadha was defeated in battle with the Licchavis. Then the king collected his armies and beat the Licchavis. Delight about the battle spread about: “The Licchavis were defeated by the king!”

Then the Venerable Mahāmoggallāna addressed the monks:

“Friends, the king was defeated by the Licchavis.”

The monks criticised and denounced him: “How can Venerable Moggallāna say, ‘Friends, the king was defeated by the Licchavis,’ when delight about the battle is spreading about thus: ‘The Licchavis were defeated by the king!’ The Venerable Mahāmoggallāna is claiming a super-human achievement.” They informed the Master.

“Monks, first the king was defeated by the Licchavis and then, after he had collected his army, the king beat the Licchavis. Moggallāna spoke truly. There is no offence for Moggallāna.”

Then the Venerable Mahāmoggallāna addressed the monks:

¹ Tapoda means “boiling waters.” Vin-a 512, says, “they say that the town of Rajagaha is near the world of the departed, and this Tapoda comes there between the two great red pits of the hells.” Cf. below, BD 1.274, n. 6. At AN v.196 Ānanda and the wanderer Kokanuda went to this river to bathe their limbs.
“Friends, after attaining an imperturbable samādhi on the banks of the river Sappinikā,¹ I heard the noise of elephants plunging in, emerging and trumpeting.”²

The monks criticised and denounced him: “How can Venerable Mahāmoggallāna say such a thing. He is claiming a super-human achievement.” They informed the Master.

“Monks, there is such a samādhi, but it is not wholly purified.³ Moggallāna spoke truly. There is no offence for Moggallāna.”

Then the Venerable Sobhita⁴ addressed the monks: “Friends, I can recall five hundred eons.”

The monks criticised and denounced him: “How can Venerable Sobhita say, ‘I can recall five hundred eons’? He is claiming a super-human achievement.” They informed the Master.

“Monks, Sobhita has this ability, and that was just one birth. Sobhita spoke truly. There is no offence for Sobhita.”

The fourth offence entailing expulsion is finished

Venerables, the four rules entailing expulsion have been recited. If a monk commits any one of them, he is no longer in communion

---

¹ Mentioned also at SN i.153; AN ii.29, AN ii 176, Sappini; at AN i.185, Sappinikā; cf. also Vinaya Texts i.254, n. 2. Usually translated the “Snake River.” The wanderers had a park on its banks. It was near Rājagaha. ² Vin-a 513, “plunging down into the deep water, and bathing and drinking there, and taking up water with their trunks, they mingle together and cross over.” ³ parisuddha. Vin-a 513f. “They say that the theras attained arahanship on the seventh day after he went forth, and had mastery in the eight attainments, but not having purified himself well in the obstructions to contemplation ... and rising up from musing and hearing the sound of the elephants, he heard it between the attainments. Of this he was aware.” ⁴ AN i.25 says, that he is the chief of the monks remembering his former rebirths. In his verses, Thag 165, Thag 166, he twice repeats that he remembered five hundred kalpas in a single night. At Atthasalīni 32 he is said to be the third in the line of theras who conveyed the Abhidhamma up to the time of the Third Council.
with the monks. As before, so after, he is expelled and not in communion. In regard to this I ask the Venerable ones: are you pure in this? A second time I ask: are you pure in this? A third time I ask: are you pure in this? The Venerable ones are pure in this and therefore silent. I will remember it thus.

Sexual intercourse, stealing, person, super, the four offences entailing expulsion, the foundation is cut without a doubt.

The chapter on offences entailing expulsion is finished

---

¹ Vinaya Texts i.5, n. 2, says that the phrase yathā pure tathā pacchā “probably means that the monk is irrevocably defeated. He must remain for ever in the condition (of permanent exclusion from the Order) into which he has brought himself.” Vin-a 516 says, “as in his time as a householder, at the time when he was not (yet) ordained, and as after when he has fallen into defeat, he is not in communion; there is not for him communion with the monks at the Uposatha (observance-day), the pavaraṇā (ceremony at the end of the rains), under the rule of the Pātimokkha, or at the legal acts of the Order.”

² Chejjavatthu. See chejja (śched) above, BD 1.75, meaning maiming.
At one time the enlightened one, the lord, was staying at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s park. Now at that time the venerable Seyyasaka¹ led the Brahma-life, dissatisfied.² Because of this he was thin, wretched, his colour bad, yellowish, the veins showing all over his body.³ The venerable Udāyin saw the venerable Seyyasaka thin, wretched, his colour bad, yellowish, his veins showing all over his body. Seeing him thus, he said to the venerable Seyyasaka: “Reverend Seyyasaka, why are you thin, wretched ... the veins showing all over your body? Perhaps it is that you, reverend Seyyasaka, lead the Brahma-life, dissatisfied?”

“It is so, your reverence,” he said.

“No then, you, reverend Seyyasaka, eat as much as you like, sleep as much as you like, bath⁴ as much as you like: eating as much as you like, sleeping as much as you like, bathing as much as you like, if dissatisfaction arises in you and passion assails⁵ your heart, then

---

¹ At Vin 2.7ff. he is represented as being tiresome in various ways. ² anabhirato see above, BD 1.114, for discussion on this term. Vin-a 517 says on this term, vikkhitacitto kāmarāgaparīṭhena pariṇāyhamāno na pana ghībhāvam patthayamāno, upset in his mind, burning with a fever of passion and sense-desires, but not wanting the household state. ³ Stock-phrase. ⁴ Vin-a 517, anointing the body with clay, rubbing on chunam. ⁵ A stock-phrase, rāgo cittaṁ anuddhaṅsati, as at MN i.26; SN i.186; AN ii.126. Vin-a 518 says, kāmarāgo cittaṁ dhaṁseti padhaṁseti vikkhipati c’eva milāpeti ca. MN-a 1.142 explains anuddhaṅsessati by hiṁsissati adhibhavissati.
emit semen using your hand.”¹

“But, your reverence, are you sure that it is suitable to act like this?”

“Yes, your reverence, I do this.”

Then the venerable Seyyasaka ate as much as he liked, slept as much as he liked, bathed as much as he liked; but having eaten as much as he liked, slept as much as he liked, bathed as much as he liked, dissatisfaction arose, and passion assailed his heart, so he emitted semen using his hand. Then in a short time the venerable Seyyasaka was nice-looking with rounded features, of a bright complexion and a clear skin. So the monks who were the friends of the venerable Seyyasaka spoke thus to the venerable Seyyasaka:

“Formerly, reverend Seyyasaka, you were thin, wretched, of a bad colour, yellowish, with the veins showing all over your body. But now, at present, you are nice-looking with rounded features, of a bright complexion and a clear skin. Why now, do you take medicine,² reverend Seyyasaka?”

“I do not take medicine, your reverences, but I am eating as much as I like, I am sleeping as much as I like, I am bathing as much as I like; then eating as much as I like, sleeping as much as I like, bathing as much as I like, if dissatisfaction arises in me and passion assails the heart, I emit semen using my hand.”

“But do you, reverend Seyyasaka, eat the gifts of faith³ with the very same hand as that which you use to emit semen?”

“Yes, your reverences,” he said.

Those who were modest monks became annoyed, vexed and angry, saying:

¹ Vin-a 518, “Thus will your mind become one-pointed. The teacher is said to have taught this.” At Vin-a 517 it is said that Seyyasaka’s teacher is LālUdāyin, “an unsteady monk.” This therā LālUdāyin is mentioned at Dhp-a 2.123 as having the reputation of saying the wrong thing; at Ja 1.123 as coming into conflict with Dabba the Mallian over food-tickets; and at Ja 2.164 as being extremely nervous and unable to talk. ² bhesajjaṁ karosi. ³ saddhā-deyya, Vin-a is silent, but Dhp-a 1.81 explains as kammañ ca phalañ ca idhalokañ ca paralokañ ca saddahitvā dinnāñi.
“How can the venerable Seyyasaka emit semen in this way?”

Then these monks, having rebuked the venerable Seyyasaka in various ways, told this matter to the lord. Then the lord on this occasion, in this connection, having had the order of monks convened, asked the venerable Seyyasaka:

“Is it true, as is said, that you, Seyyasaka, using your hand, emit semen?”

“It is true, lord,” he said.

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked him, saying: “It is not fit, foolish man, it is not becoming, it is not suitable, it is not worthy of a recluse, it is not right, it is not to be done. How can you, foolish man, emit semen using your hand? Foolish man, have I not uttered dhamma in many ways for the stilling of passion,¹ and not for the sake of passion, taught dhamma for the sake of being devoid of the fetters, and not for the sake of being bound, taught dhamma for the sake of being without grasping,² and not for the sake of grasping? How can you, foolish man, while dhamma is taught by me for the sake of passionlessness, strive after passion? How can you, while dhamma is taught for the sake of being devoid of the fetters, strive after being bound? How can you, while dhamma is taught for the sake of being without grasping, strive after grasping? Foolish man, have I not taught dhamma in various ways for the stilling of passion, taught dhamma for the subduing of conceit, for the restraint of thirst, for the elimination of attachment, for the cutting through the round of becomeings, for the destruction of craving, for passionlessness, for stopping, for waning? Foolish man, have I not declared in various ways the destruction of the pleasures of the senses, declared the full understanding of ideas of the pleasures of the senses, declared the restraint of the thirst for pleasures of the senses, declared the elimination of thoughts of pleasures of the senses, declared the allaying of the fever of pleasures of the senses? Foolish man, it is not for the benefit of unbelievers, nor for increase in the number of believers, ¹ = above, BD 1.35, except that in this second passage the lord is represented as speaking. Cf. AN ii.34. ² Anupādāna, sa-upādāna.

but it is, foolish man, to the detriment of unbelievers as well as of believers, and it causes wavering in some.”

Then the lord having rebuked the venerable Seyyasaka in various ways on account of his difficulty in maintaining his state ... said:

“... Thus, monks, this course of training should be set forth:

Intentional emission of semen is a matter entailing a formal meeting of the Order.”¹

Thus this course of training for monks was made known to the lord.

____________________

Now at that time, monks, having eaten abundant food, went to sleep, thoughtless and careless. While they were sleeping, thoughtless and careless, one of them emitted semen as the result of a dream. These were remorseful and said²: “The course of training made known by the lord says that intentional emission of semen is a matter requiring a formal meeting of the Order; and because of a dream one of us (did this). Now is this intention permitted? What now if we have fallen into an offence requiring a formal meeting of the Order?” They told this matter to the lord. He said:

“Monks, this was the intention, but it does not apply.³ monks, this course of training should be set forth:

---

¹ Saṅghādisesa. Cf. AN ii.242. Vin-a 522 says, saṅgho ādimhi c’ eva sese ca icchitabbo assā ti saṅghādiseso. This explanation was noted by CHILDE: an offence to be dealt with by a saṅghakamma in the beginning, ādi and in the remaining cases, sesa. See below, Old Commentary’s explanation which makes clear the first stage, the placing on probation; the second stage of sending back to the beginning of the probation; the third stage, the mānatta discipline; and the last stage, the rehabilitation. This type of offence is next in gravity after the Pārājikas. Because it cannot be settled by many people or by one man (Old Commentary) it therefore has to be settled by the Order, which presumably has to be convened for the purpose, as the above incident shows. Editor at Vinaya Texts i.7, n. 1, notes that, “these thirteen offences give rise to the various saṅghakammas ... which are explained in detail in the third Khandhaka of the Cūḷavagga.” ² These first sentences recur at Vin 1.294. Cf. Kv 164 where the matter of this story formed the controverted point of one of the early debates on arahans. ³ = above, BD 1.159, and see n. 1.
Intentional emission of semen except during a dream is an offence requiring a formal meeting of the Order.”

Intentional means: a transgression committed knowingly, consciously, deliberately.\(^1\)

Semen means: there are* ten kinds of semen ...

Emission means: the removal from the place is called emission.

Except during a dream means: setting the dream aside.

Offence requiring a formal meeting of the Order means: the Order places him on probation\(^2\) on account of the offence, it sends him back to the beginning,\(^3\) it inflicts the mānatta discipline;\(^4\) it rehabilitates\(^5\); it is not many people, it is not one man; therefore it is called an offence which in the earlier as well as the later stages (requires) a formal meeting of the Order. A synonym for this class of offence is a work;\(^6\) therefore, again, it is called (an offence which in the earlier as well as the later stages requires) a formal meeting of the Order.\(^7\)

\(^1\) = above, \textit{BD} 1.126, and see n. 3. \(^2\) \textit{parivāsaṁ deti}. Cf. \textit{Vin} 2.7. Rules for monks placed on probation are given at \textit{Vin} 2.31ff. At \textit{Vin} 2.40 Udāyin was placed on probation for one day, since he had concealed this first \textit{saṅghādisesa} for one day. See \textit{Vinaya Texts} ii.384, n. 1, for the four principal kinds of probation, and for Seyyasaka’s conduct. At \textit{Vin} 1.69 it is said that a person who was formerly an adherent of another sect and who asks for ordination should be put on probation for four months, and the measures to be taken for the proper carrying out of this step are stated. Valid and invalid proceedings are given at \textit{Vin} 1.320ff. \(^3\) I.e., of his probationary term. Cf. \textit{Vin} 2.7. At \textit{Vin} 2.34 rules for those thrown back to the beginning are given: they are the same as for those placed on probation. \(^4\) This appears to be much like being placed on probation, \textit{cf. Vin} 2.35. At \textit{Vin} 2.45 Udāyin underwent mānatta for six days. For the correct carrying out of this discipline see below, \textit{BD} 1.328. \(^5\) The way in which a monk should ask for rehabilitation is given at \textit{Vin} 2.39 and \textit{cf. below, \textit{BD} 1.328.} \(^6\) \textit{kamma}, possibly meaning \textit{saṅghakamma}: an act or ceremony, for the infliction of the penalty, to be performed by an assembly of monks met together in solemn conclave. Probably \textit{kamma} has here an ancient technical meaning. \(^7\) Cf. \textit{Vin} 4.225, the first \textit{Bhikkhuni-saṅghādisesa}. Here “inflicts mānatta” is apparently substituted for “places on probation,” which is not mentioned.
(The whole of Bu-Ss 1.3, Vin 3.112–Vin.3.115, because of the outspokenness and crudeness which it contains, and which seems to be inseparable from early literatures, appears unsuitable for incorporation in a translation designed principally for Western readers.)

He aims at it, makes the effort, it is emitted—an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order. He aims at it, makes the effort, it is not emitted—a grave offence. He aims at it, does not make the effort, it is emitted—not an offence. He aims at it, does not make the effort, it is not emitted—not an offence. He does not aim at it, he makes the effort, it is emitted—not an offence. He does not aim at it, does not make the effort, it is emitted—not an offence. He does not aim at it, does not make the effort, it is not emitted—not an offence.

_______________

There is no offence if he was dreaming, if there was no intentional emission, if he was mad, unhinged, in pain, a beginner.

_______________

MNEMONIC LIST

A dream, excrement and urine, reflection, and about hot water,

Medicine, itching, the way, the bladder,
a hot room for bathing-purposes, making an effort,

And a novice, and asleep, the thigh,

he pressed with the fists,

In the air, firmness, he meditated on, an aperture, he hit with a stick, /

In the stream, muddy water, running, a twist of flowers, a lotus,

Sand, mud, water, lying down, and with the thumbs.

_______________

At one time while a certain monk was dreaming he emitted semen. He was remorseful and said: “What now if I have fallen into an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order?” That monk told this matter to the lord. He said: “There is no offence for the monk because he was dreaming.”

_______________
MONKS’ FORMAL MEETING (SAÑGHĀDISESA) 1

(The reasons for not including the remainder of BD 1.5 in this translation are the same as those for not including BD 1.3 above.)

Told is the First Offence entailing a formal Meeting of the Order
At one time the enlightened one, the lord, was staying at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s park. At that time the venerable Udāyin lived in the jungle. The dwelling of the venerable one was lovely, good to look upon, beautiful, the inner chamber in the middle was entirely surrounded by the house; the couch and chair, the bolster and pillow were well designed, the water used for drinking and that used for washing were well placed; the cell was well swept. Many people came to look at the dwelling of the venerable Udāyin, and a certain brahmin together with his wife approached the venerable Udāyin, and having approached the venerable Udāyin, he said: “We want to see the dwelling of the good Udāyin.”

“Do look at it, brahmin,” he said, and taking the key, unfastening the bolt, and opening the door, he entered the dwelling. The brahmin entered after the venerable Udāyin, and the brahmin lady entered behind the brahmin. Then the venerable. Udāyin, opening some windows and closing others, going round about the inner room, and

---

1 Vihāra. 2 pariveṇa, see above, BD 1.119, n. 1. 3 Kavāṭam paṇāmetvā. Cf. Vin 1.87; Vin 2.114, Vin 2.207 and Vinaya Texts iii.88, where in note 1 the translator (rightly) insists that paṇāmeti is “to open” and not “to shut.” Our passage above is further evidence that this is so. But Pali-English Dictionary says “kavāṭaṁ paṇāmeti, to shut the door.” Possibly it means “to make the door lean,” i.e. when open against the wall, when closed against the post.
coming up from behind, rubbed up against\(^1\) the brahmin lady limb by limb. Then the brahmin, having exchanged greetings with the venerable Udāyin, went away. Then the brahmin, who was pleased, burst out with a cry of pleasure: \(^2\) “Superb are these recluses, sons of the Sakyans; who dwell in such a jungle, superb is the revered Udāyin who dwells in such a jungle.”

Having spoken thus, the brahmin lady said to the brahmin:

“What is there superb about him? Even as you rubbed up against me limb by limb, so did this recluse Udāyin rub up against me limb by limb.”

Then the brahmin became annoyed, vexed, angry and said:

“These recluses, sons of the Sakyans, \(^3\) are shameless, of low morality, liars. And they pretend to be walking by dhamma, walking by right, leading the Brahma-life, speaking truth, virtuous, of good conduct. Among these there is no recluse, among these there is no brahmanhood. Perished is recluse among these, perished is brahmanhood among these. Where is recluse among these? Where is brahmanhood among these? Fallen from recluse are these, fallen from brahmanhood are these. How can this recluse Udāyin rub up against my wife limb by limb? It is not possible to go to the park or dwelling with wives of respectable families, with daughters of respectable families, with girls of respectable families.\(^4\)

---

\(^1\) parāmasi, see below, BD 1.203, and n. 6. This “rubbing up against” was not, I think, an act of deliberate familiarity or meant offensively. In the tiny cell-room Udāyin just rubbed up against the visitors, as we might rub up against people in a crowd—in a bus or train or queue.

\(^2\) attamano attamanavācaṁ nicchāresi = MN 1.32 and MN 1.509 (nicchārayya). Vin-a is silent. MN-a 1.151 says: attamano ti sakamanato tuṭṭhamano; pitisomanasēhi va gahitamano. Attamanavācaṁ nicchāresi ti attamanatāya vācaṁ, attamanabhāvassā vā yuttavācaṁ nicchāresi. Udīrayi, pabyāhari ti vuttaṁ hoti.

\(^3\) As above, BD 1.125, and below, BD 1.223.

\(^4\) These two are probably meant to be opposed. Buddhaghosa calls kuladhitā, purisantarāṁ gatā, and kulakumāriyo, aniviṭṭhā (unsettled).
with daughters-in-law\textsuperscript{1} of respectable families, with women-slaves of respectable families. If wives of respectable families, daughters of respectable families, girls of respectable families, daughters-in-law of respectable families, women-slaves of respectable families should go to a park or dwelling, the recluses, sons of the Sakyans, may assault them.”

The monks heard this brahmin as he was grumbling, murmuring, and becoming angry. Those who were modest monks became annoyed, vexed, angry and said: “How can the reverend Udāyin come into bodily contact with women-kind?” Then these monks told this matter to the lord. Then the lord on this occasion, for this reason, causing the Order of monks to be convened, asked the reverend Udāyin:

“It is true as they say, Udāyin, that you came into bodily contact with a woman?”

“It is true, lord,” he said.

Then the enlightened one, the lord, rebuked him, saying:

“It is not right, foolish man, it is not becoming, it is not suitable, it is not fit in a recluse, it is not proper, it is not to be done. How can you, foolish man, come into bodily contact with a woman? Foolish man, is not dhamma uttered by me in various ways for the sake of stilling passion, and not for the sake of passion ... declared the allaying of the flames of the pleasures of the senses? It is not, foolish man, for the benefit of unbelievers ... Thus, monks, this course of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk, affected by desire,\textsuperscript{2} with perverted\textsuperscript{3} heart, \textsuperscript{1} Kulasuṇhā. Pali-English Dictionary gives suṇhā under suniṣa. At Vinaya Texts ii.348 it is translated “sisters-in-law.” CHILDERS gives daughter-in-law. Vin-a 532 says, “brought from another family for the young men of respectable families, they are vadhuyo,” which is daughters-in-law. And indeed a daughter-in-law held a more important position in the social system than did a sister-in-law. \textsuperscript{2} Otiṅṇa, as passive: possessed by. See Old Commentary’s explanation below in Bu-Ss 2.2.1. The translators in Vinaya Texts i.7, n. 2 say, “our word ‘degraded’ has often a very similar connotation.” They render otiṅṇa by “degraded”. Cf. below, BD 1.215. \textsuperscript{3} Vipariṇatena, literally changed. Cf. below, BD 1.215.

should come into\(^1\) physical contact with a woman, holding her hand, or holding a braid of her hair, or rubbing against any one or other of her limbs: this is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.”

\(^1\) Samāpajjeyya = saṁ + āpajjati, Sanskrit. āpadyate = ā + pad, to get into, to come into, to meet with. Sam + ā (as here) very often pleonastic. Although samāpajjati does not, in the above context, necessarily imply deliberate action, coming into physical contact with a woman was nevertheless regarded as an offence of a serious nature, because the desires possibly resulting from such a contact had to be suppressed. For in a growing vogue of monasticism the majority of members were perhaps young and middle-aged men. Cf. below, BD 1.338.

\(^2\) = below, BD 1.215.

\(^3\) = below, BD 1.215.

\(^4\) = below, BD 1.215.

\(^5\) Mahattarī. This is comparative of mahant. The Sanskrit form is mahattarā, but Pali has -ī, after therī. Same definition occurs below, BD 1.332.
The book of the discipline

The hand means: going up from the tip of the nail as far as the elbow.

Braid of hair means: nothing but hair, or mixed with threads, or mixed with garlands, or mixed with gold coins, or mixed with gold, or mixed with pearls, or mixed with jewels.

A limb means: setting to one side a hand and a braid of hair, what remains is called a limb.

Rubbing, rubbing up against, rubbing downwards, rubbing up-

---

¹ Ajjhācāra, cf. ajjhācarati (adhy-ā+√car) to practise (something bad). Used in Vinaya in the sense of a fault, a transgression; then in an erotic sense as above, and cf. below, BD 1.216. It could not there be used in sense of contact, for the speech, not the body, was at fault. Vin-a 533 says, “whatever is called physical contact (cf. Vin-a 547, “offensive speech”) according to that meaning it is a transgression.” Cf. also Vin-a 213, “she, because of his transgression, became pregnant.” Vin-a 19 says, “he disciplines body and speech through the restraint of transgressions of body and speech.” At Vin 1.63 we get adhīsīle sīlvipanno hoti ajjhācāre aćāravipanno hoti atidiṭṭhiyā dīṭṭhivipanno hoti. Here ajjhācāre (indeclinable) means according to Critical Pali Dictionary, “in matter of conduct” as adhīsīle means not “in the higher morality,” but “as to a matter of morality.” Vinaya Texts i.184, n. 1, points out that there Buddhaghosa says that adhīsīle “is said with regard to offences against the Defeat and Formal Meeting rules, while ajjhācāre consists in offences against the minor rules of the Pātimokkha.” But below, BD 1.211, “to come into physical contact,” which above is called a transgression, is there (below) called a Formal Meeting offence. ² I.e., unmixed with threads, Vin-a 533. ³ I.e., the hair mixed with threads of five colours. ⁴ I.e., with jasmine flowers, and so on. ⁵ On hirañña and suvaṇṇa see above, BD 1.28. Here Vin-a 534 says that hiraññamissa means mixed with garlands and kahāpanas; and suvaṇṇamissa means mixed with golden cīraka and with pāmaṅga. Here suvaṇṇacīraka probably means gold threads or bands or fillets (cf. Ja 5.197 where suvaṇṇacīraka seems to mean gold brocade). On pāmaṅga, cf. above, BD 1.77. ⁶ See previous note. ⁷ With jewels strung on threads.
wards,\(^1\) bending down, raising up, drawing to, pushing back, holding back hard, taking hard hold of, the grasp, the touch.

Rubbing is called merely rubbed. Rubbing up against is called moving from here and there. Rubbing downwards is called bringing down low. Rubbing upwards is called raising up high. Bending is called raising up high. Drawing to is called pulling. Pushing back is called sending back. Holding back hard\(^2\) is called holding back having taken hold of a limb. Taking hard hold of is called taking hold together with someone. Grasp is called merely taken. Touch means merely contact.

Offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order means: ... therefore it is called an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

If there is a woman, and thinking her to be a woman, if the monk is infatuated, and rubs the woman’s body with his body, rubs up against it, rubs it downwards, rubs it upwards, bends it down, raises it up, draws it to, pushes it back, holds it back hard, takes hold of it hard, grasps it, touches it, there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

If there is a woman, and being doubtful, if the monk is infatuated, and rubs the woman’s body with his body, rubs up against it ... touches it, there is a grave offence.

If there is a woman, and thinking it to be an eunuch, if the monk is infatuated ... grave offence.

---

\(^1\) These four words: āmasanā, parāmasanā, omasanā, ummasanā are all connected with masati from \(\sqrt{mrṣ}\), to touch. I have tried to give the force of the prefixes with masati by suitable prepositions. Ā has the force of “at,” therefore ā-masati, to stroke at, touch at, although ā in itself denotes touch (contact) or a personal (close) relation with the object — so Pali-English Dictionary. Cf. below, BD 1.204. Parā means “over.” Note the difference of \(\sigma=ava\) and \(\upsilon=ut\) in the third and fourth words. There are similar prefixes in some of the following words, meaning “down” and “up.” Parāmasati at Vin 2.216 is translated by “wipes” (at Vinaya Texts iii.291) — i.e., wipes over, rubs over (the spoon and the dish). Cf. parāmasati, above, BD 1.199.\(^2\) abhinīggaṇhanā, while merely “holding back” is nīggaṇhanā. Also cf. next, abhinīppīḷanā and nīppīḷanā.
The Book of the Discipline

If there is a woman, and thinking it to be a man ... thinking it to be an animal, if the monk is infatuated ... grave offence.

If there is an eunuch, and thinking it to be an eunuch, if the monk is infatuated, and rubs the eunuch’s body ... touches it ... grave offence.

If there is an eunuch, and being doubtful ... thinking it to be a man ... thinking it to be an animal ... thinking it to be a woman, if the monk is infatuated, and rubs the eunuch’s body ... touches it, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

If there is a man, and thinking it to be a man ... doubtful ... thinking it to be an animal ... thinking it to be a woman ... thinking it to be an eunuch, if the monk is infatuated and rubs the man’s body ... touches it, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

If there is an animal, and thinking it to be an animal ... doubtful ... thinking it to be a woman ... thinking it to be an eunuch ... thinking it to be a man, if the monk is infatuated and rubs the animals body ... touches it, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

Beginning with one

If there are two women, and thinking the two women to be women, if the monk is infatuated and rubs the women’s bodies ... touches them, there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

If there are two women, and being doubtful whether they are two women ... thinking them to be men ... to be eunuchs ... to be animals, if the monk is infatuated and rubs with his body the bodies of the two women ... touches them, there are two grave offences.

If there are two eunuchs, and thinking the eunuchs to be two eunuchs, if the monk is infatuated and rubs their bodies ... touches them, there are two grave offences.

If there are two eunuchs, and being doubtful of their being eunuchs ... thinking them to be men ... to be animals ... to be women, if the monk is infatuated and rubs the bodies of the eunuchs ... touches them, there are two offences of wrong-doing.

If there are two men, and thinking the two men to be men, if the monk is infatuated and rubs the two men with his body ... touches them, there are two offences of wrong-doing.

If there are two men, and being doubtful of their being men ... thinking them to be animals ... to be women ... to be eunuchs, if the monk is infatuated and rubs the two men with his body ... touches them, there are two offences of wrong-doing.

If there are two animals, and thinking the two animals to be animals ... doubtful ... thinking them to be women ... to be eunuchs ... to be men, if the monk is infatuated and rubs the two animals with his body, there are two offences of wrong-doing.

If there are a woman and an eunuch, and thinking both to be women, if the monk is infatuated and rubs with his body ... touches them, there is an offence of wrong-doing together with an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

If there are a woman and an eunuch, and being doubtful, if the monk is infatuated ... there is an offence of wrong-doing together with a grave offence.

If there are a woman and an eunuch, and thinking both to be eunuchs, if the monk is infatuated ... there are two grave offences.

If there are a woman and an eunuch and thinking both to be men, if the monk is infatuated ... there is an offence of wrong-doing together with a grave offence.

If there are a woman and an eunuch, and thinking both to be animals, if the monk is infatuated ... there is an offence of wrong-doing together with a grave offence.

If there are a woman and a man, and thinking both to be women, if the monk is infatuated ... there is an offence of wrong-doing together with an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

If there are a woman and a man, and being doubtful of both ... thinking them to be eunuchs ... to be men ... to be animals, if the monk is infatuated ... there is an offence of wrong-doing together with a grave offence.

If there are a woman and an animal, and thinking both to be women, if the monk is infatuated ... there is an offence of wrongdoing together with an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

If there are a woman and an eunuch, and being doubtful of both ... thinking them to be eunuchs ... to be men ... to be animals, if the monk is infatuated ... there is an offence of wrong-doing together with a grave offence.

If there are an eunuch and a man, and thinking both to be eunuchs, if the monk is infatuated ... there is an offence of wrong-doing together with a grave offence.

If there are an eunuch and a man, and being doubtful of both ... thinking them to be men ... to be animals ... to be women, if the monk is infatuated ... there are two offences of wrong-doing.

If there are an eunuch and an animal, and thinking both are eunuchs, if the monk is infatuated ... there is an offence of wrong-doing together with a grave offence.

If there are an eunuch and an animal, and being doubtful of both ... thinking them to be men ... to be animals ... to be women, if the monk is infatuated ... there are two offences of wrong-doing.

If there are a man and an animal, and being doubtful of both ... thinking them to be animals ... to be women ... to be eunuchs, if the monk is infatuated ... there are two offences of wrong-doing.

Beginning with two

If there is a woman, and thinking it to be a woman, if the monk is infatuated and rubs with his body the woman’s article of dress (worn on the body¹) touches it, there is a grave offence.²

If there are two women, and thinking the two women to be women, if the monk is infatuated and rubs with his body an article of dress belonging to the two women ... touches it, there are two grave offences.

---

1. Kāyapaṭibaddha or ornaments, e.g. rings, Vin-a 536, clothes and flowers, Vin-a 537. Whoso takes several women, encircling them in things to be worn, commits various offences. Cf. below, BD 1.218. 2. Cf. Vin 4.214.

---

272
If there are a woman and an eunuch, thinking that both are women if the monk is infatuated and rubs an article of dress of both with his body ... touches them, there is an offence of wrong-doing together with a grave offence.

If there is a woman, thinking it to be a woman, if the monk is infatuated and rubs his body with the woman’s article of dress ... touches it, there is a grave offence.

If there are two women ... there are two grave offences.

If there are a woman and an eunuch ... there is an offence of wrong-doing together with a grave offence.

If there is a woman, thinking it to be a woman, if the monk is infatuated and rubs (his) article of dress with the woman’s article of dress ... touches it, there is an offence of wrong-doing.¹

If there are two women ... there are two offences of wrong-doing.

If there is a woman, thinking it is a woman, if the monk is infatuated and rubs the woman’s body with something that may be thrown (aside), there is an offence of wrong-doing.

If there are two women, and thinking that the two women are women, if the monk is infatuated and rubs the bodies of the two women with something that may be thrown² (aside), there are two offences of wrong-doing.

If there is a woman and an eunuch, and thinking both are women, if the monk is infatuated and rubs the body of each with something that may be thrown (aside), there are two offences of wrong-doing.

If there is a woman, and thinking it to be a woman, if the monk is infatuated and rubs the woman’s article of dress with something that may be thrown (aside), there is an offence of wrong-doing.

If there are two women, and thinking that the two women are women, if the monk is infatuated and rubs an article of dress belonging to the two women with something that may be thrown (aside), there are two offences of wrong-doing.

If there are a woman and an eunuch ... there are two offences of wrong-doing.

If there is a woman, and thinking it to be a woman, if the monk is infatuated and rubs something he has thrown (aside) with something of the woman's which may be thrown (aside), there is an offence of wrong-doing.

If there are two women ... there are two offences of wrong-doing.

If there are a woman and eunuch ... there are two offences of wrong-doing.

* Told is the Monk Repetition *

If there is a woman, and thinking it to be a woman, if the monk is infatuated and the woman rubs the body of the monk with her body, rubs against it, rubs it downwards, rubs it upwards, bends it down, raises it up, draws it to her, pushes it back, holds it back hard, takes hard hold of it, grasps it, touches it; if desiring cohabitation, he exerts his body and recognises the contact, there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

If there are two women, and thinking them to be women, if the monk is infatuated and the women rub ... and recognises the contact, there is an offence entailing two formal meetings of the Order.

If there are a woman and an eunuch, and thinking both to be women, if the monk is infatuated and if both rub ... and recognises the contact, there is an offence of wrong-doing together with an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

If there is a woman, and thinking it to be a woman, if the monk is infatuated and the woman rubs with her body the monk's article of clothing ... there is a grave offence.

If there are two women ... there are two grave offences.

If there are a woman and an eunuch ... there is an offence of wrong-doing together with a grave offence.

If there is a woman, and thinking it to be a woman, if the monk is infatuated and the woman rubs the monk’s body with, her article of dress ... there is a grave offence.

If there are two women ... there are two grave offences.
If there are a woman and an eunuch ... there is an offence of wrong-doing together with a grave offence.

If there is a woman, and thinking it to be a woman, if the monk is infatuated and the woman rubs the monk’s article of dress with her article of dress ... there is an offence of wrong-doing.

If there are two women ... there are two offences of wrong-doing.
If there is a woman and an eunuch ... there are two offences of wrong-doing.

If there is a woman, and thinking it to be a woman, if the monk is infatuated and the woman rubs the monk’s body with something that may be thrown (aside), if desiring cohabitation, he exerts his body and recognises the contact, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

If there are two women ... there are two offences of wrong-doing.
If there is a woman and an eunuch ... there are two offences of wrong-doing.

If there is a woman, and thinking it to be a woman, if the monk is infatuated and the woman rubs the monk’s article of dress with something that may be thrown (aside) ... and recognises the contact, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

If there are two women ... there are two offences of wrong-doing.
If there are a woman and an eunuch ... there are two offences of wrong-doing.

If there is a woman, and thinking it to be a woman, if the monk is infatuated and the woman rubs with something that may be thrown (aside) something of the monk’s that may be thrown (aside), if desiring cohabitation, he exerts his body but does not recognise the contact, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

If there are two women ... there are two offences of wrong-doing.
If there are a woman and an eunuch ... there are two offences of wrong-doing.
If desiring cohabitation, he makes bodily exertion and recognises contact, there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order. If desiring cohabitation, he makes bodily exertion but does not recognise contact, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If desiring cohabitation, he does not make bodily exertion but recognises contact, there is no offence. If desiring cohabitation, he does not make bodily exertion nor recognises contact, there is no offence.

If desiring emission he exerts his body and recognises contact, there is no offence. If desiring emission, he exerts the body but does not recognise contact, there is no offence. If desiring emission, he does not exert the body but recognises contact, there is no offence. If desiring emission, he does not exert the body and does not recognise contact, there is no offence.

There is no offence if it is not on purpose, not intentional, not knowing, not agreeing, if he is mad, unhinged, in pain, a beginner.¹

_____________________

Mnemonic List
Mother, daughter, and sister, wife, and female yakka, eunuch, asleep, dead, an animal, about a wooden doll, / Pressing up to, a bridge, a road, a tree, and a boat, and a cord, A stick, he disclosed the bowl,² in salutation, he exerted himself but did not touch.

_____________________

Now at that time a certain monk stroked³ a mother⁴ for the sake of a mother’s affection ... a daughter for the sake of a daughter’s affection ... a sister for the sake of a sister’s affection. He was remorseful, and said: “What now if I have fallen into an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order?” He told this matter to the lord. He said:

¹ Vin-a 541 says that thera Udāyin was the first offender, therefore there was no offence for him.
² Cf. kavāṭaṁ pañāmeti. See BD 1.199, n. 3, above, and BD 1.213, below.
³ Āmasi, see above, BD 1.199, n. 4, and BD 1.203 n. 6. Āmasi is the word there translated by “to rub,” but there it seems to call for “to stroke.”
⁴ Vin-a 541 says “he strokes the mother’s body, saying, ‘she is my mother.’” In text āmasi (he stroked) is not followed by the accusative as is usually the case.
“Monk, this is not an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order, it is an offence of wrong-doing.”

Now at one time a certain monk came into physical contact with his former wife. He was remorseful ...

“You, monk, have fallen into an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.”

Now at that time a certain monk came into physical contact with a female yakkha ... with a eunuch. He was remorseful ... “Monk, it is not an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order, it is a grave offence.”

Now at one time a certain monk came into physical contact with a sleeping woman. He was remorseful ... “Monk, you have fallen into an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.”

At one time a certain monk came into physical contact with a dead woman. He was remorseful. “Monk, it is not an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order, it is a grave offence.”

Now at one time a certain monk came into physical contact with a female animal¹ ... “Monk, it is not an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order, it is an offence of wrong-doing.”

Now at one time a certain monk came into physical contact with a wooden doll ... “an offence of wrong-doing.”

Now at one time many women, pressing up to² a certain monk, led him about arm-in-arm. He was remorseful ... “Did you consent, monk?” he said.

“I did not consent, lord,” he said.

“It is not an offence, monk, as you did not consent,” he said.

¹ tiracchānagatitthi, see above, BD 1.47, n. 4. ² sampīḷetvā, pressing, pinching, or worrying.
Now at one time a certain monk, being infatuated, shook the bridge\(^1\) upon which a woman had ascended. He was remorseful ...

“... offence of wrong-doing.”

Bu-Ss 2.4.7

Now at one time a certain monk seeing a woman whom he met on the way, was infatuated, and gave her a blow on the shoulder. He was remorseful ...

“... formal meeting of the Order.”

Bu-Ss 2.4.8

Now at one time a certain monk, being infatuated, shook the tree up which a woman had climbed ... the boat in which a woman had embarked. He was remorseful ...

“... offence of wrong-doing.”

Bu-Ss 2.4.9

Now at one time a certain monk, being infatuated, pulled a cord\(^2\) of which a woman held (the other end). He was remorseful ...

“... grave offence,” he said.

Now at one time a certain monk, being infatuated, pulled a stick of which a woman held (the other end). He was remorseful ...

“... grave offence,” he said.

Bu-Ss 2.4.10

Now at one time a certain monk, being infatuated, greeted\(^3\) a woman with his bowl. He was remorseful ...

“... grave offence,” he said.

Bu-Ss 2.4.11

---

1 Vin-a 546, whether it is a bridge for one passenger, or for waggons, if he succeeds in shaking it or not, it is a dukkāṭa.
2 rajjuṁ āviṇji.
3 pattena paṇāmesi. In “Table of Contents,” BD 1.211, above, this appears as pattaṁ paṇāmesi, which at Vin 2.216 is “uncovered (or disclosed) the bowl.” The translation of this passage at Vinaya Texts iii.290 is not accurate; but it means “he presents the bowl with his right hand.” In the above passage it is so curious that patta is in the instrumental, as against the more natural accusative that I am inclined to suspect that añjaliṁ should have been inserted—then meaning, “he raised his hands together with his bowl in respectful salutation of the woman.” Thus this “greeting with the hands” would be balanced just below by “greeting with the feet.” Commentary is silent. I think that there must be some confusion between pattam paṇāmeti and añjaliṁ paṇāmeti. Cf. on kavāṭaṁ paṇāmeti, above, BD 1.199, n. 3.
Now at one time a certain monk, infatuated by a woman who made reverence, raised his foot. He was remorseful ... “... formal meeting of the Order,” he said.

Now at one time a certain monk, saying: “I will take a woman,” exerted himself but did not touch one. He was remorseful ... “... offence of wrong-doing,” he said.

_Told is the Second Offence entailing a Formal Meeting of the Order_ Monks’ Formal Meeting
(Saṅghādisesa) 3

... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s park. At that time the venerable Udāyin lived in the jungle. The venerable one’s dwelling was lovely, good to look upon, beautiful. At that time many women came to the park¹ in order to see the dwelling. Then those women approached the venerable Udāyin, and having approached him, they said to the venerable Udāyin:

“Honoured sir, we want to see the master’s dwelling.”

Then the venerable Udāyin, showing these women his dwelling and pointing out² the privies to them, spoke in praise, spoke in blame and begged and implored and asked and questioned and described and exhorted and abused. Those women who had little fear of blame,³ who were sly and who had no shame mocked at the venerable Udāyin, called out to him, laughed at him, made fun of him.⁴ But those women who had shame, upon departing complained to the monks, saying:

“Honoured sirs, this is not suitable, it is not fitting, we should not wish this spoken about even by our husbands, to say nothing of master Udāyin.”⁵

Then those who were modest monks became annoyed, vexed and angry and said:

¹ Oldenberg, Vin 3.274, suggests araññaṁ agamaṁsu.
² ādissa = apadisitvā, Vin-a 546.
³ chinnikā = chinnattappā, Vin-a 546.
⁴ uppaṇḍentī ti paṇḍako ayaṁ nāyaṁ puriso ti.
⁵ Kiṁ pan’ ayyena Udāyinā
“How can the venerable Udāyin offend women with lewd words?” Then these monks told this matter to the lord. Then the lord on this occasion and in this connection had the company of monks convened and questioned the venerable Udāyin, saying:

“How can the venerable Udāyin offend women with lewd words?”

“It is true, lord,” he said.

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked him, saying:

“It is not suitable, foolish man, it is not proper, it is not becoming, it is not worthy of a recluse, it is out of place, it is not to be done. How can you, foolish man, offend women with lewd words? Foolish man, is not dhamma uttered in various ways by me for the sake of passionlessness, not for the sake of passion ... proclaimed for the allaying of the flames of pleasures of the senses? It is not, foolish man, for the benefit of unbelievers ... and thus, monks, this course of training should be set forth:

“Whatsoever monk, affected by desire,5 with perverted heart,2 should offend a woman with lewd words concerned with unchastity, as, for example, a youth to a young woman, it is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.”

Whatever means: he who ...

Monk means: ... this is how monk is to be understood in this meaning.

Affected by desire means: infatuated, full of desire, physically in love with.3

Perverted means: the perverted heart is impassioned, the perverted heart is corrupt, the perverted heart is erring. And in this meaning it is understood that the perverted heart is impassioned.4

Woman means: a human woman, not a female yakṣa, not a female departed one, not a female animal5; she is intelligent, competent to know good and bad speech, what is lewd and what is not lewd.6

---

1 See above, BD 1.201, n. 1. 2 See above, BD 1.201, n. 2. 3 Cf. above, BD 1.202. 4 Cf. above, BD 1.202. 5 Cf. above, BD 1.202. 6 = below, BD 1.337
Lewd speech means: speech connected with privies and with unchastity.

Should offend\(^1\) means: it is called a transgression.\(^2\)

As, for example, a youth to a young woman means: a lad to a young girl, a boy of tender age to a girl of tender age, a male enjoying sense-pleasures to a female enjoying sense-pleasures.

Concerned with unchastity means: connected with unchaste things.\(^3\)

A formal meeting of the Order means: ... because of this it is called a formal meeting of the Order.

Pointing out the two privies he speaks in praise, and he speaks in blame, and he begs, and he implores, and lie asks, and he questions, and lie describes, and he exhorts, and he abuses.

He speaks in praise means: he extols, he praises, he commends ...

He speaks in blame means: he curses, he reviles, he finds fault with ...

He begs means: he says, “give to me, you are worthy to give to me.”

He implores means: he says, “When will your mother be reconciled?\(^4\) When will your father be reconciled? When will your devatās be reconciled? When will there be a good opportunity, a good time, a good moment? When shall I have sexual intercourse with you?”

He asks means: he says, “How do you give to your husband? How do you give to a paramour?”

He questions means: he says, “They say that as you give to your husband so you give to your paramour.”

He describes means: having asked, he says: “Give thus, giving thus you will become dear and beloved to your husband.”

\(^1\) obhāseyyā ti avabhāseyya ... asaddhammavacanaṁ vadeyya. \(^2\) Cf. above, BD 1.202, in explanation of kāyasāṁsagga. \(^3\) It is difficult to render into English the slight difference of meaning in the Pali: methunupasamāhitāḥ ti methunadhamma-patīsaṁyuttāḥi. Cf. below, BD 1.226. \(^4\) Vin-a 548, “on the reconciliation of your mother I will indulge in sexual intercourse.”
He exhorts means: not having asked, he says: “Give thus, giving thus you will become dear and beloved to your husband.”

He abuses means: he says, “You are without sexual characteristics, you are defective in sex, you are bloodless, your blood is stagnant, you are always dressed, you are dripping, you are a deformed woman,¹ you are a female eunuch, you are a man-like woman, your sexuality is indistinct, you are a hermaphrodite.²

If it is a woman, if he is infatuated thinking her to be a woman, and if the monk, pointing out the two privies to a woman, speaks in praise, speaks in blame ... abuses, it is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

If there are two women, if he is infatuated thinking them to be women, and if the monk pointing out the two privies to the two women ... it is an offence entailing two formal meetings of the Order.

If it is a woman and an eunuch, if he is infatuated thinking them both to be women, and if the monk pointing out the two privies to both ... there is an offence of wrong-doing with an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

If there is a woman, if he is infatuated thinking her to be a woman, and if the monk leaving out (talk on) the two privies to the woman, pointing out (any part) from below the collar bone to above the knee,³ speaks in praise, and speaks in blame ... and abuses, there is a grave offence.

If there are two women ... there are two grave offences.

If there are a woman and an eunuch ... there is an offence of wrong-doing together with a grave offence.

¹ sikharani—i.e., probably with certain defects of the pudendum. ² For these abnormalities, cf. same list at Vin 2.271. ³ Cf. Vin 4.213.
to above the knee to the woman, speaks in praise, speaks in blame ... abuses, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

If there are two women ... there are two offences of wrong-doing.

If there is a woman and an eunuch ... there are two offences of wrong-doing.

---------------

If there is a woman, if he is infatuated thinking her to be a woman, if the monk, pointing out an article of clothing¹ to the woman, speaks in praise ... there is an offence of wrong-doing.

If there are two women ... there are two offences of wrong-doing.

If there are a woman and an eunuch ... there are two offences of wrong-doing.

---------------

There is no offence if he is aiming at (explaining) the meaning,² if he is aiming at (explaining) dhamma,³ if he is aiming at (explaining) the teaching, if he is mad, if he is a beginner.⁴

---------------

MNEMONIC LIST

Red, thick and short, matted, shaggy and long, sown,
I hope the way is at an end, faith, about a gift, about work.

---------------

At one time a certain woman was wearing a newly dyed blanket. A certain monk, being infatuated, said to this woman: “Sister, is that red thing yours⁵?” She did not understand and said:

“Yes, master, it is a newly dyed blanket.”

He was remorseful and said; “What now if I have fallen into an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order?” He told this matter to the lord, who said:

¹ Kāyapaṭibaddha, Vin-a 549 says, “a garment or a flower or an ornament,” so here not necessarily article of dress. Cf. above, BD 1.207. ² atthapurekkhāra dhamma-purekkhāra. Attha and dhamma taken together are sometimes rendered “the letter and the spirit” as at AN i.69; cf. “not-dhamma and not-aim” at GS 5.155. Vin-a 549 says of attha, “telling the meaning of the words or reciting the commentary,” and of dhamma, “teaching or reciting the text (pāḷi).” ³ See previous note. ⁴ Vin-a 549 again says, Udāyin was the beginner. ⁵ lohita is both “blood” and “red.”
“Monk, it is not an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order, it is an offence of wrong-doing.”

At one time a certain woman was wearing a rough blanket ... said:
“Sister, is that thick, short hair\(^1\) yours?” She did not understand and said:
“Yes, master, it is a rough blanket” ... “... offence of wrong-doing.”

At one time a certain woman was wearing a newly woven\(^2\) blanket ... and said:
“Sister, is that your matted hair\(^3\)?” She did not understand and said:
“Yes, master, it is a newly woven blanket.” He was remorseful ... “... offence of wrong-doing.”

At one time a certain woman was wearing a rough blanket ... and said:
“Sister, is that stiff\(^4\) hair yours?” ...
“Yes, master, it is a rough blanket” ... “... offence of wrong-doing.

At one time a certain woman was wearing a mantle ... and said:
“Sister, is that long hair yours?” ... “... offence of wrong-doing.”

---

\(^1\) Vin-a 550, kakkasaloman ti rassalomaṁ bahulomaṁ.
\(^2\) āvuta seems to be derived from āvayati = ṛ + vā, to weave, a root which has been merged in ā + vr (āvarati), to string on, to fix on. Āvuta as “woven” is not given in the Pali-English Dictionary
\(^3\) Vin-a 550, ākṣṇaloman ti jaṭitalomaṁ.
\(^4\) Vin-a 550, kharaloman ti thaddhalomaṁ.
At one time a certain woman came along having had a field sown.¹
A certain monk being infatuated said to this woman:
“Well, sister, has there been some sowing²?” She, not understanding, said:
“Yes, master, only I have not closed³ the furrow.”
He was remorseful … “Monk, there is no offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order, there is an offence of wrong-doing.”

At one time a certain monk seeing a female wanderer⁴ on the road, and being infatuated, said to this female wanderer:
“I hope, sister, that there is a way at the end?”⁵
She, not understanding, said:
“Yes, monk,⁶ you will follow it.” He was remorseful … “… grave offence.”

At one time a certain monk, being infatuated, said to a certain woman:
“You are faithful, sister, but you do not give to us what you give to your husband.”
“What is that, sir?” she said.
“Sexual intercourse,” he said. He was remorseful … “… an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.”

¹ Note here the play of the three conjugations: (1) double causative, vapāpetvā, having had the sowing done, or having superintended it, (2) simple causative, vāpitaṁ, (3) radical verb paṭi + vuttaṁ = Sanskrit praty-upta, as noted by OLDENBERG, Vin 3.274, and by GEIGER, Pali Grammar p.72, Pali Grammar p.147, and not prati-vac, as given in Pali-English Dictionary Vapāpeti, vutta and vāpita are given under vapati, to sow. Buddhaghosa at Vin-a 550, who naturally attaches the word to vap, to sow, has two explanations; one for udakavappa, another for thūlavappa. ² See previous note. ³ See previous note. ⁴ paribbājikā. At Vin 4.92 it is a pācittiya for a monk to give food to one, at Vin 4.285 for a nun to give a robe to one. ⁵ Under sanīsidati the Pali-English Dictionary, referring to this passage, takes it to mean that the way (magga) is at an end. Buddhaghosa at Vin-a 550 has another explanation; indeed, without him we could not understand these puns. ⁶ Note that the female wanderer addresses the monk as bhikkhu, while laywomen say ayya, master, or bhante, honoured sir.
At one time a certain monk, infatuated, said to a certain woman: “You are faithful, sister, for you do not give us the highest gift.” “What is the highest gift, sir?” she said. “Sexual intercourse,” he said. He was remorseful ... “… an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.”

At one time a certain woman was doing some work. A certain monk, infatuated, said to this woman: “Stand, sister, I will work” ... “sit, sister, I will work ... lie down, sister, I will work.” She, not understanding ... “… an offence of wrong-doing.”

_Told is the Third Offence entailing a Formal Meeting of the Order_
... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s park. At that time the venerable Udāyin was dependent on families, and approached many families. Now at that time there was a certain woman who was a widow, beautiful, good to look upon, lovely. Then the venerable Udāyin, rising early and taking his robe and bowl, came up to this woman’s dwelling and having come up he sat down on the appointed seat. Then this woman approached the venerable Udāyin, and having approached she greeted the venerable Udāyin and sat down to one side. As she was sitting to one side the venerable Udāyin rejoiced, pleased, gladdened, delighted this woman with talk on dhamma. Then this woman having been ... delighted with talk on dhamma by the venerable Udāyin, said to the venerable Udāyin:

“Do say, honoured sir, what (will be) of use¹; we are able to give to the master, that is to say, the requisites of robes, alms-food, lodgings and medicine for the sick.”

“It is not hard, sister, for us to come by those things, that is to say, the requisites of robes, alms-food, lodgings, medicine for the sick. Give² what is hard for us to come by.”

“What is that, honoured sir?”

“Sexual intercourse,” he said.

“(Will it be) of use,³ honoured sir,” she said.

“(It will be) of use, sister.”

¹ Yena attho. Cf. Vin 3.210 for the same expression. ² Dehi. The use of the imperative in such a connection is a very grave thing. ³ Attho, to balance yena attho above (?)
“Come, honoured sir,” she said, and entering into an inner room, taking off her cloak, she lay back on the couch. Then the venerable Udāyin approached this woman, and having approached her he said:

“Who could touch this evil-smelling wretch?” and he departed spitting.²

Then this woman became annoyed, vexed, angry and said:

“These recluses, sons of the Sakyans³ are shameless, of low morality, liars. And they pretend to be those walking by dhamma, walking by right, leading the Brahma-life, speaking truth, virtuous, of good conduct. Among these there is no recluseship, among these there is no brahmanhood. Perished is recluseship among these, perished is brahmanhood among these. Where is recluseship among these? Where is brahmanhood among these? Fallen from recluseship are these, fallen from brahmanhood are these. How can this recluse Udāyin, having himself begged me for sexual intercourse, say: ‘Who could touch this evil-smelling wretch’ and depart spitting? What is bad in me? What is evil-smelling in me? In what am I inferior to whom?”⁴

Other women became annoyed, vexed, angry and said: “These recluses, sons of the Sakyans, are shameless ... How can this recluse Udāyin, having himself begged this (woman) for sexual intercourse, say: ‘Who could touch this evil-smelling wretch?’ and depart spitting? What is bad in her? What is evil-smelling in her? In what is she inferior to whom?”

The monks heard these women who were annoyed, vexed and angry. Those who were modest monks became annoyed, vexed, angry and said:

¹ It is curious that vasala is in the masculine or neuter, but it obviously refers to the woman. Buddhaghosa sees it as a masculine here, Vin-a 551. ² Niṭṭhuhitvā ti kheḷāṁ pātētvā, Vin-a 551; cf. Pv-a 80, kheḷān ti nuṭṭhubhanāṁ. Cf. Vin 1.271 where the seṭṭhi’s wife spat out (nuṭṭhubhitvā) ghee into a spittoon. Cf. also Ja 1.459. Forms of this verb are niṭṭhubhati, nuṭṭhubhati and niṭṭhubhati. ³ As above, BD 1.125, BD 1.200. ⁴ Kassāhaṁ kena hāyāmi. Vin-a 551, “with regard to treasure, jewelry or beauty, to what other women am I inferior? Who is better than I am?”
“How can this venerable Udāyin speak in praise of ministering to sense-pleasures for self¹ in the presence of women-folk?”

Then these monks told this matter to the lord. Then the lord for this reason, on this occasion, having had the Order of monks convened, questioned the venerable Udāyin, saying:

“Is it true as is said that you, Udāyin, spoke in praise of ministering to sense-pleasures for self in the presence of women-folk?”

“It is true, lord,” he said.

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked him saying:

“It is not right, foolish man, it is not becoming, it is not suitable, it is not worthy of a recluse, it is out of place, it is not to be done. How can you, foolish man, speak in praise of ministering to sense-pleasures for self in the presence of women-folk? Foolish man, is not dhamma preached by me in various ways for the stilling of passion ... the allaying of the flames of sense-pleasures declared? It is not, foolish man, for the benefit of unbelievers ... Thus, monks, this course of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk, affected by desire,² with perverted heart,³ should speak in praise of ministering to sense-pleasures for self in the presence of women-folk, saying: ‘Sister, this is the highest kind of ministration: that a woman⁴ should minister to one like me, virtuous, of good conduct, leading the Brahma-life, in this fashion’⁵—meaning with what is connected with sexual intercourse—that is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the

¹ Attahāmapāricariyāya, Vin-a 551 says, methunadhammasamkhā-tena kāmena pāricariyā kāmapāricariyā, attano atthāya kāmapāri-cariyā attakāmapāricariyā. This passage is quoted at Vv-a 11, where atta° cariyāya is called gāmadhamme—i.e., low states, those belonging to the village. Note that the term attakāma could be used also with religious significance: see Mrs. RHYS DAVIDS, Buddhism (Home University Library), second edition, p. 81, and cf. GS 2.21, “he to whom the self is dear,” and KS i.102, “the soul-lover.” See also attakāmarūpa at Vin 1.350 = MN i.205 = MN iii.155. MN-i.2.236 and Old Commentary below give two quite different interpretations of attakāma, the one giving the higher and the other the lower meaning. ² Cf. above, BD 1.201, BD 1.215. ³ Cf. above, BD 1.201, BD 1.215. ⁴ Yā, whoever, feminine. ⁵ Etena dhammena. It might also mean “according to this dhamma” (teaching), but that it does not here is apparent from the Old Commentary’s exegesis below.
Whatever means: ... (see Bu-Ss 3.2... competent to know) ... what is lewd and what is not lewd.

In the presence of women-folk means: in the neighbourhood of women-folk, near women-folk.

Sense-pleasures for self means: sense-pleasures for self,¹ for the sake of self, desiring for self, ministering to self.

This highest means: this highest, this best, this foremost, this utmost, this most excellent.

She² means: a noble woman,³ a brahmin woman, a merchant-class woman, a low-caste woman.⁴

One like me means: a noble man, a brahmin, a merchant-class man, a low-caste man.

Virtuous means: refraining from onslaught on creatures, refraining from taking what is not given, refraining from lying.⁵

Leading the Brahma-life means: refraining from sexual intercourse.⁶

Of good conduct means: he is of good conduct in respect of this virtue and in respect of this Brahma-life.

In this fashion means: with regard to sexual intercourse.

Should minister to means: should give pleasure to.

Connected with unchastity means: connected with unchastity.⁷

A formal meeting of the Order means: ... because of this it is called a formal meeting of the Order.

¹ Attakāman ti attano kāmam. ² Yā, translated above “a woman.” ³ Vin-a 552, “if it is said, ‘I am a noble man, you are a noble woman, a noble woman is worthy to give to a noble man, because they are of the same caste,’ it is not a saṅghādisesa offence. But if you say, ‘I am a noble man ... you are worthy to give me sexual intercourse,’ because you are speaking of things connected with unchastity, there is a saṅghādisesa offence.” ⁴ Showing that the four castes were by now recognised. ⁵ Corresponding to the first three Pārājika offences, with the addition of refraining from lying. Deliberate lying has appeared as a pācittiya offence and as a pārājika offence. ⁶ Corresponding to the first three Pārājika offences, with the addition of refraining from lying. Deliberate lying has appeared as a pācittiya offence and as a pārājika offence. ⁷ Cf. above, BD 1.216.
If there is a woman, if he is infatuated thinking her to be a woman, and if the monk speaks in praise, in the woman’s presence, of ministering to sense-pleasures for self, it is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

If there are two women, if ... thinking they are two women ... there are two offences ... a formal meeting of the Order.

If there is a woman and an eunuch, if ... thinking them both to be women ... there is an offence of wrong-doing with an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

If there is no offence if he speaks, saying: “Support¹ (us) with the requisites of robes, alms-food, lodgings, medicine for the sick,” if he is mad, if he is a beginner.²

MNEMONIC LIST
How can a barren woman?
(How) can I get a son, and be dear?
How can I be charming?
What may I give? With what shall I support (you)?
How can I go to a good bourn?

At one time a certain barren woman said to a monk dependent on (her) family: “How could I, honoured sir, bear (a child)?”
“For this, sister, give the highest gift.”
“What is the highest gift, honoured sir?” she said.
“Sexual intercourse,” he said.
He was remorseful ... “... a formal meeting of the Order.”

At one time a certain fertile woman said to a monk dependent on (her) family: “How could I, honoured sir, get a son?”

¹ upaṭṭhaha, imperative of upaṭṭhahati, from upa + √sthā. ² Vin-a 552 again says that Udāyin was the beginner, and therefore there was no offence for him.
“For this, sister, give the highest gift ... “... a formal meeting of the Order.”

At one time a certain woman said to a monk dependent on (her) family: “How could I, honoured sir, be dear to (my) husband?” ... “How could I, honoured sir, be charming?”
“For this, sister, give the highest gift ”... “... a formal meeting of the Order.”

At one time a certain woman said to a monk dependent on (her) family:
“What, honoured sir, may I give to the master?”
“The highest gift, sister,” he said.
“What is the highest gift, honoured sir?”
“Sexual intercourse,” he said. He was remorseful ... “... of the Order.”

At one time a certain woman said to a monk dependent on (her) family:
“With what can I, honoured sir, support the master?”
“With the highest gift, sister,” he said.
“What is the highest gift, honoured sir?” she said ... “... formal meeting of the Order.”

At one time a certain woman said to a monk dependent on (her) family:
“How can I go to a good bourn, honoured sir?”
“For this, sister, give the highest gift.”
“What is the highest gift, honoured sir?” she said ... “... formal meeting of the Order.”

Told is the fourth offence entailing a Formal Meeting of the Order
... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s park. At that time the venerable Udāyin was dependent on families at Sāvatthī, and he approached many families. When he saw a youth not (yet) a husband, or a young girl without a husband, he spoke in praise of the girl in the presence of the youth’s parents, saying: “The young girl of that family is beautiful, good to look upon, lovely, she is learned, accomplished, wise, clever, energetic. This young girl is suitable for that youth.”

These said: “They do not know us, honoured sir, nor who we are, nor to whom we belong. If, honoured sir, the master will induce them to give, we might convey this girl to this youth.”

He spoke in praise of the youth in the presence of the girl’s parents, saying: “The youth of that family is beautiful, good to look upon, lovely, he is learned, accomplished, wise, clever, energetic. That young girl is suitable for this youth.”

They said: “They do not know us, honoured sir, nor who we are, nor to whom we belong, nor in what, as it were, is the girl’s property. But if, honoured sir, the master would beg, we might give this girl to that youth.”

By this means he brought about the leading of the bridegroom (to the bride’s home), he brought about the leading away (from the
Monks’ formal meeting (Saṅghādisesa) 5

Now at that time the daughter of a certain woman who was formerly a courtesan was beautiful, good to look upon, lovely. Some disciples of Naked Ascetics coming from a distant village, said to the courtesan: “Lady, give this girl to our boy!”

She said: “Masters, I do not know you, nor who these are, nor to whom he belongs; and I will not give my only daughter to go to a distant village.”

Some people said to these disciples of Naked Ascetics: “Masters, why did you come?”

“Now we, masters, begged that courtesan for her daughter for our son; and she said, ‘But, masters, I do not know you, nor who these are, nor to whom he belongs, and I will not give my only daughter to go to a distant village.’”

“Master, why did you beg the courtesan for her daughter? Certainly master Udāyin should be told, master Udāyin will induce her to give (her daughter).”

Then these disciples of Naked Ascetics approached the venerable Udāyin, and having approached him, they said to the venerable Udāyin: “Now, honoured sir, we begged that courtesan ... ‘distant village.’ It would be good, honoured sir, if the master could induce this courtesan to give her daughter to our boy.”

Then the venerable Udāyin approached that courtesan, and having approached, he said to that courtesan: “Why did you not give your daughter to these (people)?”

“But, master, I do not know them, nor who they are, nor to whom he belongs, and I will not give my only daughter to go to a distant village.”

“Give her to them, I know them.”

“If, honoured sir, the master knows them, I will give (her),” she said. Then this courtesan gave her daughter to these disciples of Naked Ascetics.

¹ vāreyyāni, text; Vin-a 553, vāreyyan, with variant reading vāreyyāni. Vin-a 553, “begging: give your girl to our boy, or settling the day, lunar mansion, astronomic law.”

² kissa tumhe āgat’ attha? Here attha is second plural of atthi, from √as.

Then these disciples of Naked Ascetics, taking the young girl, for a month made use of her according to her lot as a daughter-in-law; then afterwards they made use of her according to her lot as a female slave. Then this young girl dispatched a messenger to her mother, saying: “I am wretched, I am miserable, I get no happiness. For a month they made use of me according to my lot as a daughter-in-law, now after that they are making use of me according to my lot as a female slave. Let my mother come for me, let her take me away.”

Then the courtesan came up to the disciples of Naked Ascetics, and having come up, she said to these disciples of Naked Ascetics, “Masters, do not make use of this young girl according to her lot as a female slave, make use of this young girl according to her lot as a daughter-in-law.”

They said: “We do not want anything to do with you, we want to have to do (only) with a recluse. You go away, we do not know you.”

Then this courtesan, being reproached by these followers of the Naked Ascetics, returned again to Sāvatthī. A second time this young girl dispatched a messenger to her mother, saying: “I am wretched ... take me away.” Then the courtesan approached the venerable Udāyin, and having approached him, she said to the venerable Udāyin:

“Honoured sir, it is said that the young girl is wretched, miserable, she gets no happiness. For a month they made use of her according to her lot as a daughter-in-law, and now after that they are making use of her according to her lot as a female slave. Honoured sir, do say: ‘Masters, do not make use of this young girl according to her lot as a female slave, make use of this young girl according to her lot as a daughter-in-law.’”

¹ I.e., Vin-a 553, they enjoyed what she cooked, and the meals she served. ² I.e., working in the fields, throwing out sweepings, fetching water, etc. ³ Āhārūpahāro. Vin-a 553 says, “taking and offering, getting and giving, nothing is taken or offered by us, buying and selling with you is not our custom.”
Then the venerable Udāyin approached these disciples of the Naked Ascetics, and having approached them, he said to these disciples of the Naked Ascetics:

“Masters, do not make use of this young girl according to her lot as a female slave, make use of this young girl according to her lot as a daughter-in-law.”

They said: “We do not want anything to do with you; we want to have to do (only) with the courtesan. A recluse should be without occupation,¹ the recluse will become a model recluse.² You go away, we do not know you.”

Then the venerable Udāyin having been reproached by these disciples of Naked Ascetics, returned again to Sāvatthī. For a third time the young girl dispatched a messenger to her mother, saying: “I am wretched, take me away.” For a second time the courtesan approached the venerable Udāyin ... “... Do say: ‘Masters ... as a daughter-in-law.’”

He said: “When I went before, I was reproached by these disciples of the Naked Ascetics. Go yourself. I will not go.”

Then the courtesan became annoyed, vexed, angry and said: “May this master Udāyin be wretched, may this master Udāyin be miserable, may this master Udāyin not find happiness, even as my girl is wretched, miserable, and finds no happiness because of her evil mother-in-law, because of her evil father-in-law, because of her evil husband.” And then the young girl became annoyed, vexed, angry, saying: “May this master Udāyin be wretched, may this master Udāyin be miserable, may this master Udāyin not find happiness, even as I am wretched, miserable and find no happiness because of my evil mother-in-law, because of my evil father-in-law, because of my evil husband.”

¹ Avyāvāta, a rare word. Cf. Ja 3.65 and its variant readings ajhāvata, abyāvata; Ja 6.188; DN ii.141. At Cnd 72 appossukha = abyāvata anapeekkha. ² Samanena bhavitabbaṁ, avyāvātena samaṇo assa sumano. The word sumano has variant readings suṣamaṇo, susamaṇo; Vin.-areads susamaṇo. This explanation seems to show what is rare: that Oldenberg’s text is faulty. No doubt the text could be emended: samanena bhavitabbaṁ avyāvātena (avyāvato) samaṇo assa suṣamaṇo, but the elliptical construction is perhaps intentional, and shows a popular style, which does not, however, sound very well.

Even other women, unhappy with their mothers-in-law, unhappy with their fathers-in-law, unhappy with their husbands, denounced him, thus: “May ... be wretched ... even as we are wretched, miserable, and find no happiness because of our evil mothers-in-law, because of our evil fathers-in-law, because of our evil husbands.”

But those women who were happy with their mothers-in-law, with their fathers-in-law, and with their husbands, these prayed to him thus: “May this master Udāyin be happy, may this master Udāyin be blest, may this master Udāyin prosper, even as we are happy, blest and do prosper because of our good mothers-in-law, because of our good fathers-in-law, because of our good husbands.”

The monks heard some women denouncing, some women praying. Then those who were modest monks became annoyed, vexed, angry and said: “How can the venerable Udāyin act as a go-between?” Then these monks told this matter to the lord. Then the lord on this occasion, for this reason, having had the company of monks convened, questioned the venerable Udāyin, saying:

“Is it true, as is said, Udāyin, that you acted as a go-between?”

“It is true, lord,” he said.

Then the enlightened one, the lord, rebuked him, saying: “How could you, foolish man, act as a go-between? That is not, foolish man, for the benefit of unbelievers ... Thus, monks, this course of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk should act as a go-between for a woman with a man in mind or for a man with a woman in mind, whether as a wife or as a mistress, that is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.”

\[\text{Bu-Ss 5.1.5}\]

The monks heard some women denouncing, some women praying. Then those who were modest monks became annoyed, vexed, angry and said: “How can the venerable Udāyin act as a go-between?”

Then these monks told this matter to the lord. Then the lord on this occasion, for this reason, having had the company of monks convened, questioned the venerable Udāyin, saying:

“Is it true, as is said, Udāyin, that you acted as a go-between?”

“It is true, lord,” he said.

Then the enlightened one, the lord, rebuked him, saying: “How could you, foolish man, act as a go-between? That is not, foolish man, for the benefit of unbelievers ... Thus, monks, this course of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk should act as a go-between for a woman with a man in mind or for a man with a woman in mind, whether as a wife or as a mistress, that is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.”

\[\text{Bu-Ss 5.2.1}\]

1 oyācati and āyācati. For āyācati. cf. DN i.240. 2 oyācati and āyācati. For āyācati. cf. DN i.240. 3 sajito, Vin-a 553 says, “endowed with all means of livelihood, beautifully adorned.” 4 sukhamedho. 5 sañcarittaṁ samāpajjati. For note on samāpajjati see BD 1.201, n. 3.
At one time many men of abandoned life¹ who were amusing themselves in a pleasure grove, sent a messenger to a harlot to say, “Come, we will enjoy ourselves in the pleasure grove.”

She said: “Masters, I do not know you, nor who you are, nor to whom you belong; and I have many goods, I am well-to-do, and I will not go outside the city.”² Then the messenger told this matter to the men of abandoned life. A certain man said to these men of abandoned life:

“Masters, why do you beg this harlot? Surely master Udāyin should be told. Master Udāyin will procure (her for you).”

When he had spoken thus, a certain lay-follower said to that man: “Do not speak like that, master; it is not right for recluses, sons of the Sakyans, to act like that. Master Udāyin will not do it.”

When he had spoken thus, they said, “Will he do it, or won’t he do it?” and they made a bet. Then these men of abandoned life approached the venerable Udāyin, and having approached him they said to the venerable Udāyin:

“Now we, honoured sir, amusing ourselves in the pleasure grove, sent a messenger to some harlot, saying, ‘Come, we will enjoy ourselves in the pleasure grove’ She said: ‘Masters, I do not know you, nor who you are, nor to whom you belong; and I have many goods, I am well-to-do, and I will not go outside the city.’ It would be good, honoured sir, if the master would procure this harlot (for us).”

Then the venerable Udāyin went up to this harlot, and having come up he said to this harlot: “Why do you not go among these (men)?”

“Master, I do not know them ... I will not go outside the city.”

“Go among them,” he said, “I know them.”

“If, honoured sir, the master knows them, I will go.”

Then these men of abandoned life, taking this harlot, went to the pleasure grove.

¹ Vin-a 533 calls them “abandoned with women,” itthidhutta, not necessarily leading the wild life of gambling or the wild life of drink—the other two of the three kinds of abandoned life.

² bahinagarañ ca gantabbañ nāhaṁ gamissāmi.
Then that lay-follower became annoyed, vexed, angry, saying: “How can master Udāyin act as a go-between for a temporary wife?”

The monks heard that lay-follower who was annoyed, vexed, angry. Those who were modest monks became annoyed, vexed, angry, saying: “How can the venerable Udāyin act as a go-between for a temporary wife?” Then these monks told this matter to the lord.

“How can you, foolish man, act as a go-between for a temporary wife? It is not, foolish man, for the benefit of unbelievers ... Thus, monks, this course of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk should act as a go-between for a woman with a man in mind, or for a man with a woman in mind whether as a wife or as a mistress or even as a temporary wife, there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.”

Whatever means: he who ...

Monk means: ... thus monk is to be understood in this meaning. Should act as a go-between means: either sent by a woman he goes into a man’s presence, or sent by a man he goes into a woman’s presence.

For a woman with a man in mind means: he tells to a woman the mind of a man.

For a man with a woman in mind means: he tells to a man the mind of a woman.

¹ Cf. Buddhaghosa, who says at Vin-a 553–554 that taṁkhaṇo here means “for a short time”; thus taṁkhaṇikā may mean “a temporary wife” as in this Saṅghādisesa rule. See below BD 1.236, for explanation of the Old Commentary.
As a wife¹ means: You will become a wife.
As a mistress means: You will become a mistress.
Even as a temporary wife² means: You will become a wife for the moment.

Offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order ... because of that it is called an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

Ten (kinds of) women: protected by the mother, protected by the father, protected by the parents, protected by the brother, protected by the sister, protected by the relations, protected by the lineage, protected by dhamma, with protection, protected by a stick.³

Ten (kinds of) wives: one bought with money, one kept for passion, a kept woman, one who receives clothes, one who provides water, one who takes off the pad (for the burden she carries on the head), the slave and wife, the servant and wife,⁴ the flag-brought,⁵ the wife for the moment.

Protected by the mother means: the mother protects,⁶ guards,⁷ wields supremacy,⁸ has her under control.⁹

---

¹ Vin- a 554, “Speaking to a woman with a man in mind he speaks of being a wife. Speaking to a man with a woman in mind, he speaks of being a mistress. Further, speaking to a woman with a man in mind he speaks of wifehood, of the sure state of being a wife, of the low livelihood of a mistress, but saying this, he also says, ‘they say you will become a wife.’ In speaking to a man with a woman in mind he says, ‘You will become a lord, a husband, you will become an adulterer.’”

² Taṁkhaṇikā and muhuttikā are practically synonymous.

³ MN i.286= MN iii.46, gives the first five on this list, then sassāmikā, saparidāṇḍā antaṁ mālāgulaparikkhitā. An v.264 gives the first five, then dhamaṁrakkhitā (with variant readings to insert gottā-rakkhitā), sassāmikā, etc., as at MN i.286; MN iii.46. Vv-a 72 follows the Vinaya reading. Cf. GS 5.177, n. 2.

⁴ For explanation see below, BD 1.238.

⁵ For explanation see below, BD 1.238.

⁶ Vin- a 555, “the mother lets her go nowhere.”

⁷ Vin- a 555, “she puts her in a place so (well) guarded that other people cannot see (her).”

⁸ Vin- a 555, “restrains her from living in lodgings of her own choice, and overrules her.”

⁹ Vin- a 555, “Saying ‘do this, do not do that.’” Cf. MN i.214, where the expression cittaṁ varaṁ vatteti, “has his heart under control,” or, as at Further Dialogues of the Buddha 1.155, “is master of his heart.”
Protected by the father means: the father ... has her under control.

Protected by the parents means: the parents ... have her under control.

Protected by the brother means: the brother ... has her under control.

Protected by the sister means: the sister ... has her under control.

Protected by the relations means: the relations ... have her under control.

Protected by the lineage means: her own clans-people ... have her under control.

Protected by dhamma means: those regarding dhamma ... have her under control.

With protection means: she is appropriated in the womb saying: “She is mine,” even if she is betrothed.

Protected by the stick means: the stick is put by some people, and whoever goes to such-and-such a woman says: “What a stick.”

Bought with money means: having bought (her) with money, he makes her stay.

Kept for passion, “kept for passion, means, he lives of his own free will for passion. Inasmuch as she is not only passionate, but a wife she is accepted by the man.” means: the dear one makes the dear one stay.

A kept woman means: giving her wealth, he makes her stay.

---

1 Vin-a 555, “neither lineage nor dhamma protects her, but she is protected by her own clans-people and by those regarding dhamma who, on account of one teacher, have gone forth belonging to one company.” It is not the abstract but the concrete which protects her; people and not ideas, in fact, her co-religionists (sahadhammikā). This is an interesting heading as being a recognised kind together with nine others.

2 etako daṇḍo. 3 Vin-a 555 4 piyo piyaṁ vāseti. 5 Vin-a 555, “A country-woman comes to be a wife, having received the household implements.”
One who receives clothes means: giving a garment, he makes her stay.¹

One who provides water means: having handled a bowl of water, he makes her stay.²

One who takes off the pad (for burdens she carries on the head) means: taking down the pad he makes her stay.³

A slave means: she is a slave and a wife.

A servant means: she is a servant and wife.⁴

Flag-brought means: a woman taken in a raid.⁵

A temporary wife means: a wife for a moment.

A man sends a monk saying: “Go, honoured sir, to such a one protected by the mother, and explain: ‘He says become the wife of such a one bought for money.’” If he accepts, examines and brings back, it is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

A man ... protected by the father, explain: ... protected by a stick, explain ... a formal meeting of the Order.

The steps in the composition

A man sends a monk saying: “Go, sir, to such and such a one protected by the mother, protected by the father and say: ‘He says, become the wife of so-and-so bought with money.’” If he accepts ... formal meeting of the Order.

A man ... protected by the mother and protected by the parents ...

¹ Vin-a 555, “receiving as much as a garment or cloak, a vagabond woman rises to be a wife.” ² Vin-a 555, plunging their two hands into one pot of water, he says: “Joined like this water, so let them not be divided.” ³ Vin-a 555, “Someone who is a gatherer of firewood and so on, and taking the pad off her head, he keeps her in the house.” In India the women put a coiled pad of cotton or some material or grass on their head, and then balance their burdens: brass vessels, long bunches of firewood, big round baskets and so on, on the pad. ⁴ Vin-a 555, “She works in the house for wages. Somebody lives a household life with her—not satisfied with his own wife.” ⁵ Vin-a 556, “Having gone with the army erecting the flag, plundering another district, she is brought back. If anyone makes her his wife, she is called flag-brought.” protected by the mother and protected by a stick ... formal meeting of the Order.

A portion of the series

A man ... “protected by the father and protected by the parents ... protected by the father and protected by the mother” ... formal meeting of the Order.

Told is the beginning of the contracted series

A man ... “protected by a stick and protected by the mother ... protected by a stick and with protection ...” ... formal meeting of the Order.

Told is that beginning with one

That beginning with two and that beginning with three up to that beginning with nine should be done in the same way. This is that beginning with ten:

A man sends a monk saying: “Go, sir, to such a one protected by the mother and protected by the father ... and protected by a stick, and explain: ‘He says, become ...’” ... a formal meeting of the Order.

Told is the series about women bought with money

A man sends a monk, saying: “Go, honoured sir, to such a one protected by the mother, and explain: ‘He says, become the wife kept for passion of such a man ... the kept woman ... the temporary wife.’” If he accepts ... a formal meeting of the Order.

A man sends a monk, saying: “Go, honoured sir, to such a woman protected by the mother and protected by the father ... and protected by a stick, and explain: ‘... a temporary wife.’” If he accepts ... formal meeting of the Order.

Told is the series on the woman who is a temporary wife

304
A man sends a monk saying: “Go, honoured sir, explain to so-and-so protected by the mother: ‘He says, become the wife bought by money of such and such a man,’” If he accepts, examines her, brings back, it is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

A man ... ‘the wife kept for passion’ ... ‘the kept woman’ ... ‘the temporary wife’ ... formal meeting of the Order.

The steps of composition

This is that beginning with ten:

A man sends a monk, saying: “Go, honoured sir, explain to so-and-so protected by a stick: ‘He says, become the wife of so-and-so, bought by money, and kept for passion and ... and the temporary wife’” ... formal meeting of the Order.

A man sends a monk saying: “Go, honoured sir, explain to so-and-so protected by the mother: ‘It is said, become the wife bought by money of so-and-so.’” ... a formal meeting of the Order.

A man ... “to so-and-so protected by the mother and protected by the father, explain: ‘It is said, become the wives and so-and-so, bought by money and kept for passion, and ...’” ... a formal meeting of the Order.

A man ... “to so-and-so protected by the mother and protected by the father and protected by the parents, and explain: ‘He says, become the wives of so-and-so, bought with money, and kept for passion, and the kept woman and ...’” ... a formal meeting of the Order.

Increase from both (ends) is to be made thus:

A man sends a monk saying: “Go, honoured sir, to so-and-so protected by the mother and protected by the father and ... and protected by a stick and explain: ‘He says, become the wives of so-and-so, bought by money, and kept for passion ... and temporary wives.’” ... a formal meeting of the Order.
Told is the increase from both (ends)

The book of the discipline

The mother of a man sent a monk ... the father of a man sent a monk ... the parents of a man sent a monk ... the brother of a man sent a monk ... the sister of a man sent a monk ... the relations of a man sent a monk ... the clansmen of a man sent a monk ... the co-religionists of a man sent a monk.

The mother of (a girl) protected by the mother sent a monk, saying: “Go, honoured sir, explain to so-and-so: ‘Let her be the wife, bought by money, of so-and-so ...’” ... formal meeting of the Order.

The steps in the composition

This is that beginning with ten:

The mother of (a girl) protected by the mother sent a monk, saying: “Go, honoured sir, explain to so-and-so: ‘Let her be the wife of so-and-so bought by money and the wife kept for passion and ... and the temporary wife ...’” ... a formal meeting of the Order.

The father of (a girl) protected by the father sent a monk ... the parents of (a girl) protected by the parents sent a monk ... the brother of (a girl) protected by the brother sent a monk ... the sister of (a girl) protected by the sister sent a monk ... the relations of (a girl) protected by the relations sent a monk ... the co-religionists of (a girl) protected by dhamma sent a monk ... one who was appropriated with protection sent a monk ... one who has put a stick, for protection with a stick, sent a monk, saying: “Go, honoured sir, explain to so-and-so: ‘Be the wife of so-and-so bought with money ... be the wife of so-and-so bought with money and the wife kept for passion ... and the temporary wife.’” ... a formal meeting of the Order.
One protected by the mother sent a monk, saying: “Go, honoured sir, explain to so-and-so: ‘I am the wife bought by money for so-and-so ...’” ... a formal meeting of the Order.

One protected by the mother ... ‘the wife kept for passion ... the temporary wife’ ... formal meeting of the Order.

The steps of composition

If one protected by a stick sends a monk, saying: “Go, sir, explain to so-and-so: ‘I am the wife for so-and-so, bought with money ... another wife kept for passion and and the temporary wife.’” If he accepts, examines, and brings back, it is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

Told is the whole abbreviated series

If he accepts, examines, brings back, it is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order. If he accepts, examines, but does not bring back, it is a grave offence. If he accepts, but does not examine and does not bring back, it is an offence of wrong-doing. If he does not accept, but examines and brings back, it is a grave offence. If he does not accept, but examines, yet does not bring back, it is an offence of wrong-doing. If he does not accept, and does not examine, but brings back, it is an offence of wrong-doing. If he does not accept, does not examine and does not bring back, it is not an offence.

If a man enjoins many monks, saying: “Go, honoured sirs, examine such and such a woman,” and if they all accept, all examine and all bring back, it is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order for them all.

If a man ... “... examine such and such a woman,” and if they all accept, all examine, but if one makes them bring back, it is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order for them all.
If a man … “... examine such and such a woman,” if all accept, if one makes them examine her and if all bring back, it is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order for them all.

If a man … “... examine such and such woman,” if all accept, but if one makes them examine, and if one makes them bring back, it is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order for them all.

A man enjoins a monk: “Go, honoured sir, examine such and such a woman.” If he accepts, examines her and brings back, it is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

A man enjoins a monk: “Go, honoured sir, examine such and such a woman.” If he accepts, examines her but makes a novice bring back, it is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

A man enjoins a monk: “… such and such a woman.” If he accepts, makes a novice examine, but himself brings back, it is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

A man enjoins a monk: “… such and such a woman.” If he accepts, makes a novice examine her, and the novice having examined, brings back alone,¹ there is a grave offence for both.²

Going, he procures, coming back he deceives with words—it is a grave offence. Going he deceives with words, coming back he procures—it is a grave offence. Going he procures, coming back he procures—it is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

¹ bahiddhā, not telling his teacher, the monk. ² Vin-a 559, “A grave offence for both means: the accepting, and making over the examining is a grave offence with two parts for the teacher. The accepting and the bringing back is a grave offence with two parts for the novice.”
There is no offence if it is for the Order,¹ or for a shrine,² or if he is ill,³ if he is going on business, if he is mad, if he is a beginner.

---

MNEMONIC LIST

Asleep, and dead, gone out, unsexed woman, a female eunuch,
She was reconciled after having quarrelled, and did go-between for a eunuch.

---

At one time a certain man enjoined a certain monk: “Go, honoured sir, examine such and such a woman.” As he was going, he asked some people: “Where is so-and-so?”

“She is asleep, honoured sir,” they said. He was remorseful, and said: “What now if I have fallen into an offence requiring a formal meeting of the Order.” He told this matter to the lord. He said: “Monk, this is not an offence requiring a formal meeting of the Order; it is an offence of wrong-doing.”

---

At one time a certain man enjoined a certain monk, saying: “Go, honoured sir, examine such and such a woman.” As he was going he asked some people: “Where is so-and-so?” “She is dead, honoured sir,” they said … “She has gone out, honoured sir,” they said … “That is an unsexed woman, honoured sir.” … “That is a female eunuch.”⁴ ¹ Vin-a 599f., “It is not an offence if any hall for reciting the Pātimokkha belonging to the Order is left unfinished, and a lay-follower sends a monk to a female lay-follower in order to get food as wages for the workers, or if a female lay-follower goes to a lay-follower on business connected with the Order. It is the same for building a shrine.” ² I do not think a cetiya is necessarily a “tumulus, sepulchral monument, cairn,” as the Pali-English Dictionary defines it. The cetiyas at, e.g., the Caves of Ellora and Ajanta are certainly neither tumuli nor cairns, nor do they contain relics. Erected probably after the life-time of the Buddha, they were used as places for meditation, (cet, to think), or for listening to discourses. See below, BD 1.266. ³ “If he goes for the sake of medicine for an invalid, sent by a lay-follower into the presence of a female lay-follower, or sent by a female lay-follower into the presence of a male lay-follower.”⁴ Itthipañḍakā, may be name of a deformity. Cf. above, BD 1.217; and Vin 2.271 (“pañḍikā).

---

honoured sir,” they said. He was remorseful ... “offence of wrongdoing.”

At one time a certain woman, having quarrelled with her husband, went to her mother’s house. A monk, dependent on (her) family, effected a reconciliation. He was remorseful ...

“Monk, is she not one to be told ‘enough’?”
“She is not one to be told ‘enough,’ lord.”
“It is not an offence, monk, as she is not one to be told ‘enough’.”

At one time a certain monk acted as a go-between for a eunuch. He was remorseful. “What now if I have fallen into an offence requiring a formal meeting of the Order?” He told this matter to the lord.

“Monk, it is not an offence requiring a formal meeting of the Order; it is a grave offence.”

_Told is the Fifth Offence entailing a Formal Meeting of the Order_

---

1 alañivacaniyā, a woman who has to be addressed with alañ (enough), perhaps the husband’s way of divorcing, and the wife returns to her parental home. That this woman did not return to the parental home, nālañivacaniyā, means, according to Buddhaghosa, Vin-a 561, “she was not abandoned (by her husband). For any woman who is abandoned according to the customs of diverse districts and thus ceases to be a wife, is called alañivacaniyā. But this woman was not one to be told ‘enough’ (perhaps = divorce) on account of some quarrel, so that here the lord said there was no offence.”
... at Rājagaha in the Bamboo Grove at the squirrels’ feeding place. At that time the monks of Āḷavī,¹ begging in company,² were having huts built with no benefactor,³ for their own advantage, and not according to measure⁴; but these were not finished. They lived intent on begging, intent on hinting⁵: “Give a man, give a servant, give an ox, give a wagon, give a knife, give a hatchet, give an axe, give a spade, give a chisel, give a creeper, give bamboo, give muñja-grass, give coarse grass, give tiṇa-grass, give clay.” People were oppressed with the begging, oppressed with the hinting, and when they saw the monks they were perturbed, then alarmed, then they ran away, then they went by a different route,⁶ turned in another direction⁷ and closed the door; and when they saw cows they ran away, imagining them to be monks.

¹ Vin-a 561, “boys born in the kingdom of Āḷavī were called Āḷavakā, and at the time of their going forth they were known as Āḷavakā.” These monks often gave trouble over new buildings, cf. above, BD 1.148, and Vin 2.172. ² Oldenberg says, Vin 3.274, “probably we ought to read constantly saṃyācikāya kuṭīyo.” Vin-a 566 takes saṃyācikāya to mean begging themselves. See below, BD 1.254. ³ Assāmikāyo ti anissariyo, Vin-a 561, which goes on to say, “having them built without a donor,” or benefactor, dāyaka. ⁴ Appamāṇikāyo. Vin-a 561, “with this amount they will be completed,” they said. So they were not limited in size, their measure increased, their measure was great. ⁵ See Vin 3.227 ⁶ Vin-a 565, “having come to a road, then leaving it and turning back, they went taking the left side or the right.” ⁷ Aññena mukhaṁ karoti: to direct the face towards another (quarter).
Then the venerable Kassapa the Great\(^1\) arose from spending the rains in Rājagaha, and set out for Ālavī. In due course he arrived at Ālavī. There the venerable Kassapa the Great stayed in the chief shrine at Ālavī.\(^2\) Then the venerable Kassapa the Great rising early, and taking his bowl and robes, entered Ālavī for alms. People seeing the venerable Kassapa the Great were perturbed, then alarmed, then they ran away, then they went by a different route, turned in another direction and closed the door. Then the venerable Kassapa the Great, having walked Ālavī for alms, after having eaten and finished his meal, addressed the monks saying:

“Formerly, your reverences, Ālavī had good alms-food, alms were easily obtained, it was easy to keep oneself going by gleaning or by favour. But now this Ālavī is short of alms-food, alms are difficult to obtain, nor is it easy to keep oneself going by gleaning or by favour. What is the reason, what the cause that now this Ālavī is short of alms-food, that alms are difficult to obtain, that it is not easy to keep oneself going by gleaning or by favour?”

Then these monks told this matter to the venerable Kassapa the Great.

---

\(^{1}\) Mahā. The rendering “Great” is perhaps a little misleading, for one would not think him eminent enough to be so called. The epithet was clearly given so as to distinguish him from other Kassapas. Conceivably it means that he had been in the Order longer than they had. We cannot say the “Elder” as thera is an elder; but Kassapa Senior might be possible. Further, I think it doubtful whether it is right to render Mahā as “Great” in any of the cases where it occurs as an epithet of disciples. For example, Sāriputta was never called Mahā-Sāriputta, as Moggallāna was referred to, very frequently, as Mahā-Moggallāna; and yet as far as “greatness” goes, there is little or nothing to choose between them.

\(^{2}\) Aggāḷave cetiye, mentioned at Vin 2.172; Sn i.185; Snp p.59; Dhp-a 3.170. Buddhaghosa atSn-p-a 344 = Sn-a i.268 explains aggāḷave cetiye as Ālaviyaṁ aggacetiye, and says that it was transformed into a vihāra. At ks i.234, it is taken to be “the chief temple” at Ālavī; in Buddhist Suttas, p.56 (second edition), it is called “the temple at Aggālava”; while translator at Vinaya Texts iii.212 appears to regard it as a proper name. Mr. E.M. HARE in GS 4.147 translates, “at Aggālava, near the shrine there,” and gives no notes. It was probably a pre-Buddhist shrine. See above, BD 1.243, n. 4, and below, BD 1.266, n. 5. Also see B.C. LAW, Geography of Early Buddhism, Appendix, p.74ff.
Then the lord having dwelt at Rājagaha for as long as he thought fit, set out on a tour for Āḷavī. Making the tour, in due course he arrived at Āḷavī. There at Āḷavī the lord dwelt in the chief shrine at Āḷavī. Then the venerable Kassapa the Great approached the lord, and having approached him, he greeted the lord and sat down to one side. Sitting to one side the venerable Kassapa the Great told this matter to the lord. Then the lord on that occasion, for that reason, having had the Order of monks convened, questioned the monks of Āḷavī, saying:

“Is it true, as is said, that you, monks, begging in company, were having huts built, with no benefactor, for your own advantage, not according to measure, and that these were not completed? They say that you dwelt intent on begging, intent on hinting: ‘Give a man ...’... seeing cows they ran away, taking them for monks.”

“It is true, lord,” they said.

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying: “How can you, foolish men, begging in company, have huts built? ... ‘Give a man ... give clay.’ It is not foolish men, for the benefit of unbelievers,” ... having rebuked them and given dhamma-talk, he addressed the monks:

“Formerly,¹ monks, two brothers (who were) holy men² lived close by the river Ganges. Then, monks, Maṇikanṭha,³ the nāga-king,⁴ emerging from the river Ganges, came up to the younger holy man, and having come up and encircled the younger holy man seven times with his coils, he stood spreading his great hood above his head.⁵

¹ Cf. Ja 2.283, Maṇikanṭhajātaka, for this story. ² Isī, holy man or anchorite. Isī has not the great force of ṛṣi of the brahminical tradition, meaning a seer or inspired singer to whom the Vedas were spoken or revealed. There are interesting variations in the details of this story as described in Vinaya and Jātaka. ³ Vin-a 565, “the nāga-king went with a very valuable jewel able to grant all desires, adorning his throat, therefore he is called ‘jewel-throated.’” Cf. Hindu mythology, where the cow granting all desires and the jewel granting all desires were brought out from the sea at the Churning of the Ocean. ⁴ Or serpent-king ⁵ i.e., according to Vin-a 565, above the younger holy man’s head. He was practising mettā-vihāra, and the nāga-king shaded him with his hood.
Then, monks, the younger holy man, through fear of this snake, became thin, wretched, of a bad colour, yellowish, his veins showing all over his body. Monks, the elder holy man saw that the younger holy man was thin, wretched, of bad colour, yellowish, the veins showing all over his body. Seeing this, he said to the younger holy man: ‘Why are you, good sir, thin ... all over your body?’

‘Now, the nāga-king, Maṇikaṇṭha, came out of the river Ganges for me, and came up to me, and having come up and having encircled me seven times with his coils, he stood spreading his great hood above my head. I, good sir, through fear of the snake, became thin ... all over my body.’

‘But, good sir, do you not want this snake to return?’

‘Good sir, I do not want this snake to return.’

‘Do you, good sir, see anything of this snake?’

‘I see, good sir, the jewelled ornament on his throat.’

‘Then, good sir, you beg this snake for the jewel, saying: “Good sir, give me the jewel; I want the jewel.”’

Then, monks, Maṇikaṇṭha, the nāga-king, emerging from the river Ganges, came up to the younger holy man and having come up he stood to one side. Monks, as he was standing to one side, the younger holy man said to Maṇikaṇṭha, the nāga-king: ‘Good sir, give the jewel to me, I want the jewel.’ Then Maṇikaṇṭha, the nāga-king, said: ‘A monk begs for the jewel, a monk wants the jewel,’ and he hurried away.

“A second time, monks, did Maṇikaṇṭha emerging ... come up to the younger holy man. Then, monks, the younger holy man saw Maṇikaṇṭha, the nāga-king, coming from afar, and seeing Maṇikaṇṭha, the nāga king, he said: ‘Good sir, give me the jewel, I want the jewel.’ Then, monks, Maṇikaṇṭha, the nāga-king, said: ‘A monk begs for the jewel, a monk wants the jewel.’ And then he turned away again.

“A third time, monks, Maṇikaṇṭha, the nāga-king, came up from the river Ganges. Then, monks, the younger holy man saw Maṇikaṇṭha, the nāga-king, emerging from the river Ganges, and seeing him, he said to Maṇikaṇṭha, the nāga-king: ‘Good sir, give me the jewel, I want the jewel.’ Then, monks, Maṇikaṇṭha, the nāga-king, addressed these verses to the younger holy man:

“I. My food and drink is produced abundantly, Excellently, by reason of this jewel, I do not give it to you, you are one who asks too much, And not for you will I come to a hermitage.

“Like a lad, his hand on a tempered sword,¹ You frighten² me begging for this stone,³ I do not give it to you, you are one who asks too much And not for you will I come to a hermitage.’

“Then, monks, Maṇikaṇṭha, the nāga-king, said: ‘A monk begs for the jewel, a monk wants the jewel,’ and he went away; then he was gone, and did not come back again. Then, monks, the younger holy man, not seeing that beautiful snake, became increasingly thin, wretched, of a bad colour, yellowish, the veins showing all over his body. The elder holy man, seeing that the younger holy man had become increasingly thin ... the veins showing all over his body, said to the younger holy man:

“‘Why are you, good sir, increasingly thin ... the veins showing all over your body?’

“‘It is because I, good sir, do not see the beautiful snake that I become increasingly thin ... the veins showing all over my body.’

¹ sakkharadhotipāṇi. Ja 2.285 explained “your hand is on a sword polished on the oil-(whetting) stone.” Vin-a 566 says: sakkharā vuccati kālasīlā (a dark stone) ... sakkharadhotapāṇi, pāsāne dhotanisita-khaggahattho ti attho, which seems to mean “in the hand the sword whetted and cleaned on a stone.” “As a man with a hand on a sword frightens, do you frighten begging me for the stone.” Ibib., Rouse translates this line at Ja 2.198: “Like lads who wait with tempered sword in hand” (lads, susū being there in the plural). ² tāsesi, causitive of tasati, to tremble, shake, to have fears. ³ Reading with Jātaka, tāses’ imaṁ selam yācamāno, and not with Vinaya, tāses maṇi ... Jātaka Commentary says (Ja 2.285): “asking for this jewel, you frighten me like a young man who would unsheathe his gold-hilted sword and say: ‘I cut off your head.’” Vin-a 566 reads, evaṁ tāsesi maṇi selam yācamāno, maṇiṁ yācanto ti attho.
“Then, monks, the elder holy man addressed these verses to the younger holy man:

“Do not beg him who is dear for what you covet,
It is odious to ask for too much,
The snake, begged by a brahmin for a jewel, Disappeared, and was not seen (again).”¹

“Monks, begging from these animals and living creatures will become hated, begging by hinting (will become) hated, how much more then (will be begging) from men?

Once upon a time, monks, a certain monk lived in a certain thicket on a slope of the Himālayas. Monks, not far from the thicket was an extensive, low-lying marshy ground. Then, monks, a great flock of birds, going daily to feed in this marshy ground, entered the thicket at night to roost. Then, monks, that monk, worried by the noise of the flocking birds, came up to me, and having come up and greeted me, he sat down to one side. Sitting to one side, I said, monks, to that monk: ‘I hope, monk, you are getting on well, I hope, monk, Vin 3.148 you are keeping going, having accomplished your journey with but little fatigue. But where do you come from, monk?’

‘I am getting along fairly well, lord,² I am keeping going, lord,³ and, lord,⁴ have accomplished my journey with but little fatigue. There is, lord,⁵ on the slopes of the Himālayas a large thicket, and, lord, not far from this thicket there is an extensive, low-lying marshy ground. Now, lord, a great flock of birds going daily to feed at that marshy ground goes into that thicket at night to roost. That is why I come, lord,⁶ for I am worried by the noise of that flock of birds.’

“I said: ‘Monk, do you want this flock of birds not to return?’

‘I want, lord,⁷ this flock of birds not to return.’

“I said: ‘Then you, monk, going there, and penetrating this thicket three times in the first watch of the night must utter this sound:

¹ = Ja 2.285. ² Bhagavā. ³ Bhagavā. ⁴ Bhante. ⁵ Bhante. ⁶ Bhagavā. ⁷ Bhante.
‘Listen to me, good sirs, whatever birds have come to roost in this thicket, I want a feather. Good sirs, give me one feather ‘at a time.’ Three times in the middle watch ... three times in the last watch ... at a time.’ Then, monks, this monk having gone there, and having penetrated the thicket, uttered this sound three times ... in the middle watch of the night ... in the last watch of the night ... ‘at a time.’ Then, monks, that flock of birds said: ‘The monk begs for a feather, the monk wants a feather,’ and they departed from that thicket, and after they were gone, they did not come back again. Begging, monks, from these animals and living creatures will become hateful, hinting (will become) hateful, how much more then from men?

“Once upon a time, monks, the father of Raṭṭhapāla, the noble youth, addressed these verses to Raṭṭhapāla, the noble youth:

“’Tho’ I do not know them, Raṭṭhāpāla, the many-folk, These, meeting me, beg—why do you not beg of me?’

‘The beggar is not liked, the not-giver to beggar is not liked,¹ Therefore I do not beg of you, do not be angry with me.’²

“Monks, if Raṭṭhapāla, the noble youth, can speak thus to his own father, how much more then ean (any) person to (any other) person?

“Monks, it is difficult for householders to collect possessions, and difficult to protect their stores; how can you, foolish men, dwell intent on begging, intent on asking by hinting (for something) from among these possessions which are difficult to collect, and from among these stores which are difficult to protect, saying: ‘Give a man, give a servant, give an ox, give a wagon, give a knife, give a hatchet, give an axe, give a spade, give a chisel, give a creeper, give bamboo, give muñja-grass, give coarse grass, give tiṇa-grass, give

¹ For not giving is not liked, Vin-a 566. ² = Ja 3.352, Ja 3.353, except first line.
clay.’ This is not, foolish men, for the benefit of unbelievers ... and, monks, thus this course of training should be set forth:

“A monk begging in company⁴ for having a hut built, which has no benefactor, for his own advantage, should make it according to measure. This is the measure: in length, twelve spans of a span of the accepted length²; in width seven spans inside. Monks should be brought for marking out the site. A site not involving destruction,³ and with an open space round it,⁴ should be marked out by these monks. If that monk should build a hut, begging himself for a site which involves destruction and which does not have an open space round it, or if he should not bring the monks for marking out a site, or if he should exceed the measure, there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.”

Begging in company means: oneself begging for a man, for a servant, for an ox, for a wagon, for a knife, for a hatchet, for an axe, for a spade, for a chisel ... for tīna-grass, for clay.

A hut means: it is smeared inside or it is smeared outside, or it is smeared inside and outside.⁵

For having ... built means: building or causing to be built.

Without a benefactor means: there is not anyone who is the owner, either a woman or a man or a householder or one who has gone forth.

For his own advantage means: for the good of himself.⁶

Should make it according to measure. This is the measure:
in length, twelve spans of a span of the accepted length means:

---

¹ Vin-a 566, “saññācikā means, having themselves inaugurated is called ‘begging,’ therefore saññācikāya is called begging themselves,” cf. Vin-a 561 and below, Old Commentary, sayaṁ yācitvā. ² Sugata-vidatthiyā, see Vinaya Texts i.8, n. 2, for a discussion of this phrase. Vin-a 567, “a man of medium height is three spans, a builder’s cubit (hattha, the hand used as a measure) is one and a half cubits.” ³ Anārambha—i.e., to living creatures, see below, Old Commentary, BD 1.257. ⁴ Saparikkamana—i.e., accessible, good for rambling in. See below, Old Commentary, “possible for a cart drawn by a yoke of oxen to go round it.” I follow translation as at Vinaya Texts i.8. ⁵ =below, BD 1.267, in definition of vihāra. ⁶ Cf. below, BD 1.268 for the outside measure. In width, seven inside means: for the inside measure.

---

Monks should be brought for marking out a site means: that a monk building a hut, having cleared a site for a hut, approaching the Order, arranging his robe over one shoulder, honouring the feet of the senior monks, squatting down on his heels, and saluting with his palms outstretched, should speak thus to them:\(^1\): ‘Honoured sirs, I, begging in company, for my own advantage, am desirous of building a hut, it has no benefactor; honoured sirs, I beg the Order for inspection of the site for a hut.’ A second time it should be begged for, a third time it should be begged for. If the whole Order\(^2\) is able to inspect a site for a hut, it should be inspected by the whole Order. But if the whole Order is not able to inspect a site for a hut, then those monks who are experienced and competent to know what involves destruction, what does not involve destruction, what has an open space round it, what does not have an open space round it—begging these, they should depute (them).

And thus, monks, should they depute (them): the Order should be informed by an experienced, competent monk: ‘Honoured sirs, let the Order listen to me. Such and such a monk, begging in company, for his own advantage, desirous of building a hut which has no benefactor, begs the Order for inspection of the site for a hut. If it is the right time for the Order,\(^3\) the Order should depute such and such monks to inspect a site for a hut for that monk. This is the motion. Let the Order listen to me, honoured sirs. Such and such a monk ... site for a hut. The Order depute such and such monks to inspect a site for a hut for such and such a monk. If it seems good to the venerable ones to depute the inspection of a site for a hut to such and such monks for that monk, be silent; if it does not seem good, then you should speak. Such and such monks are deputed by the Order to inspect a site for a hut for such and such a monk. It seems good to the Order, therefore they are silent; thus do I understand.’

---

\(^1\) Vin-a 569, “the Order should be spoken to thus by him.” \(^2\) I.e., all the community of a district or of a vihāra. \(^3\) Vin-a 569, “for this inspection.”

These monks (thus) deputed, going there, a site for a hut should be inspected, it should be known whether it involves destruction, whether it does not involve destruction, whether it has an open space round it, whether it does not have an open space round it. If it involves destruction and has not an open space round it, it should be said: Do not build here. If it does not involve destruction and has an open space round it, the Order should be told that it does not involve destruction and that it has an open space round it. The monk building the hut, going up to the Order, arranging his robe over one shoulder, honouring the feet of the senior monks, squatting down on his heels, and saluting with his palms outstretched, should speak thus: ‘I, honoured sirs, begging in company, am desirous of building a hut; it has no benefactor, it is for my own advantage. Honoured sirs, I beg the Order to mark out the site for a hut.’ A second time it should be begged for, a third time it should be begged for. The Order should be informed by an experienced, competent monk: ‘Honoured sirs, let the Order listen to me. Such and such a monk, begging in company, is desirous of building a hut, it has no benefactor, it is for his own advantage. He begs the Order to mark out a site for a hut. If it is the right time for the Order, the Order should mark out a site for a hut for such and such a monk. This is the motion. Honoured sirs, let the Order listen to me. Such and such a monk ... site for a hut. The Order marks out a site for a hut for such and such a monk. If the marking out of the site for a hut for such and such a monk seems good to the venerable ones, be silent; if it does not seem good, then speak. The site for a hut for such and such a monk is marked out by the Order. It seems good to the Order, therefore they are silent; thus do I understand.’

Involving destruction means: if it is the abode of ants or if it is the abode of termites or if it is the abode of rats or if it is the abode of snakes or if it is the abode of scorpions or if it is the abode of
monks’ formal meeting (saṅghādisesa) 6

centipede or if it is the abode of elephants or if it is the abode of horses or if it is the abode of lions or if it is the abode of tigers or if it is the abode of leopards or if it is the abode of bears or if it is the abode of hyenas¹ or if it is the abode of any other animals or living creatures, or if it is connected with grain or if it is connected with vegetables, or if it is connected with the slaughtering-place² or if it is connected with the execution-block or if it is connected with a cemetery or if it is connected with a pleasure-grove or if it is connected with the king’s property or if it is connected with elephant-stables or if it is connected with horses’ stables or if it is connected with a prison or if it is connected with a tavern³ or if it is connected with a slaughter-house or if it is connected with a carriage road or if it is connected with a cross-road or if it is connected with a public rest-house or if it is connected with a meeting-place:⁴ this means involving destruction.

Not with an open space round it means: It is not possible to go round it even with a yoked wagon, to go round it everywhere with a ladder.⁵ This means not with an open space round it.

Not involving destruction means: if it is not the abode of ants nor is it the abode of termites ... it is not connected with a meeting-place. This means not involving destruction.

With an open space round it means: it is possible to go round it even with a yoked wagon, to go round it everywhere with a ladder.
This means with an open space round it.

Begging in company means: oneself begging saying: Give a man ... give clay.

A hut means: it is smeared inside or it is smeared outside or it is smeared inside and outside.

¹ Cf. above, BD 1.98; An iii.101; Ja 5.416. At Vin 1.219–220 it is a dukkāta to eat the flesh of some of these animals. ² Nissita throughout. ³ For thieves, Vin-a 570. ⁴ At Vin 4.267 nuns are forbidden to keep both such places. ⁵ Text reads, saṁsaraṇa; Vin-a 570 reads saṅcaraṇa. ⁶ Vin-a 570, “a ladder having been put up by those approving of the hut, it is not possible to go round it with a ladder (to lean a ladder on every point of it).
Should build means: he builds or he causes to be built.

If he should not bring the monks for marking out a site, or if he should exceed the measure means: not having caused the site for a hut to be marked out by a vote following upon the motion, he builds or causes to be built, exceeding the length or width by as much as even a hair’s breadth, in each operation there is an offence of wrong-doing. If one lump¹ is (still) to come there is a grave offence, but when that lump has come there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.²

Offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order means: ... because of this it is called an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

If a monk builds a hut, the site not having been marked out, involving destruction, not with an open space round it, there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order together with two offences of wrong-doing.

If a monk builds a hut, the site not having been marked out, involving destruction, with an open space round it, there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order together with an offence of wrong-doing.

If a monk builds a hut, the site not having been marked out, not involving destruction, not with an open space round it, there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order together with an offence of wrong-doing.

If a monk builds a hut, the site not having been marked out, not involving destruction, having an open space round it, there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

If a monk builds a hut, the site having been marked out, involving destruction, not with an open space round it, there are two offences of wrong-doing.

If a monk builds a hut, the site having been marked out, involving

¹ Of plaster, Vin-a 571. ² Cf. below, BD 1.268.
If a monk builds a hut, the site having been marked out, not involving destruction, not with an open space round it, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

If a monk builds a hut, the site having been marked out, not involving destruction, having an open space round it, there is no offence.

If a monk builds a hut, exceeding the measure, involving destruction, not with an open space round it, there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order together with two offences of wrong-doing.

If a monk builds a hut, exceeding the measure, involving destruction, with an open space round it, there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order together with an offence of wrong-doing.

If a monk builds a hut, exceeding the measure, not involving destruction, not with an open space round it, there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order together with an offence of wrong-doing.

If a monk builds a hut, exceeding the measure, not involving destruction, with an open space round it, there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

If a monk builds a hut to (the right) measure, involving destruction, not with an open space round it, there are two offences of wrong-doing.

If a monk builds a hut to (the right) measure, involving destruction, with an open space round it, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

If a monk builds a hut to (the right) measure, not involving destruction, not with an open space round it, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

If a monk builds, a hut to (the right) measure, not involving destruction, with an open space round it, there is no offence.
If a monk builds a hut, the site not having been marked out, exceeding the measure, involving destruction, not with an open space round it, there are two offences entailing a formal meeting of the Order together with two offences of wrong-doing.

If a monk builds a hut, the site not having been marked out, exceeding the measure, involving destruction, with an open space round it, there are two offences entailing a formal meeting of the Order together with an offence of wrong-doing.

If a monk builds a hut, the site not having been marked out, exceeding the measure not involving destruction, not with an open space round it, there are two offences entailing a formal meeting of the Order together with an offence of wrong-doing.

If a monk builds a hut, the site not having been marked out, exceeding the measure not involving destruction, with an open space round it, there are two offences entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

If a monk builds a hut, the site having been marked out, to (the right) measure, involving destruction, not with an open space round it, there are two offences of wrong-doing.

If a monk builds a hut, the site having been marked out, to (the right) measure, involving destruction, with an open space round it, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

If a monk builds a hut, the site having been marked out, to (the right) measure, not involving destruction, not with an open space round it, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

If a monk builds a hut, the site having been marked out, to (the right) measure, not involving destruction, with an open space round it, there is no offence.

A monk commands: “Build a hut for me.” If they build a hut for him, the site not having been marked out, involving destruction, not with an open space round it, there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order together with two offences of wrong-doing ...

If they build a hut for him, the site having been marked out, to (the right) measure, not involving destruction, with an open space round it, there is no offence.

A monk having commanded: “Build a hut for me,” went away. But he did not command: “Let the site be marked out, and let it not involve destruction, and let it have an open space round it.” They built a hut for him, the site not having been marked out, involving destruction, not with an open space round it: there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order together with two offences of wrong-doing ... the site having been marked out, not involving destruction, with an open space round it: there is no offence.

A monk having commanded: “Build a hut for me,” went away. But he did not command: “Let it be to (the right) measure, and not involving destruction, and with an open space round it.” They built a hut for him, exceeding the measure, involving destruction, not with an open space round it: there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order together with two offences of wrong-doing ... to (the right) measure, not involving destruction, with an open space round it: there is no offence.

A monk having commanded: “Build a hut for me,” went away. But he did not command: “Let the site be marked out, and let it be to (the right) measure, and not involving destruction, and with an open space round it.” They built a hut for him, the site not having been marked out, exceeding the measure, involving destruction, not with an open space round it: there are two offences entailing a formal meeting of the Order together with two offences of wrong-doing ... the site having been marked out, to (the right) measure, not involving destruction, with an open space round it: there is no offence.
A monk having commanded: “Build a hut for me,” went away. And he commanded: “Let the site be marked out, and let it not involve destruction, and let it have an open space round it.” They built a hut for him, the site not having been marked out, involving destruction, not with an open space round it. He heard and said: “They say that a hut was built for me, the site not having been marked out, involving destruction, not with an open space round it.” This monk should go himself or a messenger should be sent, saying:

“Let the site be marked out, and let it not involve destruction, and let it have an open space round it.” If he should not go himself or send a messenger, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

A monk having commanded: “Build a hut for me,” ... they built a hut for him, the site not having been marked out, involving destruction, with an open space round it. He heard ... or a messenger should be sent saying: “Let the site be marked out, and let it not involve destruction.” If he should not go himself nor send a messenger, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

A monk having commanded: ...“Let the site be marked out, and with an open space round it ... Let the site be marked out ... Let it not involve destruction, and let there be an open space round it ... Let it not involve destruction ... Let there be an open space round it” ... there is an offence of wrong-doing ... They built a hut for him, the site not having been marked out, not involving destruction, with an open space round it, there is no offence.

A monk having commanded: “Build a hut for me,” went away. And he commanded: “Let it be to (the right) measure, and not involving destruction, and with an open space round it.” They built a hut for him, exceeding the measure, involving destruction, not with an open space round it. He heard and said: “They say that a hut was built for me, exceeding the measure, involving destruction, not with an open space round it.” This monk should go himself or a messenger should be sent, saying: “Let it be to (the right) measure, and, not involving destruction, and with an open space round it ... Let it be to (the right) measure, and not involving destruction ... Let it be to (the right) measure, and with an open space round it ... Let it be to (the right) measure ... Let it not involve destruction, and let it have an open space round it ... Let it not involve destruction ... Let it have an open space round it” ... there is no offence.

__________________________

A monk having commanded: “Build a hut for me,” went away. He commanded: “Let the site be marked out, and let it be to (the right) measure, and let it not involve destruction, and let it have an open space round it.” They built a hut for him, the site not having been marked out, exceeding the (right) measure involving destruction, not with an open space round it. He heard ... no offence.

__________________________

A monk having commanded: “Build a hut for me,” went away. He commanded: “Let the site be marked out, and let it not involve destruction, and let there be an open space round it.” They built the hut for him, the site not having been marked out, involving destruction, not with an open space round it: there are three offences of wrong-doing for the builders ... involving destruction, with an open space round it: there are two offences of wrong-doing for the builders ... not involving destruction, not with an open space round it: there are two offences of wrong-doing for the builders ... not involving destruction, with an open space round it, there is an offence of wrong-doing for the builders ... the site having been marked out, involving destruction, not with an open space round it: there are two offences of wrong-doing for the builders ... involving destruction, with an open space round it: there is an offence of wrong-doing for the builders ... not involving destruction, not with an open space round it: there is an offence of wrong-doing for the builders ... not involving destruction, with an open space round it: there is no offence.

__________________________

A monk having commanded: “Build a hut for me” went away. He commanded: “Let it be to (the right) measure, and not involving
A monk having commanded: “Build a hut for me,” went away. They built a hut for him, the site not having been marked out, involving destruction, not with an open space round it. If he comes back (and finds that it is) imperfectly executed, the hut should be given by this monk to another, or being destroyed should be rebuilt. If he does not give it to another, or destroying it have it rebuilt, there are two offences of wrong-doing together with an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order. A monk having commanded: “Build a hut for me,” went away. They built a hut for him, the site having been marked out, to (the right) measure, not involving destruction, with an open space round it: there is no offence.

If he finishes\(^1\) by himself what was imperfectly executed by himself, there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order. If others finish what was imperfectly executed by himself, there is an offence ... of the Order. If he finishes by himself what was imperfectly executed by others, there is an offence ... of the Order. If others finish what was imperfectly executed by others, there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

There is no offence if it is (built) in a mountain-cave\(^2\) as a hut,\(^3\) as \(^1\) Cf. Vin 3.225, Vin 3.229. \(^2\) leṇa. Vin 1.206 = Vin 3.248, translated at Vinaya Texts ii.61, “cave dwelling-place.” At Vin 2.146 it is given as the generic term for five kinds of abode. \(^3\) guhā Vin-a 573, “a hut of bricks or in a rock or of wood or of earth.” Guhā is mentioned at Vin 1.58 = Vin 1.96, with the four other abodes of Vin 2.146, as an allowance extra to that of dwelling at the foot of a tree. At Vin 1.107 the Order is allowed to fix upon an Upasatha Hall in any one of these five dwelling-places, and at Vin 1.239 the Order is allowed to keep the stores in any one of them. Cf. Vin 1.284.

a hut of tīna-grass,¹ for the good of another² except it be as a house, there is no offence in any of these circumstances,³ nor if he is out of his mind or a beginner.⁴

Told is the Sixth Offence entailing a Formal Meeting of the Order: that of building a hut⁵

---

¹ “= a seven-storied palace if (only) the covering is of leaves or of tīna-grass”, Vin-a 573. A seven-storied (sattabhūmaka) hut is, I suppose, conceivable, but seems hardly possible.
² “If it is built for the benefit of a preceptor or teacher or for the Order,” Vin-a 574.
³ Vin-a 574, “except it be as a house (dwelling or home, agāra) for himself, he has it built, saying: ‘It will become another half for the recitation of the Pātimokkha, or a hot room for bathing purposes, or a dining-room, or a warmed refectory’; in all these circumstances there is no offence. But if he says that it will become these things and that ‘I will dwell in it’ there is an offence.”
⁴ For these exemptions cf. Vin 4.48; Vin-a 574 indicates that the monks of Āḷavī were beginners.
⁵ Probably niṭṭhitam is omitted here by mistake.
... at Kosambi in Ghosita’s Park. At that time a householder, the supporter of the venerable Channa, said to the venerable Channa:

“Do find out a site for a vihāra, honoured sir. I will have a vihāra built for the master.”

Then the venerable Channa, clearing a site for the vihāra, had a tree cut down that was used as a shrine, revered by village, revered by little town, revered by town, revered by the country-side, revered by the kingdom. People became vexed, annoyed, angry, saying: “How can these recluses, sons of the Sakyans, have a tree cut down that is used as a shrine revered by village ... revered by the kingdom? The recluses, sons of the Sakyans, are depriving a one-facultied thing of life.” The monks heard these people who were vexed, annoyed, angry. Those who were modest monks became vexed, annoyed, angry and

---

1 Vin-a 574, “it was made, they say, by Ghosita, the great merchant.”
2 Vin-a 574, “at the time of the bodhisatta Channa was his supporter.”
3 Cf. Vin 2.21ff.; at Vin 2.88, he took the side of the nuns in a quarrel with the monks; at Vin 2.290 the brahmadaṇḍa penalty was laid on him, but he attained arahanship (DN ii.154). Cf. also Vin 4.35f., Vin 4.47, Vin 4.113, Vin 4.141 and below, BD 1.309.
4 Vin-a 574, “not a whole vihāra, but one dwelling-place.” Vihāra originally was probably rather more than “cell,” and “cell” would most likely have been called parivena, a monk’s cell, cf. Vinaya Texts iii.109, and above, BD 1.119.
5 Vin-a 575 explains cetiya by cittikata. This is from citti-karoti, to honour, to esteem. Vin-a 575 further says that “a cetiya is for the sake of honouring: the term is used of those worthy of worship of sacred places. Cetiya means the honoured (or revered or selected) tree, it is a tree used (as a place) for honouring.” See above, BD 1.243, n. 4, and BD 1.247, n. 2.
6 With body-sensibility—i.e., sense of touch.
said:

“How can the venerable Channa have a tree cut down that was used as a shrine, revered by village ... revered by the kingdom?” Then these monks told this matter to the lord. He said:

“How can you, foolish man, have a tree cut down that was used as a shrine, revered by village ... revered by the kingdom? For, foolish man, in a tree are people having consciousness as living beings. This is not, foolish man, for the benefit of unbelievers ... Thus, monks, this course of training should be set forth:

“If there is a monk building a large vihāra for his own advantage, having a benefactor, monks should be brought for marking out a site. A site should be marked out by these monks, not involving destruction, with an open space round it. If a monk should build a large vihāra on a site involving destruction, not with an open space round it, or if he should not bring monks to mark out a site, there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.”

__________________________

Large means: it is called a vihāra having a benefactor.²

Vihāra means: it is smeared inside or it is smeared outside or it is smeared inside and outside.³

Building means: building or causing to be built.

---

¹ Mahallaka, here not in the usual sense of “full of years,” but = mahantabhāvo ... pamāṃmahantāya mahallakaṁ ... atthadassanatthan mahallako nāma, Vin-a 575. But see Old Commentary’s definition below. Cf. Vin 2.166, where a vihāra is also called mahallaka. ² Because then it can be made to the size of the approved measure, apparently meaning not smaller than this. ³ Cf. above, BD 1.254, where hut, kuṭī, is defined in these same terms. Ullittālitta, which I have rendered “smeared inside and outside,” also occurs at AN i.101 = MN iii.61, in the simile of the (wise and foolish) non-inflammable and inflammable house with gabled roofs.
Having a benefactor means: a certain person is the benefactor: a woman or a man or a householder or one who has gone forth.¹

For his own advantage means: for his own good.²

Monks should be brought for marking out a site means: that monk building a vihāra, clearing the site for a vihāra ... (see Bu-Ss 6.2.2) ... should say: ‘I, honoured sirs, am desirous of building a large vihāra, having a benefactor, for my own advantage; honoured sirs, I beg the Order to inspect the site for a vihāra ... this is called having an open space round it.

Large means: it is called a vihāra having a benefactor.

Vihāra means: it is smeared inside or it is smeared outside or it is smeared inside and outside.

Should build means: he builds or he causes to be built.

If he should not bring monks to mark out the site means: not having caused the site for a vihāra to be marked out by a vote following directly upon the motion, he builds or causes to be built, in each operation there is an offence of wrong-doing. If one lump (of plaster) is (still) to come, there is a grave offence; when that lump has come there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.³

Offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order means: ... on account of this it is called an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

If a monk builds a vihāra, the site not having been marked out, involving destruction, not with an open space round it ... (see Bu-Ss 6.3.1. The sections which contain “exceeding the measure” and “to (the right) measure” are not repeated here) ... the site having been marked out, involving no destruction, with an open space round it, there is no offence.

A monk commanded: “Build a vihāra for me.” They built a vihāra for him, the site not having been marked out, involving destruction, not with an open space round it ... the site not having been marked out, not involving destruction, with an open space round it, there is no offence.

¹ Cf. above, BD 1.254. ² Cf. above, BD 1.254. ³ Cf. above, BD 1.258.

__________

A monk having commanded: “Build a vihāra for me,” went away. And he did not command: “Let there be marking out of the site, and let it not involve destruction, and let it have an open space round it.” They built a vihāra for him, the site not having been marked out, involving destruction, not with an open space round it ... the site having been marked out, not involving destruction, with an open space round it, there is no offence.

__________

A monk having commanded: “Build a vihāra for me,” went away. And he commanded: “Let there be marking out of the site, and not involving destruction, and with an open space round it.” They built the vihāra for him, the site not having been marked out, involving destruction, not with an open space round it. He heard and said: “They say that a vihāra was built for me, the site not having been marked out, involving destruction, not with an open space round it.” If this monk should go himself ... there is no offence.

__________

A monk having commanded: “Build a vihāra for me,” went away. And he commanded: “Let there be marking out of the site, and let it not involve destruction, and let there be an open space round it.” They built a vihāra for him, the site not having been marked out, involving destruction, not with an open space round it. For the builders there are three offences of wrong-doing ... the site marked out, not involving destruction, with an open space round it, there is no offence.

__________

A monk having commanded: “Build a vihāra for me,” went away. They built a vihāra for him, the site not having been marked out, involving destruction, not with an open space round it. If he comes... back there (and finds that it is) imperfectly executed ... the site having been marked out, not involving destruction, with an open space round it, there is no offence.

Told is the Seventh Offence entailing a Formal Meeting of the Order: that of building a vihāra
At one time the enlightened one, the lord, was staying at Rājagaha in the Bamboo Grove at the squirrels’ feeding place. At that time perfection had been attained by the venerable Dabba, seven years after his birth. All that there is to be attained by a disciple had been fully attained by him; for him there was nothing further to be done, no increase to (be added to) that which had been done.

Then the venerable Dabba, the Mallian, as he was meditating alone and in solitude, thought: “Perfection was realised by me seven years after my birth. Whatever there is to be attained by a disciple, all this has been fully attained by me; for me there is nothing further to be done, no increase (to be added) to that which has been done. What now if I should render a service to the Order?” Then the venerable

---

1 From here to BD 1.9 below = Vin 2.74–79; translated at Vinaya Texts iii.4–18.
2 Vin-a 576, “he realised arahanship in the tonsure hall”—i.e., as his curls were being cut off. Cf. Thag 5, and Psalms of the Brethren, p.10; at AN i.24 he is called “chief among those who assign quarters.”
3 The son of the rāja or chief of the Mallians.
4 Vin-a 576, “the threefold wisdom, the four branches of logical analysis, the six super-knowings, the nine other-worldly matters.”
5 Vin-a 576. “It is said that by him there is nothing further to be done in the four true things, the four Ways, owing to the commission of the sixteenfold thing that ought to be done.”
6 paticaya. This is translated at Vinaya Texts iii.4 as “nothing left that he ought to gather up as the fruit of his past labour.” But this, I think, is reading more into these words than is justified. Buddhaghosa at Vin-a 576 says, “there is no increasing (vaḍḍhana) of what ought to be done,” such as cleansing (a cleaned bowl). I think that this is the right interpretation. Cf. Vin 1.183, Vin 1.185; AN iii.376; AN iv.355 for phrase katassa vā paṭicayaṁ. Pati° as at Vin 3.158 above is unusual.
Dabba, the Mallian, thought: “What now if I should assign lodgings to the Order, and should distribute the meals?”

Then the venerable, Dabba, the Mallian, rising up from his meditation at evening time, approached the lord, and having approached him and greeted him, he sat down to one side. As he was sitting to one side, the venerable Dabba, the Mallian, said to the lord: “Now, lord, as I was meditating alone and in solitude, I thought: ‘... What now if I were to render a service to the Order?’ I thought of this, lord: ‘What now if I were to assign lodgings to the Order? What if I should distribute the meals?’”

“It is good, it is good, Dabba; then, you, Dabba, assign the lodgings to the Order and distribute the meals.”

“Very well, lord,” the reverend Dabba, the Mallian, answered the lord.

Then the lord on this occasion, in this connection, having given dhamma-talk, addressed the monks: “Monks, let the Order consent that Dabba, the Mallian, should assign the lodgings, and should distribute the meals. Monks, this should be authorised thus: Dabba should first be asked and having been asked, the Order should be informed by an experienced, competent monk: ‘Honoured sirs, let the Order hear me. If it is the right time for the Order, let the Order consent that the venerable Dabba, the Mallian, should assign the lodgings and distribute the meals. That is the motion. Honoured sirs, let the Order hear me. The Order agrees that the venerable Dabba, the Mallian, should assign the lodgings and distribute the meals. If it pleases the venerable ones and there is permission that the venerable Dabba, the Mallian, should assign lodgings and distribute the meals, then be silent; if it does not seem good, then you should speak. It is agreed by the Order that the venerable Dabba, the Mallian, should assign the lodgings and distribute the meals. It is agreed ... Thus do I understand.’”¹

Then the venerable Dabba, the Mallian, being so chosen, assigned one lodging in the same place for those monks who belonged to the same company. For those monks who knew the Suttantas he assigned a lodging in the same place, saying: “These will be able to chant over the Suttantas to one another.” For those monks versed in the Vinaya rules, he assigned a lodging in the same place, saying: “They will decide upon the Vinaya with one another.” For those monks teaching dhamma he assigned a lodging in the same place, saying: “They will discuss dhamma with one another.” For those monks who were musers he assigned a lodging in the same place, saying: “They will not disturb one another.” For those monks who lived indulging in low talk³ and who were athletic he assigned a lodging in the same place, saying: “These reverend ones will live⁴ according to their pleasure.” For those monks who came in late at night⁵ he, having attained the condition of heat,⁶ assigned a lodging by this light.⁷ So much so, that the monks came in late at night on purpose, (and) they thought: “We will see the wonder of the psychic potency of the venerable Dabba, the Mallian.” And having approached the venerable Dabba, ¹ Cf. Vin 2.176, where it is said that “at that time there was no one who allotted lodgings for the Order,” and Vin 2.175, where it is said that “at that time there was no one who distributed meals for the Order.” ² n.b. not to read: writing was apparently very little used at this date. ³ tiṇacakānakathikā, literally talkers about animals, so: talkers on low or childish subjects. ⁴ acchissanti ti viharissanti, Vin-a 579. ⁵ vikāle ⁶ tejobhātum samāpajjitvā. At Ud 92 Dabba is credited with this same power, which he exerted at the time of his utter waning out. This power is also ascribed to Gotama at Vin 1.25; and to Uppalavāṇṇa at Thig-a 190. See Minor Anthologies of the Pali Canon, ii. Sacred Books of the Buddhists VIII, p.11, n. 1, where Mr. Woodward considers that this “power over the fire-element is probably the basis of śakti (suttee) in India.” I think, however, that suttee is connected with satī, the good, virtuous wife; while śakti is literally ability, willpower, influence. Cf. SN i.144 and KS i.182, n. 2; also AN i.176; AN ii.165; DN iii.27, DN iii.228, DN iii.247. ⁷ Vin-a 579, “having entered upon the fourth jhāna by meditation on fire, arising from that his fingers were glowing as a result of knowledge in the six super-knowings⁸: the power of iddhi, or psychic potency, was one of the six abhiññā.

the Mallian, they spoke thus: “Reverend Dabba, assign a lodging to us.”

The venerable Dabba, the Mallian, spoke thus to them: “Where do your reverences desire it? Where shall I assign it?”

Then these (monks) would quote a distant place on purpose, saying: “Reverend Dabba, assign us a lodging on the Vulture’s Peak; your reverence, assign us a lodging on the Robber’s Cliff; your reverence, assign us a lodging on the slopes of Isigili Hill on the Black Rock; your reverence, assign us a lodging on the slopes of Vebhāra at Sattapanţi Cave; your reverence, assign us a lodging in Sītā’s Wood on the slopes of the Snake Pool; your reverence, assign us a lodging at the Gomata Glen; your reverence, assign us a lodging at the Tinduka Glen; your reverence, assign us a lodging at the Tapodā Glen; your reverence, assign us a lodging at the Tapodā Park; your reverence, assign us a lodging at Jīvaka’s Mango Grove; your reverence, assign us a lodging in the deer-park at Maddakucchi.”

The venerable Dabba, the Mallian, having attained the condition of heat for these (monks) went in front of each with his finger glowing; and they by the light of the venerable Dabba, the Mallian, went behind him. The venerable Dabba, the Mallian, assigned a lodging to them and said: “This is the couch, this the bed, this the bolster, this the pillow, this a privy, that a privy, this the drinking water, that the water for washing, this the staff, this (the form of) the Order’s agreement, this is the time it should be entered upon, this the time

---

1 A mountain near Rājagaha. These place-names also occur at DN ii.116.
2 Isigili-passa. Here at the Black Rock, Godhika took his own life, SN i.120, and Vakkali, SN iii.123. From here the other peaks round Rājagaha could be seen, MN iii.68.
3 One of the mountains near Rājagaha. See Psalms of the Brethren p. 45, notes, and illustrations facing p. 364.
4 Vin 1.182.
5 The river Tapodā (hot waters) ran beneath the Vebhāra Hill. See above, BD 1.188, and n. 1. Samiddhi was tempted by a devatā as he was bathing in the Tapodā, SN i.8ff., which is very similar to the Samiddhi Jātaka, Ja 2.56.
6 See previous note.
7 A garden at Rājagaha belonging to the physician Jīvaka Komārabhacca. Mentioned at MN i.368 (cf. MN-a 3.45). The Sāmaññaphala Suttanta was spoken here, DN i.47; this is referred to at Vin 2.287.
8 At Vin 1.105 the Bhagavan appeared to Mahākappina here and exhorted him to observe the Uposatha. At both SN i.27 and SN i.110 it is said that in this garden Gotama’s foot was hurt by a splinter.
it should be departed from.” Then the venerable Dabba, the Mallian, having assigned a lodging to these (men), went back again to the Bamboo Grove.¹

Now at that time the monks who were the followers of Mettiya and Bhummajaka² were newly ordained and of little merit; they obtained whatever inferior lodgings belonged to the Order and inferior meals. At that time the people in Kājagaha wished to give the Elder monks alms-food having a specially good seasoning,³ and ghee and oil and dainties.⁴ But to the monks who were the followers of Mettiya and Bhummajaka they gave ordinary food, unseasoned porridge of broken rice⁵ accompanied by sour gruel. These, after they had eaten and had returned from their meal, asked the Elder monks: “What did you get, your reverences, at the refectory? What did you?”

Some Elders spoke thus: “There was ghee for us, your reverences, there was oil for us, there were dainties for us.”

But the monks who were the followers of Mettiya and Bhummajaka spoke thus: “Your reverences, there was nothing for us, (only) ordinary food, unseasoned porridge of broken rice accompanied by sour gruel.”

At that time a householder who had nice food gave to the Order in continuous food supply a meal for four monks. He, together with his wife and children, attended and served in the refectory.

¹ Vin-a 579, “talking to them with talk about the country, he did not sit down, but returned to his own dwelling.” ² Vin-a 579, “the chief men of the sixfold group.” At Vin-a 614 (on Vin 3.179) it is said that Assaji and Punabbasuka are the foremost in this group, and at mn-a 3.186, they are called “among these six, two teachers of the crowd.” ³ abhisamkhārika piṇḍapāta. Abhi° means what specially belongs to the saṁkhāras, merit-accumulating. Pali-English Dictionary suggests tentatively “specially prepared.” The parallel passage at Vin 2.77 omits piṇḍapāta. The reading there is probably defective, and has led translators of Vinaya Texts iii.9, to render abhi° as a “wishing-gift.” See Vinaya Texts iii.9 n. 3. ⁴ uttaribhaṅga; also at Vin 4.259; Ja 1349. Ghee, oil and uttari° are mentioned together at Vin 2.214. ⁵ kaṇājakaṁ = sakunḍakabhattrāṁ, a meal with husk-powder cake. Cf. Ja 5.383.
One offered boiled rice, another offered curry, another offered oil, another offered dainties. Now at that time a meal given by the householder who had nice food was apportioned for the following day to the monks who were the followers of Mettiya and Bhummajaka. Then the householder who had nice food went to the park on some business and approached the venerable Dabba, the Mallian, and having approached the venerable Dabba, the Mallian, and greeted him, he sat down to one side. As he was sitting to one side, the venerable Dabba, the Mallian, rejoiced ... gladdened with dhamma-talk the householder who had nice food. Then when the householder who had nice food had been rejoiced ... gladdened with dhamma-talk by the venerable Dabba, the Mallian, he said to the venerable Dabba, the Mallian: “For whom, honoured sir, is the meal apportioned for tomorrow in our house?”

“Householder, the food apportioned in your house for tomorrow is for the monks who are the followers of Mettiya and Bhummajaka.”

Then the householder who had nice food was sorry and said: “How can these depraved monks enjoy themselves in our house?” And going to his house, he gave orders to a female slave, saying: “Having prepared for those who come to eat tomorrow a seat in the store-room, serve them with porridge of broken rice accompanied by sour gruel.”

“Very well, master,” the female slave answered the householder who had nice food.

Then the monks who were the followers of Mettiya and Bhummajaka said to one another: “Yesterday, your reverences, a meal was allotted to us by the householder who has nice food. Tomorrow the

---

1 This acquiescence in “pāpabhikkhū” is curious. It reminds one of the lax monks, not uncommon in Burma at the present day, who do not keep the Vinaya precepts. There are said to be good and earnest monks who do keep them, but who are not seen about much for the very reason that they lead the good life, as intended.

2 kōṭṭhaka, a store-room for various things. At Vin 2.153 a kōṭṭhaka is allowed to the monks. It was usually built over the gateway. Here Vin-a 580, says it was outside the gateway of the vihāra in the Bamboo Grove. See Vinaya Texts iii.109 for meanings and references.
householder who has nice food, attending with his wife and children, will serve us. Some will offer boiled rice, some will offer curry, some will offer oil, some will offer dainties.” These, because of their happiness, did not sleep that night as much as they had expected.

Then the monks who were the followers of Mettiya and Bhummajaka, rising up early and setting out taking their bowls and robes, approached the dwelling of the householder who had nice food. The female slave saw the monks who were followers of Mettiya and Bhummajaka coming from afar; and seeing them and making ready a seat in the store-room, she said to the monks who were followers of Mettiya and Bhummajaka: “Sit here, honoured sirs.”

Then the monks who were followers of Mettiya and Bhummajaka thought: “But undoubtedly the food will not be ready,¹ since we are made to sit in the store-room.”

Then the female slave came up with the porridge of broken rice accompanied by sour gruel and said: “Eat, honoured sirs.”

“But, sister, we are those who enjoy a continuous supply of food.”

“I know that the masters enjoy a continuous supply of food. But yesterday I was ordered by the householder: ‘Having prepared a seat in the store-room for those who come for a meal today, serve them with porridge of broken rice accompanied by sour gruel.’ Eat, honoured sirs,” she said.

Then the monks who were the followers of Mettiya and Bhummajaka said: “Yesterday, your reverences, the householder who has nice things to eat went to Dabba, the Mallian,² in the park; doubtless Dabba, the Mallian, set the householder at variance with us.” These (monks) on account of their lamentations did not eat as much as was expected.

Then the monks who were the followers of Mettiya and Bhummajaka, after they had eaten and had returned from their meal, going to the park and putting aside their bowls, sat down outside the store-room of the park, squatting against their outer cloaks, silent, abashed, their shoulders bent, their heads lowered, brooding, speechless.

¹ siddha. This is past participle of (i) sijjati, to boil, to cook; (a) sijjhati, to be accomplished, (see Pali-English Dictionary).

² Note that the monks now drop the epithet “venerable” or “reverend” in speaking of Dabba.

Then the nun Mettiya approached the monks who were followers of Mettiya and Bhummajaka, and having approached them she said to the monks who were followers of Mettiya and Bhummajaka: “I salute you, masters.” When she had spoken thus the monks who were followers of Mettiya and Bhummajaka did not respond. A second time ... A third time the monks who were followers of Mettiya and Bhummajaka did not respond.

“Do I offend against the masters? Why do the masters not respond to me?” she said.

“It is because you neglect us, sister, when we are got into difficulties by Dabba, the Mallian.”

“What can I do, masters?” she said.

“If you would like, sister, this very day you could make the lord expel Dabba, the Mallian.”

“What can I do, masters? How am I able to do that?” she said.

“Come, sister, go up to the lord, and having gone up, say to the lord: ‘Now, lord, it is not suitable, it is not becoming that this quarter which should be without fear, secure, without danger is the very quarter which is full of fear, insecure, and full of danger. Where there was a calm, now there is a gale. It seems the very water is blazing. I have been assaulted by master Dabba, the Mallian.’”

⁴ All this is stock. Cf. AN iii.57; SN i.124 = MN i.258. ⁵ The following narrative down to Bu-Ss 8.1.9 = Vin 2.78–79 and is almost exactly the same as that recorded at Vin 2.124–127, except that here the monks send Vaddha to the lord to say that Dabba has assaulted Vaḍḍha’s wife. ⁶ ayyena, instrumentive, therefore not “lord” (vocative) as at Vinaya Texts iii.14. Ayya was a usual way in which the laity and nuns addressed the monks, but I do not think that anyone ever addressed the lord thus.
“Very well, masters,” the nun Mettiyā answered the monks who were followers of Mettiya and Bhummajaka, and she approached the lord. Having approached and greeted the lord, she stood to one side. As she was standing to one side, the nun Mettiyā spoke thus to the lord: “Now, lord, it is not suitable ... by master Dabba, the Mallian.”

Now the lord on this occasion and in this connection, having had the Order of monks convened, asked the venerable Dabba, the Mallian:

“Dabba, do you remember doing as the nun Mettiyā says?”

“Lord, the lord knows with regard to me,” he said. A second time ... a third time the lord said to the venerable Dabba, the Mallian ... “with regard to me.”

“Dabba, the Dabbas¹ do not give evasive answers like that. If what was done was done by you, say so; if it was not done by you, say it was not.”

“Lord, since I was born, I cannot call to mind² ever indulging in sexual intercourse even in a dream; much less so when I was awake.”

Then the lord addressed the monks, saying: “Because of this, expel the nun Mettiyā,³ and take these monks to task.”

Having spoken thus, the lord rising up from his seat entered the vihāra. Then these monks expelled the nun Mettiyā. Then the monks who were followers of Mettiya and Bhummajaka said to those monks:

“Your reverences, do not expel the nun Mettiyā; she has not committed any sin; she was urged on by us, because we were angry, displeased and wanted him out of the way.”

“But are not your reverences defaming the venerable Dabba, the Mallian, with an unfounded charge involving defeat?”

“It is so, your reverences,” they said.

¹ They are wise, Vin-a 581. ² abhijānāmi. ³ This is, I think, clear evidence of monkish gloss. In every case of supposed wrong-doing the lord has always asked the supposed wrong-doer “Is it true?” and has never condemned anyone without first hearing what he has to say. It is so noteworthy as to be suspicious: where a woman is involved she is given no chance to exculpate herself to the lord. See Horner, Women under Primitive Buddhism, p. 266.
Then those who were modest monks became annoyed, vexed and angry, and said: “How can the monks who are followers of Mettiya and Bhummajaka defame the venerable Dabba, the Mallian, with an unfounded charge involving defeat?” Then these monks told this matter to the lord. He said:

“How can you, foolish men, defame Dabba, the Mallian, with an unfounded charge involving defeat? It is not, foolish men, for the benefit of unbelievers... Thus, monks, this course of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk, malignant, malicious and ill-tempered, should defame a monk with an unfounded charge involving defeat, thinking: ‘Thus perhaps may I drive him away from this Brahma-life,’ then, if afterwards he, being pressed or not being pressed, the legal question turning out to be unfounded, if the monk confesses his malice, it is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.”

Whatever means: who...
Monk means: ... in this meaning monk is to be understood.
Monk means: another monk.
Malignant, malicious means: angry, displeased, dissatisfied, the mind worsened, stubborn.
Ill-tempered means: with this anger, with this hatred, and with this displeasure, and with this dissatisfaction he is angry.
Unfounded means: unseen, unheard, unsuspected.

\[1\] patiṭṭhāti with more general meaning of “to stand fast.” But here, judging by the Old Commentary, see below at end of Bu-Ss 8.1.2, it must mean “confess” with the sense that his words were standing on or founded in malice. The verb, however, in such meanings is followed by the locative. But paṭi governs the accusative.

\[2\] Accusative.

\[3\] Cf. Vin 4.236, Vin 4.238; DN iii.238, MN i.101.

\[4\] Vin-a 585, not seen by self or others, nor by the bodily eye, nor by clairvoyance.
Involving defeat means: of one of the four (headings involving defeat).

Should defame means: should reprove or should cause to reprove.\(^1\)

Thus perhaps may I drive him away from this Brahma-life means: I may drive (him) away from monkdom, I may drive (him) away from recluse-dhamma,\(^2\) I may drive (him) away from the aggregates of morality, I may drive (him) away from the advantage of religious austerity.\(^3\)

Afterwards means: in the moment in which he is defamed that moment, that minute, that second has passed.

Being pressed means: he is defamed in that matter in which he is pressed.

Not being pressed means: not being spoken to by anyone.

A legal question\(^4\) means: there are four legal questions: legal questions arising out of disputes legal questions arising out of censure, legal questions arising out of transgressions, legal questions arising out of obligations.

If the monk confesses his malice means: empty words have been spoken by me, a lie has been spoken by me, untruth has been spoken by me, it has been spoken by me not knowing.

Offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order means ... on account of this it is called an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

He is unseen by him committing\(^5\) an offence involving defeat,\(^6\) but if he reprimands him saying: “Seen by me, you are one who has

\(^1\) Vin-a 587, “should reprove means he reproves him himself with the words ‘you have fallen into defeat’ ... should cause to reprove means ... he enjoins another monk and this one reproves him with his (i.e. the enjoiner’s) words.”

\(^2\) samanā-dhamma, explained at An iii.371: therefore not “the ascetic’s path” as at. Ja 1.31.

\(^3\) tapoguṇa.\(^4\) adhikaraṇa. = Vin 4.126–Vin 4.238. Cf. Vin 2.88ff., where the nature of these questions is explained, and Vin 2.99ff., which explains the ways of settling these questions. At MN ii.247ff. Gotama is represented as explaining all this to Ānanda.\(^5\) aijhāpajjanta, present participle.\(^6\) Pārājika dhamma.
committed¹ a matter involving defeat, you are not a (true) recluse, you are not a (true) son of the Sakyans, there is no (holding) the observance-day (ceremony),² or the ceremony held at the end of the rains,³ or the ceremony performed by a chapter of monks⁴ with you,”—for each speech⁵ there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.⁶

He is unheard by him committing an offence involving defeat, but if he reprimands him saying: “Heard by me, you are ...”—for each speech there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

He is unsuspected by him of committing an offence involving defeat, but if he reprimands him saying: “Suspected by me, you are ...”—for each speech there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

He is unseen by him committing an offence involving defeat, but if he reprimands him saying: “Seen and heard by me, you are one who has committed an offence involving defeat ...”—for each speech there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

He is unseen by him committing an offence involving defeat, but if he reprimands him saying: “Seen and suspected by me ... Seen, heard and suspected by me ...”—for each speech there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

He is unheard by him committing an offence involving defeat, but if he reprimands him saying: “Heard and suspected by me ... Heard and seen by me ... Heard, seen and suspected by me ...”—for each speech there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

He is unsuspected by him of committing an offence involving defeat, but if he reprimands him saying: “Suspected and seen by me

¹ Ajjhāpanna, past participle. ² Uposatha, a chapter of monks meeting on the fifteenth day of each half-month to expound dhamma, Vin 1.102. E.M. Hare, gs 4.140, gs 4.170, gives “observance-day” for uposatha. ³ Pavāraṇā, when the monks invite one another to tell of anything seen, heard or suspected to be wrong, Vin 1.160 and cf. Vin 2.32. ⁴ Saṅghakamma, the monks being assembled together in solemn conclave. Cf. Vin 1.123, Vin 1.143. ⁵ Vācāya vācāya. ⁶ Cf. below, BD 1.292.
... Suspected and heard by me ... Suspected, seen and heard by me ...
”—for each speech there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

He is seen by him committing an offence involving defeat, but if he reprimands him saying: “Heard by me ... Suspected by me ... Heard and suspected by me, you are one who has committed an offence involving defeat ...”—for each speech there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

He is heard by him committing an offence involving defeat, but if he reprimands him saying: “Suspected by me ... Seen by me ... Suspected and seen by me ...”—for each speech there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

He is suspected by him of committing an offence involving defeat, but if he reprimands him saying: “Seen by me ... Heard by me ... Seen and heard by me ...”—for each speech there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

He is seen by him committing an offence involving defeat; but he is in doubt as to the sight, he does not trust the sight, does not remember the sight, is confused as to the sight. He is in doubt as to what he has heard ... is confused as to what he heard. He is in doubt as to the suspicion ... he is confused as to what he suspected; yet he reprimands him saying: “Suspected and seen by me ... Suspected and heard by me ... Suspected and seen and heard by me ...”—for each speech there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

He is unseen by him committing an offence involving defeat, but if he causes him to be reprimanded saying: “You are seen, you are one who has committed an offence involving defeat ...”—for each speech there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

He is unheard ... He is unsuspected ...
He is unseen by him committing an offence involving defeat, but if he causes him to be reprimanded saying: “You are seen and heard ... You are seen and suspected ... You are seen and heard and suspected ...” — for each speech there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

He is seen by him committing an offence involving defeat, but if he causes him to be reprimanded saying: “You are heard ... You are suspected ... You are heard and suspected ...”

He is heard by him ... He is suspected by him ...

He is seen by him committing an offence involving defeat; he is in doubt as to the sight ... he is confused as to what he suspected, yet he causes him to be reprimanded saying: “You are suspected and seen ...” ... he is confused as to what he suspected, yet he causes him to be reprimanded saying: “You are suspected and heard ...” ... he is confused as to what he suspected, yet he causes him to be reprimanded saying: “You are suspected and seen and heard ... involving defeat ...” — for each speech there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

There is a view of what is pure in what is impure, a view of what is impure in what is pure, there is a view of what is impure in what is impure, a view of what is pure in what is pure.

If a man is impure, committing a certain offence involving defeat, even though there exist a view of purity, if he speaks desiring his expulsion, but without having gained his leave, there is an offence of wrong-doing together with an offence requiring a formal meeting of the Order.

If a man is impure ... if he speaks desiring his expulsion, but

---

¹ See Vin 1.114, where it is said that no monk who has not given leave may be reproved for an offence.
having gained his leave, it is an offence requiring a formal meeting of the Order.

If a man is impure ... not having gained his leave, he spoke intending abuse, there is an offence of wrong-doing together with one of insulting speech.

If a man is impure ... having gained his leave, he spoke intending abuse, it is an offence of insulting speech.

If a man is pure, not committing a certain offence involving defeat, even though there exist a view of impurity, if he speaks desiring his expulsion, but without having gained his leave, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

If a man is pure ... having gained his leave, he speaks intending his expulsion, there is no offence.

If it is a pure man ... without having gained his leave, he speaks intending abuse, it is an offence of wrong-doing with one of insulting speech.

If it is a pure man ... having gained his leave, he speaks intending abuse, it is an offence of insulting speech.

If a man is impure, committing a certain offence involving defeat, even though there exist a view as to impurity, he speaks wishing his expulsion, but not having gained his leave, there is an offence of wrong-doing ... it is not an offence ... it is an offence of wrong-doing with one of insulting speech ... it is an offence of insulting speech.

If a man is pure, not committing an offence leading to defeat, even though there exist a view as to purity ... there is an offence of wrong-doing with an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order ... it is an offence requiring a formal meeting of the Order ... it is an offence of wrong-doing with one of insulting speech ... it is an offence of insulting speech.
There is no offence if there is a view as to what is impure in what is pure, if there is a view as to what is impure in what is impure, if he is mad, if he is a beginner.

Told is the Eighth Offence entailing a Formal Meeting of the Order: that concerned with what is unfounded.
... at Rājagaha in the Bamboo Grove at the squirrels’ feeding-place. At that time as the monks who were the followers of Mettiya and Bhummaja were descending from the slope of the Vulture’s Peak, they saw a he-goat copulating with a nanny-goat; seeing them they said: “Look here, your reverences, let us call this he-goat Dabba, the Mallian, and this nanny-goat Mettiyā, the nun; thus we will express it: ‘Formerly, your reverences, we spoke to Dabba, the Mallian, about what was heard, but now we have ourselves seen him sinning with the nun Mettiyā.’ These gave that he-goat the name of Dabba, the Mallian, and called that nanny-goat Mettiyā, the nun.

These told the monks: “Formerly, your reverences, we spoke to Dabba, the Mallian, about what was heard, but now we ourselves have seen him sinning with Mettiyā, the nun.”

The monks said: “Your reverences, do not speak like that; the venerable Dabba, the Mallian, would not do that.”

Then these monks told this matter to the lord. The lord, on that occasion, in that connection, having had the Order of monks convened, asked the venerable Dabba, the Mallian:

“Do you remember,¹ Dabba, to have done as these monks say?”

“Lord, the lord knows with regard to me,” he said.

A second time, the lord ... a third time the lord said to the venerable Dabba, the Mallian ... “knows with regard to me,” he said.

“Do not, Dabba, ...” ... “... how much more when I was awake.” he

¹ Cf. above, BD 1.280.
Then the lord addressed the monks: “Because of this, monks, you should put questions to these monks.” Having spoken thus, the lord rising up from his seat, entered the vihāra.

Then these monks put questions¹ to the monks who were followers of Mettiya and Bhummajaka. These, being questioned by the monks, told this matter to the monks.

“Did you not defame the venerable Dabba, the Mallian, your reverences, with a charge of falling into defeat, taking up some point as a pretext in a legal question really belonging to something else?”

“It is so, your reverences,” they said.

Then those who were modest monks became annoyed, vexed and angry, and said: “How can the monks who are followers of Mettiya and Bhummajaka defame the venerable Dabba, the Mallian, with ... to something else?”

Then these monks told this matter to the lord. He said: “Is it true as is said, that you, monks, defamed Dabba, the Mallian, with ... to something else?”

“It is true, lord,” they said.

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying: “How can you, foolish men, defame Dabba, the Mallian, with ... to something else? Foolish men, it is not for the benefit of unbelievers ... And thus, monks, this course of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk, malignant, malicious and ill-tempered, should defame a monk with a charge involving defeat, taking up some point as a pretext in a legal question really belonging to something else, saying: ‘Thus perhaps may I drive him away from this Brahma-life’; then, if afterwards, he, being pressed or not being pressed, the legal question turning out to belong to something different, if the monk confesses his malice and (confesses)

¹ Vin-a 598, “Where did you see Dabba with Mettiyā? ... at what time? ... where were you going then? ... Who knows you were at that time in the Bamboo Grove? ...”
having taken up some point as a pretext: it is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.”

Whatever means: ... (=Bu-Ss 8.2) ... is angry.

In a legal question really belonging to something else means: either it is an offence of a different kind or it is a legal question of a different kind.

How is a legal question connected with a different kind of legal question? The legal question arising out of disputes may belong to something different: to a legal question arising out of censure, to a legal question arising out of transgressions, to a legal question arising out of obligations. A legal question arising out of censure ... a legal question arising out of transgressions ... a legal question arising out of obligations may belong to something different: to a legal question arising out of disputes to a legal question arising out of transgressions, to a legal question arising out of obligations. Thus a legal question may belong to a different legal question.

How is a legal question connected with a legal question? A question arising out of disputes is connected with a question arising out of disputes A question arising out of censure is connected with a question arising out of censure. A question arising out of transgression may be connected with a question arising out of transgression, or it may be connected with something else. How is a question arising out of transgression connected with something other than a question arising out of transgression? An offence involving defeat through sexual intercourse may belong to something else: to an offence involving defeat through taking something that was not given, to an offence involving defeat through taking up human form, to an offence involving defeat through claiming states of further-men. An offence involving defeat through taking something that was not given ... an offence involving defeat through taking up human form ... an offence involving defeat through claiming states of further-men may belong to something else: to an offence involving defeat through sexual intercourse, to an offence involving defeat through taking something that was not given, to an offence involving defeat through taking up human form. Thus a question arising out of transgression may belong to something other than a question arising out of transgression. And how can a question arising out of transgression belong to a question arising out of transgression? An offence involving defeat through sexual intercourse may belong to an offence involving defeat through sexual intercourse ... An offence involving defeat through claiming states of further-men may belong to an offence involving defeat through claiming states of further-men. Thus does a question arising out of transgression belong to a question arising out of transgression. A question arising out of obligations may belong to a question arising out of obligations. Thus may a legal question belong to a legal question.

Taking up some point as a pretext. A pretext means that there are ten pretexts: the pretext of birth, the pretext of name, the pretext of family, the pretext of characteristic, the pretext of offence, the pretext of a bowl, the pretext of a robe, the pretext of a teacher, the pretext of a preceptor, the precept of lodgings.

The pretext of birth means: A noble is seen committing a matter involving defeat; seeing another noble he reprimands him, saying: “A noble is seen by me; you are one who has committed a matter involving defeat, you are not a (true) recluse, you are not a (true) son of the Sakyans; there is no (holding) the observance-day (ceremony) with you, or the ceremony at the termination of the rains, or the ceremony performed by a chapter of monks”—for each speech there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order. A brahmin is seen ... a merchant is seen ... a low-caste man is seen ... for each speech there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

The pretext of name means: one who is a Buddharaṇkhita is seen ... one who is a Dhammarakkhita is seen ... one who is a Saṅgharakkhita is seen committing a matter involving defeat; seeing another Saṅgharakkhita ... for each speech there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

The pretext of family means: a Gotama is seen ... a Moggallāna is seen ... a Kaccāna is seen ... a Vāsiṭṭha is seen committing an offence involving defeat; seeing another Vāsiṭṭha ... for each speech there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

The pretext of characteristic means: a tall man is seen ... a short man is seen ... a dark man is seen ... a fair man is seen committing an offence involving defeat ... for each speech there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

The pretext of an offence means: one is seen committing a slight offence, and if he reprimands him for a matter involving defeat, saying: “You are not a (true) recluse ...” ... for each speech there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

The pretext of a bowl means: one carrying a copper bowl is seen ... one carrying a bowl of hide¹ is seen ... one carrying a cracked bowl² is seen committing a matter involving defeat ... for each speech there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

The pretext of a robe means: one wearing robes taken from the dust-heaps is seen ... one wearing householders’ robes is seen committing a matter involving defeat ... for each speech there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

The pretext of a teacher means: the pupil of such and such a one is seen committing a matter involving defeat ... for each speech there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

The pretext of a preceptor means: the novice of such and such a one is seen committing a matter involving defeat ... for each speech there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

The pretext of lodgings means: a dweller in such and such lodgings is seen committing a matter involving defeat ... for each speech

¹ Vin-a 602, sāṭakapatta, “like the copper bowl it is well-turned, of beautiful hide, glossy, of black colour (literally bee-coloured), it is called a clay bowl.” ² Vin-a 602, “it was an ordinary clay bowl.”
there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

With a charge involving defeat means: one of the four ... (=Bu-Ss 8.2) ... a question arising out of obligations.

Taking up some point as a pretext means: taking up a certain pretext among these pretexts.

If the monk confesses his malice means: ... (=Bu-Ss 8.2) ... because of this it is called an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

A monk is seen committing an offence which entails a formal meeting of the Order; in the offence which entails a formal meeting of the Order there is a wrong view as to an offence which entails a formal meeting of the Order. If he reprimands him for a matter involving defeat, saying: “You are not a (true) recluse ... nor a ceremony performed by a chapter of monks,” thus it is connected with a different kind of offence and a pretext is taken up: for each speech there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

A monk is seen committing an offence of evil speech; there is the wrong view that in the offence of evil speech there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order; there is the wrong view that in the evil speech there is a grave offence, an offence requiring expiation, an offence which ought to be confessed, an offence of wrong-doing. If he reprimands him ... for each speech there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

_Beginning severally, the series, with this exception, should be put together_

A monk is seen committing an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order; in the offence which entails a formal meeting of the Order there is a wrong view as to an offence which entails a formal meeting of the Order. If he causes him to be reprimanded for an offence involving defeat, saying: “You are not a (true) recluse ... for each speech there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

A monk is seen committing an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order; in the offence which entails a formal meeting of the Order there is a wrong view that it is a grave offence ... a wrong view that it is an offence of evil speech ... a monk is seen committing an offence of evil speech ... there is a wrong view that it is an offence of wrong-doing. If he causes him to be reprimanded ... for each speech there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

There is no offence if, thinking what is true,¹ he reprimands him or causes him to be reprimanded, if he is out of his mind, if he is a beginner.

_Told² is the Ninth Offence entailing a Formal Meeting of the Order_

¹ Tathāsaññī, cf. tathāgata, the “truth-finder.” ² Samatta, instead of the more usual niṭṭhita.
... at Rājagaha in the Bamboo Grove at the squirrels’ feeding place. And then Devadatta¹ came up to Kokālika,² and to Kaṭamorakatissaka, and to the son of the lady Khanḍā, and to Samuddadatta, and having come up he said to Kokālika, Kaṭamorakatissaka, and the son of the lady Khanḍā, and to Samuddadatta: “Now we, your reverences, will make a schism in the Order of the recluse Gotama, a breaking of the concord.”³

When he had spoken thus Kokālika said to Devadatta: “Your reverence, the recluse Gotama has great psychic power, and great might. How can we make a schism in the Order of the recluse Gotama, a breaking of the concord?”

“Now we, your reverence, having approached the recluse Gotama, will beg for five items: ‘Lord, the lord in many ways speaks in praise of desiring little, of being contented, of expunging (evil), of being punctilious, of what is gracious, of decrease (of the obstructions), of putting forth energy.⁴ Lord, these five items are conducive in many ways to desiring little, to contentment, to expunging (evil), to being punctilious, to what is gracious, to decrease (of the obstruction), to putting forth energy.

¹ This story is given almost word for word at Vin 2.196ff. ² These schisms appear again in Bu-Ss 11. Mentioned at Vin 4.66, Vin 4.335. At Sn i.149 = AN v.170 = Snp p.123, Kokālika tried to defame the two chief disciples. ³ Vinaya Texts iii.251, “let us stir up a division in the sāmaṇa Gotama’s saṅgha and in the body of his adherents,” with note that “in cakka-bhedāṁ the first word no doubt connotes ‘kingship, lordship’ as in dhamma-cakka, cakkavatti, etc.” But it can also mean breaking a wheel, and symbolically cakkabheda has special meaning of “breaking up the peace, sowing discord.” ⁴ = Vin 1.45 = Vin 2.2 = Vin 3.21 = Vin 4.213.

1. It were good, lord, if the monks for as long as life lasted, should be forest-dwellers; whoever should betake himself to the neighbourhood of a village, sin¹ would besmirch² him.

2. For as long as life lasts let them be beggars for alms;³ whoever should accept an invitation, sin would besmirch him.

3. For as long as life lasts let them be wearers of robes taken from the dust-heap; whoever should accept a robe given by a householder, sin would besmirch him.⁴

4. For as long as life lasts let them live at the foot of a tree;⁵ whoever should go under cover, sin would besmirch him.

5. For as long as life lasts let them not eat fish and flesh;⁶ whoever should eat fish and flesh, sin would besmirch him.”

“There recluse Gotama will not allow these things. Then we will win over the people by means of these five items.”

“It is possible, your reverence, with these five items, to make a schism in the Order of the recluse Gotama, a breaking of the concord. For, your reverence, people esteem austerity.”⁷

Then Devadatta together with his friends went up to the lord, and having gone up and greeted the lord, he sat down to one side. As he was sitting to one side, Devadatta said to the lord: “Lord, the lord in many ways speaks in praise of desiring little ... who should eat fish or flesh, sin would besmirch him.”

¹ vajja. ² phuseyya from phusati to touch, not from phusati to sprinkle. Vin-a 603, “let hatred touch that monk, let the lord deal with him for the offence.” ³ Those who only eat the alms received in the begging-bowl. ⁴ At Vin 1.280 it is laid down that the monks may wear either the paṁsukula robes or accept lay robes, as they please. ⁵ At Vin 1.152 monks are forbidden to spend vassa out in the open. ⁶ At Vin 1.238 and below, BD 1.298, it is laid down that fish and meat are pure for the monks if they do not see, hear or suspect that it has been killed for them. Cf. BD 1.98, BD 1.99 above, where there seems to be no offence in eating meat. ⁷ lūkhappasanna, cf. AN ii.71, where this is one of the four types of persons who estimate by and esteem outward form. Each type is explained at Pp 53.
“Enough, Devadatta,” he said. “Whoever wishes, let him be a forest-dweller; whoever wishes, let him dwell in the neighbourhood of a village; whoever wishes, let him be a beggar for alms; whoever wishes, let him accept an invitation; whoever wishes, let him wear rags taken from the dust-heap; whoever wishes, let him accept a householder’s robes. For eight months, Devadatta, lodging at the foot of a tree is permitted by me.¹ Fish and flesh are pure in respect of three points: if they are not seen, heard or suspected (to have been killed for him²).

Then Devadatta thinking: “The lord does not allow these five items,” was joyful and exultant.³ He rose from his seat, and having greeted the lord, and paid homage to him keeping him on his right side, he departed together with his friends. Then Devadatta, entering Rājagaha, taught the people by means of the five items: “We, your reverences, having approached the recluse Gotama, begged for five items: ‘Lord, the lord in various ways speaks in praise of desiring little ... whoever should eat fish and flesh, sin would besmirch him.’ The recluse Gotama does not allow these. But we live in conformity with these five items.”

¹ I.e., not in the four months of the rains. ² Vin-a 604, “not seen means, having killed deer and fish for the benefit of the monks, their being caught was not seen; not heard means, having killed ... of the monks, the taking (of them) was not heard”; not suspected means, if the monks see men going from a village to the jungle with nets and snares in their hands; and if on the next day they receive fish and flesh with their alms in the village they suspect: “Was not this done for the benefit of the monks?” They ask the men, who deny it, and say it was done for their own benefit. Or the monks may hear it said that men are going out to the jungle with nets and snares, or they may neither see the hunters nor hear it said they that have gone out, but simply receive fish and flesh in their begging-bowls. The same doubts assail them, and they ask if the killing took place for their benefit. But if it was not done expressly for the monks’ benefit, inasmuch as there is no doubt as to this, everything is quite in order. ³ Vin-a 606, says he was joyful and exultant because he now thought he could cause a schism.
tilious\(^1\) and practise the expunging of evil; but the recluse Gotama is luxurious and strives after abundance.”

Then those who were faithful, virtuous, clever, enlightened people became vexed, annoyed, angry and said: “How can this Devadatta go forward with a schism in the Order of the lord, with a breaking of the concord?”

Then the monks heard these people who were vexed, annoyed, angry. Those who were modest monks were ... angry, and said: “How can this Devadatta go forward with a schism, with a breaking of the concord?” Then these monks told this matter to the lord.

He said: “Is it true, as is said, Devadatta, that you went forward with a schism in the Order, with a breaking of the concord?”

“It is true, lord,” he said.

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked him, saying: “How can you, foolish man, go forward with a schism in the Order, with a breaking of the concord? It is not, foolish man, for the benefit of unbelievers ... Thus, monks, this course of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk should go forward with a schism of the Order which is harmonious, or should persist in taking up some legal question leading to a dissension: that monk should be spoken to thus by the monks: ‘Do not, venerable one, go forward with a schism of the Order which is harmonious, or persist in taking up some legal question leading to a dissension. Let the venerable one be associated with the Order; for the Order is harmonious, on friendly terms, not quarrelsome, it dwells comfortably under a single rule.’\(^2\) And if that monk, after he has been spoken to thus by the monks, should persist, that monk should be admonished up to three times by the monks together concerning his giving up such a course. Should he give it up after being admonished up to three times, this is good. Should he not give it up, there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.”

\(^1\) Vin-a 607, they are dhuta because they are endowed with the paṭipadā which shakes off the kilesas; they are sallekhavuttī because their course of life (vutti) reduces the kilesas.
\(^2\) I.e., not Gotama’s authority, but that of the Pātimokkha rules. This word, ekuddesa, occurs in the Pārājikas in definition of saṅvāsa, communion.

Bu Ss 10.2.1

Whatever means: he who ...

Monk means: ... in this meaning is monk to be understood.

Harmonious means: an Order belonging to the same community¹ is established within the same boundary.²

Should go forward with a schism means: saying, “How should these folk be separated, how should they be separated, how should they be at variance?” seeking a faction, he gets a group together.

A legal question leading to a dissension means: the eighteen ways of causing a division.³

Taking up means: taking.

Leading to means: kindling.

Should persist means: should not give up.

That monk means: that schismatic monk.

By the monks means: by other monks, whoever see, whoever hear; these should say: “Do not, venerable one, go forward with a schism of the Order which is harmonious, nor persist in taking up a legal question leading to a dissension. Let the venerable one be associated with the Order. The Order, harmonious, on friendly terms, not quarrelsome, dwells comfortably under a single rule.” A second time they should say ... A third time they should say ... If he gives it up, this is good. If he does not give it up, it is an offence of wrong-doing. If having heard, they do not speak, there is an offence of wrong-doing. That monk, having been pulled to the middle of the Order, they are to say: “Do not, venerable one, go forward with a

---

¹ Vin-a 607. There is no separation as to mind. ² Vin-a 607. There is no separation as to body. Belonging to the same community means that there are none living together holding various heretical views or various religious proceedings; that there is no mental separation from those of the same mind. Within the same boundary means there is no bodily separation from those in bodily concord. For these expressions see also Vin 1.321. ³ These are given at Vin 2.204 and are the same as the eighteen things by which you may conclude that a monk is a speaker of what is not dhamma, Vin 1.354. The first ten are also given at AN i.19.
schism of the Order, which is harmonious, nor persist in taking up a legal question leading to a dissension. Let the venerable one be associated with the Order. The Order, harmonious ... comfortably under a single rule.” A second time they should say ... A third time they should say ... If he gives it up, that is good. If he does not give it up, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

That monk should be admonished. Thus, monks, should he be admonished: the Order should be informed by an experienced, competent monk: “Honoured sirs, let the Order listen to me. This monk, so and so, proceeds with a schism of the Order which is harmonious. He does not give up this course. If it is the right time for the Order, let the Order admonish this monk, so and so, so that he may give up his course. This is the motion. Honoured sirs, let the Order hear me. This monk, so and so ... does not give up his course. The Order together admonishes the monk, so and so, that he may give up his course. If it seems good to the venerable ones, together admonishing this monk, so and so, that he should give up his course, be silent; if it does not seem good, then you should speak. A second time I speak this matter ... A third time I speak this matter ... then you should speak. It has been said by the Order that the monk, so and so, should give up his course. It seems good to the Order ... Thus do I understand.”

According to the motion there is an offence of wrong-doing; according to the two resolutions¹ there are grave offences;² according to the end of a resolution there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order. If he is committing an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order, the offence of wrong-doing according to the motion and the grave offences according to the two resolutions, subside.³

An offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order means: ... because of this it is called an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

---

¹ kammavācā, resolution; ñatti, motion, cf. Vin 1.317 and Vinaya Texts i.169, n. 2; Vinaya Texts ii.265, n. 2. ² Vin-a 609. He to whom these three offences do not seem good, should speak. ³ = below, BD 1.307, BD 1.313
Thinking a legally valid act\(^1\) to be a legally valid act, he does not give it up, there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order. Being in doubt as to whether it is a legally valid act, he does not give it up, there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order. Thinking an act which is not legally valid to be an act which is legally valid, he does not give it up, there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order. Thinking an act which is legally valid to be an act which is not legally valid, is an offence of wrong-doing. Being in doubt as to whether it is not a legally valid act, is an offence of wrong-doing. Not thinking an act which is legally valid to be an act which is not legally valid, is an offence of wrong-doing.\(^2\)

\[\text{The Tenth Offence entailing a Formal Meeting of the Order: that of a schism in the Order}\]

\(^1\text{Vin-}a.609, \text{“a legally valid act, an act which has been repeated together.” An unlawful act is explained at Vin}.1.317f. \text{It is connected with }ñatti \text{ and kammavācā.}\]

\(^2\text{= below, BD 1.307, BD 1.313.}\)

\(^3\text{= below, BD 1.308, BD 1.313.}\)
... at Rājagaha in the Bamboo Grove at the squirrels’ feeding-place. At that time Devadatta proceeded to a schism in the Order, a breaking of the concord. The monks spoke thus: “Devadatta is not one who speaks dhamma, Devadatta is not one who speaks Vinaya.¹ How can this Devadatta proceed with a schism in the Order, with a breaking of the concord?” Having spoken thus, Kokālika, Kaṭamorakatissa, and the son of the lady Khaṇḍā and Samuddadatta² said to these monks:

“Do not speak thus, venerable ones; Devadatta is one who speaks dhamma, Devadatta is one who speaks vinaya, and Devadatta having adopted³ our desire and objective, gives expression to them; he knows that what he says for us⁴ seems also good to us.”

Then those who were modest monks were ... angry, and said: “How can these monks become those throwing in their lot with⁵ and taking part in⁶ Devadatta’s proceeding for a schism in the Order?” Then these monks told this matter to the lord.

“Is it true as they say, monks, that (these) monks are those who are throwing in their lot with and taking part in Devadatta’s proceeding for a schism in the Order?”

“It is true, lord”, they said.

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying: “Monks,

¹ At DN iii.135 these words occur in a kind of definition of “Tathāgata.” ² The same monks as in Bu-Ss 10, above. ³ ādāya, literally having taken. ⁴ jānātino bhāsati, Vin-a 611, he knows our desires, and so on. ⁵ anuvattaka, Vin-a 611, “those following him by taking up (his) opinions, pleasures, approvals.” ⁶ vaggavādaka. “They speak words not on the side of unanimity,” Vin-a 611.
how can these foolish men become those to throw in their lot with, to take part in Devadatta’s proceeding for a schism in the Order? It is not, monks, for the benefit of unbelievers ... Thus, monks, this course of training should be set forth:

“If a monk has monks: one or two or three, who throw in their lot with him or take his part, and if these should speak thus: ‘Do not, venerable ones, say anything against this monk; this monk is one who speaks dhamma, this monk is one who speaks Vinaya; and this monk, adopting our desire and objective, gives expression to them; he knows that what he says for us seems also good to us.’ These monks should be spoken to thus by monks: ‘Do not, venerable ones, say this. This monk is not one who speaks dhamma, this monk is not one who speaks Vinaya. Please do not let a schism in the Order seem good to the venerable ones; let the venerable ones be at one with the Order, for the Order being harmonious and on friendly terms, not quarrelsome, dwells comfortably under one rule.’ If these monks having been spoken to by the monks should persist, then these monks should be admonished up to three times by these monks in a body, for giving up their course. If these, having been admonished up to three times, should give it up, that is good; if they should not give it up, that is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.”

____________________

If a monk means: if a schismatic monk.

Has monks means: has other monks.

Throw in their lot with means: he is one having that view, that allegiance, that objective; and these are those having that view, that allegiance, that objective.¹

Take his part means: these are standing for his sort, his faction.

One or two or three means: there are one or two or three.

If these should speak thus means: “Do not, venerable ones, speak against this monk. This monk is one who speaks dhamma, and this monk is one who speaks Vinaya, and this monk is one who having adopted our desire and allegiance, gives expression to them. He knows that what he says for us seems also good to us.”

¹ Cf. above, BD 1.163, and DN i.187; MN i.487.

These monks means: these monks who throw in their lot with.

By monks means: by other monks who see, and who hear. These should say: “Do not, venerable ones, speak thus. This monk is not one who speaks dhamma, and this monk is not one who speaks Vinaya. Please do not let a schism in the Order seem good to the venerable ones. Let the venerable ones be at one with the Order; for the Order being harmonious and on friendly terms, not quarrelsome, dwells comfortably under one rule.” A second time they should say ... A third time they should say ... if they give it up, that is good; if they do not give it up, it is an offence of wrong-doing.

These monks, having pulled them into the middle of the Order, should say: “Do not, venerable ones, speak thus. He is not ... under one rule.” A second time they should say ... a third time they should say ... if they give up their course it is good; if they do not give it up there is an offence of wrong-doing.

These monks should be admonished means: Thus, monks, they should be admonished ... the Order should be informed by an experienced, competent monk: “Let the Order hear me, honoured sirs. Such and such monks, having thrown in their lot with such and such a monk, are taking his side in a proceeding for making a schism in the Order. These do not give up this course. If it is the right time for the Order, let the Order as a body admonish such and such monks about giving up this course. This is the motion. Honoured sirs, let the Order hear me: such and such monks ... not give up the course. The Order as a body admonishes such and such monks about giving up this course. If it seems good to the venerable ones to admonish such and such monks for giving up this course, you should be silent; if it does not seem good to you, you should speak. A second time I proclaim this matter. A third time I proclaim this matter ... you should speak. Let the Order as a body admonish such and such monks for giving up this course. It seems good to the Order ... Thus do I understand.”

According to the motion there is an offence of wrong-doing; according to two resolutions there are grave offences; at the end of the resolution there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order. If they are committing an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order, the offence of wrong-doing according to the motion and the grave offences according to the two resolutions, subside.¹

Two or three should be admonished together; further than that² they should not be admonished.

An offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order means:
... because of that it is called an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

Thinking a legally valid act to be a legally valid act, they do not give it up, there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order. Being in doubt as to whether it is a legally valid act, they do not give it up, there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order. Thinking an act which is not legally valid to be an act which is legally valid, they do not give it up, there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order. Thinking an act which is legally valid to be an act which is not a legally valid act, is an offence of wrong-doing. Being in doubt as to whether it is not a legally valid act, is an offence of wrong-doing. Not thinking an act which is legally valid to be an act which is not legally valid, is an offence of wrong-doing.³

It is not an offence if they have not been admonished, if they give it up, if they are mad, out of their minds, in pain, beginners.⁴

Told is the Eleventh Offence entailing a Formal Meeting of the Order:
that of siding in with a schism

¹ = above, BD 1.302; below, BD 1.313, BD 1.327. ² taduttari. ³ = above, BD 1.302; below, BD 1.313, BD 1.327. ⁴ Cf. above, BD 1.303; below, BD 1.313, BD 1.327.
... at Kosambī in Ghosita’s park. At that time the venerable Channa\(^\text{1}\) indulged in bad habits. The monks said: “Reverend Channa, do not do that, it is not suitable.”\(^\text{2}\)

He said: “What do you, your reverences, think should be said to me? It is I who should tell you.\(^\text{3}\) The enlightened one is for us, dhamma is for us, dhamma is realised for us by a master.\(^\text{4}\) Just as a great wind blowing would raise up grass, sticks, ferns and rubbish together; or just as a mountain-born\(^\text{5}\) river would raise up various water plants\(^\text{6}\) together, so you, having gone forth from various names, from various clans, from various lineages, from various families, are raised up together. What do you, your reverences, think should be said to me? It is I who should tell you. The enlightened one is for us, dhamma is for us, dhamma is realised for us by a master.”

Then those who were modest monks were ... angry, and said: “How can the venerable Channa, himself being spoken to by the \(^\text{1}\) = Vin 4.141. \(^\text{2}\) Also in Bu-Ss 7. \(^\text{3}\) Vin-a 612, “I am worthy to say to you: ‘Do this, do not do that. For when, as our enlightened one, mounting Kanthaka (his horse), left the household life with me, I went forth into homelessness.’” \(^\text{4}\) Vin-a 612, “The fourfold true things having been penetrated for us by a master (ayyapatta), dhamma is for us. But thinking that the Order was hostile to him, he did not say, ‘The Order is for us.’” \(^\text{5}\) pabbateyya, Vin-a 612, “Its source is on a mountain.” \(^\text{6}\) saṅkha-sevāla-paṇaka: saṅkha, a water-plant, probably unidentified; sevāla = Blyxa octandra moss; paṇaka or paṇṇaka a name of a water-plant, most likely a fern (so Pali-English Dictionary). Vin-a 612, “saṅkha is called the leaf and the moss, with a long root; sevāla is dark sevāla (moss); the rest are water-plants, sesame plants and seeds; and everything that is to be styled a water-plant.” monks in accordance with dhamma, reckon himself as one not to be spoken to?"

Then these monks told this matter to the lord. He said:

"Is it true, as they say, Channa, that you, yourself being spoken to by the monks in accordance with dhamma, reckon yourself as one not to be spoken to?"

"It is true, lord," he said.

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked him, saying:

"How can you, foolish man, yourself being spoken to by the monks in accordance with dhamma, reckon yourself as one not to be spoken to? It is not, foolish man, for the benefit of unbelievers ... Thus, monks, this course of training should be set forth:

If a monk is one who is difficult to speak to,¹ and if himself being spoken to by the monks according to dhamma² concerning the courses of training included in the exposition,³ he reckons himself as one not to be spoken to, saying: 'Do not say anything to me, venerable ones, either good or bad, and I will not say anything to the venerable ones, either good or bad; refrain, venerable ones, from speaking to me (then) that monk should be spoken to thus by the monks: 'Do not, venerable one, reckon yourself as one not to be spoken to; let the venerable one reckon himself as one to be spoken to; let the venerable one speak to the monks in accordance with dhamma,⁴ and then the monks will speak to the venerable one in accordance with dhamma. Thus is the multitude increased for the lord, that is to say by speaking with one another, by assisting one another.¹ And if that monk when he has been spoken to by the monks should persist as before, then that monk should be admonished up to three times by the monks together for giving up his course. And if after being admonished up to three times by the monks together, he gives up his course, that is good; if he does not give it up, there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.”

¹ Dubbacajātika. Vin-a 612, says that dubbaca means that it is impossible to speak to him. Editors Vinaya Texts i.12 get nearer to this in their note than in their translation, which reads: "refuses to listen to what is said to him." I follow translation at GS 2.151 (of AN ii.147) and at KS ii.137 (of SN ii.206). But at GS 3.133 (AN iii.178) the reading is, "they are speakers of ill," and at GS 5.104 (AN v.152), "of foul speech." But Channa, above, has given no indication that his speech was evil. Chalmers, Further Dialogues of the Buddha 1.69 (MN i.95), has "unruly," but MN-a 2.66 explains: so dukkhenā vattabbo hoti, with which cf. SN ii.173, dukkhaṁ vattabbā. ² Sahadhammikaṁ, here adverbial. Vin-a 613, "according to the courses of training made known by the enlightened one." For similar use, see Vin 1.60; Vin 4.141. ³ I.e., in the Pātimokkha, see below, Old Commentary. ⁴ Saha dhammena.

If a monk is one who is difficult to speak to means: he is difficult to speak to, endowed with qualities which make him difficult to speak to,² intractable,³ incapable of being instructed.⁴

In the courses of training included in the exposition means: in the courses of training included in the Pātimokkha.

By the monks means: by other monks.

According to dhamma means: that course of training made known by the lord, this is called according to dhamma.

Himself being spoken to he reckons himself as one not to be spoken to, saying: “Do not, venerable ones, say anything to me, either good or bad, and I will not say anything to the venerable ones, either good or bad; refrain, venerable ones, from speaking to me”—(then) that monk means: that monk who is difficult to speak to.

By the monks means: by other monks, these see, these hear. He should be spoken to by these, saying: “Venerable one, do not reckon yourself as one not to be spoken to, let the venerable one reckon himself as one to be spoken to, let the venerable one speak to the monks in accordance with dhamma, and then the monks will speak to the venerable one in accordance with dhamma. Thus is the multitude increased for the lord, that is to say by speaking to one another, by assisting one another.” A second time he should be spoken to ... A third time he should be spoken to ... If he gives it up, that is good; but if he does not give it up, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If, having heard, they do not speak, there is an offence of wrong-doing. That monk, having been pulled into the middle of the assembly, should be told: “Do not, venerable one, reckon yourself as one not to be spoken to ... by ordaining one another.” A second time he should be told ... A third time he should be told ... If he gives it up, that is good; if he does not give it up, there is an offence of wrong-doing. That monk should be admonished. And thus, monks, should he be admonished. The Order should be informed by an experienced, competent monk: “Honoured sirs, let the Order hear me. This monk, so and so, being re-monstrated with by the monks in accordance with dhamma, reckons himself as one not to be spoken to: he does not give up this course. If it is the right time for the Order, let the Order admonish this monk so that he may give up this course. That is the motion. Honoured sirs, let the Order hear me. This monk, so and so ... Thus do I understand.”

¹ Aññamañña-vuṭṭhāpanena, translated at Vinaya Texts i.12, “by mutual help.” Vuṭṭhāpeti is also to ordain, to rehabilitate, cf. Vin 4.226, Vin 4.317, where vuṭṭhāpeti = upasampādeti in Old Commentary. ² Vin-a 612, “endowed with these conditions, they make a man difficult to talk to.” There are nineteen such conditions enumerated here; sixteen at mn-a 2.66. ³ Akkhamo, Vin-a 613, “he does not submit to, does not endure the exhortation.” ⁴ Appadakkhiṇaṅgāhi anusāsaniṁ, literally a left-handed (i.e., unskilled, clumsy) taker of the teaching. They do not take the teaching with deference, but disrespectfully (cf. Vin-a 613 and mn-a 2.66), possibly also referring to the fact that they do not (depart) keeping the right side towards the teacher, which is padakkhiṇaṅ karoti. This whole phrase is stock, occurring at, e.g., sn ii.201; an ii.147; an iii.178; an v.152; mn i.95.

According to the motion there is an offence of wrong-doing; according to the two resolutions there are grave offences; at the end of a resolution there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order. If he is committing an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order, the offence of wrong-doing according to the motion and the grave offences according to the two resolutions, subside.¹

An offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order means: ... on account of this it is called an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

¹ = above, BD 1.302, BD 1.307; below, BD 1.327.
Being in doubt as to whether it is a legally valid act ... Not thinking an act that is legally valid to be an act that is not legally valid is an offence of wrong-doing.¹

There is no offence if he has not been admonished, if he gives it up, if he is mad, if he is a beginner.²

_Told is the Twelfth Offence entailing a Formal Meeting of the Order: that concerning one to whom it is difficult to speak_

¹ Cf. above, BD 1.302, BD 1.307; below, BD 1.327.
² Cf. above, BD 1.303, BD 1.308; below, BD 1.327.
Monks’ Formal Meeting
(Saṅghādisesa) 13

... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s park. Now at that time,¹ unscrupulous, depraved monks who were the followers of Assaji and Punabbasu² were in residence³ at Kiṭāgiri.⁴ They indulged in the following kinds of bad habits: they planted and caused to be planted small flowering trees; they watered them and caused them to be watered; they plucked them and caused them to be plucked; they tied them up into (garlands) and caused them to be tied up; they made and caused to be made garlands having a stalk on one side⁵; they made and caused to be made garlands having a stalk on both sides⁶; they made and caused to be made a branching flower-stalk⁷; they made and caused to be made a wreath⁸; they made and caused to be ² Vin-a 614, “they were the foremost of the sixfold group of monks” — the bad group, often giving trouble. ‘They say, ‘alms in the countryside are now abundant, now short. Let us not live in one place but in three places.’ So they chose Kāśi of the kingdom of Kosala, Āṅga of the kingdom of Magadha, and Kiṭāgiri. They did things not to be done and neglected the courses of training which had been set forth. So they are called ‘unscrupulous, evil monks.’” At Vin-a 579 (on Vin 3.160) it is said that Mettiya and Bhummajaka are the leaders of the sixfold group.

---

¹ This whole passage = Vin 2.10ff.
³ āvāsīka. Vin-a 613, āvāso ti vihāro. “Āvāsīka are those to whom this āvāsa belongs, for they have the care of the new buildings and the repairs to the old: these are the residents. Those who only stay in a vihāra are called inmates (nevāsīka), but these were residents (āvāsīkā).” MN-a 3.187 defines āvāsīkā as nibandhavāsino, “continual dwellers.”⁴ Vin-a 613, “that was the name of the countryside,” while MN-a 3.186 says, “that was the name of the township.”⁵ ekato-vannṭikamāla. Vin-a 617, “a garland made with the stalks on one side of the flowers.”⁶ ubhatovantikamāla. Vin-a 617, “a garland made with the stalks of the flowers on both sides.”⁷ manjarika. Vin-a 617, “an arrangement of flowers.”
made a garland worn round the forehead; they made and caused to be made an ear-ornament; they made and caused to be made a breast-plate. These (monks) take or send garlands having a stalk on one side to wives of reputable families, to daughters of reputable families, to girls of reputable families, to daughters-in-law of reputable families, to female slaves of reputable families. They take or send garlands having a stalk on both sides; they take or send a branching flower stalk; they take or send a wreath; they take or send a garland worn round the forehead; they take or send an ear-ornament; they take or send a breast-plate. These eat from one dish together with wives of reputable families, with daughters of reputable families, with girls of reputable families, with daughters-in-law of reputable families, with female slaves of reputable families. They drink from one beaker; they sit down on one seat; they share one couch; they share one mat; they share one coverlet; they share one mat and coverlet. They eat at the wrong time; they drink intoxicants; they wear garlands, (use) perfumes and cosmetics; they dance and sing and play musical instruments, and they sport. They dance when she dances, they sing when she dances, they play musical instruments when she dances, they sport when she dances; they dance when she sings ... they dance when she plays musical instruments ... they dance when she sports ... they sport when she sports.

They play on a chequered board for gambling; they play on a

---

1. vidhutika. Vin-a 617, “It is done by piercing the flowers of the Yitex negundo tree (sinduvara) with a needle or small stick.”
2. vaṭamsaka. The commentary is of no use here. Sometimes as at Vv 38 an ear-ornament = kaṇnikā, Vv-a 174. But here next item, āveḷa = kaṇnikā Vin-a 617.
3. uracchada. Vin-a 617, “floral garlands like a hāra to be put on the breast.”
4. Vin-a 620, “they lie down on.”
5. attharaṇa, literally strewing, spreading (neutral). Hence probably a mat or rug, or even something spread over them, some cover.
6. Vin-a 620, “when a nautch-girl dances, they go dancing in front of her or behind her.”
7. atṭhapada. Vin-a 620, “they play at dice on the chequered board,” having eight squares on each side.
draught-board\(^1\); they play with imagining such boards in the air\(^2\); they play a game of keeping stepping on to diagrams\(^3\); they play with spillikans\(^4\); they play at dice; they play tip-cat\(^5\); they play brush-hand\(^6\); they play with a ball\(^7\); they play at blowing through toy-pipes made of leaves\(^8\); they play with a toy plough\(^9\); they play at turning somersaults\(^10\); they play with a toy windmill\(^11\); they play with a toy measures of leaves\(^12\); they play with a toy cart\(^13\); they play with a toy bow\(^14\); they play a game of guessing at letters\(^15\); they play a mind-

---

\(^1\) dasapada—i.e., a board with ten squares on each side. The commentary on this passage to “deformities,” below = DN-a 1.85f.
\(^2\) Vin-a 620, “as they play on the dice or draught board, so they play in space.”
\(^3\) parihārapatha. Vin-a 62 = DN-a 1.85, “having drawn a circle with various lines on the ground, there they play avoiding the line to be avoided.”
\(^4\) santikāya kilanti. Vin-a 621, “putting together chessmen and little stones into heaps, they move them away and put (new ones) with the nails without letting them tremble; but if one trembles there is defeat.”
\(^5\) ghaṭikenakīḷanti, Vin-a 621, “they move about hitting a short stick with a long stick.”
\(^6\) salākahatthenakīḷanti, Vin-a 621 = moistening the brush-hand in crimson lac or in floury water, and beating it on the ground or on a wall, he says, “What shall it be?’ and they play showing the form required”—elephants and horses.
\(^7\) akkhenakīḷanti, Vin-a 621, gulena, with a ball. Critical Pali Dictionary says akkha is a die.
\(^8\) paṅgacīrenakīḷanti, Vin-a 621, “they play blowing that leafy pipe.”
\(^9\) vaṅkakenakīḷanti, Vin-a 621, “they play with the plaything, the small plough of village boys.” Variant readings caṅgakena, vaṅgakena.
\(^10\) mokkhacikāya kilanti, derivation extremely obscure, see article Pali-English Dictionary and Journal of the Pali Text Society 1885, p. 49. Vin-a 621 says “it is called a game of rolling about (samparivattaka)” (cf. Ja 2.142). “Holding a stick in the air, and putting the head on the ground, they play turning about by being upside down.” At Vin 1.275 the son of a great merchant disabled himself by playing this way. See also Vinaya Texts ii.184, n.
\(^11\) ciṅgulakena kilanti, Vin-a 621, “a wheel that is made of the leaves of palm-trees and so on; the wheel reels round at a breath of wind—they play with this.” On ciṅgulaka see Journal of the Pali Text Society 1885, p. 50.
\(^12\) pattāḷhakenakīḷanti, Vin-a 621, pattāḷham vuccati pañnanālīkā, and it also says, “they play measuring the leafy pipe with this sand and so on.” On the measures, āḷhaka and nāḷikā, see above, BD 1.103.
\(^13\) rathakena, Vin-a 621, with a little cart.
\(^14\) dhanukena kilanti, Vin-a 621, “with a little bow.” These last six and “tip-cat” are given as examples of childish games at MN i.266 = AN v.203 = Mil 230.
\(^15\) akkharikāya kilanti, Vin-a 621, “they play the game of recognising syllables in the air or on their backs.”
reading game\(^1\); they play a game of mimicking deformities\(^2\); they train themselves in elephant lore\(^3\); they train themselves in horse lore\(^4\); they train themselves in cart lore; they train themselves in archery; they train themselves in swordsmanship; then they run in front of an elephant, they run in front of a horse and they run in front of a chariot; now they run backwards, now they run forwards, and they whistle,\(^6\) and they snap their fingers,\(^7\) and they wrestle,\(^8\) and they fight with fists, and having spread out their upper robes as a stage,\(^9\) they say to a dancing girl: “Dance here, sister,” and they applaud,\(^10\) and indulge in various bad habits.

At one time a certain monk, rising up from spending the rains among the people of Kāsī, and going to Sāvatthī for the sake of seeing the lord, arrived at Kiṭāgiri. Then this monk getting up early and taking his bowl and robe entered Kiṭāgiri for alms-food. He was pleasing whether he was approaching or departing, whether he was

\(^1\) manesikāya, Vin-a 621, “they play the game of knowing the mind and thoughts.”
\(^2\) yathāvajjena kīḷanti. This means the blind, the lame, the deformed and so on: imitating that which is a deformity, they play the game of exhibiting it.
\(^3\) Vin-a 621, “they learn the learning which is to be learnt for the (craft and care) of elephants” and horses.
\(^4\) Vin-a 621, “they learn the learning which is to be learnt for the (craft and care) of elephants” and horses.
\(^5\) dhāvantipī ādhāvantipī, Vin-a 621, dhāvantipī tiparammukhā gacchantā dhāvantipī. Ādhāvantipī pi ti yattakaṁ dhāvantipī tattakaṁ eva abhimukhā puna āgacchantā ādhāvantipī.
\(^6\) usselhenti. So far this word appears only to come here and at the parallel passage, Vin 2.10. The translators at Vinaya Texts ii.349, n. 1, “are quite uncertain how to render this word.” I admit I do not agree with their rendering, “they used to exhibit signs of anger,” as I think that all these activities were entered upon in a friendly spirit. See Pali-English Dictionary under seleti; also Morris, Journal of the Pali Text Society, 1885, p. 54, who is inclined to think usselhenti is connected with seleti, and signifies “to shout out.” Snp-a 485 (on Snp 682) explains selenti as mukhena usselanasaddaṁ muñcanti.
\(^7\) Here, and at Vin 2.10, appoṭhenti. Pali-English Dictionary gives only apphoṭeti, with meaning of “to snap the fingers or clap the hands.” But at Mil 13, Mil 20 apphoṭeto is given as a variant reading, also apphoṭhe°. Vin-a 622, “they make a wrestling contest.”
\(^8\) raṅgamajjha; cf. Sāniv 306, Ja 4.495.
\(^9\) nalāṭikam denti, which Pali-English Dictionary says, “gives a frown.” Buddhaghosa at Vin-a 622 says, “they say, ‘Very good, sister,’ and placing their fingers on their own foreheads they then place them on her forehead.”
looking before or looking behind, whether he was drawing in or stretching out (his arm),¹ his eyes were cast down, he was possessed of pleasant behaviour.²

People seeing this monk, spoke thus:

“Who can this be like an idiot of idiots, like a fool of fools, like a very supercilious person?³ Who will go up to him and give him alms? Our masters, the followers of Assaji and Punabbasu are polite,⁴ genial, pleasant of speech, beaming with smiles, saying: ‘Come, you are welcome.’ They are not supercilious, they are easily accessible, they are the first to speak.⁵ Therefore alms should be given to these.”

A certain lay follower saw that monk wandering in Kiṭāgiri for alms; seeing that monk he approached him, and having approached and greeted him, he said:

“Honoured sir, are alms obtainable?”

“Alms are not obtainable, your reverence,” he said.

“Come, honoured sir, we will go to my house.”

Then the lay follower having taken this monk to his house and made him eat, said:

“Where, honoured sir, will the master go?”

“I will go to Sāvatthī, your reverence, to see the lord,” he said.

“Then, honoured sir, in my name salute the lord’s feet with your head and say: ‘Lord, the residence at Kiṭāgiri has been corrupted. At Kiṭāgiri are residing unscrupulous, depraved monks who are the followers of Assaji and Punabbasu. These indulge in the following bad habits ... they indulge in a variety of bad habits. Lord, those men who formerly had faith and were virtuous now have no faith and are not virtuous. Those who formerly were chaṇṇels for gifts⁶ to the Order are now cut off; they neglect the well-behaved monks, and the depraved monks stay on. It were good, lord, if the lord would send monks to Kiṭāgiri, so that this residence in Kiṭāgiri may be settled.”¹

¹ From “he was pleasing” is more or less stock, cf., e.g., MN iii.35, MN iii.90; DN i.70; AN ii.104, AN ii.106, AN ii.210. ² iriyāpatha can mean “good behaviour” besides the postures, of which there are four. ³ bhākuṭikanhākutiko. Vin-a 622, “having frowned when he cast down his eyes, they say that he goes about like an angry man with his mouth clenched.” These last two words are in Pali kuṭitamukha, for which there are variant readings saṅkuṭi°, saṅkuci°. ⁴ sanha = nipuṇa. “They greet a lay woman and are not like a fool of fools,” so Vin-a 622. ⁵ Cf. DN i.116 for some of these words. ⁶ dānapatha.

“Very well, your reverence,” and that monk having answered and rising up from his seat, departed for Sāvatthī. In due course he approached Sāvatthī, the Jeta Grove and Anāthapindika’s park and the lord; and having approached and greeted the lord, he sat down to one side. It is usual for enlightened ones, for lords, to exchange greetings with in-coming monks. So the lord said to this monk:

“I hope, monk, that it is going well with you, I hope that you are keeping going, I hope that you have accomplished your journey with but little fatigue. And where do you come from, monk?”

“Things go well, lord, I am keeping going, lord, and I, lord, accomplished my journey with but little fatigue. Now, I, lord, having spent the rains among the people of Kāsi, and coming to Sāvatthī for the sake of seeing the lord, arrived at Kitāgiri. Then I, lord, rising up early, and taking my bowl and robe, entered Kitāgiri for alms-food. Then, lord, a certain lay follower saw me as I was wandering in Kitāgiri for alms-food, and seeing me he approached, and having approached and greeted me, he said: ‘Are alms obtainable, honoured sir?’ ‘No, your reverence, alms are not obtainable,’ I said. ‘Come, honoured sir, we will go to my house,’ he said. Then, lord, that lay follower, taking me to his house and feeding me, said: ‘Where, honoured sir, will the master go?’ I said: ‘Your reverence, I will go to Sāvatthī for the sake of seeing the lord.’ Then he said ... ‘may be settled.’ Therefore, lord, do I come.”

Then the lord, on that occasion, in that connection, having had the Order of monks convened, asked the monks:

“Monks, is it true as is said, that the monks who are followers of Assaji and Punabbasu, residing in Kitāgiri, are unscrupulous and depraved and indulge in the following bad habits: they plant small

¹ saṇṭhaheyya; or, may be put in order, may continue, may be established.
flowering trees ... indulge in a variety of bad habits ... and those men, monks ... and the depraved monks stay on?”

“It is true, lord,” they said.

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

“How, monks, can these foolish men indulge in this kind of bad habit, how can they plant small flowering trees or cause them to be planted? How can they water them or cause them to be watered? How can they pluck them or cause them to be plucked? How can they tie up garlands or cause them to be tied up? How can they make or cause to be made ... How can they take or send ... How can they eat ... How can they drink ... sit ... stand ... eat ... drink ... run ... dance and sing and play musical instruments and sport ... play ... train themselves ... run ... run round facing ... how can they whistle and snap their fingers and wrestle and fight with fists, and having spread out their upper robes as a stage, say to a nautch girl: 'Dance here, sister,' and applaud and indulge in a variety of bad habits? It is not, monks, for the benefit of unbelievers ...” and having rebuked them and given them talk on dhamma, he addressed Sāriputta and Moggallāna:

“You go, Sāriputta¹ and Moggallāna; and having gone to Kitāgiri make an act of banishment² from Kiṭāgiri against those monks who are followers of Assaji and Punabbasu; these are fellow monks of yours.”³

They said: “Lord, how can we make an act of banishment from Kitāgiri against the monks who are followers of Assaji and Punabbasu? These monks are violent and rough.”

“Then, Sāriputta and Moggallāna, go together with many monks.”

“Very well, lord,” Sāriputta and Moggallāna answered the lord.

¹ Sāriputtā. Use of karotha and later karoma clearly indicates that both the chief disciples are meant. Cf. Vin 1.351 for similar use of Anuruddhā. ² pabbājaniyakamma. This is directed against those who bring families into disrepute. ³ saddhivihārino.

At Vin 2.171 the followers of Assaji and Punabbasu refused to prepare lodgings for Sāriputta and Moggallāna saying that they were men of evil desires. This Assaji is not the same as he who converted Sāriputta and Moggallāna to the teaching of the lord.
“And this, monks, is how it should be done. First, the monks who are the followers of Assaji and Punabbasu should be reproved; having been reproved they should be reminded; having been reminded they should be accused of the offence; having been accused of the offence, the Order should be informed through an experienced, competent monk: ‘Let the Order listen to me, honoured sirs. These monks who are followers of Assaji and Punabbasu are those who bring a family into disrepute, they are of evil conduct; their evil conduct is seen and also heard, and respectable families corrupted by them are seen and also heard. If it seems the right time for the Order, let the Order make an act of banishment from Kiṭāgiri against the monks who are the followers of Assaji and Punabbasu, so that the monks who are the followers of Assaji and Punabbasu may not be in Kiṭāgiri. This is the motion. Let the Order listen to me, honoured sirs. These monks who are ... seen and also heard. The Order issues an act of banishment from Kiṭāgiri against the monks who are followers of Assaji and Punabbasu so that the monks who are followers of Assaji and Punabbasu may not be in Kiṭāgiri. If it seems good to the venerable ones to make an act of banishment from Kiṭāgiri against the monks who are followers of Assaji and Punabbasu so that the monks who are the followers of Assaji and Punabbasu may not be in Kiṭāgiri, then be silent; if it does not seem good (to you) then you should speak. A second time I speak forth this matter ... And a third time do I speak forth this matter: Let the Order listen to me ... should speak. By the Order there has been made an act of banishment from Kiṭāgiri against the monks who are followers of Assaji and Punabbasu so that the monks who are followers of Assaji and Punabbasu may not be in Kiṭāgiri. If it seems good to the Order, then be silent; so do I understand.’”

Then¹ Sāriputta and Moggallāna, at the head of a company of monks, having gone to Kiṭāgiri made an act of banishment from Kiṭāgiri against the monks who were followers of Assaji and Punabbasu, ¹ Vin 2.13 here has some matter not given at Vin 3.183. But the story continues in Vin 2.14 as above.

so that the monks who were followers of Assaji and Punabbasu might not be in Kiṭāgiri. The act of banishment having been made by the Order, these did not conduct them selves properly,¹ nor did they become subdued,² nor did they mend their ways,³ they did not ask the monks for forgiveness,⁴ they cursed them,⁵ they reviled them,⁶ they offended by following a wrong course through desire, by following a wrong course through hatred, by following a wrong course through stupidity, by following a wrong course through fear⁷; and they went away, and they left the Order.⁸

Those who were modest monks became angry ... and annoyed, and said: “How can the monks who are followers of Assaji and Punabbasu, banished by the Order, not conduct themselves properly, not become subdued, not mend their ways? Why do they not ask for forgiveness from the monks? Why do they curse and revile them? Why do they, following a wrong course through desire, hatred, stupidity and fear, go away and leave the Order?” Then these monks told this matter to the lord.¹

¹ Vin-a 625, “they did not do well in the eighteen duties.” ² “Through not following a suitable course they are not subdued,” Vin-a 625, and taking the variant reading paṇṇalomā, pannalomā instead of pana na loma, as given in the printed edition of the Vin-a Pali-English Dictionary says, lomaṁ pāteti means to let the hair drop, as a sign of modesty or subduedness. By this must be meant some analogy with an animal (such as a dog or cat) who, having raised the fur (loma), lets it fall back as a sign of good temper restored. Hence this phrase is almost certainly meant to be taken metaphorically. In Commentary, on Vin 2.5 (see Vin 2.309), where this same expression occurs, Buddhaghosa explains lomaṁ pātenti by paṇṇalomā honti, which means those whose down is flat, not standing up in excitement, and whose minds are therefore subdued. Cf. “he takes up the wrong course,” MN-a 3.153 on MN i.442. ³ Na netthāraṁ vattanti. Vin-a 625, “they did not follow the way of the overcoming of self.” Commentary on Vin 2.5, given at Vin 2.309, is fuller: netthāraṁ vattanti ti nettharantānaṁ etan ti netthāraṁ yena sakā nissāranaṁ nittharitum tami aṭṭhārasavidhāṁ sammāvattāṁ vattanti ti attho. Same phrase occurs at MN i.442, translated at Further Dialogues of the Buddha 1.316 “fails to atone,” but this rendering is, I think, too Christian in tone to fit. MN-a 3.153 on MN i.442 says: na nīthāraṁ vattati ti nīthāraṇakavattam hi na vattati āpattivuṭṭhānatthāmaṁ turitaturito chandajāto na hoti., variant reading nīthāra, as at MN i.442. ⁴ Vin-a 625, “‘we have done badly, we will not do so again, forgive us.’ They did not ask for forgiveness.” ⁵ Vin-a 625, “They swore at those who did the commission of the Order with the ten expressions of cursing.” These are given at Dhp-a 1.211. ⁶ Dhp-a 1.211–212, “They made dread appear in these.” ⁷ These are the four so-called agatis. At DN iii.133 = AN iv.370, they occur among the nine “Impossibles” (abhabbaṭṭhāna) for a monk who is khīṇāsava. The agati-formula is stock; cf., e.g., Vin 1.283; Vin 2.167, Vin 2.176, Vin 2.177; Vin 3.238, Vin 3.246; DN iii.182, DN iii.228; AN i.72; AN ii.18; AN iii.274. ⁸ vibhamanti. Vin-a 625 says, ekacce gihī honti. Cf. BD 1.60, π. 3.

He asked: “Is it true as is said, monks, that the monks who are the followers of Assaji and Punabbasu, having been banished by the Order, do not conduct themselves properly ... leave the Order?”

“It is true, lord,” they said.

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying ... “And thus, monks, this course of training should be set forth:

If a monk lives depending on a certain village or little town, and is one who brings a family into disrepute and is of depraved conduct, and if his evil conduct is seen and heard, and families corrupted by him are seen and also heard, let that monk be spoken to thus by the monks: ‘The venerable one is one who brings families into disrepute, and is of depraved conduct. The venerable one’s depraved doings are seen and heard, and families corrupted by the venerable one are seen and also heard. Let the venerable one depart from this residence; you have lived here long enough.’ And if this monk having been spoken to by the monks should say to these monks: ‘The monks are followers of desire and the monks are followers of hatred and the monks are followers of stupidity and the monks are followers of fear; they banish some for such an offence, they do not banish others’—this monk should be spoken to thus by the monks: ‘Venerable one, do not speak thus. The monks are not followers of desire and the monks are not followers of hatred and the monks are not followers of stupidity and the monks are not followers of fear. The venerable one is one who brings families into disrepute and is of depraved conduct. The depraved doings of the venerable one are seen and heard, and families corrupted by the venerable one are seen and also heard. Let the venerable one depart from this residence; the venerable one has dwelt in this residence long enough.’ If this monk, when spoken to thus by the monks, should persist as before, that monk should be admonished up to three times by the monks for giving up his course. If after being admonished up to three times, he gives up that course, it is good. If he does not give it up, it is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.”

¹ Here at Vin 3.184, the next normal step is omitted: “Then the lord on that occasion, in that connection, having convened the Order of monks, asked the monks.” This is given at parallel passage, Vin 2.14.

---

A monk (is dependent on) a certain village or a little town means: a village and a little town and a city, and thus a village and a little town.

Lives depending on means: there they are dependent for the requisites of robes, alms-food, lodgings and medicine for the sick.

A family means: there are four kinds of families: a noble family, a brahmin family, a merchant family, a low-caste family.¹

One who brings a family into disrepute means: he brings families into disrepute by means of a flower² or a fruit³ or with chunam or clay or with a toothpick or with bamboo or with medical treatment⁴ or with going messages on foot.⁵

Of depraved conduct means: he plants or causes to be planted a little flowering tree; he waters it and causes it to be watered; he plucks it and causes it to be plucked; he ties up garlands and causes them to be tied up.

Are seen and also heard means: those who are face to face with them see; those who are absent hear.

Families corrupted by him means: formerly they had faith, now thanks to him they are without faith; having been virtuous, now they are without virtue.

Are seen and also heard means: those who are face to face with them see; those who are absent hear.

That monk means: that monk who brings a family into disrepute.

By the monks means: by other monks; these see, these hear; it should be said by these: ‘The venerable one is one who brings families into disrepute and is of depraved conduct; the venerable one’s depraved conduct … has lived here long enough.’ And if the monk being spoken to thus by the monks should say: ‘… they do not banish others’.

This monk means: this monk against whom proceedings have been taken.

By the monks means: by other monks; these see, these hear; it should be said by these: ‘Do not, venerable one, speak thus … the venerable one has lived here long enough.’ A second time should they say … A third time should they say … if he gives up the course that is good; if he does not give it up it is an offence of wrong-doing. If, having heard, they do not speak, there is an offence of wrong-doing. That monk having been drawn into the middle of the Order, should be told: ‘Do not, venerable one, speak thus … you have lived here long enough.’ A second time he should be told … A third time he should be told … if he gives up his course it is good, but if he does not give it up there is an offence of wrong-doing.

That monk should be admonished. The Order should be informed through an experienced, competent monk: ‘Let the Order listen to me, honoured sirs. This monk, so and so banished by an act of the order, makes the monks fall into wrong courses by following desire, by following hatred, by following confusion, by following fear; and he does not give up his course. If it seems the right time to the Order, let the Order admonish this monk for the sake of giving up his course. This is the motion. Let the Order listen to me … Thus do I understand.’
According to the motion there is an offence of wrong-doing ... grave offences subside.

An offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order means: the Order places him on probation on account of his offence, it sends him back to the beginning, it inflicts the mānatta discipline, it rehabilitates; it is not many people, it is not one man, therefore it is called an offence which in the earlier as well as in the later stages requires a formal meeting of the Order. A synonym for this class of offence is a work; therefore, again, it is called an offence which in the earlier as well as in the later stages entails a formal meeting of the Order.¹

Thinking a legally valid act to be a legally valid act, he does not give it up—there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order. Being in doubt as to whether it is a legally valid act ... Not thinking an act which is legally valid to be an act which is not legally valid, is an offence of wrong-doing.²

It is not an offence if he is not admonished, if he gives it up, if he is mad, if he is a beginner.

Told is the Thirteenth Offence entailing a Formal meeting of the Order:

that of bringing families into disrepute

The thirteen matters which require a formal meeting of the Order have been set down, venerable ones—nine which become offences at once,³ and four which are not completed until the third admonition.⁴

If a monk offends against one or other of these, for as many days as he knowingly conceals his offence,⁵ for so many days should probation be spent by this monk, even against his will.¹ When this monk has spent his probation, a further six days are to be allowed for the monk’s mānatta discipline. If, when the monk has performed the mānatta discipline, the company of monks numbers twenty, that monk may be rehabilitated.² But if the Order of monks should rehabilitate that monk when numbering less than twenty even by one, that monk is not rehabilitated and these monks are blameworthy. This is the proper course there. Now I ask the venerable ones: I hope that you are pure in this matter?³ A second time I ask: I hope that you are pure in this matter? A third time I ask: I hope that you are pure in this matter? The venerable ones are pure in this matter, therefore they are silent. Thus do I understand.⁴

¹ Cf. above, BD 1.196. ² Cf. BD 1.302, BD 1.307, BD 1.313. ³ paṭhamāpattikā. ⁴ yāvatatiyaka: name of the last four Saṅghādisesa, where before punishment can be inflicted, the monks must have been admonished so as to give up their wrong courses, even up to the third time. ⁵ Vin-a 629, “for as many days as he knowingly conceals his offence, saying: ‘I have fallen into such and such an offence,’ and does not tell his co-religionists.”

386

Told are the thirteen

THE SUMMARY OF THIS IS
Emission and bodily contact;
lewd talk and one’s own pleasure,
Acting as a go-between; and a hut, and a vihāra;
without foundation,
And some point, and a schism, even siding in with,
Difficult to speak to, and bringing a family into disrepute—these are the thirteen offences entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

Told are the thirteen sections

¹ Vin-a 629, taking up probation (parivāsa) it may be spent unwillingly, not under his power.
² Abbheti, to rehabilitate after suspension for breach of rules.
³ I.e., of being at least a group of twenty.
⁴ For this passage cf. Vin 4.242.

387
At one time the enlightened one, the lord, was staying at Sāvatthī in Anāthapiṇḍika’s park in the Jeta Grove. At that time the venerable Udāyin was dependent on families in Sāvatthī and approached many families. Now at that time the young girl of a family who was supporting the venerable Udāyin had been given (in marriage) to a boy of a certain family. Then the venerable Udāyin, getting up early and taking his bowl and robe; approached that family, and having approached them he asked the people:

“Where is (the girl) called so and so?” They said:

“Honoured sir, she was given to a boy of a certain family.” Now this family supported the venerable Udāyin. Then the venerable Udāyin approached this family, and having approached them he asked the people:

“Where is (the girl) called so and so?” They said:

“Master, she is sitting in the inner room.”

Then the venerable Udāyin approached this girl, and having approached her, he sat down together with that girl, a man and a woman, in a secret place on a secluded, convenient seat,¹ conversing at the right time, speaking dhamma at the right time.²

Now at that time Visākhā, Migāra’s mother, had many children

¹ Old Commentary, see below, BD 1.333, and Vin-a 631 explain that this means a seat where “it is possible to indulge in sexual intercourse.” ² Vin-a 631, “talking for a time when anyone comes and goes in their presence, then he says: ‘You should perform a seeming observance-day, you should give food to be distributed by ticket.’” and many grandchildren.¹ The children were healthy and the grandchildren were healthy and she was considered to be auspicious.²
People used to regale Visākhā first at sacrifices, festivals³ and feasts.⁴
So Visākhā, being invited, went to that family. Visākhā saw the venerable Udāyin sitting together with that girl, a man and a woman,⁵ in a secret place on a secluded, convenient seat. Seeing this, she said to the venerable Udāyin:

“This is not proper, honoured sir, it is not suitable that the master should sit together with women-folk, a man and a woman, in a secret place on a secluded, convenient seat. Although, honoured sir, the master has no desire for that thing,⁶ unbelieving people are difficult to convince.”⁷

But the venerable Udāyin took no heed after he had been spoken to thus by Visākhā. Then Visākhā, when she had departed, told this matter to the monks. Those who were modest monks became annoyed, vexed, angry and said:

“How can the venerable Udāyin sit together with womenfolk, a man and a woman, in a secret place on a secluded, convenient seat?”
And these monks told this matter to the lord. He said:

“Is it true, as is said, Udāyin, that you sat together with womenfolk, a man and a woman, in a secret place on a secluded, convenient seat?”
“It is true, lord,” he said.

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked him, saying: “How can you, foolish man, sit together with womenfolk, a man with a woman, in a secret place on a secluded, convenient seat? It is not, foolish man, for the benefit of unbelievers ... And thus, monks, this course of training should be set forth:

“Whatsoever monk should sit down together with a woman, the one with the other, in a secret place on a secluded, convenient

¹ Vin-a 631, “they say that she had ten sons and ten daughters ... and that her sons and her daughters each had twenty children, so that in addition to her own, she had four hundred children.” ² Abhimaṅgalasammatā. ³ Vin-a 631, “The blessings of leading the bride to one’s own home and away from her own home”—i.e., wedding feasts. ⁴ Feasts at the beginning and at the end of the rains. ⁵ Eko ekāya. ⁶ Tena dhammena. ⁷ I.e., that he and the woman were on purely platonic terms.
seat, and if a trustworthy\textsuperscript{1} woman lay-follower seeing him should speak concerning a certain one of three matters: either one involving defeat,\textsuperscript{2} or one entailing a formal meeting of the Order,\textsuperscript{3} or one involving expiation,\textsuperscript{4} and the monk himself acknowledging that he was sitting down, should be dealt with according to a certain one of three matters: as to whether it is one involving defeat, or as to whether it is one entailing a formal meeting of the Order, or as to whether it is one involving expiation. Or that monk should be dealt with according to what that trustworthy woman lay-follower should say. This is an undetermined matter.\textsuperscript{5}

\textbf{Whatever} means: he who ...

\textbf{Monk} means: this is how monk is to be understood in this sense.

\textbf{Woman} means: a human woman, not a female \textit{yakkha}, not a female departed one, not a female animal, even a girl born on this very day, much more an older one.\textsuperscript{6}

\textbf{Together with} means: together.\textsuperscript{7}

\textbf{A man with a woman}\textsuperscript{8} means: there is a monk and also a woman.

\textbf{A secret place} means: secret from the eye, secret from the ear. Secret from the eye means: if covering the eye or raising the eyebrow or raising the head he is unable to see. Secret from the ear means: he is unable to hear ordinary speech.

\textbf{A secluded seat} means: it is secluded by a wall built of wattle and daub, or by a door or by a screen or by a screen wall or by a tree or by a pillar or by a sack or it is concealed by anything whatever.\textsuperscript{9}

\textbf{Convenient} means: it is possible to indulge in sexual intercourse.

\textbf{Should sit down} means: when the woman is sitting the monk is sitting or lying close to her; when the monk is sitting the woman is sitting or lying close to him; both are sitting, or both are lying.

\textbf{Trustworthy} means: (a woman who) has attained the fruit,\textsuperscript{10}

\textsuperscript{1} Vin-a 632, “one who has attained the fruit of stream-entry.”  \textsuperscript{2} The First Defeat.  \textsuperscript{3} The second Formal Meeting.  \textsuperscript{4} Bu-Pc 44, Bu-Pc 45.  \textsuperscript{5} It depends upon circumstances.  \textsuperscript{6} = above, BD 1.202.  \textsuperscript{7} = above, BD 1.202.  \textsuperscript{8} Literally one (masculine) with one (feminine).  \textsuperscript{9} Cf. Bu-Ay 2.2.1 and Vin 4.269.  \textsuperscript{10} Of stream-attainment, Vin-a 632.
one who possesses complete understanding, one who has learned the teaching.

Female lay-follower means: one going to the enlightened one for refuge, one going to dhamma for refuge, one going to the Order for refuge.

Seeing means: seeing.²

Should speak concerning a certain one of three matters: either one involving defeat, or one entailing a formal meeting of the Order, or one involving expiation, and the monk himself acknowledging that he was sitting down, should be dealt with according to a certain one of three matters: as to whether it is one involving defeat, or as to whether it is one entailing a formal meeting of the Order, or as to whether it is one involving expiation. Or that monk should be dealt with according to what that trustworthy woman lay-follower should say.

If she should say this: “The master was seen by me sitting and indulging in sexual intercourse with a woman,” and if he acknowledges this, he should be dealt with for an offence.

If she should say this: “The master was seen by me sitting and indulging in sexual intercourse with a woman,” and if he should say this: “It is true that I was sitting but I was not indulging in sexual intercourse,” he should be dealt with for sitting down.

If she should say this: “The master was seen by me sitting and indulging in sexual intercourse with a woman,” and if he should say this: “I was not sitting but I was lying down,” he should be dealt with for lying down.

If she should say this: “The master was seen by me sitting and indulging in sexual intercourse with a woman,” and if he should say this: “I was not sitting but I was standing,” he is not to be dealt with.

If she should say this: “The master was seen by me lying down and indulging in sexual intercourse with a woman,” if he acknowledges this, he should be dealt with for an offence.

¹ Vin-a 632, “one who has penetrated the four truths.” ² disvā ti passītvā.
If she should say this: “The master was seen ... with a woman,” and he should say this: “It is true that I was lying down but I was not indulging in sexual intercourse,” he should be dealt with for lying down.

If she should say this: “The master ... with a woman,” and if he should say this: “I was not lying down but I was sitting,” he should be dealt with for sitting down.

If she should say this: “The master ... with a woman,” and he should say this: “I was not lying down but I was standing,” he should not be dealt with.

If she should say this: “The master was seen by me sitting together with a woman and indulging in physical contact,” and if he acknowledges this he should be dealt with for an offence ... “It is true that I was sitting, but I did not indulge in physical contact,” he should be dealt with for sitting down ... “I was not sitting, but I was lying down,” he should be dealt with for lying down ... “I was not sitting but I was standing,” he should not be dealt with.

If she should say this: “The master was seen by me lying down together with a woman and indulging in physical contact,” and if he acknowledges this he should be dealt with for an offence ... “It is true that I was lying down, but I did not indulge in physical contact,” he should be dealt with for lying down ... “I was not lying down but I was sitting down” ... “I was not lying down, I was standing,” he should not be dealt with.

If she should say this: “The master was seen by me sitting together with a woman, the one with the other, in a secret place on a secluded seat suitable (for sexual intercourse),” and if he acknowledges this he should be dealt with for sitting down ... “I was not sitting down, but I was lying down,” he should be dealt with for lying down ... “I was not sitting down, I was standing,” he should not be dealt with.

If she should say this: “The master was seen by me lying down ... on a secluded seat suitable (for sexual intercourse),” and if he acknowledges this he should be dealt with for lying down ... “I was not lying down, I was sitting down,” lie should be dealt with for sitting down ... “I was not lying down, I was standing,” he should not be dealt with.

Undetermined means: not determined as to whether it involves defeat, or formal meeting of the Order, or expiation.

He acknowledges going,¹ he acknowledges sitting down, he acknowledges an offence,² he should be dealt with for an offence.³ He acknowledges going, he does not acknowledge sitting down, but he acknowledges an offence, he should be dealt with for an offence. He acknowledges going, he acknowledges sitting down, but he does not acknowledge an offence, he should be dealt with for sitting down. He acknowledges going, he does not acknowledge sitting down and he does not acknowledge an offence, he should not be dealt with. He does not acknowledge going, but he acknowledges sitting down and he acknowledges an offence, he should be dealt with for an offence. He does not acknowledge going, he does not acknowledge sitting down, but he acknowledges an offence, he should be dealt with for an offence. He does not acknowledge going, he does not acknowledge sitting down, though he does not acknowledge an offence, he should be dealt with for sitting down. He does not acknowledge going, he does not acknowledge sitting down, he does not acknowledge an offence, he should not be dealt with.

_Told is the First Undetermined Offence_

---

¹ Vin-a 633, “saying: ‘I am going to a secret place for the sake of sitting down.’”
² Vin-a 633, “a certain offence among the three”—i.e., either a pārājika or a saṅghādisesa or a pācittiya.
³ Vin-a 633, āpattiya kārelabbo, “he should be dealt with according to which of the three he acknowledges.”
At one time the enlightened one, the lord, was staying at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s park. At that time the venerable Udāyin said: “It has been forbidden by the lord to sit together with womenfolk, a man and a woman, in a secret place on a secluded, convenient seat,” but he sat together with that young girl, the one with the other, in a secret place, conversing at the right time, talking dhamma at the right time. A second time did Visākhā, Migāra’s mother, being invited, come to that family. Visākhā saw the venerable Udāyin sitting together with that girl, the one with the other, in a secret place, and seeing them she said to the venerable Udāyin:

“This, honoured sir, is not right, it is not suitable for the master to sit together with womenfolk, a man and a woman, in a secret place. Although, honoured sir, the master has no desire for that thing, unbelieving people are difficult to convince.”

But the venerable Udāyin took no heed after he had been spoken to thus by Visākhā. Then Visākhā, when she had departed, told this matter to the monks. Those who were modest monks ... (=Bu-Ay 1.1; the words on a secluded, convenient seat are omitted here) ...“And thus, monks, this course of training should be set forth:

“And furthermore, if there is not a seat which is secluded and convenient, but sufficient¹ for speaking to a woman with lewd words,² then whatever monk should sit down on such a seat together with a woman, the one with the other, in a secret place, and a trustworthy woman lay-follower seeing him should speak concerning a certain one of two matters: either one entailing a formal meeting of the Order, or one involving expiation, and the monk himself acknowledging that he was sitting down, should be dealt with according to a certain one of two matters: as to whether it is one entailing a formal meeting of the Order, or as to whether it is one involving expiation. Or that monk should be dealt with according to what that trustworthy woman lay follower should say. This again is an undetermined matter.”

¹ Alaṁ. ² Cf. Bu-Ss 3.

394

And furthermore, if there is not a seat which is secluded means: it is not secluded by a wall built of wattle and daub or by a door or by a screen or by a screen wall or by a tree or by a pillar or by a sack, or it is not secluded by anything whatever.¹

Not convenient means: it is not possible to indulge in sexual intercourse.²

But sufficiently so for speaking to a woman with lewd words means: it is possible to speak to a woman with lewd words.

Whatever means: he who.

Monk means: ... this is the sense in which monk is to be understood.

On such a seat means: on a seat like that.

Woman means: a human woman, not a female yakkha, not a female departed one, not a female animal,³ one who is learned and competent to know good and bad speech, and what is lewd and what is not lewd.⁴

Together with means: together.⁵

Should sit down means: when the woman is sitting ... ⁶

Seeing means: seeing.⁷

Should speak concerning a certain one of two matters:

Either one entailing a formal meeting of the Order, or one involving expiation, and the monk himself acknowledging that he was sitting down, should be dealt with according to a certain one of two matters: as to whether it is one entailing a formal meeting of the Order, or as to whether it is one involving expiation. Or that monk should be dealt with according to what that trustworthy woman lay-follower should say.

If she should say this: “The master was seen by me when he was sitting down and coming into physical contact with a woman,” if he acknowledges this he should be dealt with for an offence.

If she should say this: “The master was seen by me ... physical contact,” and if he should say: “It is true that I was sitting, but I did not come into physical contact,” he should be dealt with for sitting ... “I was not sitting, but I was lying down,” he should be dealt with for lying down ... “I was not sitting, but I was standing,” he should not be dealt with.

If she should say this: “The master was seen by me lying down, and coming into physical contact with a woman,” if he acknowledges this he should be dealt with for an offence ... “It is true that I was lying down, but I did not come into physical contact,” he should be dealt with for lying down ... “I was not lying down, but I was sitting down,” he should be dealt with for sitting down ... “I was not lying down, but I was standing,” he should not be dealt with.

If she should say this: “The master was heard by me when he was sitting down and speaking lewd words to a woman,” if he acknowledges this he should be dealt with for an offence.

If she should say this: “The master ... to a woman,” and if he should say: “It is true that I was sitting down but I did not speak lewd words to a woman,” he should be dealt with for sitting down ... “I was not sitting down but I was lying down,” he should be dealt with for lying down ... “I was not sitting down but I was standing,” he should not be dealt with.

If she should say this: “The master was heard as he was lying down and speaking lewd words to a woman” ... “but I was standing,” he should not be dealt with.

If she should say this: “The master was seen by me sitting together

---

1 Samāpajjanto. On samāpajjati, see above, BD 1.201, n. 3.
with a woman, the one with the other, in a secret place,” and if he acknowledges this he should be dealt with for sitting down ... “I was not sitting down, but I was lying down,” he should be dealt with for lying down ... “I was not sitting down, but I was standing,” he should not be dealt with.

If she should say this: “The master was seen by me lying down together with a woman, the one with the other, in a secret place,” and if he acknowledges this, he should be dealt with for lying down ... “I was not lying down, but I was sitting down,” he should be dealt with for sitting down ... “I was not sitting down, but I was standing,” he should not be dealt with.

This again means: it is called so with reference to the former.

Undetermined means: not determined as to whether it involves a formal meeting of the Order, or expiation.

---

He acknowledges going, he acknowledges sitting down, he acknowledges an offence, he should be dealt with for an offence. He acknowledges going, he does not acknowledge sitting down, he acknowledges an offence, he should be dealt with for an offence. He acknowledges going, he acknowledges sitting down, he does not acknowledge an offence, he should be dealt with for sitting down. He acknowledges going, he does not acknowledge sitting down, he does not acknowledge an offence, he should not be dealt with. He does not acknowledge going, he acknowledges sitting down, he acknowledges an offence, he should be dealt with for an offence. He does not acknowledge going, he does not acknowledge sitting down, but he acknowledges an offence, he should be dealt with for an offence. He does not acknowledge going, he acknowledges sitting, he does not acknowledge an offence, he should be dealt with for sitting down. He does not acknowledge going, he does not acknowledge sitting down, he does not acknowledge an offence, he should not be dealt with.¹

Told is the First Undetermined Offence

¹ Cf. above, Bu-Ay 1.3.
Set forth, venerable ones, are the two undetermined matters. In this connection I ask the venerable ones: I hope that you are pure in this matter? A second time I ask: I hope that you are pure in this matter? A third time I ask: I hope that you are pure in this matter? The venerable ones are pure in this matter, therefore they are silent. Thus do I understand.

ITS SUMMARY

Convenient and so and likewise, but not thus, such undetermined matters are well pointed out by the best of Buddhas.

Told is the Undetermined
TRANSLATOR’S INTRODUCTION

The actual rules, sikkhāpada, of the Pali Pātimokkha are accessible to English readers in Rhys Davids and Oldenberg’s translation,¹ and translations even earlier.² They have also all been set out in full by B.C. Law,³ while E.J. Thomas⁴ has given some in their entirety and has summarised others, classifying these, under their appropriate sections, where affinities are visible. This is the first translation into English of these sikkhāpadas complete with their attendant material.

It has been truly and helpfully observed by the editors of Vinaya Texts⁵ that “inside each class (of offence) the sequence of the clauses⁶ follows no invariable rule. Sometimes offences of a related character are placed together in groups, but sometimes those which would naturally come together are found scattered in quite different parts of the same class.” In addition, as Oldenberg has pointed out,⁷ “it not infrequently happens that a rule refers to the one immediately preceding it.”

A considerable amount of work having been done on the Pātimokkha, it will be better in this Introduction not to enlarge upon ¹ Vinaya Texts i.1ff., Sacred Books of the East XIII. ² Dickson, Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society 1876; Gogerly, Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society 1862; R. Spence Hardy, Eastern Monachism, 1850, in various chapters. ³ A History of Pali Literature i.50ff., based on Vinaya Texts i.1ff. ⁴ A History of Buddhist Thought, 16ff. ⁵ Vinaya Texts i.xiv. ⁶ I.e., rule, ordinance, sutta, dhamma, clause or article. ⁷ Vin.1.xvii.

rules, grouping of rules or sporadic appearance of rules, but to confine myself mainly to various findings arising from a study of the auxiliary material—stories, Old Commentary and anāpatti (no offence) clauses—surrounding each rule.

Some of these Pātimokkha rules, when read in conjunction with their attendant material, testify that, although the legal decree and the penalty for its infringement may be the culminating point, there was also a softening influence at work. For the not altogether infrequent anujānāmi (“I allow”) allowances, always put into the mouth of Gotama, tend to counteract any too great stringency, inexpediency or lack of clarity on the side of which the sikkhāpada, as first framed, may have erred.

Doubtless the sikkhāpadas, if isolated from their surrounding matter and viewed either as extracts from this or as the foundations on which it was later reared,¹ may be said to amount to not much more than a series of prohibitions. But on those occasions when an anujānāmi is present in the auxiliary material, then anujānāmi and sikkhāpada, allowance and rule, taken in association as they are intended to be, produce a balance, a middle way between the two extremes of uncompromising legal ordinance and unchecked laxity of behaviour. On such occasions the anujānāmi pulls against the rule, and appears as an event potent in its effect on the character of the rule, no less than on the history of its formulation.

The Nissaggiyas and Pācittiyas are arranged on the same general plan that the Suttavibhāṅga follows throughout. This comprises a story leading up to the formulation of a rule, sikkhāpada, which is laid down together with the penalty for breaking it. In some cases there follow one or more other stories showing that it was advisable to remodel the rule, and at whose conclusion the amended version of the rule is given. Next comes the Old Commentary or Padabhājaniya, defining the words of the rule; then cases where the penalty for breaking the rule or some lighter (never heavier) penalty is incurred; and finally, a list of cases which entail no offence against the rule.

¹ BD 1.xivf.
The Nissaggiya Group

Each of the thirty Nissaggiya rules for monks has, as the penalty for breaking it, expiation of the offence, Pācittiya, involving forfeiture, Nissaggiya. This penalty is stated in the words Nissaggiyaṁ Pācittiyaṁ, “(an offence) involving forfeiture, to be expiated.” The forfeiture enjoined is that in respect of which the offence had been committed, for example a robe or bowl or rug. These rules are concerned both with behaviour as such and with the wrongful acquisition or unsuitable usage of things.

The form of expiation enjoined by the Old Commentary is confession¹ of the offence of wrongful acquisition. From internal evidence, Pācittiya is a (minor) offence to be confessed, āpatti desetabbā, a statement common to all the Nissaggiyas. But etymologically the word Pācittiya has nothing to do with confession. I have therefore kept to the more literal translation,² and have rendered it “offence of expiation” throughout, and the two words Nissaggiya Pācittiya as “offence of expiation involving forfeiture.” According to the Old Commentary, “having forfeited (the article), the offence should be confessed.” Thus the act of forfeiture should precede the expiation or confession. I will say something more below about the method in which forfeiture should be made.³

In history, the place at which an event is said to have taken place is often of some importance. It is well known that Gotama spent the greater part of his teaching life at Sāvatthi and his last years at Vesālī. It is worth recalling, for the evidence contributed, that Sāvatthi, with an overwhelming majority, is given as the locus of twenty-two Nissaggiyas, Rājagaha of three, Vesālī and Kapilavatthu each of two, Ālavī of one.

As many as sixteen Nissaggiya rules for monks are concerned with robes, and fall into two groups, Bu-NP 1–Bu-NP 10, Bu-NP 24–Bu-NP 29; five with rugs (santhata), Bu-NP 11–Bu-NP 15; two with sheep’s wool, Bu-NP 16, Bu-NP 17; three with gold and silver and bartering, Bu-

¹ Cf. S. Dutt, Early Buddhist Monachism, p. 104ff. ² See below, BD 2.3, n. 4. ³ Below, BD 2.xii.
NP 18–Bu-NP 20; two with bowls, Bu-NP 21, Bu-NP 22; one with medicine, Bu-NP 23; and the last one, Bu-NP 30, is against a monk appropriating for his own use benefits intended for the Order. There are, moreover, a few cross-sections. For example, in the matter of exchange of robes (Bu-NP 5), in the matter of washing, dyeing and beating robes (Bu-NP 4), and in the matter of washing, dyeing and beating sheep’s wool (Bu-NP 17), the correct behaviour for a monk to observe towards a nun also comes under legislation; and in two of the rules connected with making rugs, sheep’s wool is also the subject of legal attention.

Oddly, there is no Nissaggiya concerned with either lodgings or bedding, senāsana, or with almsfood, pīṇḍapāta, which with robes and medicine are regarded as a monk’s four indispensable requisites. There are offences regarding these which had to be confessed, and which occur in the Pācittiya section of the Pātimokkha, but evidently there are no types of offences where lodgings and almsfood had to be forfeited, in addition to their wrongful acquisition or usage being confessed.

About half the rules were formulated because the monks acquired something by means considered un-becoming, tiresome or inconvenient: they asked for too much, they pressed potential donors, for example as to the quality of the robe-material they particularly desired. The remaining half were formulated because monks did various things or used various articles in ways thought unsuitable: they had an unnecessary amount of robes or bowls, they laid aside their robes for too long, they made nuns wash their robes or their sheep’s wool for them, and they carried sheep’s wool so far that the laity made fun of them.

The formulation of the majority, namely of sixteen Nissaggiya rules, resulted, so it is recorded, from criticisms made of a monk or monks by the laity; eight from criticisms made by modest monks, three from those made by nuns, two from those made by Ānanda, and one from those made by a wanderer. With the exception of Ānanda, who complained for the sake of the Order, and not because he himself had been specially inconvenienced, these various classes of critics put forward their complaints because they personally had been in some way adversely affected by the monks’ behaviour. Thus there is a parallelism between the sources of criticism and the sections of society annoyed. Once Gotama is recorded to have heard of troublesome behaviour direct from Mahāpajāpatī while he was talking to her (Bu-NP 17), and once he came upon signs of it himself (Bu-NP 17). Four times a new rule is framed in place of one already existing, for occasions afterwards arose which showed that its scrupulous observance resulted in unfair situations.

It will be seen that the number of Nissaggiya rules formulated according to this reckoning is thirty-six. This means that six times the rule as originally framed had to be altered: four times, as mentioned above, in accordance with circumstances that had not been foreseen when it was first set forth (Bu- NP 1, Bu-NP 2, Bu-NP 14, Bu-NP 21), and twice when close adherence to the rule as first drafted is shown to result in occurrences so unsuitable as to provoke complaints and criticism (Bu-NP 5, Bu-NP 6).

These Nissaggiyas where the rule had to be altered, although never more than once, thus contain two stories, one leading up to the first, and the other to the second version of the rule. The second version must be taken to annul the validity of the first. This however had to remain in the text for the sake of historical interest, and as to some extent explanatory of the force and wisdom of the second version. Had it been omitted, the incidents showing its shortcomings and its need for revision could not have been used as testimony that such shortcomings were remediable and such revision necessary and reasonable.

In these six Nissaggiyas where a rule is formulated twice, the first version is always followed by the phrase, “And thus this rule of training for monks came to be laid down by the lord.” There is no instance of this phrase occurring either after the second formulation of the rule, or in any of the remaining twenty-four Nissaggiyas where the rule is framed once only.

Yet in the text of the Vinaya is every rule, whether it had to be revised or not, and every amended rule, ascribed to Gotama. The formula so very definitely attributing “to the lord” only those rules that had to be altered is to my mind somewhat inexplicable. It is not peculiar to the Nissaggiyas, but occurs throughout the Vibhaṅga. It is possible that the occurrence of this phrase points to some comparatively old stratum in the Suttavibhaṅga, where only those rules, so pointedly said to have been laid down “by the lord,” were genuinely prescribed by him; but that then there came a case, perhaps before, perhaps after his death, which made it clear that a revision and a more exact delimitation of the rule already formulated was wanted in the interests of reason, decency or justice.

Such revision may then in fact have been made, not by the founder, but by one of his followers or by the saṅgha. Or a decision may have been taken at the final recension of the “texts” to attribute all rules to the lord, so as to invest them with his authority. Even so, the mystery remains why this phrase, “And thus this rule of training for monks came to be laid down by the lord,” was appended only to those rules which, as the history of the Order shows, had to be altered, and not to those whose original version has been able to stand and operate down the centuries.

It is something more than coincidence, and looks like adherence to some thought-out pattern, that in the six Nissaggiyas where a rule is twice formulated there should occur, after its first formulation, this phrase ascribing its setting forth “to the lord,” and before its second formulation an anujānāmi, an “allowance.” In each case the anujānāmi occurs in the talk which, before the rule was revised, is reputed to have been given by Gotama to monks. Its effect is not to tighten but to mitigate the force and application of the rule as first drawn up. An anujānāmi however also occurs in five of the remaining twenty-four Nissaggiyas (Bu-NP 3, Bu-NP 15, Bu-NP 22, Bu-NP 28, Bu-NP 29), not immediately before, but some way before the rule, here of course formulated only once.

In the Nissaggiya group of rules, there occurs the formulation of four dukkaṭa offences, those of wrong-doing. Each of these is ascribed to Gotama. Many others appear in the material placed after the Old Commentary, but it is not said of these that he was the author.

Most rare it is to find, as in Bu-NP 1 and Bu-NP 21, which have several other points in common, a short story leading up to the drafting of an offence of wrong-doing placed after the anāpatti (no offence) clauses.¹ As would be expected, the story and the offence are pertinent to the matter in hand.

In Bu-NP 6 the anujānāmi, which is unusually long, ends, exceptionally for the Nissaggiya section, in the formulation of a dukkata offence. It immediately precedes the second drafting of the rule.

In Bu-NP 22, which because of some peculiarities that it contains I shall discuss more fully below, the first story introduces, not a Nissaggiya Pācittiya offence, but one of wrong-doing.

The occurrence of dukkata offences in Bu-NP 6 and Bu-NP 22 before the final formulation of the rule, no less than their ascription to the lord, should correct the impression given at Vinaya Texts i.xxv that the term dukkata “occurs only in ... the latest portion of the Piṭaka,” that is in “the Notes giving the exceptions to, and the extensions of the Rule in the Pātimokkha” (Vinaya Texts i.xix), which are always placed after the Old Commentary.

As a general rule, the Padabhājaniya states that forfeiture and confession were to be made to an Order, that is to any part of the whole Order, five monks or more,² living within one boundary, sīmā, or within one residence, āvāsa; or to a group, gaṇa³ of monks, that is to a group of from two to four monks; or to an individual monk. Whenthe article had been forfeited and the offence confessed, the offence was to be acknowledged, in the first two instances, by “an experienced, competent monk”; in the third by the monk to whom the forfeiture and confession had been made. The forfeited article was then to be given back to the monk who, having acquired it wrongfully, had forfeited it.

The value of the Nissaggiya Pācittiya type of penalty was, I think, in the eyes of the framer or framers of the Pātimokkha rules, its deterrent effect on the commission of further similar offences, and its redemptive power for each particular offender. It was apparently held that an offence whose penalty was of this nature was annulled by confessing it and having it acknowledged, combined with this hardly more than symbolic act of forfeiting the article wrongfully acquired. This involved some formality, but evidently the offence was not considered bad enough to warrant the offender’s permanent loss of the goods he had obtained improperly.

¹ Similarly at Bi-NP 1. ² Sizes of a saṅgha, order, are given at Vin 1.319. ³ In the Old Commentary, the phrase sambahulā bhikkhū also occurs, and appears often to be a synonym for gaṇa. See below, BD 2.7, BD 2.8.

Thus it is only true that “rules were required to prevent his (i.e., a monk’s) acquiring a store of property,”¹ on the assumption that these rules were deterrent and preventive and not retributive and revengeful. More important is it perhaps to realise that, behind this statutory limiting of possessions, there was the conviction that greed, craving, thirst, taṇhā, themselves undesirable, produced further undesirable states of mind.

It is true that any great emphasis on the monastic ideal, any clear expression of it, is lacking in the Vinaya, and is to be found almost exclusively in the Suttapiṭaka.

The rules were probably, like the Rule of St. Benedict, to help the beginners, the backsliders, in their struggle towards “the lofty heights of virtue” and wisdom. Yet there is one notable occasion, in Bu-NP 17, when we are reminded of the end, the ideal, the thing sought, to which the Vinaya rules must be held to constitute a means of realisation. This is when the lord is shown as asking Mahāpajāpatī whether the nuns are “zealous, ardent, with a self that is striving,” a triad of words belonging to Sutta material. To which she answers that while monks make them wash their sheep’s wool for them, it is impossible for nuns to attend to “the higher morality, the higher thought, the higher wisdom,” also a Sutta triad.

Conquest in this age-old struggle on the part of certain women to escape the ties of domesticity so as to seek the “further shore” is happily expressed in verses ascribed to Sumaṅgala’s mother:²

“O woman well set free! how free am I,
How thoroughly free from kitchen drudgery!
Me stained and squalid ’mong my cooking-pots,
My brutal husband ranked as even less Than the sunshades he sits and weaves away.”

Yet although references to the need for ideals and their value, and for man’s inner spiritual and mental training and the means of attaining these, may be, practically absent from the Vinaya, there is no doubt that its legal and somewhat austere character is based on a high and mature standard of morality, justice and common sense.

There are three exceptions to the Nissaggiyas’ customary insistence on the return of the forfeited article to the monk who had come by it unlawfully, and had forfeited it, only to be given it back again.
And there are three exceptions to their usual instruction that forfeiture and confession are to be made to an Order or to a group or to an individual monk. The same three Nissaggiyas, Bu-NP 18, Bu-NP 19, Bu-NP 22 share both these irregularities.

Bu-NP 18 and Bu-NP 19 are both concerned with gold and silver, called jātarūparajata¹ in the one case, and rūpiya in the other. The Old Commentary on these Nissaggiyas requires a monk who has picked up gold and silver (Bu-NP 18), or who has entered into various transactions in which they are used (Bu-NP 19), to make forfeiture in the midst of the Order, saṅghamajjhe. It does not give the usual alternatives of forfeiting to a group or an individual. That these commodities may not be forfeited to either of these parties is precluded by the rule of Bu-NP 18 itself, for this lays it down as an offence for a monk to have gold and silver in his possession. The saṅgha is more impersonal, and is, when need arises, a body of monks in their official character, with the functions of discharging legal and juridical business and of carrying out formal acts.

But although the saṅgha may receive the forfeited gold and silver,
"it may neither retain them nor return them to the monk who forfeited them. It must either hand them over to some lay person, asking him to bring medicines in exchange, or, failing this, the Order must appoint from among its number a “silver-remover,” rūpiya chaḍḍaka, whose office it is to dispose of whatever mediums of exchange rūpiya and jātarūparajata denote.

¹ On these terms see below, BD 2.100, n. 2.

Of the various objects with which the rules of the Nissaggiyas are concerned, gold and silver are the only ones which a monk might in no circumstances have in his possession. Clearly he had access to them, for his association with the laity was but little restricted.

Similarly Bu-NP 22, besides precluding forfeiture and confession to either a group or an individual, also debars the return of the forfeited article, here a bowl, to the monk who forfeited it. But he is to be given another bowl in its place. This is unique in the Nissaggiyas. It is also unique to find given in the rule itself the method of forfeiture. This is otherwise invariably and solely, found in the Old Commentary. Here the method of forfeiture enjoined in the rule appears again, though in more detailed form, in the Old Commentary.

The sikkhāpada of Bu-NP 22, after stating that a monk who, getting another new bowl in exchange for a bowl mended in less than five places, incurs an offence, proceeds to say: “That bowl must be forfeited by that (offending) monk to a bhikkhuparisā (company, assembly, congregation of monks). And whatever is the last bowl (pat-tapariyanta) belonging to that company of monks, it should be given to that monk, with the words, ‘Monk, this is a bowl for you; it should be kept until it breaks.’”

It is interesting to find that the new bowl got in exchange for the mended bowl is subject to forfeiture only to the Order. This suggests that bowls were regarded at some time as more especially communal property than were robes,¹ or the other objects in regard to which a monk might commit an offence involving forfeiture. Yet in Bu-NP 21, an extra bowl, if it had been used for more than ten days, might be forfeited either to an Order or to a group or to an individual.

¹ On a monk’s death, his robes did not necessarily return to the Order. He could bequeath them to the monk who had nursed him or to a pupil. Moreover, robe-material might be presented to individual monks, if the laity so wished. See Bu-NP 8, Bu-NP 9, Bu-NP 10.
Nevertheless the injunction which occurs at the end of the sikkhāpada of Bu-NP 22 reveals a closer concern for communal ownership and property than do the other Nissaggiya sikkhāpadas. In these others, although the Order, or a section of it, may receive the forfeited article, it also, with the exception of Bu-NP 18 and Bu-NP 19, returns it, the community as a whole assuming no further responsibility.

At the end of Bu-NP 21, it is said that failure to give back a bowl that had been forfeited entails a dukkaṭa offence.¹ Yet in Bu-NP 22 it appears that a bowl on being forfeited becomes an extra bowl for a company of monks and is absorbed into their stock of bowls. The result of an Order’s obtaining an additional bowl in this way is that all its members are liable to profit. For their bowls, on the accretion of this extra one, may all be shuffled round. But this is not to be done haphazard. The rule has given concise directions for the right procedure, and these are followed and expanded at some length by the Old Commentary.

There is a still further way in which Bu-NP 22 is unique among the Nissaggiyas. It contains three stories instead of, as is normal, one, or, as in six cases, two. This means that a chain of three connected circumstances have arisen, each of which demands jurisdiction. The curious thing is, that the first, story does not end with the formulation of a Nissaggiya Pācittiya offence, but with that of an offence of wrong-doing. This is to the effect that a monk must not ask for a bowl. But monks observed this precept too scrupulously. Lay people complained that, by receiving almsfood into their hands, they resembled members of other sects. So Gotama, it is said, made an “allowance” moderating the dukkaṭa rule, and permitting monks to ask for a bowl when theirs were broken or destroyed. But because the six monks abused this privilege, the Nissaggiya Pācittiya rule was formulated.

I have dwelt on Bu-NP 22 at some length, for I think that, even as there are some grounds for holding that Bu-Ss 12 may represent some specially ancient fragment of the Pātimokkha,² so likewise may

---

¹ Cf. end of Bu-NP 1, where same offence incurred by failure to give back a robe.
² See BD 1.xxviiiif.
this Nissaggiya.

In the first place, the term bhikkhuparisā, because it merely indicates an assembly, a company of monks, may belong to those earlier days before Gotama’s followers were fully organised into a saṅgha, bound by the same observances and obligations, the same rules and (formal) acts, and living in the same communion.

It is possible that, in such a context, bhikkhu did not mean all that at some time it came to mean. Secondly, the mention of this “company of monks” as the recipient body of a forfeited bowl may point to a time when communal ownership was more actual than nominal. Thirdly, the need for stating, in the Nissaggiya Pācittiya rule itself, that the article wrongfully acquired must be forfeited, suggests that this-rule antedates the other Nissaggiyas, and belongs to a time when forfeiture was new as a penalty, and when therefore the method of carrying it out had to be plainly stated. Fourthly, one might suppose that the first story in this Nissaggiya purports to be recounting unsuitable behaviour in an early follower of Gotama. For the early followers, it may be presumed, entering from a more urgent sense of religion, committed less serious offences than the later, and hence incurred lighter penalties.

The appointment of two officials is mentioned in the Nissaggiyas, that of silver-remover (Bu-NP 18) and that of assigner of bowls (Bu-NP 22). The duty of both is to deal with the results of offences, and not with the distribution of articles, such as robes and lodgings, lawfully acquired. Appointments of officials were not of one officer for the whole saṅgha, but of an officer for any of those lesser sections of it which, dwelling within one boundary or residence, were, to the not negligible confusion of later historians, also called saṅgha. Even so, we do not know whether each of these saṅghas always appointed every possible official, ready to function—and a not inconsiderable number are named throughout the Vinaya—or if only those were appointed when occasion demanded their service. Nor do we know whether an official, once appointed, held his post permanently or temporarily.
I think it fairly safe to presume the latter. Monks travelled a great deal on the one hand, and on the other had to spend the three or four months of the rains in one residence with other monks. Had two permanent office-bearers met, and a case within their orbit arisen, a ruling would have been necessary as to which one, such as the senior or the one first arrived, was to deal with the situation. But there is no record of any such event.

It seems more likely, and the internal evidence, such as it is, points this way, that the authorised procedure for appointing the officials was prescribed as the need for this or that official was felt. Thus a similar appointment could be correctly made if and when future need arose. But if there was, for example, no occasion for a silver-remover or an assigner of bowls, which could only be because no monk had acquired gold and silver or a new bowl in exchange for one mended in less than five places, then there was no obligation to appoint a monk to fill either of these offices.

The procedure for the appointment of the officials is in each case much the same; and they have to be “agreed upon” by the entire Order affected. This well illustrates the democratic nature of the monastic institution. Two other “agreements of the monks,” bhikkhusammuti, are described in the Nissaggiyas (Bu-NP 2, Bu-NP 14), and again the responsibility for making the required agreement is shown to be vested in the whole organism, and not in any one of its members.

Some English translations of Pali words and phrases appear to have become almost traditional by now, and hence attract little critical attention. Such a phrase is “pattacīvaraṁ ādāya,” “taking the bowl and robe.” It is the occurrence of this phrase in Bu-NP 5, together with the mention of various sorts of robes, that has raised the question of which robe it is that is here referred to in the phrase.

Dialogues of the Buddha ii.162, n. 1, describes the three usual robes of a monk as the inner one worn in the residence, the upper robe put on before a monk left the monastery and went out to a village, and the outer cloak carried, and put on near the outskirts of the village. If this is a correct interpretation—and it is the one generally accepted—the phrase pubbaṅhasamayaṁ nivāsetvā would appear to mean, “having dressed in the morning in the upper robe.” This implies that the monk will already have put on his inner robe to wear in the residence, if indeed he had not slept in it, but later put on his upper robe with a view to going on his alms round. Again, the phrase pattacīvaraṁ ādāya, which as a rule immediately follows this other one, would in effect mean, “taking the outer cloak and the bowl.” I think it possible however that if the cīvara of this phrase did at some time come to refer exclusively to the saṅghāṭi, the outer cloak, it may not always have done so. For it is hard to see the sense that such an interpretation could make in Bu-NP 5, as I hope to show. On the other hand, the occurrence of the phrase here may be due to some later editorial addition to the story.

The nun Uppalavāṇṇā is elsewhere in the *Vinaya*¹ the focus of an alteration in the rules on jungle-dwelling for nuns. Here too another episode in her life, as this is recorded in Bu-NP 5, is the centre round which turn some intricate questions with regard to robes.

According to this Nissaggiya, Uppalavāṇṇā, in the stereotyped phrase, “having dressed in the morning and taking her bowl and robe,” pubbaṅhasamayaṁ nivāsetvā pattacīvaraṁ ādāya, had gone to Sāvatthī for alms food. She had then used her upper robe, uttarāsaṅga, to tie up some meat. She next gave her inner robe, antaravāsaka, to the monk Udāyin, although protesting that it was her last, her fifth robe, idañ ca me antimaṁ pañcimaṁ cīvaraṁ. And finally it is said that on her return to the nunnery, the nuns receiving from her her bowl and robe, pattacīvaraṁ paṭiganhaṇtiyo, asked her where her inner robe was.

The question is, which of the five robes allowable to a nun did she set out “taking,” and which did the nuns “receive” from her when she came back to the nunnery?

The five robes of a nun, mentioned also at Vin 4.218, Vin 4.282, are named at Vin 2.272 as the three usual robes worn also by monks, with the addition of the vest or bodice, saṅkacchika, and the bathing-cloth, and it is said that these should be pointed out to women wishing to receive the upasampadā. At Vin 4.345 it is laid down as an offence of expiation for a nun to enter a village without her bodice, that is without having this on under her inner robe. Buddhaghosa at Vin-a 663 assumes that Uppalavaṇṇā had on her bodice, for he says, “dressed in (nivattha) her bodice, and showing only the palms of her hands ... she went away,” that is from Udāyin. We know that she had had her upper robe, and suspect that it was accounted for by the phrase, “having dressed in the morning.” Likewise, on account of the phrase, “taking her bowl and robe,” she should have had her outer cloak with her. But had she in fact had this, surely she would have put it on. Yet in the narrative of her meeting with Udāyin, there is no suggestion that she was either carrying it or wearing it.

---
¹ Vin 3.35ff. = BD 1.53ff.

Either therefore “having dressed in the morning” refers to putting on the inner robe, and “taking the bowl and robe” to the upper robe, and not to the saṅghāṭi, the outer cloak; or this latter phrase is some later interpolation.

Now at Vin 1.298 it is a dukkaṭa offence to enter a village wearing only the inner and the upper robes, that is without the outer cloak. This rule, be it noticed, was made in reference to monks, and I do not think that it applies to nuns.¹ For at Vin 4.281 it is a Pācittiya offence for nuns, having laid aside the cīvara, here certainly the outer cloak, to go into the country for more than five days with only the inner and the upper robes. Therefore if, at the time to which Bu-NP 5 purports to refer, a nun did not have to go into a village on her morning alms-round taking her outer cloak, Uppalavaṇṇā may have “taken” merely her upper robe. She would then have returned to the nunnery dressed only in her bodice, as Buddhaghosa seems to imply.

¹ It is too facilely said by some writers that the Vinaya for nuns is a mere copy of that for monks—e.g., H. Kern, A Manual of Indian Buddhism, p. 86; though it is probable that the Pātimokkha of the nuns was “modelled on” that of the monks; Cf. E. J. Thomas, A History of Indian Thought, 15, n. 1; M. Winternitz, A History of Indian Literature ii.24, speaking of it as “a similar code compiled later for the nuns”; Miss D. Bhagvat, Early Buddhist Jurisprudence, p. 18, as a “mere imitation of the former”—i.e., the Bhikkhu-Pātimokkha.

With the growing disparagement of nakedness in monks and nuns,¹ the robe the nuns “received” from her would hardly have been her bodice. Besides, this “receiving” of a bowl and robe from an incoming monk or nun came to be but a recognised, standardised act. It would thus appear possible that the discrepancy which exists may be attributable to a later interpolation of the phrase which denotes this act of respect done to a monk or nun on coming back to the residence.

If we allow that the phrase pattacīvaraṁ ādāya, of the beginning of the story, betrays neither the marks of interpolation nor of accredited meaning, but signifies taking the upper robe, then we are almost forced to see the phrase pattacīvaraṁ paṭiganhantiyo, towards the conclusion of the story, as some additional matter. For if the course of the story is carefully followed, it is impossible to identify these two cīvara the one with the other.

Thus an explanation of the discrepancy between whatever robes it was that these phrases are intended to signify is that this Nissaggiya has suffered some careless “editorial” gloss or glosses. The point itself may be small and of no particular importance. But every instance of perceptible “curling and combing”² of the texts must make us the more alive to the possibility of their patchwork nature, their composite “authorship,” to their gradual alterations and additions, and probably to their losses too.

Having taken an instance of the translation of a frequent phrase, whose latent reference has been perhaps too little questioned, and hence too easily regarded as uniformly specific, I turn now to a word, santhata, and the verb, santharati (= saṁ + stṛ), of which it is the past participle. In this case it is owing to the comparative infrequency of these two words that their latent reference has been too little questioned on the one hand, but on the other not fully perceived to be specific.

In Bu-NP 11–Bu-NP 15, santhata occurs as a neuter noun,\(^1\) meaning a rug or mat.\(^2\) Because there are other words for rug, mat, carpet, ground-covering, sheet and so on, the problem before us is to find the differentiating feature peculiar to the kind of rug called santhata, the particular characteristic in virtue of which it was so named. For neither the Old Commentary nor Buddhaghosa describes the finished article; they concentrate instead on the process of making it. The result of the process is what in the text of the introductory stories and the sikkhāpadas is called a santhata.

The Old Commentary is very terse, but, by exclusion, informative: santhata means, what comes to be made having spread, not woven, santharitvā katam hoti avāyimaṁ. Thus santharitvā in this definition needs some word to be supplied as its object, such as one representing the material used in making the article by this process known as santharati. Buddhaghosa, at Vin-a 684, describes the technique of what the Old Commentary, in defining santhata, calls santharitvā, by saying, “it is made having spread (santharitvā) silk\(^3\) filaments (aṁsu) one upon the other on a level piece of ground, having poured boiled rice (or corn) and so on over the silk filaments.”

This then is the kind of process meant by santhata, and it is the only one described. It seems that the basic material of which the article was being made was spread out in layers, in strata all running the same way, and not cross-wise so as to be woven, and that it was then somehow welded together by pouring boiling rice over it. The result of this operation was a santhata, a thing made by this process.

Childers defines the cognate noun, santhāra, as “layer, stratum”; and there are passages in the Vinaya and the Suttas\(^4\) where santharati,

---

\(^1\) See e.g. DN ii.160, Snp 401, Snp 668; also the stock-phrase, dhamani-santhata-gatta, having the limbs strewn with veins. As a noun, santhata occurs only once elsewhere, Vv 63,5.
\(^2\) Pali-English Dictionary, B.C. Law, A History of Pali Literature i.53, “rug or mat”; E.J. Thomas, A History of Buddhist Thought, p.19, “rug." Vinaya Texts i.24 translates “rug or mat” and “rug”; Huber, Journal Asiatique, 1913, p.497, “couverture"; Vidyabhusana, So-sor-thar-pa, p.20, “mat.” \(^3\) “Silk” is not essential to the argument. This part of the Commentary is referring to Bu-NP 11, where monks thought of making santhata mixed with silk. In Bu-NP 12–Bu-NP 14 they were made of wool. \(^4\) Vin 1.227; DN ii.84, DN iii.208; Ud 8.6; MN i.354.
used largely in connection with preparing a council-hall, must mean to spread or to strew most probably in layers, by a spreading method, of layering. This, at all events, is the view held by the commentator¹ who describes the arrangement of covering the ground with cow-dung, scents, coloured, mats, fleecy rugs, and skins of various animals, all one above (upari) the other. It is unfortunate that the commentator, in thus defining santharitvā, more than once uses the word itself. In spite of this, the description is of inestimable help in arriving at a fuller understanding of what santharati implies.

If my hypothesis is correct, the cognate verb attharati (= ā + str) would denote the simpler act of spreading, covering, laying out, but not in layers, and as it were once only or one thing only, such as cloth (Vin 1.254ff.) or a bridge (Ja i.199). It would then follow that santharati, when used with reference to spreading a couch or chair or mattress or stool,² must mean not simply the act of putting out the couch or chair unurnished, but converting it into something fit to sit on or lie on. This could be done by spreading on it or under it different coverings, in layers: the sheet, pacuttharaṇa, the ground-covering, bhummataṭṭharaṇa, for example. These coverings would in no way be held together as though woven, but would be spread one on top of the other.

For the translation of santhata in Bu-NP 11–Bu-NP 15 I have chosen “rug” in preference to “mat,” because it seems desirable to convey the impression that a santhata was something that could both be sat on and also worn wrapped round the body. The Old Commentary on Bu-NP 15 defines purāṇa-santhata, an old, used or soiled santhata, in exactly the same terms as it uses to define purāṇa-cīvara, an old, used or soiled robe. Of both it says that they mean, “dressed in it once, put on once,” using for this the words nivāseti and pārupati, which usually refer to the complete dressing in the monk’s three robes. Buddhaghosa defines these words, “dressed in” and “put on,” as “sat on” and “lain on” (Vin-a 687). Yet on the very same page he speaks of a santhata “counting as a fourth robe.”

¹ MN-a iii.18; Ud-a 409. ² See below, BD 2.238f.
But for Buddhaghosa apparently these two definitions are not impossible of reconciliation. For in his exegesis on Bu-NP 4 he says (Vin-a 660) that a robe is called “old” (i.e., dressed in it once, put on once) if a monk lies on it, using it as a pillow. Thus a robe, meant to be worn, could also on occasion be used to lie on.

As the Vinaya itself provides no evidence as to what exactly santhata means, whether it is a rug or a mat, although it describes the process by which it is made, I have followed the commentator in regarding the article as something that could either be sat on or worn. “Rug” rather more accurately than “mat” seems to cover these two usages which, by the time of Buddhaghosa at any rate, appear to have grown into the meaning of santhata.

The nisidana-santhata of Bu-NP 15 is not a species of santhata, but of nisidana, and is a piece of cloth to sit upon (nisidana) made with the addition of part of an old santhata. A nisidana was so called if it had a border.¹ But the reason why a border came to be allowed, together with its correct measurements, is given at Vin 4.170f., and has nothing to do with the need to add part of a santhata to a nisidana.

The Pācittiya Group (Nos. 1–60)

A curious feature of the Pācittiyas is that the Old Commentary on these rules nowhere explains what is meant by Pācittiya, the offence which gives its name to this whole section. It is from the phrase āpatti desetabbā, occurring in the Vibhaṅga on each Nissaggiya, that we infer that Pācittiya is an offence to be confessed; and even as forfeiture and confession are to be made to an Order or to a group or to an individual, so we may conclude that the same holds good when the offence is one whose penalty is merely that of expiation, of confession unaccompanied by forfeiture.

By and large each Pācittiya is composed on the same general lines as the other classes of rules in the Sutta Vibhaṅga: introductory story, rule, sometimes another story, even more than one, with the amended version or versions of the rule, Old Commentary, other exegetical material, and a list of no offences against the rule. There are, as in the Nissaggiyas, irregularities and variations from this customary pattern. These cannot be analysed until the translation of the ninety-two Pācittiyas is complete, and even then it will be doubtful whether they will throw any light on “the comparative age of any different parts of the Pātimokkha.”¹

One thing however we can do now, and it is not altogether unimportant. We can correct the misapprehension into which the editors of Vinaya Texts fell, and which 1,² among others,³ have hitherto followed too uncritically. For it is not quite the case that the Old Commentary is a “word for word commentary upon”⁴ each of these rules, although undoubtedly it is nearly so. Setting aside the occasions where words are defined by themselves, but nevertheless defined, there yet remain a few distinct but notable lapses and omissions, some words of a rule not being commented upon at all. There is no attempt in the Old Commentary to explain “water (that) contains life” (Bu-Pc 20), “monk arrived first” (Bu-Pc 16), or “in destruction of” (vegetable growth) (Bu-Pc 11), although in the last case the paragraph following the Old Commentary’s definition of “vegetable growth” leads us to suppose that “destruction” means cutting, breaking and cooking.

Sāvatthī, again with a large majority, is said to be the locus of thirty-nine of these sixty Pācittiyas, Rājagaha of six, Kosambī of five, Vesālī and Áḷavī each of four, Kapilavatthu of two and Suññamāragiri of one. The total of sixty-one is accounted for by the fact that, in Bu-Pc 5, the first version of the rule is reputed to have been formulated when Gotama was at Áḷavī, and the second when he had moved on from there to Kosambī.

The critics, as a result of whose complaints Pācittiya rules for monks were made or revised, are thirty-five times shown to have been the “modest monks,” fifteen times “people,” manussa, to which must be added the criticism of a lay-woman (Bu-Pc 7, both stories), of a man (Bu-Pc 45), of a poor workman (Bu-Pc 33), of Mahānāma Sakka (Bu-Pc 47), and of hirelings of the king (Bu-Pc 58). Four times the nuns complain, once the titthiyas, once a brahmin, once upāsakā, lay-followers.

---

These last, also, upon one occasion (Bu-Pc 41) are recorded to have told Gotama how monks might avoid bringing discredit on themselves from members of other sects; he laid down a rule in accordance with their representations. Once King Pasenadi thought of a device by which Gotama might know that monks had been behaving indecorously (Bu-Pc 53). Five times, it appears, Gotama discovered by direct observation or by questioning that legislation was required.
By a too fastidious adherence to a rule, it is on several occasions demonstrated to be unsatisfactory, and is revised.

Thus the total number of rules appearing in these Pācittiyas is greater than sixty. It is not uniformly the case, as in the Nissaggīya section, that when a rule is amended, it is amended once only. At least three of these sixty Pācittiyas provide evidence of a long struggle to get the rule right. In Bu-Pc 32 the rule on a group-meal, gaṇabhojana, revised seven times, results finally in seven legalised exceptions being allowed to the offence, as it otherwise remains, of eating in a group. To the ruling on paraṁparabhojana (Bu-Pc 33), eating meals out of the turns in which they have been offered, four exceptions are sanctioned. Thirdly, six exceptions are made to the rule that a monk should not bathe at intervals of less than half a month (Bu-Pc 57).

A consideration of the reasons leading to the exceptions made to these, as to several other rules, reveals something of the care and vigilance needed for the smooth running of the Buddhist cenobium, impinging as it did on various elements and aspects of the society of the day. The laity were, on the one hand, not to be drained of their resources, on the other, not to be refused when they offered food, as this might result in wounding their spirit of generosity, in dashing their hope of merit, and in the loss to monks of the robe-material which the laity, at the right time of year, gave to members of the Orders with meals. Nor were the laity to be kept waiting. At least I think that that, as much as the discourtesy of refusing the offer, made to monks who were travelling, to “eat just here,” and which looks as if the lay-people were willing to provide the meal, is at the root of two exceptions, made at Bu-Pc 33.5. For there are various times in Nissaggiya and Pācittiya when lay-people are recorded to be annoyed with monks for keeping them waiting.

At Bu-Pc 33.4 it is obvious that the assigning to another monk of a meal that is expected later is a device for overcoming the rudeness, otherwise involved, of refusing food that is actually being offered. Nor, so it emerges, is it polite to refuse an invitation given to a meal by a wanderer, a paribbājaka-samāpanna. A naked ascetic, ājīvaka, had, as is stated, on Bimbisāra’s advice, asked the monks to a meal with him, but they had refused (Bu-Pc 32.8).

Incidentally this story reveals the necessity for keeping the friendship of the kings, on whom the success of the Order largely depended. They did much to set the fashion in faith. I have mentioned Pasenadi’s device for letting the lord know, but without himself speaking to him, that he had seen monks, arahans at that, sporting in the water. Mallikā, his queen, was of the opinion either that there was no rule against this, or that these monks did not know about it. Apparently her first surmise was right. The third mention of a king in these sixty Pācittiyas is again of Bimbisāra. Because monks, by bathing until after dark, kept him waiting his turn, for it appears that he did not wish to disturb them, a rule, severe compared with its cause, was formulated forbidding monks to bathe at intervals of less than half a month (Bu-Pc 57). But this proved deleterious to robes and lodgings. For in the hot weather, the fever weather, at a time of wind and rain, when making repairs or going on a journey, monks lay down to rest with their limbs damp from rain or sweat. And the restriction on bathing was uncomfortable for those who were ill. This is a rule whose various adjustments are the direct outcome of a tropical climate.

I think that the growing needs of the monks, as expressed for example in the exceptions to Bu-Pc 57, and also in the acquisition of more and more accessories, recounted principally in the Mahāvagga, does not necessarily indicate soft-living and greed on their part, but a desire to keep what they had properly and cleanly, to use it as efficiently as possible, and to keep themselves in a good state of health, for this was regarded as an essential basis for leading the higher life. Four great, perpetual and destructive enemies against which man has to fight in India are the heat of the sun, the damp of the rains, the strength of the winds blowing up dust and dirt, and the persistent ravages of insects. When the Vinaya has been exhaustively studied, I believe it may as often as not be found that the desire and its sanction to acquire various objects in order to preserve others, or to lessen by making exceptions the constraint of some rules, will prove to be attributable to one or other of these forces of nature.

Illness, though not gone into in detail, is however kept in mind by the constant allusion to provisions made for the comfort of ill monks. Such provisions are usually contained in a sikkhāpada, or an anujānāmi, or both. The permission to bathe more often than once a fortnight is a case in point. Again, a monk, if ill, is allowed to eat more than one meal in succession at a public rest-house (Bu-Pc 31), to kindle a fire for warming himself (Bu-Pc 56), and a nun who is ill may receive exhortation from a monk in the nunnery instead of going to the monk’s quarters (Bu-Pc 23).

Of these sixty Pācittiya rules for monks, fifteen are devoted to rules for eating, Bu-Pc 29, Bu-Pc 31–Bu-Pc 43, Bu-Pc 46. None occur in Bu-Pc 61–Bu-Pc 92. Since therefore all the Pācittiya ordinances falling under this head are contained in this volume, it is possible to allude to various points arising from them here; I have already drawn attention to some. Rules concerned with the exhortation of nuns are arranged exclusively in Bu-Pc 21–Bu-Pc 24, but as I have discussed these elsewhere,¹ I shall not do so again now. Rules regarding the army and, to all intents and purposes, robes come only within this volume. Other rules cannot be so profitably discussed until the

¹ Women under Primitive Buddhism, p.126ff.
Pācittiya translation is completed.

In these rules, which cannot always be fully understood unless read in conjunction alike with their introductory stories, the Old Commentary and the anāpatti clauses, much diverse and interesting material comes to light. It would be a long and delicate business to investigate all the ramifications, and to connect these with those other parts of the Vinaya to which they sometimes seem to refer. Merely to take two random examples from Bu-Pc 47. For understanding the definition of “time of giving robes” (= Bu-Pc 32), acquaintance with, for example, Kd 7 is necessary. Again the fact that there is “no offence” if a monk is going to the nuns’ quarters presupposes at least a knowledge of the Pācittiyas concerned with the exhortation of nuns.

The rules on eating are important for monks, for taking nothing but food given in alms involved a three-fold maintenance of a correct attitude: towards the laity, towards members of other sects, and towards fellow monks. The same applies to robes, where also a monk’s behaviour towards a nun has to be taken into account. It might indeed be said that a monk’s attitude towards eating and robes epitomises his whole attitude towards the society of the day.

The Pācittiyas on meals and eating would provide material for an extensive essay. I have already referred to the group-meal and the out-of-turn meal,¹ that is to two ways in which, leaving aside the exceptions, a meal might not be eaten. Here I shall do no more than note down some of the more outstanding words for various kinds of meals, that is for classes of food named. Notes will be found appended to these words where they appear in the text.

1. The five kinds of meals, pañca bhojanāni, given in the Old Commentary on Bu-Pc 35 as rice-gruel, food made with flour, barley, fish, meat, and mentioned in the anāpatti clauses of Bu-Pc 29, Bu-Pc 31–Bu-Pc 33, are used in the Old Commentary on Bu-Pc 35 to define “soft food,” bhojaniya.

2. “Solid food” is defined by exclusion. In Bu-Pc 35 it is everything except the five soft foods and food that may be eaten during a watch of the night, during seven days and during life. These last three categories seem to refer solely to medicines. In Bu-Pc 41 solid food is everything but the five soft foods and water for cleansing the teeth.

¹ Above, BD 2.xxvii.

3. Five other classes of food are given in the anāpatti clauses of Bu-Pc 32, Bu-Pc 33, dependent on how and when given: the regular supply of food, that allowed by ticket, that given on a day of the waxing or waning of the moon, on an observance day, and on the day after this.

4. Comparing the Old Commentary on Bu-Pc 35 and Bu-Pc 42, it appears that yāgu, conjee, ranks neither as a solid food nor as a soft food.

5. In Bu-Pc 39 the five standard medicines, and meat and fish (two of the soft foods) with milk and curds are called “sumptuous foods,” paṇītabhojanāni.

6. Solid food or soft food that is not left over, anatiritta, and solid or soft food that is left over, atiritta, are mentioned in Bu-Pc 35.

There is nothing very special to say about the Pācittiya rules for robes. These receive a large share of legislation in the Nissaggiyas, and are given comparatively scant attention in the Pācittiyas. Their rules constitute two small groups: Bu-Pc 25, Bu-Pc 26, Bu-Pc 58–Bu-Pc 60; again, but not in this volume, Bu-Pc 79 and Bu-Pc 92.

A monk incurs an offence of expiation if he gives a robe to a nun who is not a relation, except in exchange (Bu-Pc 25 and cf. Bu-NP 5). This rule was the outcome of generosity on a monk’s part, not of greed. The first draft had to be revised because nuns were affronted that monks would not even exchange robes with them. Again, an offence is incurred:

1. if a monk sews a robe for a nun who is not a relation (Bu-Pc 26)—the result of Udāyin’s obscene design on a nun’s robe;
2. if he does not use one of the three prescribed modes of disfiguring a new robe, apparently so as to be able to recognise it
(Bu-Pc 58, and whose anāpatti clauses should be read in conjunction with Vin 1.254, Vin 1.255);
3. if he uses a robe after having assigned it to a member of any of the five classes of his co-religionists (Bu-Pc 59), for clearly these must be able to rely on an assignment; and
4. if he hides a robe or a bowl or various other specified requisites belonging to another monk (Bu-Pc 60).

Bu-Pc 81 should be compared with Bu-Pc 59. Bu-Pc 92 declares it an offence for a monk to have a robe made, up to the measure of a Sugata’s robe, or larger. It will be noticed that Bu-Pc 25 and Bu-Pc 59 provide evidence that a monk had power to dispose of a robe in his possession, either by exchange or assignment, a point which wars against the view that the Order was the owner of the robes, even after they had been allotted or assigned to individual monks.

A set of three Pācittiya rules (Bu-Pc 48–Bu-Pc 50) came to be laid down for the conduct to be observed by monks in regard to an army. There is no blinking of facts, no pretence of ignoring the existence of armies as part of the structure of worldly life, either here or in various Sutta passages. Moreover, from the many military similes used to describe a man’s (puggala, as at An iii.91ff.) or a monk’s (as at An i.184, An ii.116, An ii.170, An ii.202) successful mental purification and victorious spiritual battles, it is clear that fighting by kings, chieftains and soldiers, though never frankly condoned as in the Gītā, was yet on the whole not roundly censured. Two Sutta passages should however be specially remarked, the one in the Samyutta,¹ depicting the utter futility of war, for it settles nothing, does not stop the deed from rolling on; the other in the Dhammapada,² violently contrasting the use of force with the exercise of dhamma. Dhamma—conscience, duty, the moral “ought,” the disciplinary rules, the body of teaching, and it has meant all of these—is arrayed against brute force. There is no doubt as to which is found the more fitting and the more admirable.

Even had not the intentional taking of life ranked as a Pārājika offence, there was yet the moral sīla, or principle, binding a monk to refrain from onslaught on creatures, and binding the laity too, but only on the fortnightly uposatha days. Thus, clearly, fighting by monks was condemned, and Buddhist monks could not become soldiers. In this respect they differ widely from the Western monk of the Middle Ages, who saw nothing incongruous in taking up arms.

¹ SN i.85.  ² Dhp 256, Dhp 257.

Further, as these Pācittiyaś show, a monk’s dealings with an army were, though not forbidden outright, reduced to the minimum. For, contrary to the view sometimes put forward that Gotama and his followers were breakers of homes, it is apparent here as elsewhere in the canon that his relations were by no means inaccessible to a man once he had turned monk.

In Bu-Pc 48, a monk is allowed to go and see an army fighting, if there is sufficient reason. This exception is a generalisation from the particular instance of a monk’s wish to visit a sick relation who was in the army. But, having gone to the army, a monk is not to stay there for more than three nights (Bu-Pc 49), nor while there to witness manoeuvres: sham fights, troops in array, the massing of the army, reviews (Bu-Pc 50). This is a group where the later “rule refers to the one immediately preceding it.”¹

In all of these manoeuvres the four “wings” of an army might participate: the elephants each requiring twelve men, the horses each with three men, the chariots each with four men, the infantry with (bows and) arrows.

In the Jātakas there is not infrequent reference to this fourfold composition of an army. But that it should be set down in considerable detail in the Old Commentary may be ascribed to the determination that, given lucid explanations, the monks should be in no doubt as to what was an army or part of one.

In each of these three monastic rules connected with an army, it is recorded that the laity, apparently a little stung by jealousy, complain of the monks’ conduct. They realise that it is because of their own poor acquirement (alābha dulladdhaṁ of good deeds) in the past that, in the present, they are brought into contact with fighting forces. The implication seems to be that for a monk this should not be necessary or inevitable: being a monk he should be beyond the desire to witness fighting, real or sham, both because his karma in this respect should be worn away, and for fear lest he should engender a new bad karma for the future. In general terms it may be said that there is no offence if a monk sees an army or a conflict through no fault of his own, and not having gone of set purpose to see either the one or the other.

¹ Vin.1.xvii.

In their Introduction to Vinaya Texts¹ Rhys Davids and Oldenberg have drawn attention to a curious irregularity in the method of framing some of the Pācittiya rules. In referring to the Pācittiyas and the apparent “effort to arrange the offences in groups (vagga) of ten,” they raise the question of the three cases in which “we find regulations formulated with the utmost brevity (the offences being merely expressed by a locative case dependent upon Pācittiyaṁ) at the commencement of such a vagga.” And they go on to say, “It seems to us, at least in the present state of our knowledge, quite impossible to draw any conclusions from such peculiarities as to the comparative age of any different parts of the Pātimokkha.” Now since all the Pācittiyas referred to fall within this volume, I will attempt to discuss them, but without necessarily, since “the present state of our knowledge” is still defective, trying to arrive at any conclusion.²

They are Bu-Pc 1–Bu-Pc 3, Bu-Pc 11–Bu-Pc 13, Bu-Pc 51–Bu-Pc 54. Any attempt to trace a cause for the peculiar way in which the rule in each of these Pācittiyas is framed must depend to some extent upon the nature of the material found within these same Pācittiyas. Nothing as yet can be suggested as to why they stand at the beginning of their respective vaggas. I would only point out, first, that in the Bhikkhuni-Vibhaṅga there is one Pācittiya, Bu-Pc 4, which is of this same brief type, but it does not head a vagga; and secondly, that the Bhikkhu-Pācittiyas Bu-Pc 72, Bu-Pc 73, although not of the brief type yet conform to it to the extent that, after some introductory material included in the rule and leading up to the formulation of the offence, the offence itself is expressed by a locative case dependent on Pācittiyaṃ. These two rules do not head their division, and its first rule is framed in the normal manner.

¹ Vinaya Texts i.xiv. ² There are also the seven concluding Pācittiyas, Bu-Pc 86–Bu-Pc 92, where the offence of expiation involves, not Nissaggiya, forfeiture, but some other penalty in respect of an article made of the wrong material or to the wrong measure.

Leaving Pācittiya Bu-Pc 72, Bu-Pc 73 and Bhikkhunī-Pācittiya Bi-Pc 4 to one side, I will now summarise such outstanding features as are evinced by the three groups of rules which are “formulated with the utmost brevity,” together with their attendant material.

1. In Bu-Pc 1, Bu-Pc 2, Bu-Pc 3 (repeating Bu-Pc 2), Bu-Pc 11, Bu-Pc 54, not only is the key-word or words (sometimes there are two) of the rule defined, but also the words used in such a definition are themselves defined. The definition of these words I believe not to belong to the original Old Commentary, but to a revised version of it. This is not however a point peculiar to these five Pācittiya; for Bu-Pj 4 and Bu-Pc 10 also define the words used in the definition of the words of the rule. To my mind such supplementary definitions portray a synthesis of thought, based on knowledge, which is far from primitive or tentative. Again, the very material of the rule of Bu-Pc 11, that it is an offence to destroy vegetable growth, may be compared with that of Bu-Pc 10 and Bu-Pc 20, where it is an offence to dig the soil or to sprinkle water containing life. The sole purpose of all these three Pācittiyas is to preserve from harm creatures that are one-facultied. In this respect then Bu-Pc 11 is not unique or peculiar. It may in addition be suitably compared with Bu-Pc 10, as much for the similarity of guiding principle as for the defining of words used in definition.

The words used to define the definitions of the key-word of Bu-Pc 2 and Bu-Pc 3 do not seem wholly contrived for monastic purposes. Why should “crafts,” for example, be classified as “high and low” and then catalogued?

It was impossible for monks to follow any of the crafts mentioned. Such painstaking analysis of all the ten ways in which “insulting speech” and “slander” might be made seems to point to later days when classification and analysis had come to be in vogue.

2. I suppose that in the introductory story of Bu-Pc 2, the group of six monks when they jeered at the well-behaved monks about five out of ten things—birth, name, clan, work, craft—must have had in mind the social position and the occupation held by these while they were still “in the world.” For all such considerations should count as nothing once a man had become a monk. The offence was summarised as one of “insulting speech,” and not as one of probing into matters whose importance to monks should be infinitesimal. Nor can one say of Gotama’s Order that, as time went on, such considerations came to be of account, or that the richer and better-born entrants came to hold the more influential positions. This has never been the case. The influence of the members has always depended on their mental and spiritual attainments alone, or on some gift of character. This backward view, if such it is meant to be, into a monk’s past is unique in the Pācittiyas. But yet I cannot see that it affords any data for the comparative age of this Pācittiya.

3. Bu-Pc 2 has a reference to lekhā. If this is writing, which, partly owing to the paucity of references alike to it and to writing-materials, is assumed to be an art of later discovery, then a clue is at once established for a comparatively late date of this Pācittiya, or at any rate of a portion of it; or to writing being less a “later discovery” than is hitherto assumed.

4. Bu-Pc 1 contains a long and sophisticated analysis of the way in which an offence of expiation is incurred by the three and the seven ways of telling a conscious lie. This may be compared with the beginning of a similar analysis in Bu-Pj 4¹ of the incurrence of an offence involving defeat by the three and the seven ways of telling a conscious lie. The passage in Bu-Pj 4 as it goes on is paralleled by a passage in Bu-Pc 8. In both Bu-Pj 4 on the one hand and Bu-Pc 1 and Bu-Pc 8 on the other, this analysis with its very different style and terminology consorts strangely with the more archaic language and the more direct modes of thought that we usually associate with the Vinaya.

¹ Vin 3.93ff. = BD 1.162ff.

5. Bu-Pc 2 and Bu-Pc 51 contain material belonging to Jātaka stories—but so does Bu-Pc 5.

6. As already noted, there is the failure of the Old Commentary on Bu-Pc 11 to explain one of the two key-words of the rule: “in destruction of,” pātabyatāya.

7. Bu-Pc 12, with its mention in the introductory story of Channa, who, having indulged in bad habits, anācāraṁ ācaritvā, was being examined for an offence in the midst of the Order, to my mind brings the whole question of monastic disciplinary regulation a step later in time. For it points to a period when formal proceedings had been constituted, when faults were examined, not merely expiated by confession, and when there was an apparatus for dealing with, among many other transgressions, questions of failure in habit or conduct, ācāravipatti. These are set out in detail in Kd 14. This Pācittiya, in striking contrast to Bu-Ss 12, where again the same fault is imputed to Channa, seems to have been compiled in full cognisance of these later legal proceedings.

8. Bu-Pc 13 appears to be recording an event later in time than that recorded in Bu-Ss 8. In this latter, Dabba the Mallian is appointed, so it is said, to the double office of assigning lodgings and distributing meals. Between this and the compilation of the Pācittiya some time must have elapsed, since in the Pācittiya he is being accused of acting out of favouritism. The Old Commentary mentions a number of offices tenable by members of the Order, showing that it knew of the creation of these. It does not mention all. So far we know little of the chronology of these offices, but it is unlikely that they were formed during the earliest days of the Sakyan venture.

9. Now, in Bu-Pj 3, the gist of the offence lies in intentionally depriving a person of life. The case is cited, in the stories given after the formulation of the rule, of one monk tickling another, who laughed so much that he died. It is here not said openly that this constitutes an offence, merely that it is not one involving defeat, because his death was not caused intentionally. Either some need to clarify the nature of this offence must have grown up, for in Bu-Pc 52 the same story is recounted and entails an offence of expiation; or the nature of the offence was decided contemporaneously with the Pārājika story, but, being Pācittiya, was reserved for the Pācittiya group of rules and offences. If this is the case here, it is otherwise with Bu-Pj 2. For this now and again states that an offence of deliberate lying may not be such as to constitute an offence of defeat, although it may be one involving expiation (Vin 3.59, Vin 3.66).

10. Bu-Pc 53 seems to offer little data as to its comparative age. It is unusual, however, in that no verbal reports of unsuitable behaviour are recorded to reach the lord. The framing of the rule is made to depend upon Pasenadi’s belief that his “device” will arouse the required suspicions in Gotama’s mind.

11. The rule framed in Bu-Pc 54, that “in disrespect there is an offence of expiation,” is not unique. Three times a similar Pācittiya offence is laid down at Vin 1.176, in connection with the elaborate arrangements made there for holding the Pavaraṇa ceremony. Such Pācittiyas are therefore part and parcel of large-scale administration and regulation, such as could only be undertaken when the Order was comparatively advanced in age and stability. But who can say whether the rule at Bu-Pc 54 is based on these other anādariye pācittiyas, or they on it, or whether they are independent? All one can say is that it is not at all necessary to suppose that the bad habits that again Channa is recorded to have indulged in had anything to do with preparations for the Pavaraṇa.

For a long list of “bad habits,” quite unconnected with this, is given at Bu-Ss 13.

If the evidence of the Pācittiyas which are briefly stated and stand at the head of three only out of the eight divisions of which the Pācittiya section is composed, appears to be on the side of their comparative lateness, it must be not forgotten that the remaining Pācittiyas have never been subjected to any kind of critical examination. When this has been undertaken, it may be found that some of them also, although their rules are framed in the more normal manner, show similar or different signs of comparatively late construction. What I have done here is no more than to indicate possible lines which historical inquiry into the comparative age of different parts of the Vinaya might follow.

In discussing these “brief” Pācittiyas, I have had occasion to mention the overlapping of Pārājika and Pācittiya material. I have cited Bu-Pj 4 and Bu-Pc 8, and these are also seen to work in with one another in a still further fashion. In the former it is an offence involving defeat for a monk, out of undue estimate for himself, to boast that he has attained some state of “further-men,” when this is not a fact, abhūta. In the latter it is an offence of expiation for a monk to speak of attaining such a state to anyone not ordained, even though it be a fact, bhūta. In both cases the introductory story is identical up to this point, although Bu-Pj 4, before the final draft of the rule, adds material not appearing in Bu-Pc 8. This same long story with the two endings may in fact be the record of no more than one event, some monks averring that they had told a lie, others maintaining that they had told the truth. If so, Bu-Pj 4 and Bu-Pc 8 would belong to precisely the same date, suggesting that the two cases were legislated for simultaneously, although the two findings were relegated to different but appropriate parts of the Pātimokkha.

Judging by the great length of Bu-Pj 4, and the number of cases adduced and legislated for, the topic was one that was at some time of immense importance.¹ It is not therefore surprising that it figures also in the Pācittiya section. It suggests, as does the substance of no other rules at all, the spiritual value attached to a man becoming something more and greater than he was before.

There are still further occasions when the contents of this volume refer to different portions of the Vinaya or are referred to by it. Under the latter heading come also certain allusions which are generally wrapped up in the phrase, yathādhammokāretabbo, he should be dealt with according to the rule—that is, according to some Nissaggiya or Pācittiya rule. This indicates that such a rule had been formulated before that portion of the Vinaya referring to it had been compiled. I have drawn attention, in the notes, to any references that I have found in the contents of this volume to or from other parts of the Vinaya.

¹ BD 1.xxivf.

Another Pācittiya which betrays the marks of some later accretion is Bu-Pc 29. In it there is a list of eleven persons who, for a householder, were elders, therā, and whom he invited to a meal. It is an interesting list. It contains the names of nine out of the ten to twelve men whom Mrs. Rhys Davids considers were at the beginning of his ministry “clustering about the Leader in the Vinaya.”¹ Two therefore look like intruders into this early company: Upāli, “the Vinaya expert”²—but expert only on the assumption that by his day the discipline had had time to grow into some coherent form; and Rahula, the founder’s son. He was probably not among his father’s followers from the very beginning of his teaching, and was never a particularly satisfactory monk, although several earnest discourses were addressed to him.³

Members of Other Sects—This volume contains some interesting details about the titthiyas, especially, as is natural, regarding ways in which their life and that of the Sakyan followers might overlap.

1. In Bu-NP 22, people, jumping from the particular to the general, complained that the recluses, sons of the Sakyans, went about for almsfood to be put into their hands, like members of other sects.

2. In Bu-NP 6, monks coming “naked as they were” to Sāvatthī were mistaken by their co-religionists for ājīvaka, Naked As-

---

¹ Sakya, p.127. For further information on these early followers see Gotama the Man, Ch.6, and Sakya, Ch.7.
² Sakya, p.352.
³ MN 61, MN 62, MN 147.
3. In Bu-Pc 1, Hatthaka, a monk, having been outwitted in an argument by members of other sects, titthiyas, resorted to unworthy methods in order to confound them. The titthiyas complained, and not in vain, for the modest monks heard them and asked Hatthaka if there was truth in what they had been saying. He seems to have been very cross, saying that somehow the titthiyas should be worsted. But the modest monks were not impressed by this declaration, and told the incident to the lord. The result was what is now the first Pācittiya rule. This story merely confirms what is well known: that monks and titthiyas debated together, and that, whatever individual monks might do or think, the considered opinion of the saṅgha was that titthiyas should not be treated contemnuously.

4. Bu-Pc 32.8 supplies various items of interest. To begin with there is the ājīvaka who wanted to provide “a meal for all heretics,” sabbapasaṇḍīka-bhatta. This shows that he thought of those who were not of his sect, although they were following a life of religion, as “heretics”; at the same time he wished to honour them by entertaining them. In accordance with this view, or so it seems, the ājīvaka was advised by King Bimbisāra, a relation of his, first of all to invite Gotama and his monks. He sent a messenger to the monks, but they refused the invitation, for at that time a group-meal of this nature had not been allowed. The naked ascetic then approached Gotama, whom he greeted in an amicable and friendly way, and argued that one who is gone forth, pabbajita, is fit or worthy, arahati, to accept the alms of another who is gone forth. Gotama then, as recorded, accepted, and allowed the monks to eat a group-meal at the meal-time of recluses, samaṇa-bhatta-samaya. Here, as not infrequently, the terms of the rule are wider than the terms used in the story leading up to its formulation. Samaṇa was a word of very general application, covering ājīvaka, as well as members of all other diverse and “heretical” sects. In the Old Commentary, samaṇa is defined as paribbājaka-samāpanna, literally one who has attained to being a wanderer. Paribbājaka\(^1\) was, like samaṇa, a word of tremendous range, although it did not, for members of Gotama’s Order themselves, include “monk” or “nun.” For,

---

¹ Literally, “Men of the Livelihood”, Buddhist India, p.143.

5. In Bu-Pc 41 (= Vin 4.285, and cf. Vin 4.224), wanderer and female wanderer are, taking their definitions in conjunction, explained as, “setting aside monk and novice, nun, female probationer and female novice, whoever (else) has attained to being a (male or female) wanderer.” It is only regrettable that the definition contains the word to be defined. In this portion of the Old Commentary too, Naked Ascetic, here and also in the rule, called acelaka,\(^2\) although he figured in the story as an ājīvaka, is defined as “whoever, naked, has attained to being a wanderer.” This definition should be compared with that of samaṇa in Bu-Pc 32.

6. Bu-Pc 41 further tells that a monk gave almsfood, at a distribution of food, to an ājīvaka. All that the ājīvaka seems to have done by way of thanks was to tell his fellow sectarians that the food was obtained by him from a munḍagahapatika belonging to Gotama, the recluse, samaṇa. This curious term, possibly unique to this context, is clearly one of contempt. It means literally “little shaven householder” and would seem to imply that the ājivakas despised the monks for their less austere way of living, and were not above having a sly dig at their more indulgent tendencies.

---

\(^1\) The account of paribbājakā at Buddhist India, p.141, has not been superseded. \(^2\) He who is without a cloth, cela. Jacobi, Jaina Sūtras, ii.xxx–xxxii, says that “the Buddhists denote by Acelaka the followers of Makkhali Gosāla and his two predecessors, Kisa Samkicca and Nanda Vaccha, and have preserved an account of their religious practices in the MN 36.” Jacobi draws attention to the identity of the rules for the acelakas and the Jains. Gosāla’s views are set forth at DN i.53. Dialogues of the Buddha i.71, n. 1, calls his followers ājīvaka. B.M. Barua, The Ajīvakas, Pt.1, p.13, summarises the position thus: “Both the Jaina and Buddhist records agree in speaking of Gosāla as a leader of the Ājivaka sect... They also agree in calling the Ājivakas naked ascetics (acelakas).”
People who heard what the ājīvaka had said are recorded to advise the lord not to let monks, whom they call ayya, masters, give with their own hands to titthiyas, since these want to bring discredit on the Buddha, the dhamma and the Order.

Three points emerge from this episode with the lay-people. First, that ājīvakas did not live, any more than did monks, either in seclusion from the “world” or from members of other sects, including Gotama’s. Secondly, that the lay-people appear to have come to the conclusion that their representations to the lord must include more than the one sect of the ājīvakas, and they therefore say titthiyas, a term of broader application. Thirdly, that the odd intrusion of the later “triad of Buddhism” may suggest that this passage belongs to a comparatively late date, but that then, with the increasing popularity of Gotama’s Order, relations between Sakyan monks and followers of other sects were becoming somewhat strained.

This Pācittiya, rich in its references to members of other sects, contains yet one more. Gotama is reputed to tell Ānanda to give what surplus there is of the Order’s solid food to “those who eat scraps,” broken meats, or remains of food, vighāsāda. Ānanda, always showing a touching regard for women, chose as the recipients some female wanderers, paribbājikā. Here then is contributory evidence that wanderers were eaters of scraps, of food not otherwise wanted, and that they did not object to receiving this from Gotama’s religious followers.

7. In Bu-NP 20 a wanderer, paribbājaka, is recorded to barter his costly cloth for Upananda’s outer cloak, but when he wanted to exchange the articles again Upananda refused. The wanderer complained, basing his argument on the life of the world: because householders give out of compassion to another householder, should not one who has gone forth, pabbajita, give to one who has gone forth? The resemblance to the ājīvaka’s reasoning in Bu-Pc 32.8 cited above is quite remarkable. Upananda is rebuked both by other monks and by Gotama for bartering with a wanderer. The wanderer’s park or monastery, ārāma, is mentioned.¹
THE BOOK OF THE DISCIPLINE

Sakyaputta—In this volume there are two monks who have appended to their name the epithet Sakyaputta. These are Upananda Sakyaputta, to whom there are frequent references—e.g., Bu-NP 6, Bu-NP 8–Bu-NP 10, Bu-NP 18, Bu-NP 20, Bu-NP 25, Bu-NP 27, Bu-Pc 9, Bu-Pc 42–Bu-Pc 46, Bu-Pc 59, and Hatthaka Sakyaputta, Bu-Pc 1. This epithet, which I have translated as “son of the Sakyans,” was presumably given to distinguish these men from others bearing the same name. Neither Upananda nor Hatthaka was an ornament to the Order, and thus the epithet will not have been conferred in recognition of any special ability on his part. It indicated primarily that they were Sakyans, born into the Sakyan clan or tribe, gotta. But it did more than this. It implied, not only that the men so described were of Sakyan descent and themselves Sakyans, but that they were also members of the religious sect known by its contemporaries as the Sakyaputta sect, its adherents being called sakyaputtiyas.

For Sakyans who were not monks are called, when there was need to differentiate them from others of the same name, not Sakyaputta, but Sakka. A good example is Mahānāma Sakka (Bu-Pc 47 and, e.g., AN i.26, AN i.276), a brother of Anuruddha and cousin of Gotama. There does not seem to have been any other notable Anuruddha contemporary with this brother of Mahānāma’s, and so there was no occasion to append Sakka to his name. There were however other Mahānāmas,² hence the suffix Sakka for the one of Sakyan descent.

I hold it essential to translate the putta in Sakyaputta. Yet in saying that a Sakyan who had become a follower of Gotama’s was called Sakyaputta if his own name was not sufficiently distinctive, I do not in the least wish to suggest anything mystical or comparable to the Hindu “twice born.” No more is meant than the recording of the case of a Sakyan who had become a follower of the Sakyaputta sect, or, after the Order had been fully constituted, a monk in Gotama’s Order. In this way, the force of putta in Sakyaputta is double-edged.

¹ See Buddhist India, p.142. ² See Dictionary of Pali Proper Names
It indicates at one and the same time a man’s birth as Sakyan and his calling as religious. Moreover, the fact is emphasised that the sectarian or monastic body which he has entered is one founded by his kinsman, a member of his own clan, Gotama Sakyaputta, as he is called by members of other sects,¹ and by Assaji, recently become a follower.²

In its beginnings, the sect founded by Gotama, and which afterwards turned into an “Order,”³ was largely entered and maintained by his relations. I therefore think it advisable, in order to keep before the mind the Sakyan and not merely Gotamic influences on the origin of the monastic institution, to translate the Sakya part of the compound Sakyaputta as “of the Sakyans,” using the plural. The same will apply to Sakyaputtīyā, “sons of the Sakyans,” a name frequently given to Gotama’s followers, whether they were of the Sakyan clan or not. By their calling, and not on account of their birth, these had become “sons” of the Sakyan leader, Sakyamuni,⁴ and of his Sakyan co-workers and co-founders.⁵ There is a commentarial support for taking the Sakya of the compound as a plural. For Vin-a 735 defines Sakyaputta as sakyānaṁ putto, “son of the Sakyans,” sakyānaṁ being a genitive plural.

It is perhaps not always necessary, although I hold it to be correct, to insert “son,” putta, in translations of various compounds, such as devaputta (e.g., AN i.278, Hatthaka devaputta) and Mallaputta (e.g., Dabba Mallaputta, Vin 3.158, Vin 4.37), it being sufficient to read merely a, or the, deva, and a, or the, Mallian.

But when a person can only be distinguished from others bearing the same name by calling him “so and so, the son of so and so,” as Up-

¹ E.g., Vin 3.1. ² Vin 1.41. Assaji is recorded to refer to Gotama as mahāsamaṇa Sakyaputto Sakyakulā pabbajito, the great recluse, the son of the Sakyans, gone forth from a Sakyan family. ³ See S. DUTT, Early Buddhist Monachism, Ch.3. ⁴ E.J. THOMAS, Life of Buddha, p. 1, n. 1, “Śākyamuni, ‘the sage of the Śakyas’”; A History of Buddhist Thought, p. 150, “Śākyamuni, ‘the recluse of the Śakyas’”; S. RADHAKRISHNAN, Indian Philosophy, i.351, “Śākyamuni, the sage of the Śakyas.” ⁵ MRS. RHYS DAVIDS, Gotama the Man, p. 89ff.; Sakya, p. 115ff.; and cf. Unknown Co-founders of Buddhism, Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society, 1927, p.193ff.
asena Vaṅgantaputta,¹ then the putta part of the name must be translated. For he was not Upasena Vanganta, but Upasena, Vanganta’s son. The great exception to this is Sāriputta, where, for English translators and readers, putta seems to have become an integral part of his name, since it is never translated as “the son of (Rūpa-)Sāri.”

As putta sometimes forms part of a name, so also does mātā, pitā, dhītā, mother, father, daughter. For example, there are Sigalamātā, Nakulamātā, Visākhā Migāramātā, Nakulapita, Suppavasa Koliyadhītā. Now Nakulamātā and Nakulapita have, in the Pali canon, no other names. They must therefore be translated as “Nakula’s mother” and “Nakula’s father.” I think it as necessary to translate putta where it means a “son” in a life of religion, as it is to translate mātā, pitā, dhītā and again putta where no such reference is intended.

There are further the terms ayya and ayyaputta; these cannot mean exactly the same thing. The former is “master” and the latter “little master,” something like our “son of the house,” the young gentleman. Again there is setṭhi and setṭhiputta. The former is variously translated as banker, merchant, great merchant, treasurer. A difference in standing is, I hold, intended by setṭhiputta (see Bu-NP 6), and should be shown in translations. A setṭhiputta is a young merchant, literally a son of a merchant, but he is not yet the head of the firm, for his description as putta means that his father is still alive. It would not be actually wrong to translate setṭhiputta as “merchant,” since he is one by occupation, but the full significance implicit in putta can only be brought out by regarding the word as pithy, not as pleonastic. In the same way I think that the intended implication of putta, when the poor workman addresses Kirapatika, in Bu-Pc 33, as ayyaputta, is that this employer, although paying the wages, was not the head of his business because his father was still living.

Dhammī kathā and dhamma—I have translated dhammī kathā often as “reasoned talk,” sometimes as “talk on dhamma.” In so doing, I have been guided mainly by the context. I hold that in the phrase, “then the lord on this occasion, in this connection, having given dhammī kathā, addressed the monks, saying, “the lord is not supposed to have given them talk on dhamma, on material now found chiefly in the Suttas. I think it more probable that he was engaged in explaining to the monks such circumstances as had arisen since the first framing of a rule, and telling them why he thought its alteration justifiable. He would thus have been reasoning out the situation with them, marshalling the arguments bearing on the case.

¹ See below, BD 2.83.

Similarly, Gotama is sometimes shown, for example in Bu-NP 3 and Bu-Pc 58, as questioning monks or hearing reports about their conduct. Then, it is said, “having given dhammī kathā,” he framed a rule so that, given certain circumstances, they need not behave in that particular way again. In this connection Bu-Pc 58 is interesting, for it asserts that the dhammī kathā given was “on what is befitting, on what is suitable.” These words, (an-)anulomika and (an-)anucchavika, do not properly belong to Sutta but to Vinaya material. When they occur in the Suttas,¹ it seems uniformly the case that they are used in connection with the discipline of monks or other samaṇas.

On the other hand, when it is said, for example in Bu-Pc 6, that Anuruddha roused and delighted the woman dhammīyā kathāya, it would be a mistake to think that he was explaining to her the need for making or altering a rule. The context in no way suggests this; it suggests that he had given her an inspiring talk in virtue of which she became a lay-adherent.

Again, to take from among many other instances of it, the phrase as it stands in Bu-Pc 21. From the context it may be inferred that Gotama gave the nuns some lofty discourse to recompense their disappointment for “the merely inferior talk on dhamma,” parittaṃ ūpam dhammīm kathāṃ katvā, given them by the group of six monks in place of the exhortation.²

Lest it be thought that in the Nissaggiyas and these Pācittiyas the phrase dhammī kathā supplants dhamma, it will be wise to draw attention to some of the passages where this great word occurs. In Bu-

¹ E.g., AN i.106, AN ii.27, AN iii.116; MN i.477; It 103; Snp 385. ² Cf. MN iii.270, where Mahāpajāpatī is shown asking Gotama for exhortation, for instruction, for dhammikathā, “talk on dhamma,” for the nuns.
Pc 4, the group of six monks are found making lay-followers speak dhamma line by line. This was made an offence. The Old Commentary on this Pācittiya, as well as that on Bu-Pc 7, by its choice of words for defining dhamma, makes it clear that dhamma as the teaching, as discourses, as great sayings, as connected with the goal, attha, was being considered; and neither dhamma as dhammi kathā, reasoned talk germane to the matter in hand, nor dhamma as pāḷi, the text, as it is explained in Buddhaghosa’s commentary.¹ Bu-Pc 7 traces the evolution of the circumstances in which it became permissible for a monk to teach dhamma, dhammaṁdeseti, to women. Bu-Pc 5 confines itself to mentioning that lay-followers listened to dhamma spoken by, bhāsita, monks who were elders. This would be in accordance with part of the definition given by the Old Commentary on Bu-Pc 4 and Bu-Pc 7, that dhamma is what is spoken by disciples.

Dhamma, for the reason stated in the Introduction to BD.1, I have left untranslated.²

Ārāma; vihāra—I have usually translated ārāma, not as “park,” but as “monastery”; and vihāra as “dwelling-place.”³ The Vinaya depicts monastic life at a fairly advanced stage, and it is reasonable to assume that the many words connected with the monks’ lodgings had attained definite meanings reflecting the habits and customs induced by their way of living.

Ārāmas were doubtless originally places for enjoyment, parks. Many were handed over by rich benefactors to the Order as it grew and its increasing numbers called for larger and more fixed settlements. Ārāmas thus became monasteries, places made use of by monks, and intended solely for this purpose.

Vihāras too, as the monks increased in number, changed their character. The word had at some time stood for something much like an isolated pariveṇa, or cell, but it came to imply a row of cells, or individual dwelling-places, connected by a verandah, pamukha.⁴

It is curious and disappointing that the definition of vihāra in

¹ For Buddhaghosa’s interpretations of the words used in defining dhamma, see Vin-a 742, and below, BD 2.191. ² BD 1.lvi. ³ For notes on these terms, see below, BD 2.2, BD 2.46. ⁴ Cf. Bu-Pc 17.2.1.
Bu-Pc 19 and at Vin 3.156 is so unenlightening. Neither is the word explained where other comparable terms are briefly defined in Bu-Pj 2.¹

H. Kern² has to my mind given an acceptable, though short, account of ārāma, vihāra, pariveṇa and kuṭi (hut); and S. Dutt has a learned and illuminating chapter³ on the development, interrelation and use of these quarters for monks, together with the function and character of such other words denoting habitations for monks as simā, boundary, limit; āvāsa, residence, settlement, colony; and senāsana, lodgings, bedding, “seats.” S. Dutt shows, in this chapter, that as “the communal life of the bhikkhus came to gravitate more and more towards a coenobium,” largely “brought about by the institutions of Vassa,” the rains-retreat, so there developed the means and the rules for communal, as against eremitical, dwelling.

Ekamantaṁ—The literal meaning of this is “at one side.” The word constantly occurs in the phrases, “he, or she, stood, or sat down at one side.” This implies respect accorded to a superior. In order to bring out this aspect of ekamantaṁ, of the respectful attitude adopted by laity towards monks, by monks to senior monks or to wiser monks, I have translated the word as “at a respectful distance.” In so doing, I am following the Commentaries. These enumerate six wrong ways of sitting, nisajjadosa,⁴ such as would bring discomfort and inconvenience to a person worthy of consideration and honour. The only reason why I prefer my translation to the more literal one is that it better emphasises a particular point in the manners of the day; and also when we hear of lay-people sitting down or standing by monks “at a respectful distance,” one more piece of evidence, however small, testifying to the esteem in which monks were held by the laity, is forced to contribute its weight.

Abbhantara—This is a linear measure, mentioned below on BD 2.20, BD 2.22, and which I have left untranslated for fear lest an English rendering should give a false impression.⁵

¹ See BD 1.83. ² A Manual of Indian Buddhism, p. 80ff. ³ Early Buddhist Monachism, Ch.5. ⁴ See below, BD 2.42, n. 5. ⁵ See BD 1.łviii.
Buddhaghosa’s Commentary\(^1\) remarks that “here one abhantara is twenty-eight hands (hattha)”; the Critical Pali Dictionary says no more than that it is “a certain measure of length.” The Vibhaṅga Commentary does not include abhantara among its graded linear measurements at all.\(^2\) In Moggallāna’s scheme of measures of length,\(^3\) although given at the very end of the scheme and looking like an afterthought, we find that twenty-eight ratanas equal one abhantara. Rhys Davids,\(^4\) following this scheme, describes ratana as “(cubit, forearm) = hattha = kukku,” and says that hattha “is the usual word.”\(^5\)

The Samyutta Commentary explains kukku by hattha.\(^6\) As it is very likely that these measurements varied with time and locality, in trying to establish the length of a Vinaya abhantara it will be best to consider the hattha, twenty-eight of which were held to compose an abhantara, according to Vinaya interpretations.

We find hattha defined in the Old Commentary\(^7\) as “from the elbow as far as the tip of the nail,” which means that hattha, taken as a measure of length, would comprise the hand together with the forearm.\(^8\) Even so, there is yet some vagueness, for the tips of the nails are not all the same distance from the elbow. We are thus left with not an exact measurement. Rhys Davids however suggested that “to the end of the little finger only is meant,”\(^9\) apparently on the grounds that because the span, vidatthi, is the basis of computation for the ratana, two vidatthi making one ratana, and because vidatthi is “the name for the ordinary span to the end of the fourth or little finger” from the end of the thumb, therefore the hattha, which is equivalent to the ratana measure, would be from the elbow as far as the nail of the little finger. This provides a straight line for measurement, and the distance is about fifteen inches. One abhantara, if taken as equal to twenty-eight hatthas, would therefore correspond to roughly thirty-five feet. The “staff” in Bu-Sk 58 (Vin 4.200), that had to measure “four hands,” would be about five feet in length.

---

\(^1\) Vin-a 654.
\(^2\) Vb-a 343.
\(^3\) Abhidhānappadīpikā 194–197.
\(^4\) Ancient Coins and Measures of Ceylon, p.15.
\(^5\) Ancient Coins and Measures of Ceylon, p.15, n.2.
\(^6\) SN-a iii.300.
\(^7\) Vin 3.121, Vin 4.221.
\(^8\) Cf. Vin-a 533.
\(^9\) Ancient Coins and Measures of Ceylon, p.15, p.17.
In conclusion, I very gratefully acknowledge my debt to Mrs. Rhys Davids for her unflagging interest in the preparation of this volume, and for kindly reading the proofs. Two revered theras of Colombo, the Venerable Rambukwella Siddhartha and the Venerable S.P. Vajirañāṇa, have given me much valuable assistance with monastic practice and Vinaya terminology.

To these in particular, and also to other friends and acquaintances in Ceylon, too numerous to mention, I would tender my warm thanks in recognition of conversations that were as instructive as they were stimulating. I am also indebted to the editor for his kind permission to reprint in this Introduction, part of an article published in 1939 in the Vesak Number of the Ceylon Daily News.

I. B. Horner
Manchester, 1940.
At one time the enlightened one, the lord, was staying at Vesālī in the Gotamaka shrine.¹ At that time three robes were allowed to monks by the lord.² The group³ of six monks, thinking: “Three robes are ¹ Gotamaka-cetiya, one of the cetiyas or shrines of Vesālī, to the south (DN iii.9). Mentioned, with the other shrines of Vesālī, as being pleasant (DN ii.102–DN ii.103, DN ii.118; AN iv.309, SN v.159; Ud 62). AN-a 2.373 ascribes the Gotamaka-cetiya to a yakkha named Gotamaka. For further references to these shrines see Ud-a 322–323; Dialogues of the Buddha 1.220ff.; KS v.230, KS v.231; Mrs. Rhys Davids, Gotama the Man, 193; E.J. Thomas, Life of Buddha as Legend and History, 137; B.C. Law, Geography of Early Buddhism, p. 46, and Appendix; and Dictionary of Pali Proper Names. ² The three robes, ticīvara, consisted of the inner robe or cloth, antaravāsaka, the upper robe or cloth, uttarāsaṅga, the outer cloak, saṅghāṭi. Permission to wear a double, diguna, outer cloak, a single, ekacciya, upper robe, and a single inner robe is given at Vin 1.289, also at the Gotamaka shrine. At Vinaya Texts ii.212, n. 2, the three robes are described in detail, although there the saṅghāṭi is wrongly called the “waist cloth”.

The antaravāsaka is put on at the waist, and hangs down to just above the ankles, being tied with the kāyabandhana, a strip of cloth made into a belt or girdle (allowed at Vin 2.136). The method of putting on the antaravāsaka is different from that adopted by laymen, Vin 2.137. Monks take the two ends together, fold them across together in front and then fold them back again; then the garment is held in position by the belt. The uttarāsaṅga is the upper robe worn when a monk is in a residence. It covers him from neck to ankle, leaving one shoulder bare; it should not be worn in the same way as laymen wear their upper cloth, Vin 2.137. The saṅghāṭi is put on over this when the monk goes out. It may be exactly the same size as the uttarāsaṅga, but it consists of double cloth, since to make it two robes are woven together. It is a good protection against cold, and monks may wrap themselves in it to sleep. All these three robes are made in the patchwork fashion. Only the bathing-cloth is plain. allowed by the lord,” entered a village in one set of robes, remained in the monastery¹ in another set of three robes, went down to bathe in another set of three robes. Those who were modest monks looked down upon,² criticised,³ spread it about,⁴ saying: “How can the group of six monks wear an extra robe?”⁵ Then these monks told this matter to the lord.

“Is it true, as is said, monks, that you wear an extra robe?”

“It is true, lord,” they said.

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

“How can you, foolish men, wear an extra robe? It is not, foolish men, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased⁶ ... And thus, monks, this rule of training⁷ should be set forth:

Whatever monk should wear an extra robe, there is an offence⁸

---

¹ ārāma, a park, a place where one enjoys oneself, ā+ramati. Cf. definition of ārāma at Vin 3.49 as pup-phārāma phalārāma, flower-park, fruit-park (orchard). In Pali, however, the word has come to be used largely in connection with a residence for monks, hence a monastery. ² ujjhāyanti Explained at Vin-a 296 as avajjhāyanti avajānantā tam jhāyanti olokeni, lāmakato vā cintenti ti attho, they censured, despising, they were angry, (and) looked down upon him, or the meaning is they thought (of him) as inferior. Cf. Vin-a 770 (ujjhāpeti) and sn-a i.349. Ujjhāyati therefore seems to mean to think poorly of, to look down upon, to belittle someone, rather than to be irritated, angry, or to grumble. Cf. Bu-Pc 13, Vin 4.38. ³ khīyanti. Explained at Vin-a 296 as tassa avaṇṇaṁ, kathenti pakāsenti, they speak blame (dispraise) of him, they show him up. Cf. sn-a i.349. Hence to speak badly of someone, to criticise. Cf. Bu-Pc 13, Vin 4.38, Bu-Pc 79, Vin 4.152, Bu-Pc 81, Vin 4.154. ⁴ vipācenti. Explained at Vin-a 296 as vitthārikaṁ karontisabbatthapattharanti, they make wide-spread, they spread everywhere. Hence to speak disparagingly, to spread ill-fame. Cf. sn-a i.349. These three words occur frequently in Vinaya, but only once I think otherwise in the Canon, at sn 1.i.232. ⁵ atirekačīvara. ⁶ appasannānaṁ pasādāya. Pasāda, prasāda (Sanskrit) is “pleasing.” Cf. buddhe pasannā of sn i.34, pleased with the Buddha, and therefore become his followers, i.e. converted. Thus “pleasing” has the sense of “converting.” ⁷ sikkhāpada. Pada is a sentence, rule, regulation, ordinance, which indicates a training. Here pada is rule; sikkhā is training, Hence a rule of, or for, training. ⁸ Although no word for “offence” occurs in these rules, the terms themselves—e.g. pācittiya, dukkāta—imply “offence.”
of expiation¹ involving forfeiture.”²

Thus this rule of training for monks came to be laid down³ by the lord.

At that time⁴ an extra robe accrued to⁵ the venerable Ānanda; and the venerable Ānanda was desirous of giving that robe to the venerable Sāriputta, but the venerable Sāriputta was staying at Sāketa. Then it occurred to the venerable Ānanda: “A rule of training laid down by the lord is that an extra robe should not be worn. And this extra robe has accrued to me, and I am desirous of giving this robe to the venerable Sāriputta, but the venerable Sāriputta is staying at

¹ pācittiya. E.J. Thomas, History of Buddhist Thought, p.18, n. 3, says that “this translation depends on the derivation of pācittiya from Sanskrit prāyaścittika, but this is not the term used in the Sanskrit versions of the Pātimokkha, which have pātayantika and pāyantika.” Vinaya Texts i.32 and Geiger, Pali Literatur und Sprache § 27, incline to etymology prāyaścittika. Geiger points out that Sylvain Lévi derives it from prāk-citta, which +ika is the derivation to which the Pali-English Dictionary inclines. Pācittiya as prāyaścittika means literally “in repentance, in compensation, in expiation.” Expiation is not, however, enjoined in these rules, but confession. Thus in reality pācittiya means a (minor) offence to be confessed. But since the term pācittiya has etymologically nothing to do with confession, I have kept to the more literal rendering, of “expiation.” B.C. Law, History of Pali Literature, i.46ff., speaks of Pācittiya offences as those “for which some expiation was laid down … requiring repentance … requiring confession and absolution.”

At Vin 1.254 five things are allowed to the monks after the ceremonial making of the kaṭhina cloth, one being to have as many robes as are wanted. This appears to be a relaxation of the above rule. ² nissaggiya. The thing to be forfeited or given up was that in respect of which the offence had been committed.

The name of this class of offence, Nissaggiya Pācittiya, means that, besides confessing the offence, there is an object wrongfully acquired which has to be forfeited. In the next class of offence, Pācittiya, there is no such object which needs to be forfeited. To mark the distinction between these two classes of offence (Nissaggiya Pācittiya, and Pācittiya), as also their connection, in translating nissaggiya pācittiya I have put nissaggiya, “involving forfeiture,” in the secondary position, although in the Pali it stands before pācittiya.³ paññatta. The primary sense, “made known,” is now lost. The word is now used in its secondary sense of established, given, passed, laid down.⁴ = Vin 1.289. Also cf. below, Bu-NP 21, where the same story is told in the same words about an extra bowl.⁵ uppannarhi hoti, literally there came to be arisen to, produced for, or born to. Cf. below, BD 2.24, BD 2.90, BD 2.99, BD 2.114.
Sāketa. Now what line of conduct should be followed by me?” Then the venerable Ānanda told this matter to the lord. He said:

“But, Ānanda, how long before Sāriputta will come (here)?”

“Lord, on the ninth or tenth day,” he said.

Then the lord on this occasion, in this connection, having given reasoned talk,¹ addressed the monks, saying:

“Monks, I allow you to wear an extra robe for at most ten days. And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“When the robe-material is settled,² when a monk’s³ kaṭhina⁴ (privileges)⁵ have been removed,⁶ an extra robe may be worn for at most ten days. For him who exceeds that (period), there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture.”

¹ dhammī kathā. In this and similar contexts this does not mean talk on dhamma, on the doctrine as expounded in the Suttas, so much as any good, reasonable talk relevant to the matter in hand. Thus here the lord, it may be supposed, would have reasoned with the monks and have explained to them the causes and conditions leading him to modify the rule as originally laid down. Cf. Vin-a 637. ² niṭṭhita, established, closed, settled, finished, ready to wear, or “done for.” For this last see Vinaya Texts i.19 in note. That niṭṭhita has the two meanings of “made” and “done for” is borne out by the Old Commentary. Huber, J.Bu-As, 1913, Nov–Dec, p.490, has “si un bhikṣu a les trois robes au complet,” and doubtless the meaning here is that the robes have been distributed and each monk has his set of three robes made up and ready to wear. ³ bhikkhunā, instrumental used for genitive. ⁴ The kaṭhina cloth is the cotton cloth supplied annually, after the rains, by the laity to the monks for making robes. Kaṭhina refers to a specially ceremonial cloth, for it is made with special ceremony at the end of the rains. The kaṭhina cloth should be brought at dawn, offered to the Order, cut by the monks, sewn and dyed. All this must be done on the same day. Then it is taken to a simā, boundary, and with formulae is offered by the Order to one monk. Ways in which kaṭhina comes to be made, attathata, and not made, anatthata, are given at Vin1.254f. The kaṭhina cloth brings certain privileges, which, however, last only four months. It loses its quality automatically at the end of the season, as well as in other ways. A monk can wear kaṭhina cloth for any length of days as long as the kaṭhina quality is there. If it is not kaṭhina cloth, he can wear an extra robe for only ten days. On attathata cf. also below, BD 2.26, n. 3. ⁵ Five things were allowable to monks when the kaṭhina cloth had been (formally) made, attathata, Vin1.254. ⁶ (This footnote proved troublesome to typeset due to its length, so it has been moved to an appendix with other long notes on page 2976.)
When the robe-material is settled means: the robe-material is made up¹ for a monk, or lost² or destroyed³ or burnt, or an expectation of robe-material is disappointed.⁴

When the kaṭhina (privileges) have been removed means: they come to be removed because of a certain one of eight grounds,⁵ or they come to be removed before the time by the Order.

For at most ten days means: it may be worn for ten days at the maximum.

An extra robe means: one that is not allotted,⁶ not assigned.⁷

Robe-material means: any one robe-material of the six (kinds

¹ kata; cf. katacīvara at Vin.1.256, a robe that is made up, finished, ready to wear, opposed to cīvara, robe-material, probably meaning not ready to wear, and vip-pakatacīvara, a robe or robe-material that is imperfectly executed, thus not ready to wear. Vin-a 638 says that kata means that it is finished by means of a needle.
² Vin-a 638, “carried off by thieves.” On removal of kaṭhina privileges owing to loss of the robe-material, see Vin.1.255ff.
³ Vin-a 638, “destroyed by white ants.”
⁴ cīvarāsā upacchinnā. On a monk going away with the expectation of a robe and the removal of his kaṭhina privileges on various grounds, see Vin.1.259ff. Vin-a 638 says that “longing for a robe arises and is cut off. These are impediments to getting robes settled.” The last four cases mean that a monk’s responsibility for a robe is gone.
⁵ Given at Vin.1.255, also at Vin-a 638. See above, BD 2.5, n. 3, and Vinaya Texts ii.157 for a discussion of the validity of these grounds or reasons, mātikā, for removal. They are as follows: the ground depending on (the monk) having gone away, on (his robe being) settled, on his having resolved (not to have it finished), on (his robe) being lost, on his having heard (that the privileges are removed in a certain residence), on the lapse of an expectation (that a special gift of a robe would be made to him), on his having gone beyond the boundary (of the community to which the kaṭhina cloth was given), on the general removal (of the kaṭhina privileges of the whole Order). Removal means that the quality of kaṭhina will disappear (see above, BD 2.5, n. 1). ⁶ anadhiṭṭhita. This means a robe used by a certain monk himself, rather than one not yet designated for a particular monk, and thus still at the disposal of the Order, not disposed of, not allotted. See Vin-a 642ff. Cf. niṭṭhita in connection with robes, translated above as “settled.” Also see note on adhiṭṭhāna, BD 1.128. Critical Pali Dictionary gives adhiṭṭhita as “determined” for a similar Vinaya passage. ⁷ avikappita, possibly meaning kept and given to another monk. At Vin.1.289 monks are allowed to assign an extra robe; then presumably it ceases to be “extra.” On the allowance to allot, not to assign (adhiṭṭhātum na vikappetuṁ) various articles, see Vin.1.296f.
of) robe-materials\(^1\) (including) the least one fit for assignment.\(^2\)

For him who exceeds that period there is an offence involving forfeiture means: it is to be forfeited on the eleventh day at sunrise; it should be forfeited to the Order,\(^3\) or to a group\(^4\) or to an individual. And thus, monks, it should be forfeited: That monk, approaching the Order, arranging his upper robe over one shoulder, honouring the feet of the senior monks, sitting down on his haunches, saluting with joined palms, should speak\(^5\) thus: ‘Honoured sirs, this robe is to be forfeited by me, the ten days having elapsed. I forfeit it to the Order.’ Having forfeited it, the offence should be confessed.\(^6\) The offence should be acknowledged by an experienced, competent monk; the robe forfeited\(^7\) should be given back\(^8\) (with the words): ‘Honoured sirs, let the Order listen to me. This robe of the monk so

---

\(^1\) At Vin 1.281 six kinds of robes were permitted to the monks: made of linen, cotton, silk, wool, coarse hemp, canvas. At Vin 1.58, Vin 1.96 these six are called benefits extra to rag-robes. Cf. below, BD 2.40, BD 2.48, and Vin 4.60.

\(^2\) vikappanupagapacchima. Pali-English Dictionary explains vikappanupaga as “according to option,” under upaga. But vikappana is a technical term meaning the assignment of robes. The meaning of pacchima, according to the Commentary, is “the least”—i.e., the smallest in measurement according to the assignment or apportioning of the robes. For Vin-a 639 says, “having pointed out the kinds of robes, i.e., the six kinds, as in note above), now, in order to point out the measure, he says vikap° pacchimaṁ. Its measure is two spans in length, one span in width. Thus the text says, ‘Monks, the least robe that I allow you to assign is one that is eight finger-breadths in length and four finger-breadths wide according to the finger-breadth of the accepted standard’” (sugataṅgula, cf. Vin 4.168). The ‘text’ quoted by Buddhaghosa is Vin 1.297. Cf. below, BD 2.40, BD 2.48, BD 2.140.

\(^3\) saṅgha, five or more monks; see Vin 1.319.

\(^4\) gaṇa; two to four monks.

\(^5\) passive construction, literally “the Order should be spoken to.” āpatti desetabbā. Vin-a 640, having greeted the Order (as above) the monk says, ‘I, reverence sirs, having fallen into such and such an offence, that I confess.’ If there is one robe it constitutes one offence of expiation involving forfeiture; if there are two (robes) there are two (such offences); if there are many (robes) there is a multiplicity (of such offences). He should forfeit his robe or robes saying, ‘Here is a robe (are robes) to be forfeited for transgressing the ten days. I forfeit it (them) to the Order.’ The same procedure is required if forfeiting them to a group or to one monk. The offending monk then says that he sees his offence, and is exhorted to restrain himself in the future. nissaṭṭha-cīvara, nissaṭṭha being past participle of nissajjati.

\(^6\) dātabbaṁ.
and so, which had to be forfeited, is forfeited (by him) to the Order. If it seems right\textsuperscript{1} to the Order, the Order should give back this robe to the monk so and so.’

That monk, approaching two or three\textsuperscript{2} monks, arranging his upper robe over one shoulder ... joined palms, should speak thus: ‘Honoured sirs, this robe is to be forfeited by me, the ten days having elapsed. I forfeit it to the venerable ones.’ Having forfeited it, the offence should be confessed. The offence should be acknowledged by an experienced, competent monk; the robe forfeited should be given back (with the words): ‘Let the venerable ones listen to me. This robe of the monk so and so, which had to be forfeited, is forfeited (by him) to the venerable ones. If it seems right to the venerable ones, let the venerable ones give back this robe to the monk so and so.’

That monk, approaching one monk, arranging his upper robe over one shoulder, sitting down on his haunches, saluting with joined palms, should speak thus to him: ‘Your reverence,\textsuperscript{3} this robe is to be forfeited by me, the ten days having elapsed. I forfeit it to the venerable one.’ Having forfeited it, the offence should be confessed. The offence should be acknowledged by this monk; the robe forfeited should be given back (with the words): ‘I will give back this robe to the venerable one.’

\textsuperscript{1} pāṭakalla = pāṭakāla, having attained the (right) time.\textsuperscript{2} sambhulā bhikkhū in Vinaya almost always means a gaṇa—i.e., two to four monks. In the Suttapiṭaka the expression means “many monks.” Yet at Vin\textsuperscript{2.15} sambhulā therā bhikkhū apparently include eleven theras, and at Vin\textsuperscript{1.300} sambhulā therā include five elders; thus in these two passages sambhulā should be translated by “several, a number of.”\textsuperscript{3} āvuso; in preceding cases bhante.\textsuperscript{4} i.e. a monk.\textsuperscript{5} saññī, or “is aware.” It has been suggested to me that the first two cases (excluding that of “is in doubt”) are more definite in meaning than the later ones, and that therefore these first two might be translated by “is aware” and “is not aware,” and the others by “thinks” and “does not think.” But the Pali word is the same throughout.
elapsed when they have done so, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he thinks that one is allotted \(^1\) when it is not allotted, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he thinks that one is assigned when it is not assigned, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he thinks that one is bestowed when it is not bestowed, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he thinks that one is lost when it is not lost, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he thinks that one is destroyed when it is not destroyed, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he thinks that one is burnt when it is not burnt, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he thinks that one is stolen when it is not stolen, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. Not forfeiting the robe which had to be forfeited, if he makes use of it, there is an offence of wrong-doing. \(^3\) If he thinks that the ten days have elapsed when they have not elapsed, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether the ten days have not elapsed, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that the ten days have not elapsed when they have not elapsed, there is no offence.

There is no offence if, within ten days, it is allotted, \(^4\) assigned, bestowed, lost, destroyed, burnt, \(^5\) if they tear it from him, \(^6\) if they take it on trust; \(^7\) if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer. \(^8\)

\(^1\) i.e. an extra robe. \(^2\) This and the next six cases = below, Vin 3.251 (without the “assigned” clause), Vin 3.262. \(^3\) dukkata, also to be confessed. \(^4\) adhittheti, according to Critical Pali Dictionary to employ, adopt, keep for oneself. \(^5\) These clauses indicate that the monk has lost responsibility for the robe. \(^6\) acchinditva ganhanti. This phrase appears to be a substitute for vilumpati, to steal, which as avilutte viluttasaññi occurs immediately after “burnt” in the preceding paragraph. \(^7\) vissasaññi ganhanti. At Vin 1.296 things are allowed to be taken on trust from a monk endowed with five qualities: he must be an acquaintance and a friend, alive, he must have spoken about the thing taken, and must know that he will be pleased with the monk for taking it. Cf. also Vin 1.308 for various cases where a robe taken on trust is said to be rightly taken or wrongly taken. \(^8\) Cf. Bu-NP 2, Bu-NP 3, Bu-NP 28; and cf. Bu-NP 1, where for “burnt” we get “broken” (of a bowl).
Then the group of six monks did not give back a robe that had been forfeited. They told this matter to the lord. He said: “Monks, a robe that has been forfeited is not not to be given back. Whosoever should not give it back, there is an offence of wrong-doing.”
At one time the enlightened one, the lord, was staying at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. At that time monks, entrusting robes to the hands of (other) monks, set out on a tour of the country with (only) an inner and an upper robe; these robes, deposited for a long time, became soiled; the monks dried them in the sun. The venerable Ānanda, as he was engaged in touring the lodgings, saw these monks drying these robes in the sun. Seeing these monks he came up to them, and having come up he said to these monks:

“Your reverences, whose are these robes that are soiled?” Then these monks told this matter to the venerable Ānanda. The venerable Ānanda looked down upon, criticised, spread it about, saying:

“How can the monks, entrusting robes to the hands of (other) monks, set out on a tour of the country with (only) an inner and an upper robe?” Then the venerable Ānanda told this matter to the lord. He said:

“Is it true, as is said, monks, that monks, entrusting robes to the hands of (other) monks, set out on a tour of the country with (only) an inner and an upper robe?”

“It is true, lord,” they said.

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

“How, monks, can these foolish men, having entrusted robes to the hands of (other) monks, set out on a tour of the country with (only) an inner and an upper robe? It is not, monks, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“When the robe-material is settled, when a monk’s kaṭhina (privileges) have been removed, if this monk should be away, separated from his three robes,¹ even for one night, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture.”²

And thus this rule of training for monks came to be laid down by the lord.

At that time a certain monk became ill in Kosambī. Relations sent a messenger to this monk, saying: “Let the revered sir³ come, we will nurse (him).” The monks said: “Go, your reverence, relations will nurse you.” He said:

“Your reverences, a rule of training laid down by the lord is that

¹ ticīvarena vippavaseyya. Cf. Vin 2.123, where it is a dukkaṭa, offence for a monk to be separated from his nisīdana, piece of cloth for sitting on, for four months.
² At Vin 1.254 the five privileges allowable to monks after the ceremonial making of the kaṭhina-cloth, atthatakathina, include one called asamādānacāra, translated, at Vinaya Texts ii.151, in accordance with Buddhaghosa’s explanation, as “going for alms without wearing the usual set of three robes,” a relaxation of the above rule. At Vin 1.298 it is a dukkaṭa offence for a monk to enter a village wearing (only) his inner and upper robes. But because Ānanda thoughtlessly did so on one occasion, the lord is reputed to have put forward five reasons for laying aside the outer cloak, five (identical) reasons for laying aside the upper and inner robes, and five (partly identical and partly different) reasons for laying aside the cloth for the rains. It is not said which reason covered Ānanda’s lapse. When monks are staying in lodgings in the jungles they are allowed to lay aside one of the three robes in a house; but then it came about that if they are away from that robe for more than six nights, there is an offence; see Bu-NP 29. ³ bhaddanto, an honorific title. Cf. below, BD 2.80, where an ill monk is allowed to travel without a rug, santhata, if he has the agreement of the Order as to the rug.
one should not be away, separated from the three robes; but I am ill, I am not able to set out taking the three robes. I will not go.”

They told this matter to the lord. Then the lord, on this occasion, in this connection, having given reasoned talk, addressed the monks, saying:

“I allow you, monks, to give a monk who is ill the agreement (to be regarded) as not away, separated from the three robes.¹ And thus, monks, should it be given: That monk who is ill, approaching the Order, arranging his upper robe over one shoulder, honouring the feet of the senior monks, sitting down on his haunches, saluting with joined palms, should speak thus: ‘I, honoured sirs, am ill, I am not able to set out taking the three robes. Thus I, honoured sirs, request the Order for the agreement (to be regarded) as not away, separated from the three robes.’ A second time it should be requested, a third time it should be requested. The Order should be informed by an experienced, competent monk, saying: ‘Honoured sirs, let the Order listen to me. This monk so and so is ill, he is not able to set out taking the three robes. He requests the Order for the agreement (to be regarded) as not away, separated from the three robes. If it seems right to the Order, let the Order give this monk so and so the agreement (to be regarded) as not away, separated from the three robes. The Order should be informed by an experienced, competent monk, saying: ‘Honoured sirs, let the Order listen to me ... the three robes. The Order gives the monk so and so the agreement (to be regarded) as not away, separated from the three robes. If the giving to the monk so and so of the agreement (to be regarded) as not away, separated from the three robes, is pleasing to the venerable ones, let them be silent; if it is not pleasing, they should speak. Agreement (to be regarded) as not away, separated from the three robes, is given by the Order to the monk so and so, and it is pleasing to the venerable ones; therefore they are silent, so do I understand this.’ And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

¹ ticīvarena avippavāsasammutiṁ. This means that by convention, by agreement among other monks, the one who is ill is regarded as not separated from his three robes, although in fact he is separated from them and goes away without them. On account of this agreement, sammuti, the separation, being regarded as no separation, does not count as an offence. Cf. also sammuti at, e.g., Bu-NP 14; Vin 1.283f. The government is by democracy, for the monks agree among themselves. At Vin 1.298 the illness of a monk is one of the reasons “allowed” for his laying aside his outer cloak. See Vin 1.109f. for agreement to, and removal of, ticīvarena avippavāsa in connection with sīmā, boundary.

“When the robe-material is settled, when a monk’s kaṭhina (privileges) have been removed, if this monk should be away, separated from the three robes, even for one night, except on the agreement of the monks,¹ there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture.”

---

When the robe-material is settled means: the robe-material is made up for a monk, or lost or destroyed or burnt, or an expectation of robe-material is disappointed.² When the kaṭhina (privileges) have been removed means: they come to be removed because of a certain one of eight grounds, or they come to be removed before the time by the Order.³

If this monk should be away, separated from the three robes, even for one night means: without the outer cloak, or without the upper robe, or without the inner robe.

Except on the agreement of the monks means: setting aside the agreement of the monks.

There is an offence involving forfeiture means: it is to be forfeited at sunrise; it should be forfeited to the Order, or to a group, or to an individual. And thus, monks, should it be forfeited ... ‘Honoured sirs, these three robes were away, separated from me for a night, without the agreement of the monks (and) are to be forfeited. I forfeit them to the Order ...’ ... should give back ... let the venerable ones give back ... I will give back this robe to the venerable one.’

---

A village having one precinct,⁴ various precincts, a dwelling having one precinct, various precincts; a stable⁵ having one precinct, various precincts; a watch-tower\(^1\) having one precinct, various precincts; a quadrangular building\(^2\) having one precinct, various precincts; a long house\(^3\) having one precinct, various precincts; a mansion\(^4\) having one precinct, various precincts; a boat having one precinct, various precincts; a caravan having one precinct, various precincts; a field having one precinct, various precincts; a threshing-floor\(^5\) having one precinct, various precincts; a monastery\(^6\) having one precinct, various precincts; a dwelling-place\(^7\) having one precinct, various precincts; the foot of a tree having one precinct, various precincts; an open space having one precinct, various precincts.

¹ Cf. rule in Bu-NP 29. ² Cf. Bu-NP 1.3.1. ³ Cf. Bu-NP 1.3.1 ⁴ ekupacāra; cf. Vin 3.46, gāmupacāra. ⁵ uddosita; Vin-a 654 explained, yānādīnaṁ bhaṇḍānaṁ sālā, a room for such implements as waggons, etc.

---

A village having one precinct means: a village comes to be for one family\(^8\) and is enclosed\(^9\): laying aside the robe within the village, he should remain\(^10\) within the village. It is not enclosed\(^11\): he should

---

\(^1\) aṭṭa; Vin-a 654 explained, “it is made with bricks for warding off hostile kings, and thick walls, and is four or five storeys high.” Cf. Vb-a 366.
\(^2\) māla (or māḷa). Cf. Vin 1.140; DN i.2; Snp p.104. Snp-a 447 calls manḍalamāḷaṁ, a mandapaṁ, or pavilion. At Vibhaṅga 251 this and the preceding building (aṭṭa) and the following one (pāsāda) are included in the definition of senāsana, lodgings. Vin-a 654 says that māla is ekakūṭasaṅgahītacaturassapāsādo, a quadrangular building comprised under one roof. Vb-a 366 quotes this definition, while saying that māla is like an eating-hall, a pavilion. This and the next two, pāsāda and hammiya, occur, as māla, pāsāya, hammiya at Āyaraṅgasutta 2.7.1, and are translated by JACOBI in Jaina Sūtras 1.105 as loft, platform, roof. See his note on māla, loc. cit. But from the Commentary, it seems that māla and pāsāda are two different styles of houses, the one square, the other long, while hammiya is a larger type of house.
\(^3\) pāsāda ti dīghapāsādo, Vin-a 654. Pāsāda has also been defined as the big buildings of kings; cf. below, BD 2.130, the pāsāda of King Bimbisāra. If a pāsāda type of building is built by other people, then it is called a hammiya.
\(^4\) (This footnote proved troublesome to typeset due to its length, so it has been moved to an appendix with other long notes on page 2977.)
\(^5\) karaṇa; here, in dhaṅnakaraṇa, seems to mean preparing the doing. Vin-a 654 explains by khala, corn ready for threshing, or the threshing-floor.
\(^6\) Vin-a 654, “a flower-park or an orchard.”
\(^7\) vihāra.
\(^8\) Vin-a 652, “it is the village of one ruler or headman.”
\(^9\) Vin-a 652, “it is enclosed by a wall or by a fence or by a ditch.”
\(^10\) vatṭhabbaṁ. In this meaning cf. Vin 2.8. Vin-a 652, “he ought to wait in a place of his own choosing within the village until the sun rises.”
\(^11\) Vin-a 652, “it is shown by this that there are various precincts to this same village.”
remain in the same house\(^1\) as that in which the robe was laid aside, or it should not be removed from the reach of the hand.\(^2\)

A village comes to be for various families,\(^3\) and is enclosed: he should remain in the same house as that in which the robe was laid aside—either in the hall or at the entrance—\(^4\)—or it should not be removed from the reach of the hand. Or if, going to the hall, laying aside the robe within a reach of the hand, either he should remain in the hall or at the entrance, or it should not be removed from the reach of the hand. The robe being laid aside in the hall, he should either remain in the hall or at the entrance, or it should not be removed from the reach of the hand. It is not enclosed: he should remain in the same house as that in which the robe was laid aside, or it should not be removed from the reach of the hand.

---

\(^1\) Vin-a 652, “the definition of a house is that, it is the dwelling of one family, etc.”

\(^2\) hatthapāsa. Vin-a 652 says that the robe should not be moved for more than two and a half linear measures—i.e., ratana. Cf. Vb-a 343, dve vidatthiyo ratanaṁ. A vidatthi is a span of twelve fingers’ breadth. Cf. also Vin 3.149. Vin-a 652 proceeds, “having gone beyond this measure, if the monk by psychic potency waits in the air until the sun rises, there is an offence involving forfeiture.” Hatthapāsa, a reach of the hand, arm’s length, is a technical term, always used in the Vinaya to denote a distance of two and a half cubits around oneself.\(^5\) Vin-a 652, “it is a village belonging to various rulers and headmen, like Vesālī and Kusināra, etc.”

\(^3\) dvāramūle = nagaradvārassa samipe, Vin-a 652.\(^6\) There is not much difference between gabbha, “room,” and ovāraka, “inner room,” but the latter is usually a bedroom, sleeping-apartment.

\(^4\) BD 2.19

\(^5\) Vin-a 654, dvāramūle = gharadvāramūle.
in which the robe was laid aside, or it should not be removed from the reach of the hand.

A stable comes to be for one family, and is enclosed; there are various rooms, various inner rooms: laying aside the robe within the stable, he should remain within the stable. It is not enclosed: ... (See Bu-NP 2.3.4) ... A stable comes to be for various families ... It is not enclosed ... or it should not be removed from the reach of the hand.

A watch tower comes to be for one family: laying aside the robe within the watch-tower, he should remain within the watch-tower. A watch-tower comes to be for various families; there are various rooms, various inner rooms; he should remain in the same inner room as that in which the robe was laid aside or at the main entrance, or it should not be removed from the reach of the hand.

A quadrangular building comes to be for one family: laying aside the robe within the quadrangular building (See Bu-NP 2.3.6) ... A quadrangular building comes to be for various families ... from the reach of the hand.

A long house comes to be for one family: laying aside the robe within the long house. ... A long house comes to be for various families ... from the reach of the hand.

A mansion comes to be for one family: laying aside the robe within the mansion. ... A mansion comes to be for various families ... from the reach of the hand.

A boat comes to be for one family: laying aside the robe within the boat. ... A boat comes to be for various families; there are various rooms, various inner rooms; he should remain in the same inner room as that in which the robe was laid aside, or it should not be removed from the reach of the hand.

A caravan comes to be for one family: laying aside the robe in the caravan, seven abhhantaras should not be removed before or behind, an abhhantara should not be removed from the side. A caravan comes to be for various families: laying aside a robe in the caravan, it should not be removed from the reach of the hand.

A field comes to be for one family, and is enclosed: laying aside the robe within the field, he should remain within the field. It is not enclosed: it should not be removed from the reach of the hand. A field comes to be for various families, and is enclosed. Laying aside the robe within the field, he should either remain at the main entrance, or it should not be removed from the reach of the hand. It is not enclosed: it should not be removed from the reach of the hand.

A threshing-floor comes to be for one family, and is enclosed: laying aside the robe on the threshing-floor, he should remain on the threshing-floor. It is not enclosed: it should not be removed from the reach of the hand. A threshing-floor comes to be for various families, and is enclosed: laying aside the robe on the threshing-floor, he should either remain at the gate, or it should not be removed from the reach of the hand.

A monastery comes to be for one family, and is enclosed. ... (See

---

¹ Cf. the “ocean-going ship” of AN iv.127 = SN iii.155, and the one at Ja 5.75 which took five hundred passengers. Thus the Indians at the time of the compilation of these works were not apparently ignorant of quite large-scale shipbuilding. ² abhhantara also at Vin 1.111. Vin-a 654 says, “here one abhhantara is twenty-eight hands.” See BD 2, Introduction, p. 50. ³ Vin-a 654, “of the field.” ⁴ Variant readings at Vin 3.276 suggest some difficulty, even as though there were some omission. ⁵ At Vin 2.154 monks were allowed to enclose their ārāmas (monasteries) with bamboo fences, thorn fences and ditches.
Bu-NP 2.3.13) ... It is not enclosed. ... A monastery comes to be for various families: ... It is not enclosed; it should not be removed from the reach of the hand.

A dwelling-place comes to be for one family, and is enclosed: laying aside the robe within the dwelling-place, he should remain within the dwelling-place. It is not enclosed: he should remain in the same dwelling-place as that in which the robe was laid aside, or it should not be removed from the reach of the hand. A dwelling-place comes to be for various families, and is enclosed: he should remain in the same dwelling-place as that in which the robe was laid aside for at the main entrance, or it should not be removed from the reach of the hand. It is not enclosed: he should remain in the same dwelling-place as that in which the robe was laid aside, or it should not be removed from the reach of the hand.

A foot of a tree comes to be for one family: laying aside the robe in the shade, if he spreads it entirely in the shade at the time of mid-day, he must remain in the shade.¹ A foot of a tree comes to be for various families; it must not be removed from the reach of the hand.

An open space having one precinct means: in a jungle where there are no villages,² the same precinct is seven abbhantaras all round³; beyond that there are different precincts.⁴

¹ The area is that to which the mid-day shadow spreads. People used to live at the foot of trees. Mūla, foot, is literally root. ² Cf. definition of “jungle” at Vin 3.46, Vin 3.51. ³ = Vin 1.111. Vin-a 655 says, “standing in the middle there are seven abbhantaras extending to all quarters; sitting in the middle he guards the robe put down on the boundary of the eastern or western quarter. But if at the time of sunrise he goes as much as a hair’s breadth to the eastern quarter, the robe is to be forfeited in the western quarter. But at the time of uposatha, beginning with the monks sitting at the outer circle of the congregation, the boundary of the seven abbhantaras should be removed, so that the boundary increases to the size to which the Order increases.” ⁴ Thus, in order to be in the same precinct as the robe, he has to be within seven abbhantaras of it.
If he thinks that he is away, separated when he is away, separated, except on the agreement of the monks, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he is in doubt as to whether he is away, separated, except on the agreement of the monks, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he thinks that he is not away, separated, when he is away, separated, except on the agreement of the monks, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he thinks that it is taken away when it is not taken away ... If he thinks that it is bestowed when it is not bestowed ... If he thinks that it is lost when it is not lost ... If he thinks that it is destroyed when it is not destroyed ... If he thinks that it is burnt when it is not burnt ... If he thinks that it is stolen when it is not stolen, except on the agreement of the monks, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. Not forfeiting the robe which had to be forfeited, if he makes use of it, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that he is away, separated, when he is not away, separated, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether he is not away, separated, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that he is not away, separated, when he is not away, separated, there is no offence.

There is no offence if before sunrise it is taken away, bestowed, lost, destroyed, burnt; if they tear it from him; if they take it on trust; if there is the agreement of the monks, if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

---

¹ (This footnote proved troublesome to typeset due to its length, so it has been moved an appendix with other long notes on page 2973.) ² anto aruṇe = anto-aruṇagga, “the time before sunset,” so Critical Pali Dictionary. ³ Cf. Bu-NP 1, Bu-NP 3, Bu-NP 21 (“broken” = Vin 4.245), Bu-NP 27, Bu-NP 29. ⁴ All these clauses show that in some way the monk’s responsibility for the robe had gone. ⁵ Cf. below, BD 2.159.
... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. At that time a robe¹ accrued to² a certain monk not at the right time.³ The robe, as they made it, did not suffice for him. Then that monk, pulling out that robe, smoothed it again and again.⁴ The lord, as he was engaged in touring the lodgings, saw this monk pulling out this robe and smoothing it again and again, and seeing him he approached this monk, and having approached he said to this monk:

“Why, monk, do you, pulling out this robe, smooth it again and again?”

“Lord, this robe which accrued to me not at the right time, as they made it does not suffice for me, therefore do I, pulling out this robe, smooth it again and again.”

“But, monk, is there for you an expectation of a robe?”⁵

“There is, lord,” he said.

Then the lord on this occasion, in this connection, having given reasoned talk, addressed the monks, saying:

“Monks, I allow you, having accepted a robe not at the right time, to lay it aside in the expectation of a robe.”⁶

¹ cīvara means both the made-up robe and the robe-material or robe-cloth. ² uppannaṁ hoti. Cf. above, BD 2.4, n. 3; below, BD 2.90, BD 2.99. ³ akalacīvara. Also at Vin 4.245, Vin 4.246, Vin 4.284, Vin 4.287. ⁴ Vin-a 658, “thinking, if one gets rid of the creases, it will be big (enough for me), sprinkling it with water, treading upon it with his feet, pulling it out with his hands and taking it up, he rubbed it across his back ... but dried by the sun, it (i.e., the robe-material) became as small as before, so he did this again.” ⁵ civarapaccāsā. Cf. civarāsa at Vin 1.259ff., and bhattapaccāsā at Vin 4.77. ⁶ Cf. Bu-NP 2, where monks are not allowed to wear extra robes.
Then monks said: “It is allowed by the lord, if a robe has been accepted not at the right time, to lay it aside in the expectation of a robe.” These, accepting robes not at the right time, laid them aside for more than a month. These robes, tied up in bundles, remained on a bamboo for hanging up robes.¹ Then the venerable Ānanda, as he was engaged in touring the lodgings, saw these robes tied up in bundles that remained on the bamboo for hanging up robes. Seeing them, he addressed the monks thus:

“Your reverences, whose are these robes, tied up in bundles, that remain on the bamboo for hanging up robes?”

“Your reverence, they are our robes, given not at the right time, that are laid aside in the expectation of robes.”

“But for how long, your reverences, have these robes been laid aside?”

“For more than a month, your reverence,” they said. Then the venerable Ānanda looked down upon, criticised, spread it about, saying:

“How can these monks, having accepted robe-material not at the right time, lay it aside for more than a month?”

Then the venerable Ānanda told this matter to the lord. He said:

“Is it true, as is said, monks, that monks having accepted robe-material not at the right time, laid it aside for more than a month?”

“It is true, lord,” they said.

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

“How, monks, can these foolish men, having accepted robe material not at the right time, lay it aside for more than a month? It is not, monks, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus also, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“When the robe-material is settled, when a monk’s kāṭhina (privileges) have been removed, if robe-material should accrue to the monk not at the right time, it may be accepted by that monk if he so wish. Having accepted it, it should be made up quickly.

¹ cīvaravaṁsa, with cīvararajju allowed at Vin 1.286, Vin 2.121. Cf. below, BD 2.152.
But if it is not sufficient for him, that robe-material may be laid aside by that monk for a month at most, should he have any expectation that the deficiency may be supplied.¹ If he should lay it aside for longer than that, even with the expectation (of the deficiency being supplied), there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture."

When the robe-material is settled means: ... (See Bu-NP 2.3) ... or they are removed before the time by the Order.

If robe-material (should accrue) not at the right time means: some that has accrued during the eleven months² when the kaṭhina cloth is not (formally) made³; some that has accrued during the seven months when the kaṭhina cloth is (formally) made, even a gift (of material) offered⁴ at the right time; this means robe-material (accruing) not at the right time.

Should accrue means: should accrue from the Order or from a group or from a relation or from a friend, or as rag-robes, or by means of his own property.⁵

If he so wish means: himself desiring, it may be accepted.

Having accepted it, it should be made up quickly means: it should be made up within ten days.

---

¹ Literally “for the completion of,” pāripūriyā.
² Vin-a 658, “setting aside one last month of the rainy season (kattika), there remain eleven months.”
³ atthata, from attharati, literally “to spread out.” Not however, to be taken literally here, but as the ceremony of making the robes at the end of the rains. See Vinaya Texts ii.148 note for very interesting remarks on distributing the robes, and above, BD 2.5, n. 1.

These curious expressions, “during the eleven, during the seven months,” mean, I think, that, in the case of the eleven, the kaṭhina cloth is only distributed in the month following the termination of the rains; therefore there would be eleven months when it is not made. In the case of the seven months, it is probably meant that no making of robes takes place during the rains, but that in unusual circumstances robe-material might be given to a monk during the remaining seven months of the year. Vin-a 658 says that the four months of the rainy season (kattika) are in the winter; thus setting aside five months (i.e., these, with the one remaining over after “eleven months”), there remain seven. Cf. Vin-a 729. Cf. above, BD 2.5, n. 3; below, BD 2.154, n. 3.
⁴ ādissa; Vin-a 658, uddisitvā.
⁵ Cf. below, BD 2.91.
But if it is not sufficient for him means: if it is not enough to be worn.

That robe-material may be laid aside ... for a month at most\(^1\) means: it may be laid aside for a month at the maximum.\(^2\)

That the deficiency may be supplied means: for the sake of supplying the deficiency.

Any expectation means: there is expectation from the Order or from a group or from a relation or from a friend, or as to rag-robies, or by means of his own property.\(^3\)

If he should lay it aside for longer than that, even with the expectation (of the deficiency being supplied) means: if a robe that was expected accrues on the very day that the first robe\(^4\) accrues, he should have it made up within ten days. ... If a robe that was expected accrues two days ... three days ... four days ... five days ... six days ... seven days ... eight days ... nine days ... ten days after the first robe accrues, he should have it made up within ten days. If a robe that was expected accrues eleven days ... twelve days ... thirteen days ... fourteen days ... fifteen days ... sixteen days ... seventeen days ... eighteen days ... nineteen days ... twenty days after the first robe accrues, he should have it made up within ten days ... twenty-one days after the first robe accrues, he should have it made up within nine days ... twenty-two ... twenty-three ... twenty-four ... twenty-five ... twenty-six days after the first robe accrues, he should have it made up within four days. If a robe that was expected accrues twenty-seven ... twenty-eight ... twenty-nine days ... he should have it made up within one day. If a robe that was expected accrues thirty days after the first robe accrues, on that same day it should be allotted, assigned, bestowed. But should it not be allotted or assigned or bestowed, it is to be forfeited on the thirty-first day at sunrise; it should be forfeited to the Order, or to a group, or to an individual. And thus, monks, should it be forfeited: ‘This robe, honoured sirs, (given) not at the right time, is to be forfeited by me, the month having elapsed. I forfeit it to the Order.’ ‘The Order should give back ... let the venerable ones give back ... I will give back this robe to the venerable one.’

\(^1\) pārāmaṁ ... paramatā. \(^2\) pārāmaṁ ... paramatā. \(^3\) Vin-a 658, “on a certain day the Order or a group will receive robes, and there will be a robe for me; ... a robe has been ordered for me by my relations, by a friend; when these come they will give the robes. ... I will get a robe from the dust-heap, ... by my own property, meaning cotton threads, etc.” This last must mean that if he has the means of sewing the robes together, he may do so. Cf. below, BD 2.91. \(^4\) mūlacīvara, as opposed to paccāsā-cīvara, the robe that was expected (Vin-a 659).

If the robe that was expected accrues but is different from the first robe that has accrued, and there are some nights over,¹ it should not be caused to be made up unwillingly.² If he thinks that a month has elapsed when it has elapsed, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he is in doubt as to whether a month has elapsed ... If he does not think that a month has elapsed when it has elapsed ... If he thinks that one is allotted when it is not allotted ... If he thinks that one is assigned when it is not assigned ... If he thinks that one is bestowed when it is not bestowed ... If he thinks that one is lost when it is not lost ... If he thinks that one is destroyed when it is not destroyed ... If he thinks that one is burnt when it is not burnt ... If he thinks that one is stolen when it is not stolen, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. Not forfeiting the robe which had to be forfeited, if he makes use of it, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that a month has elapsed when it has not elapsed, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether a month has not elapsed, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that a month has not elapsed when it has not elapsed, there is no offence.

¹ I.e., the month not being finished (Vin-a 659). ² akāma. Vin-a 659, “if the first robe is soft and the robe that was expected is coarse and it is impossible to mix them, and there are nights, though not a month, remaining, the robe should not be caused to be made up unwillingly. But taking another robe that was expected, this should be made up after an interval, and the robe that was expected should be assigned as a cloth used for water-strainers.”
There is no offence if within a month it is allotted, assigned, bestowed, lost, destroyed, burnt, if they tear it from him, if they take it on trust; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.¹

¹ Cf. Bu-NP 1, Bu-NP 2, Bu-NP 28, Bu-NP 29; and Bu-NP 21 = Vin 4.245 (“broken” instead of “burnt”).
... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time¹ the former wife of the venerable Udāyin had gone forth among the nuns. She frequently came to the venerable Udāyin, and the venerable Udāyin frequently went to this nun. Now at that time the venerable Udāyin used to participate in a meal with this nun. Then the venerable Udāyin, dressing in the morning,² taking his bowl and robe, approached this nun, and having approached and disclosed his private parts in front of this nun, he sat down on a seat. And further, the nun having disclosed her private parts in front of the venerable Udāyin, sat down on a seat. Then the venerable Udāyin, impassioned, looked at and thought about³ this nun’s private parts and emitted semen. Then the venerable Udāyin said to this nun:

“Go, sister, fetch water, I will wash the inner robe.”

“Give⁴ it (to me), master, I will wash it myself,” and she took hold of one part with her mouth and placed one part on her private parts. Because of this she conceived a child. The nuns spoke thus:

“This nun is one who does not lead the Brahma-life, (because) she is pregnant.”

(She, sayin,) “Ladies,⁵ I am not one who does not lead the Brahma-life,” told this matter to the nuns.

The nuns looked down upon, criticised, spread it about, saying:

“How can master Udāyin get a soiled robe⁶ washed by a nun?” Then

¹ Opening phrases are the same as those of Bu-Pc 30. ² puṇha and aparəṇha are the morning and the afternoon. Cf. Kp-a 105. ³ upanijjhāyati has sense of “to look at (eagerly)” and “to reflect on.” ⁴ āharati has sense of “to give” here. ⁵ ayye. ⁶ purāṇa-cīvara, literally “old robe.”
these nuns told this matter to the monks. Those who were modest monks looked down upon, criticised, spread it about, saying:

“How can the venerable Udāyin get a soiled robe washed by a nun?”

Then these monks told this matter to the lord. He said:

“Is it true, as is said, that you, Udāyin, got a soiled robe washed by a nun?”

“It is true, lord,” he said.

“Was she a relation of yours, Udāyin, or not a relation?”

“She was not a relation, lord,” he said.

“Foolish man, one who is not a relation does not know what is suitable or what is unsuitable, or what is pleasant or what is unpleasant for a woman who is not a relation. Thus you, foolish man, will get a soiled robe washed by a nun who is not a relation. It is not, foolish man, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk should get a soiled robe washed or dyed or beaten by a nun who is not a relation, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture.”

---

Whatever means: he who ...

(A nun) who is not a relation means: one who is not related on the mother’s side or on the father’s side back through seven generations.

Nun means: one ordained by both Orders.

---

1 Oldenberg’s edition has moghapuriso; but see Sinhalese edition, and also below, BD 2.39, BD 2.44, where the vocative, moghapurisa, occurs in similar contexts.
2 Six kinds of dyes allowed at Vin 1.286.
3 At Vin 1.286 monks are allowed to beat, ākoṭeti, with the hands robe-material that has become harsh.
4 Cf. Bu-NP 17 for both “rule” and Old Commentary.
5 Cf. below, Bu-NP 6.3.1. This definition = Vin 3.212, Vin 3.214, Vin 3.216, Vin 3.219, Vin 3.235; Vin 4.60, Vin 4.61.
6 = below, BD 2.40, BD 2.96, and passim. Vin-a 660, “she is ordained by a motion of the Order of nuns where the resolution is put three times and followed by the decision (as the fourth item, ñatticatuttha), then she is ordained in the same way by the Order of monks. Therefore she is ordained by eight Vinaya acts.”
A soiled robe means: dressed in it once, put on once. Wash means: he gives an order — there is an offence of wrong-doing. If washed, it is to be forfeited.

Dye means: he gives an order — there is an offence of wrong-doing. If dyed, it is to be forfeited.

Beat means: he gives an order — there is an offence of wrong-doing. If once having given a blow with the palm (of the hand) or a blow with a club, it is to be forfeited. It should be forfeited to the Order, or to a group, or to an individual. And thus, monks, should it be forfeited: ‘Honoured sirs, this soiled robe which I had washed by a nun who is not a relation, is to be forfeited. I forfeit it to the Order.’

... ‘... the Order should give back ... let the venerable ones give back ... I will give back this robe to the venerable one.’”

Vin 3.207
Bu-NP 4.2.2
BD 2.33

If he thinks that she is not a relation when she is not a relation and makes her wash (his) soiled robe, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he thinks that she is not a relation when she is not a relation and makes her wash, makes her dye (his) soiled robe, there is an offence of wrong-doing together with an offence involving forfeiture. If he thinks that she is not a relation when she is not a relation and makes her wash, makes her beat (his) soiled robe, there is an offence of wrong-doing together with an offence involving forfeiture.

¹ nivattha, past participle of nivāseti. It refers to the antaravāsaka, the inner or under robe that hangs down from the waist, and to the uttarāsaṅga, upper robe; also to the cloths for the rains (Bu-NP 24), to garments worn by members of other sects (Vin 1305f.), to garments called akkanāla and poṭhaka (Vin 1306f.), to nuns’ vests (Vin-a 663), to a laywoman’s outer cloak, saṭaka, Vin 4.18. ² pāruta, past participle of pārupati. It refers to the saṅghāṭi, outer cloak; also to a (costly) paṭa, or cloth (below, BD 2.109), and to vihāracīvara, and other things that a monk may put on, pārupitum, to cover the body if the robes are stolen or lost (Bu-NP 6). Thus, for a monk, both nivāseti and pārupati are required to indicate the putting on or dressing in the complete set of three robes. Cf. Vin 4.281f., where the two words occur in connection with the five kinds of robes a nun should wear. See below, BD 2.88, where “old rug,” purāṇasāntha, is defined as is “soiled robe,” purāṇa-cīvara, above.

³ Vin-a 660, “the nun who was ordered prepares an oven, collects sticks, makes a fire, fetches water, until, having washed it, she holds it up: there is an offence of wrong-doing in each action for the monk.” ⁴ nissaggyiyena āpatti dukkaṭassa; probably pācittiya omitted merely for the sake of brevity.
robe, there is an offence of wrong-doing together with an offence involving forfeiture. If he thinks that she is not a relation when she is not a relation and makes her wash, makes her dye, makes her beat (his) soiled robe, there are two offences of wrong-doing together with an offence involving forfeiture.

If he thinks that she is not a relation when she is not a relation and makes her dye (his) soiled robe, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he thinks that she is not a relation when she is not a relation and makes her dye, makes her beat (his) soiled robe, there is an offence of wrong-doing together with an offence involving forfeiture. If he thinks that she is not a relation when she is not a relation and makes her dye, makes her wash (his) soiled robe, there is an offence of wrong-doing together with an offence involving forfeiture. If he thinks that she is not a relation when she is not a relation and makes her dye, makes her beat, makes her wash (his) soiled robe, there are two offences of wrong-doing together with an offence involving forfeiture.

If he thinks that she is not a relation when she is not a relation and makes her beat (his) soiled robe, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he thinks that she is not a relation when she is not a relation and makes her beat, makes her wash (his) soiled robe, there is an offence of wrong-doing together with an offence involving forfeiture. If he thinks that she is not a relation when she is not a relation and makes her beat, makes her dye (his) soiled robe, there are two offences of wrong-doing together with an offence involving forfeiture.

If he is in doubt as to whether she is not a relation ... If he thinks that a woman is a relation when she is not a relation ... If he makes her wash another's soiled robe, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he makes her wash a sheet (used as) a piece of cloth for sitting on,¹ there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he makes a woman who has been ordained by one (Order only) wash it,² there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that she is not a relation when she is a relation, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether she is a relation, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that she is a relation when she is a relation, there is no offence.

There is no offence when a female relation is washing it if a woman assistant who is not a relation is (helping); if she washes it unasked³; if he makes her wash an unused one; if he makes her wash another requisite,⁴ except the robe; if it is (washed) by a female probationer, by a female novice; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.⁵

¹ A compound word in Pali, nisīdana-paccattharaṇa. Nisīdana is a piece of cloth for sitting on; paccattharaṇa is the bed-clothes, really a piece of cloth for covering a bed or chair, thus a sheet. Cf. below, BD 2.46, n. 3. At Vin 1.295 a nisīdana was found to be too small to protect the whole lodging; to meet this difficulty the lord is reputed to have allowed a paccattharaṇa, made as large as one wishes. It looks therefore as if nisīdana-paccattharaṇa is either a sheet that is a piece of cloth to sit upon, although larger than a mere “piece of cloth to sit upon,” the mere nisīdana; or that it is a sheet used as, or instead of, a piece of cloth for sitting on. Cf. nisīdana-santhata, in Bu-NP 15, and both in Introduction.

² Vin-a 662, “causing it to be washed by one who was ordained (only) in the presence of the nuns is an offence of wrong-doing, and it is the same lor one who has been ordained (only) in the presence of the monks; five hundred Sakyan women were ordained in the presence of the monks.”

³ Vin-a 662, “if she has come for the Exposition and the Exhortation, seeing the soiled robe and taking it from the place where it was put, she says: ‘Give it, master, I will wash it,’ and when it is brought she washes it and moreover dyes it and beats it—this is called ‘she washes it unasked’ (avuttā). If she hears a monk ordering a youth or a novice to wash the robe, she says: ‘Bring it, master, I will wash it,’ and she washes it, or taking it for a time, having washed it and dyed it, she then gives it back—this is called ‘she washes it unasked.’”

⁴ Vin-a 662, “a sandal, bowl, shoulder-strap, girdle, couch, chair, straw mat.”

⁵ Cf. below, BD 2.97f.
Monks’ Forfeiture (Nissaggiya) 5

... at Rājagaha in the Bamboo Grove at the squirrels’ feeding-place. At that time the nun Uppalavaṇṇā¹ was staying at Sāvatthi. Then the nun Uppalavaṇṇā, dressing in the morning and taking her bowl and robe, entered Sāvatthī for alms-food. Having wandered about Sāvatthī for alms-food, returning from her alms-gathering after her meal,² she approached the Blind Men’s Grove³ for the mid-day rest; having plunged into the Blind Men’s Grove she sat down at the foot of a tree for the mid-day rest. Now at that time some thieves, having done their deeds,⁴ having killed a cow⁵ and taken the flesh, entered the Blind Men’s Grove. Then the robber-chief saw the nun Uppalavaṇṇā as she was sitting at the foot of the tree for the mid-day rest, and seeing her, it occurred to him: “If my sons and brothers see this nun they will trouble her,” and he went by a different way.⁶

¹ Vin 3.35 tells the story of the rape of Uppalavaṇṇā by a brahmin youth; see BD 1.53, n. 5. ² pacchabhāṭta; bhāṭta usually means cooked rice. As this is the main thing put into the bowl, it has come to mean the whole meal. ³ Malalasekera, Dictionary of Pali Proper Names 1.111, says, “‘Blind,’ usually, but wrongly, translated ‘Dark’.” He gives the story accounting for the name of this Grove, an episode that must have taken place before the rape of Uppalavaṇṇā, as it is said (Dhp-a 2.49, Dhp-a 2.52) that after that time nuns were not to stay in this Grove. Vin-a 662 also says that Uppalavaṇṇā entered the Blind Men’s Grove, because the rule of training had not then been laid down. Those who translate andhavana as “Dark Grove” think of it, rightly or wrongly, as a Grove where, because it is so dark, it is impossible to see anything. ⁴ kata-kammā—i.e., committed thefts. Said of māṇava (Commentary: cora, thief) at AN iii.102, and of cora at Vism 180, Ja 3.34. ⁵ The cow was probably not so sacred then as now, and the cattle-thief common in those days. ⁶ Vin-a 662, “It is said that formerly the robber-chief knew the therī, therefore seeing her as he went in front of the robbers, he said: ‘Do not go there, all come here,’ and taking them he went by another way.”

474
Then that robber-chief, taking the best meats of the cooked meat, tying (them up) in a leaf-packet, and hanging it up on a tree near the nun Uppalavaṇṇā, said: “Whatever recluse or brahmin sees it, it is given (to him), let him take it.”¹ and having spoken thus, he departed. Then the nun Uppalavaṇṇā, arising from contemplation,² heard these words of that robber-chief as he was speaking.³ Then the nun Uppalavaṇṇā, taking that meat, went to the nunery. Then the nun Uppalavaṇṇā, having prepared⁴ that meat at the end of that night, tying it up into a bundle with her upper robe,⁵ rising in the air,⁶ reappeared in the Bamboo Grove.

Now at that time the lord was visiting the village for alms-food, and the venerable Udāyin came to be the one left behind as guardian of the dwelling. Then the nun Uppalavaṇṇā approached the venerable Udāyin, and having approached, she said to the venerable Udāyin:

“Where, honoured sir, is the lord?”

He said, “Sister, the lord has entered the village for alms-food.”

“Give this meat to the lord, honoured sir,” she said.

“You, sister, have pleased the lord with this meat; if you were to give me your inner robe, likewise would I become pleased with the inner robe.”⁷

“But we women, honoured sir, get things with difficulty. This is my last, (my) fifth robe.¹ I shall not give it to you,” she said.

¹ By these words the meat was made kappiya, allowable, and became a gift that might be taken. ² On samādhi as a term in Hindu philosophy, see Radhakrishnan, Eastern Religions and Western Thought, 49–52. It is there rendered as “unification,” “identification,” “ecstatic consciousness.” It is possible that the “sense of immediate contact with ultimate reality, of the unification of the different sides of our nature,” was not absent from the Early Buddhist conception of samādhi. ³ Vin-a 663, “It is said that the therī arose from contemplation at the appointed time: he spoke (the words reported above) at that very moment, and she heard and thought, ‘There is no other samaṇa or brahmin here but me.” ⁴ sampādetvā, possibly “roasted.” ⁵ = Vin 4.162. ⁶ On vehāṁsa as “above the ground” see BD 1.79, n. 6. ⁷ Vin-a 663, Udāyin is filled with lust and greed.

“It is as if, sister, a man giving an elephant should caparison² its girth,³ yet even so do you, sister, (though) giving meat to the lord, not give⁴ me your inner robe.”⁵

Then the nun Uppalavāṇṇā, being pressed by the venerable Udāyin, giving him her inner robe, went to the nunnery. The nuns, taking the nun Uppalavaṇṇā’s bowl and robe, said to the nun Uppalavāṇṇā:

“Lady, where is your inner robe?”

The nun Uppalavaṇṇā told this matter to the nuns. The nuns looked down upon, criticised, spread it about, saying:

“How can the venerable Udāyin accept a robe from a nun? Women come by things with difficulty.” And then these nuns told this matter to the monks. Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying:

“How can the venerable Udāyin accept a robe from a nun?” Then these monks told this matter to the lord. He said:

“Is it true, as is said, that you, Udāyin, accepted a robe from a nun?”

“It is true, lord.”

“Is she a relation of yours, Udāyin, or not a relation?”

¹ Vin-a 663, she did not speak from greed, for “in those who have destroyed the cankers there is no greed”; but there was no robe left over of the five that were to be worn by nuns. These five, as pañca civārani, are referred to at Vin 4.281f. At Vin 2.272 it is said that the three usual robes, the vest, saṅkacchika, and the bathing-cloth, should be pointed out to women who wish to receive the upasampadā ordination. Nuns were also allowed indoors robes or cloths, āvasathacīvara (Vin 2.217), but apparently such things were handed from nun to nun as need arose (Vin 4.303).

² sajjeyya. Sajjeti is to send out, to prepare, equip, fit up, decorate, deck out, and came to mean to give. ³ kaccha, here accusative plural. It is the girth or middle of an animal. If a present of an elephant is being made, a decorated cloth to be tied round his middle should also be given. ⁴ sajjeyya. Sajjeti is to send out, to prepare, equip, fit up, decorate, deck out, and came to mean to give. ⁵ Here there is a parallelism between kaccha, an accessory of the elephant, and antaravāsaka, the inner robe, which Udāyin thought might accompany the gift of meat. The meat had been wrapped up in the nun’s upper robe, and it is to be presumed that she was in consequence going about in her inner robe; see BD 2.xviii.
“She is not a relation, lord,” he said.

“Foolish man, one who is not a relation does not know what is suitable or what is unsuitable, or what is right\(^1\) or what is wrong for a woman who is not a relation.\(^2\) Thus you, foolish man, will accept a robe from the hand of a nun who is not a relation. It is not, foolish man, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk should accept a robe from the hand of a nun who is not a relation, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture.”

And thus this rule of training for monks came to be laid down by the lord.

Then scrupulous monks did not accept exchange of robes\(^3\) with nuns. The nuns ... spread it about, saying:

“How can the masters not accept exchange of robes with us?”

Monks heard these nuns who looked down upon, criticised, spread it about. Then these monks told this matter to the lord. Then the lord on this occasion, in this connection, having given reasoned talk, addressed the monks, saying:

“Monks, I allow you to accept exchange among these five (classes of people):\(^4\) a monk, a nun, a female probationer, a male novice, a female novice. I allow you, monks, to accept exchange among these five (classes of people). And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk should accept a robe from the hand of a nun who is not a relation, except in exchange, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture.”\(^5\)

---

1 \textit{santa}, meaning “right” or “existent.”
2 Cf. below, \textit{BD} 2.44, and \textit{Vin} 4.59. Also above, \textit{BD} 2.31, where, however, we get \textit{pāśādika} and \textit{apāśādika}, pleasant and unpleasant, instead of \textit{santa} and \textit{asanta}, right and wrong.
3 \textit{pārivattakacīvara}. Cf. \textit{parivatteti} barter, \textit{BD} 2.55, below.
4 \textit{Vin-a} 663, “among these five (kinds of) co-religionists having the same faith, the same morality, the same views.”
5 At \textit{Vin} 4.60 it is a \textit{pācittiya} to give (\textit{dātuṁ}) a robe to a nun who is not related, except in exchange.
Whatever means: ... (See Bu-NP 4.2.1) ...

Nun means: one ordained by both Orders.¹

A robe means: any one robe of the six (kinds of) robes (including) the least one fit for assignment.²

Except in exchange means: without an exchange.

He accepts: in the action there is an offence of wrong-doing; it should be forfeited on acquisition; it should be forfeited to the Order, or to a group, or to an individual. And thus, monks, should it be forfeited: ‘Honoured sirs, this robe, accepted from the hand of a nun who is not a relation, is to be forfeited by me. I forfeit it to the Order.’ ... ‘... the Order should give back ... let the venerable ones give back ... I will give back this robe to the venerable one.’

If he thinks that a woman is not a relation when she is not a relation, (and) accepts a robe, except in exchange, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he is in doubt as to whether the woman is not a relation, (and) accepts a robe, except in exchange, there is an offence of expiation invoking forfeiture. If he thinks that a woman is a relation when she is not a relation, (and) accepts a robe, except in exchange, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he accepts a robe, except in exchange, from the hand of a woman ordained by one (Order only),³ there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that a woman is not a relation when she is a relation, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether a woman is a relation, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that a woman is a relation when she is a relation, there is no offence.

There is no offence if she is a relation; if there is an exchange; if there is a large thing for a small thing, or a small thing for a large

¹ = above, BD 2.32, below, BD 2.96, and Vin 4.52, Vin 4.55, Vin 4.57, Vin 4.60, passim.
² = above, BD 2.7, and see there n. 4; see also below, BD 2.48, BD 2.140.
³ Vin-a 664, “taking from the hand of a woman ordained in the presence of nuns (only), is an offence of wrong-doing; but from one ordained in the presence of monks (only), is an offence of expiation.”
thing\(^1\); if a monk takes it on trust\(^2\); if he takes it for the time being; if he takes another requisite, except the robe; if she is a female probationer, a female novice; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

\(^1\) Vin-a 664, “if bartering a precious sandal, a robe, shoulder-strap, waist-band, for a robe of little value, he accepts that robe, there is no offence.” \(^2\) At Vin 4.60 it is the nun who may take on trust, the monk giving.
Monks’ Forfeiture (Nissaggiya) 6

... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans,¹ came to be skilled² in giving dhamma-talk.³ Now at that time a certain son of a (great) merchant⁴ approached the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, and having approached and greeted the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, he sat down at a respectful distance.⁵ As he was sitting at a respectful distance, the venerable

¹ He had a novice, Kaṇḍaka, who behaved badly, Vin 1.79, Vin 1.85. At Vin 1.153, having promised Pasenadi to spend the rains with him, he went to another place; and at Vin 1.300, having spent the rains at one place, he accepted a share of robes at others. At Vin 2.165, coming late to a meal, he made a monk get up and give him his place. At Vin 2.168 he took two lodgings, and is also called a “maker of strife, quarrelsome.” He is mentioned in Bu-NP 8, Bu-NP 9, Bu-NP 10, Bu-NP 18, Bu-NP 20, Bu-NP 25, Bu-NP 27, and in various Pācittiyas.⁵ paṭṭho, probably for paddho. Vin-a 665 says, paṭṭho ti cheko samattho paṭṭibalō.³ dhammīkathā. Here, more a talk on religious or philosophical matters than the “reasoned talk” given by the lord before modifying one of the rules. See above, BD 2.4, BD 2.14.⁷ seṭṭhiputta. Seṭṭhi is a banker and a trader combined, hence a merchant, head of a guild. He is primarily a merchant, and a banker only because a merchant, and because there were no banks in those days. Seṭṭhi-putta indicates that the father was still alive, so that his son, the setthiputta, is not yet head of the firm, but will be on the death of his father. He would then become a seṭṭhi.⁵ ekamantaṁ nisīdi, literally sat down to one side, or end. In sitting down in the presence of an honoured person, care should be taken not to sit down in any of the six wrong ways, or nisajjadosa. These are atidūra, accādsanna, uparivāta, unnatappadesa, atisammukha, atipacchā, too far, too near, to windward, on a higher seat, too much in front, too much behind; see Vin-a 129 = MN-a 1.110; Ud-a 53 (abbreviated); SN-a i.16 for similar six wrong ways of standing; and cf. SN-a ii.86 for a different set of six nisajjadosa. To consider all these difficulties, and to sit down so as to cause no discomfort to the honoured person, is ekamantaṁ nisīdi.

480
Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, gladdened ... and delighted that son of a (great) merchant with dhamma-talk. And then the son of the (great) merchant, having been gladdened ... and delighted by the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, with dhamma-talk, said to the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans:

“Honoured sir, do let me know what will be of use.¹ We are able to give to the master, that is to say of the requisites of robes, alms-food, lodgings and medicine for the sick.”²

“If you, sir, are desirous of giving something to me, give (me) one cloth from these,”³ he said.

“Wait, honoured sir, until I go to the house; having gone to the house I will send either one cloth from these or something better than these.”

A second time the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, said to the son of the (great) merchant ... A third time the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, said to the son of the (great) merchant: “If you, sir, are desirous of giving something to me, give (me) one cloth from these.”

“Now, honoured sir, for us who are sons of respectable families, it is awkward⁴ to go out with (only) one piece of cloth. Wait, honoured sir, until I go to the house; having gone to the house I will send either one cloth from these or something better than these.”

“What is the good, sir, of your offering without desire to give, because even after you have offered you do not give?”

Then that son of the (great) merchant, being pressed by the ven-

¹ yena attho. Cf. BD 1.222 for same expression. ² Genitive or dative plural used here instead of accusative plural, which usually goes with dātuṁ, to give. ³ ito. This refers to the two pieces of cloth that a man would ordinarily wear, as is done today in India, except in the Punjab: the dhoti and the chaddar, the one put on at the waist, and the other to cover the top part of the body. The son of the merchant, in this story, presumably had on no more than the customary two pieces of cloth, so that if he gave one away, he would have to go partially naked. So he said, “Wait.” ⁴ kismiṁ viya = kiṁ viya, it is what? it is like what? There is no English expression to render this exactly, but in most Indian languages there is something of the sort. The origin of the expression is obscure. Cf. “it is awkward to go empty-handed,” kismiṁ viya rittahatthaṁ gantuṁ, below, BD 2.321, and n. 4. erable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, giving one cloth, went away.

People, seeing the son of a (great) merchant, spoke thus:
“Why do you, master, come with (only) one cloth?” Then this son of a (great) merchant told this matter to these people. The people looked down upon, criticised, spread it about, saying:
“These recluses, sons of the Sakyans, have great desires, they are not contented; among them it is not easy to make reasonable requests.¹ How can they take a cloth when a reasonable request was made by the son of a (great) merchant?”

Monks heard these people who ... spread it about. Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying:
“How can the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, ask the son of a (great) merchant for a robe?” Then these monks told this matter to the lord. He said:
“Is it true, as is said, that you, Upananda, asked the son of the (great) merchant for a robe?”
“It is true, lord,” he said.
“Is he a relation of yours, Upananda, or not a relation?”
“He is not a relation, lord,” he said.
“Foolish man, one who is not a relation does not know what is suitable or what is unsuitable, or what is right or what is wrong for one who is not a relation.² Thus you, foolish man, will ask a son of a (great) merchant for a robe. It is not, foolish man, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:
“Whatever monk should ask a man or a woman householder who is not a relation (of his) for a robe, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture.”

¹ dhammanimantana, a request such as could reasonably be made by a pious man to a good monk, a request made to religious people in a suitable way. Here the monk presumed on the request made him by the merchant’s son. ² Cf. above, BD 2.39.
And thus this rule of training for monks came to be laid down by the lord.

Now at that time several monks¹ were going along the high-road from Sāketa to Sāvatthī. Midway on the road, thieves issuing forth, plundered these monks.² Then these monks said:

“It is forbidden by the lord to ask a man or woman householder who is not a relation for a robe.” And being scrupulous, they did not ask, (but) going naked as they were to Sāvatthī, they saluted the monks respectfully. The monks said:

“Your reverences, these Naked Ascetics³ are very good because they respectfully salute these monks.”⁴

They said: “Your reverences, we are not Naked Ascetics, we are monks.”

The monks said to the venerable Upāli: “If so,⁵ reverend Upāli, question these.”⁶

Then the venerable Upāli, having questioned these monks,⁷ said to the monks: “These are monks, your reverences; give them robes.”

Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying: “How can monks come naked? Should they not come covered up with grass or leaves?” Then these monks told this matter to the lord. Then the lord, on that occasion, in that connection, having given reasoned talk, addressed the monks, saying:

“I allow, monks, one whose robe is stolen or one whose robe is destroyed, to ask a man or woman householder who is not a relation (of his) for a robe. If there is for the Order at the first residence⁸

¹ sambahulā, bhikkhū, or “two or three” or “many monks”; see above, BD 2.8, n. 6.
² Vin-a 665, “they stole their bowls and robes.” ³ ājīvakā. ⁴ Or, “these Naked Ascetics who respectfully salute these monks are very good.” ⁵ iṅgha. ⁶ Vin-a 665, “ask them for the sake of knowing their status as monks.” ⁷ Vin-a 665, “he asked them about the pabbajjā and the upasampadā ordinances, and about bowls and robes.” ⁸ (This footnote proved troublesome to typeset due to its length, so it has been moved to an appendix with other long notes on page 2978.)
which he approaches either a robe in the dwelling-place\(^1\) or a bed-cover\(^2\) or a ground-covering\(^3\) or a mattress-cover,\(^4\) (I allow) him to take it to put on, if he says, ‘Getting (a robe), I will replace\(^5\) it.’ But if there is not for the Order either a robe in the dwelling-place or a bed-cover or a ground-covering or a mattress-cover, then he should come covered up with grass or leaves; but he should not come naked. Who should so come, there is an offence of wrong-doing.\(^6\) And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk should ask a man or woman householder who is not a relation (of his) for a robe, except at the right time, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. This is the right

\(^1\) vihāracīvara. As far as I know the word occurs only here. Vin-a 666 says, “people having had a residence erected, thinking, ‘Let the four requisites belonging to us be of use (to the monks),’ making ready sets of three robes and depositing them in the residence that they have erected—this is what is called a vihāracīvara.” It thus seems to be a robe put by in case of need in a residence, and more specifically in the vihāra, or dwelling-place portion of it—i.e., not in the refectory or any of the other rooms used together by the community.

\(^2\) uttarattharaṇa. This is a cover for a bed or chair, used out of respect for the person who uses the bed or chair, so as to prevent his clothes from being soiled. Vin-a 666 says that it is called a sheet for spreading on or over a couch, uttarattharaṇanāti mañcabhasa upari attharaṇakaṁ paccatharaṇaṁ vuccati. At Vin-a 776 uttarattharaṇa is called a sheet that may be spread over couches and chairs, uttarattharaṇanāti nāma mañcepīṭhānam upari athštabbakāṁ paccatharaṇaṁ. On paccatharaṇa see above, BD 2.34, n. 1.

\(^3\) bhummattharaṇa. Vin-a 666, “when the earth is prepared, they cover it for the sake of preserving its texture with carpets; spreading out a straw mat above this they walk up and down.” At Vin-a 776 bhummattharaṇa is called a mat for sitting or lying on, kaṭusāraka, that may be spread on the ground. Cf. below, BD 2.73.

\(^4\) bhisi-chavi. Vin-a 666, “the outer skin (chavi) of a mattress for a couch or a mattress for a chair.” Bhisi, a mattress, may mean a door-rug, something thick for wiping the feet, or a cushion. In fact, anything like a mattress afterwards came to be called bhisi. At Vin 4.40 (= below, BD 2.240) five materials are given of which a bhisi might lawfully be made. See also Vinaya Texts ii.210, n.

\(^5\) odahissāmi. Vin-a 667 explains by puna ṭhapessāmi, “I will deposit again.”

\(^6\) Cf. Vin 1.305: whatever monk adopts nakedness, the adoption of members of other sects, there is a grave offence; Visākhā’s strictures on nakedness for monks and nuns, Vin 1.292, Vin 1.293; and Bu-NP 24 below. At the root of the desire that monks should be clothed was the need, lay and monastic, to differentiate between bhikkhus and titthiyas, or those of them who were Naked Ascetics.
time in this case: if a monk becomes one whose robe is stolen or whose robe is destroyed; in this case this is the right time.”

Whatever means: he who ...
Monk means: ... is monk to be understood in this case.
Not a relation means: one who is not related on the mother’s side or on the father’s side back through seven generations.¹
A householder means: he who lives in a house.²
A woman householder means: she who lives in a house.³
A robe means: any one robe of the six (kinds of) robes (including) the least one fit for assignment.⁴
Except at the right time means: setting the right time to one side.
One whose robe is stolen means: a monk’s robe becomes stolen⁵ by kings or by thieves or by rogues, or it becomes stolen by anyone whatsoever.
One whose robe is destroyed means: a monk’s robe becomes burnt by fire, or it becomes carried away by water,⁶ or it becomes eaten by rats and white ants, or it becomes worn by use.

If he asks, except at the right time, there is an offence of wrong-doing in the action; it is to be forfeited on acquisition. It should be forfeited to the Order, or to a group, or to an individual. And thus, monks, should it be forfeited: ‘This robe, honoured sirs, asked for by me from a householder who is not a relation, except at the right time, is to be forfeited. I forfeit it to the Order.’ ... ‘... the Order should give back ... let the venerable ones give back ... I will give back this robe to the venerable one.’

¹ Cf. above, BD 2.31; below, BD 2.55. ² Cf. below, BD 2.55. Ajjhāvasati is, according to Critical Pali Dictionary, “to dwell in (as an owner).” ³ Cf. below, BD 2.55. Ajjhāvasati is, according to Critical Pali Dictionary, “to dwell in (as an owner).” ⁴ Cf. above, BD 2.7 and n. 4; BD 2.40, and below, BD 2.140. ⁵ Here presumably with the sense of “taken forcibly.” ⁶ udakena vūḷhaṁ; cf. Vin 1.32. Sinhalese edition has vūḷhaṁ, which I understand to be the correct form.
If he thinks that a man (or woman) is not a relation when he is not a relation, (and) asks for a robe except at the right time, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he is in doubt as to whether a man is not a relation (and) asks for a robe except at the right time, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he thinks that a man is a relation when he is not a relation, (and) asks for a robe except at the right time, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he thinks that a man is not a relation when he is a relation, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether a man is a relation, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that a man is a relation when he is a relation, there is no offence.

There is no offence if it is at the right time; if they belong to relations; if they are invited\(^1\); if it is for another; if it is by means of his own property\(^2\); if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

---

1 Vin-a 667 seems to take नातकानाम pavāritānām together—i.e., without the comma of the text. Commentary says “if they are for relations who are invited”; and later pavāritānām is taken up again, “whoever having invited, but who owing to foolishness or forgetfulness, does not give, should be asked ... If he says, ‘I invite you to my house,’ going to his house you should sit down for as long as desirable, or lie down, but take nothing. If he says, ‘I invite you to whatever is in my house,’ you should ask for what is allowable there.” Cf. below, BD 1.52, BD 1.57.

2 Vin-a 667, “if he asks for a robe by means of utensils allowable to monks (kappiyabhāṇḍa), if it is by an allowable procedure (kappiyavohārena).” Cf. above, BD 2.27, n. 3.
Monks’ Forfeiture (Nissaggiya) 7

... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. At that time the group of six monks having come up to monks whose robes had been stolen, said: “Your reverences, one whose robe has been stolen or one whose robe has been destroyed is allowed by the lord to ask for a robe from a man or woman householder who is not a relation¹; your reverences, ask (them) for a robe.”

They said: “No, we don’t want² (one), your reverences, a robe has been obtained by us.”

“We are asking for the venerable ones,” they said.

“Do ask (them), your reverences.”

Then the group of six monks, having approached householders, said:

“Sirs, monks are coming whose robes have been stolen; give them robes,” (and) they asked for many robes. At that time a certain man who was sitting in a village assembly hall³ said to another man:

“Master,⁴ monks are coming whose robes have been stolen; I gave them a robe.”

Then he said: “I also gave (to them).”

Then another man said: “I also gave (to them).”

These men ... spread it about, saying: “How can these recluses, sons of the Sakyans, not knowing moderation,⁵ ask for many robes? Will the recluses, sons of the Sakyans, deal in the cloth trade⁶ or will they set up a shop?”

¹ Bu-NP 6. ² alaṁ. ³ sabhāyaṁ nisinno. ⁴ ayyo, not ayye, indicates affection and familiarity along with respect. ⁵ They do not care for moderation, do not think of it, or have forgotten it. ⁶ This is simply a rebuke. ⁷ Cf. below, BD 2.113, and Vin 2.291.
The monks heard these men who ... spread it about. Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying: “How can the group of six monks, not knowing moderation, ask for many robes?” Then these monks told this matter to the lord. He said: “Is it true, as is said, that you, monks, not knowing moderation, asked for many robes?” “It is true, lord,” they said. The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying: “How can you, foolish men, not knowing moderation, ask for many robes? It is not, foolish men, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth: “If a man or a woman householder who is not a relation, asking (a monk), should invite¹ him (to take material for) many robes, then at most (material for) an inner and an upper robe² should be accepted as robe-material by that monk; if he should accept more than that, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture.”

Bu-NP 7.2.1

_Him_ means: the monk whose robe has been stolen.

_A man who is not a relation_ means: ... (See Bu-NP 6.3.1) ... she who lives in a house.

_(For) many robes³_ means: (for) abundant robes.⁴

_Asking, should invite_ means: he says, “Take just as much as you want.”

_At most (material for) an inner and an upper robe should be accepted as robe-material by that monk_ means: if the three ¹ _abhihaṭṭhuṁ pavādreyya_. See Vinaya Texts ii.440 for note on this phrase. It is there found that _abhihaṭṭhuṁ_ (in spite of the spelling with -ṭṭh-) is a gerund from _abhi-har_, like Prakrit _abhihaṭṭuṁ_. This is confirmed by Vin-a 668, _MN-a_ 2.264 (on _MN i.222_ = _AN-a_ (on _AN v.350_ = _SN-a_ i.iii.54 (on _SN iv.190_)) which explain _abhihaṭṭhuṁ_ by _abhiharitvā_. The phrase _abhihaṭṭhuṁ pavāreti_ is followed by the instrumental, the sense of _pavāreti_ being to “present with, to supply with, to invite with.” Here “to invite” seems the best translation, as the choice of the amount is made to rest with the monk. Also Vin-a 668 says that the term means “to make to like,” as well as _niman-teti_, to request, or invite. _Critical Pali Dictionary_ suggests that _abhiharati + pavāreti_ means to bring out and offer (food, etc.). ² _santaruttara_; see above, _BD 2.12, n. 1_. ³ _bahūhi ... bahukehi_. ⁴ _bahūhi ... bahukehi_.

488
(robes) come to be destroyed, two may be accepted; if two are destroyed, one may be accepted; if one is destroyed nothing may be accepted.

If he should accept more than that means: if he asks for more than that there is an offence of wrong-doing in the action. It is to be forfeited on acquisition; it should be forfeited to the Order, or to a group, or to an individual. And thus, monks, should it be forfeited: ‘Honoured sirs, having gone up to a householder who is not a relation, this robe material asked for by me more than that (which I should ask for), is to be forfeited. I forfeit it to the Order.’ ... ‘... the Order should give back ... let the venerable ones give back ... I will give back this robe to the venerable one.’

If he thinks that a man is not a relation when is he not a relation (and) asks for robe-material more than that (which he should ask for), there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he is in doubt as to whether he is not a relation ... (See Bu-NP 6.2) ... is no offence.

There is no offence if, saying: ‘I will take the remainder,’ taking it he goes away; if they give the remainder, saying: ‘Let it be only for you’; if they do not give because (a robe was) stolen¹; if they do not give because (a robe was) destroyed; if they belong to relations²; if they are invited; if it is by means of his own property³; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

¹ Vin-a 669, “they give on account of his being learned and so on” (and not because he was robbed). ² Cf. above, BD 2.49. ³ Cf. above, BD 2.27, BD 2.49.
Monks’ Forfeiture (Nissaggiya) 8

... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. At that time¹ a certain man said to his wife: “I will present² master Upananda³ with a robe.” A certain monk who was going for alms heard the words of this man as he was speaking. Then this monk approached the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, and having approached he said to the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans:

“You, reverend Upananda, are of great merit⁴; on a certain occasion a certain man said to his wife: ‘I will present master Upananda with a robe.’”

“Your reverence, he is my supporter,” he said.

Then the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, approached this man, and having approached he said to this man:

“Is it true, as is said, that you, sir, desire to present me with a robe?”

“Did I not also think, master: I will present master Upananda with a robe?”

“If you, sir, desire to present me with a robe, present me with a robe like this. What shall I do with one presented that I cannot make use of?”

Then that man ... spread it about, saying: “These recluses, sons of the Sakyans, have great desires, they are not contented. It is not easy to present them with a robe. How can master Upananda, before being invited by me, approaching me, put forward a consideration\(^1\) with regard to a robe?”

¹ Cf. Bu-NP 9 ² acchādeti has sense of to give so as to clothe or cover. ³ See also Bu-NP 6. ⁴ Same thing said to Upananda at Vin 1.300, and Vin 3.217, Vin 3.257 (BD 2.58, BD 2.145, below).

Monks heard that man who ... spread it about. Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying: “How can the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, before being invited, approaching a householder, put forward a consideration with regard to a robe?” Then these monks told this matter to the lord. He said:

“Is it true, as is said, that you, Upananda, before being invited, approaching a householder, put forward a consideration with regard to a robe?”

“It is true, lord,” he said.

“Is he a relation of yours, Upananda, or not a relation?”

“He is not a relation, lord,” he said.

“Foolish man, one who is not a relation\(^2\) does not know what is suitable or what is unsuitable, or what is right or what is wrong for one who is not a relation.\(^3\) Thus you, foolish man, before being invited, approaching a householder who is not a relation, will put forward a consideration with regard to a robe. It is not, foolish man, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“In case a robe-fund\(^4\) comes to be laid by for a monk by a man or a woman householder who is not a relation (of his), thinking: ‘I will present the monk so and so with a robe, having got the robe in exchange for this robe-fund’—then if that monk, out of desire for something fine, approaching before being invited, should put forward a consideration with regard to a robe, saying: ‘Indeed it would be well; do let the venerable one,\(^5\) having got a robe like this or like that in exchange for this robe-fund, present it to me,”

\(^1\) vikappaṁ āpajjissati. Cf. below, BD 2.145, where again Upananda is greedy about robes.

\(^2\) Cf. below, BD 2.147.

\(^3\) Cf. above, BD 2.39, BD 2.44, and below, BD 2.59, BD 2.147.

\(^4\) cīvaracetāpana. A robe-fund consisted of things for barter. This passage is complicated by the various meanings, brought out by the Old Commentary, (see below), which appear to be attached to the cognate forms, cetāpana, cetāpanena, and cetāpetvā. Vin-a 670, cīvaracetāpanan ti cīvaramūlaiṁ. \(^5\) āyasmā, perhaps here “gentleman” — or “lady”; certainly it is an honorific title. Cf. below, BD 2.148 there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture.”

For a monk means: for the good of a monk, making a monk an object, being desirous of presenting to a monk.

A man who is not a relation means: one who is not related on the mother’s side or on the father’s side back through seven generations.

A householder means: he who lives in a house.

A woman householder means: she who lives in a house.

Robe-fund means: gold or a gold coin or a pearl or a jewel or a coral or a ploughshare or a (piece of) cloth or thread or cotton.

For this robe-fund means: for what is present.

Having got in exchange means: having bartered.

I will present means: I will give.

Then if that monk means: that monk for whom the robe-fund comes to be laid by.

Before being invited means: before it was said (to him): ‘What kind of robe do you want, honoured sir? What kind of robe shall I get in exchange for you?’

Approaching means: going to the house, approaching (him) anywhere.

Should put forward a consideration with regard to a robe means: ‘Let it be long or wide or rough or soft.’

For this robe-fund means: for what is present.

Like this or like that means: long or wide or rough or soft.

---

1. Cf. this portion of the Old Commentary, with that on Bu-NP 8 and Bu-NP 27.
2. See above, BD 2.31, BD 2.47.
3. Cf. above, BD 2.47.
4. For one on hirañña, unwrought gold, and suvaṇṇa, wrought gold, see BD 1.28.
6. paṭaka seems connected with paṭa.
7. paccupaṭṭhita, present, ready, at hand.
8. parivatteti; also means to turn over, to deal with, to change. Cf. pārivattakacīvara, exchange of robes, at BD 2.39, above.
9. appitaṁ, of a close weave, solid. But, as opposed to “soft,” it must here mean harsh or rough. Vin-a 727 explains it by ghana, solid, compact, massive. Cf. below, BD 2.145.
Having got in exchange means: having bartered.
Present (it) means: give (it).
Out of desire for something fine means: wanting what is good, wanting what is costly.

If according to what he says, he gets in exchange one that is long or wide or rough or soft, there is an offence of wrong-doing in the action. It is to be forfeited on acquisition; it should be forfeited to the Order, or to a group, or to an individual. And thus, monks, should it be forfeited: ‘Honoured sirs, before I was invited (to take) this robe, approaching a householder who was not a relation, I put forward a consideration with regard to a robe; it is to be forfeited. I forfeit it to the Order.’ ... ‘... the Order should give back ... let the venerable ones give back ... I will give back this robe to the venerable one.’

If he thinks that a man is not a relation when he is not a relation, (and) before being invited, approaching a householder, puts forward a consideration regarding a robe, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he is in doubt as to whether the man is not a relation, (and) before being invited, approaching a householder, puts forward a consideration with regard to a robe, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he thinks that a man is a relation when he is not a relation, (and) before being invited, approaching a householder, puts forward a consideration with regard to a robe, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether a man is a relation, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that a man is a relation when he is a relation, there is no offence.

There is no offence if they belong to relations,¹ if they are invited; if it is for another; if it is by means of his own property; if he gets something of small value in exchange while he desires to get something costly in exchange; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

¹ Cf. BD 2.49, BD 2.52.
... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. At that time⁴ a certain man said to another man: “I will present master Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, with a robe.” Then he² said: “I also will present master Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, with a robe.” A certain monk who was going for alms heard this conversation of these men. Then this monk approached the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, and having approached, he said to the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans:

“You, reverend Upananda, are of great merit; on a certain occasion a certain man said to another man: ‘I will present master Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, with a robe.’ Then he said: ‘I also will present master Upananda, the son of the Sakyans with a robe.’”

‘Your reverence, these (men) are my supporters.’ Then the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, approached these men, and having approached, he said to these men:

“Is it true, as is said, that you, sirs, desire to present me with robes?”

“Did we not think, master: ‘We will present master Upananda with robes?’”

“If you, sirs, desire to present me with robes, present me with a robe like this. What shall I do with ones presented that I cannot make use of?”

Then these men ... spread it about, saying:

“These recluses, sons of the Sakyans, have great desires, they are not contented. It is not easy to present them with robes. How can master Upananda, before being invited by us, approaching, put forward a consideration with regard to a robe?”

¹ Cf. Bu-NP 8 ² The other man.

Monks heard these men who ... spread it about. Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying: “How can the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, before being invited, approaching householders, put forward a consideration with regard to a robe?” Then these monks told this matter to the lord. He said:

“Is it true, as is said, that you, Upananda, before being invited, approaching householders, put forward a consideration with regard to a robe?” “It is true, lord,” he said.

“Are they relations of yours, Upananda, or not relations?”

“They are not relations, lord,” he said.

“Foolish man, one who is not a relation does not know what is suitable or what is unsuitable, or what is right or what is wrong for those who are not relations.¹ Thus you, foolish man, before being invited, approaching householders who are not relations, will put forward a consideration with regard to a robe. It is not, foolish man, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“In case various robe-funds come to be laid by for a monk by two men householders or by (two) women householders who are not relations (of his), thinking: ‘We will present the monk so and so with robes, having got various robes in exchange for the various robe-funds.’ Then if that monk, out of desire for something fine, approaching before being invited, should put forward a consideration with regard to a robe, saying: ‘Indeed it would be well; do let the venerable ones, having got a robe like this or like that in exchange for the various robe-funds, present it to me, the two together with one,’² there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture.”

¹ Cf. above, BD 2.39, BD 2.44, BD 2.59.
² Ubbh’va santā, ekenā ti. The Commentary says nothing, but see Old Commentary below. It means that the two men should combine and put their funds together so that there should be two funds which could then be exchanged for one (good) cloth or robe, and the two men present the monk with one robe.
For a monk¹ means: ... (See Bu-NP 8.2.2) ... being desirous of presenting to a monk.

By two² means: by two.³

Men who are not relations means: ... back through seven generations.⁴

Men householders mean: they who live in a house.

Women householders mean: they who live in a house.

Robe-funds mean: gold or gold coins or pearls or jewels or corals or ploughshares or cloths or threads or cottons.⁵

For these various robe-funds means: for these (things) that are present.

Having got in exchange means: having bartered.

We will present means: we will give.

Then if that monk means: that monk for whom the robe-funds have come to be laid by.

Before being invited means: ... ‘... what kind of robe shall we get in exchange for you?’

Approaching ... should put forward a consideration with regard to a robe means: ‘Let it be long …’

For these various robe-funds means: for these (things) that are present.

Like this ... present (it) means: give (it).

The two together with one means: two people for one (robe).⁶

Out of desire for something fine means: wanting what is good, wanting what is costly.

If, according to what he says, they get in exchange one that is long or wide or rough or soft, there is an offence of wrong-doing in the action ... (See Bu-NP 8.2.1–Bu-NP.8.2.3; instead of a householder who is not a relation, ... a householder read householders who are not relations ... householders) ... if he gets something of small value in exchange while they desire to get something costly in exchange; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

¹ Cf. this portion of the Old Commentary, with that on previous Nissaggiya. ² ub-hinnaṁ, (more properly 'both') ... dvinnāṁ. ³ ubhinnan, (more properly 'both') ... dvinnam. ⁴ Cf. above, BD 2.39, BD 2.44, BD 2.54. ⁵ Cf. above, BD 2.55, where these items are given in the singular, since only one robe-fund is being defined. ⁶ dve pi janā ekena, two people with one (fine robe instead of with two more ordinary ones).
Monks’ Forfeiture (Nissaggiya) 10

... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time a chief minister,¹ the supporter of the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, sent a robe-fund² by a messenger to the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, saying: “Having got a robe in exchange for this robe-fund, present master Upananda with a robe.”

Then that messenger approached the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, and having approached, he said to the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans: “Honoured sir, this robe-fund was brought for the venerable one; let the venerable one accept this robe-fund.”

When he had spoken thus, the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, said to that messenger: “Sir, we do not accept a robe-fund; but we accept a robe if it is at the right time and if it is allowable.”³

When he had spoken thus, that messenger said to the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans: “But is there someone who is the venerable one’s attendant⁴?”

At that time a certain lay-follower went to the monastery on some business or other. Then the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, said to that messenger: “Sir, this lay-follower is the monks’ attendant.”

¹ mahāmatta is at BD 1.74 included in definition of “kings.” ² See Bu-NP 8 and Bu-NP 9. ³ kappiya—i.e., something that is made allowable for the monks to take because it has been given, and so made legally acceptable. See Vin 1.206. ⁴ veyyā-vacacakara, usually a lay-attendant in little better position than a servant. Vin-a 672 explains by kiccakaro kappiyakārako, one who makes something legally allowable (to the monks by offering it to them).
Then that messenger, informing¹ that lay-follower, approached the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, and having approached, he said to the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans:

“Honoured sir, the person whom the venerable one has pointed out as an attendant has been instructed² by me; let the venerable one approach (him) at the right time (and) he will present you with a robe.”

Then the chief minister sent a messenger to the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, to say: “Let the master make use of this robe; we want this robe made use of by the master.”

Then the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, did not say anything to that lay-follower. A second time the chief minister sent a messenger to the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, to say: “Let the master make use of ... by the master. “A second time the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, did not say anything to that lay-follower. A third time the chief minister sent a messenger to the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, to say: “Let the master make use of ... by the master.”

Now at that time there came to be a meeting-day for the townspeople,³ and an agreement was made by the townspeople that: Whoever comes the last pays fifty.⁴ Then the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, approached that lay-follower, and having approached, he said to that lay-follower:

¹ saññāpetvā = jānāpetvā, Vin-a 672. ² saññatto = āṇatto, Vin-a 672. ³ negamassa samayo hoti. Negama also occurs at Vin 1.268. The word comes from nigama, which is from nadi-gāma. Originally things were sent by water rather than by land, so that villages on rivers (nadi-gāma) would become the centres of trade. In India all important cities are on a river. Thus nadi-gāma is an important place, a town even, which may or may not be the seat of a king (rājadhāni). If a gāma, village, becomes very big, it is called nagara, town. If not so big, then it is a pura. This is usually a fortified town. Villages and towns run in this order: gāma, village; nigama, a riverside and hence important village or little town; pura, a fortified town, in which kings may live; nagara, a town (this may contain a fortified portion, but may spread outside it); rājadhāni, seat of a king. ⁴ paññāsām bandho. Buddhaghosa is doubtful of the reading; there is also the variant reading baddho, which is synonymous with jito or jīno below. Vin-a 672 says “the fine (or punishment, daṇḍa) is fifty kahāpanas.”

“Sir, I want the robe.”

“Honoured sir, wait this day¹ (only). Today there comes to be a meeting-day for the townspeople, and an agreement was made by the townspeople that: Whoever comes last pays fifty.”

“Sir, give me the robe this very day,”² he said, and he took hold of his waist-band.³ Then that lay-follower, being pressed by the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, having got a robe in exchange for the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, went the last. People said to this lay-follower: “Why do you, master, come the last? You have lost fifty.”⁴ Then that lay-follower told this matter to those people. The people ... spread it about, saying:

“These recluses, sons of the Sakyans, have great desires, they are not contented; amongst them it is not easy to render a service. How can they, being told by a lay-follower: ‘Honoured sir, wait this day (only),’ not wait?” Monks heard these people who ... spread it about. Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying: “How can the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, being told by a lay-follower: ‘Honoured sir, wait this day (only),’ not wait?” Then these monks told this matter to the lord. He said:

“Is it true, as is said, that you, Upananda, being told by a lay-follower: ‘Honoured sir, wait this day (only),’ did not wait?”

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked him, saying:

“How can you, foolish man, being told by a lay-follower: ‘Honoured

¹ ajjunho. Vin-a 672 explains by ajja ekāñ divasañ. It is therefore more likely to mean “(only) this day (the rest of the present day-and-night)” as given in the Critical Pali Dictionary, than “this moonlight night” of the Pali-English Dictionary ² aj’ eva. ³ ovaṭṭikāyapārāmasi. Ovaṭṭikā can also mean a bracelet and a patch. See Vinaya Texts ii.153, n. 3; Morris, Journal of the Pali Text Society, 1887, p.156. Pārāmasi, translated at BD 1.203 as “rubs up against” is here explained by Vin-a 672 as ganhi, took hold. ⁴ paññaśaṁ jino’si. Oldenberg, Vinaya Texts iii.277 says, “Probably we ought to read jino’si.” Vin-a 672 has the reading jito’si. Jiyati, one of whose meanings is “to lose,” is in Pali both the passive of jī and the present middle of jīya, (jī), therefore it can have jīta or jīna as past participles.
sir, wait this day (only),’ not wait? Foolish man, it is not for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“In case a king or one in the service of a king\(^1\) or a brahmin or a householder should send a robe-fund for a monk by a messenger, saying: ‘Having got a robe in exchange for this robe-fund, present the monk so and so with a robe’; then if this messenger should approach the monk and say: ‘Honoured sir, this robe-fund was brought for the venerable one; let the venerable one accept this robe-fund,’ then the messenger should be spoken to thus by this monk: ‘Sir, we do not accept a robe-fund, but we accept a robe if it is at the right time and if it is allowable.’ If this messenger should say to the monk: ‘But is there someone who is the venerable one’s attendant?’; then, monks,\(^2\) an attendant should be pointed out by the monk in need of a robe—either one who is engaged in the monastery\(^3\) or a lay-follower—saying: ‘This is the monks’ attendant.’ If this messenger, instructing this attendant, approaching that monk, should speak thus: ‘Honoured sir, I have instructed the person whom the venerable one pointed out as an attendant; let the venerable one approach at the right time, (and) he will present you with a robe’; then, monks, if that monk is in need of a robe, approaching that attendant, he should state\(^4\) and remind him two or three times, saying: ‘Sir, I am in need of a robe.’ If while stating and reminding two or three times, he succeeds in obtaining\(^5\) that robe, that is good. If he does not succeed

\(^{1}\) rājabhogga. Pali-English Dictionary seems to see in this the meaning of “Of royal power, entitled to the throne, as a designation of class.” It says, under article for bhogga, and quoting this passage, that rājabhogga “takes the place of the usual khattiya.” I think, however, that the reference is back to the chief minister, who has already appeared in this episode. Cf. also below, Old Commentary, BD 2.67. \(^{2}\) Vinaya Texts i.23, n.1, “this word of address is most noteworthy ... It must be meant as an address by the Buddha himself to the brethren.” Cf. also Bu-Pc 71, where bhikkhave again occurs in the sikkhāpada, rule. \(^{3}\) ārāmika, one who is employed in petty or menial works in a monastery, an attendant in a monastery. Nowadays such a man receives food there. \(^{4}\) codetabbo, here to request or state, but “state” is chosen for the translation, since monks were not allowed to make a request. \(^{5}\) abhinipphādeti.
in obtaining it, he should stand silently¹ for it four times, five times, six times at the utmost. If he succeeds in obtaining that robe, standing silently for it, four times, five times, six times at the utmost, that is good. If he, exerting himself² further than that, succeeds in obtaining that robe, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he does not succeed in obtaining it, he should either go himself to where the robe-fund was brought from for him,³ or a messenger should be sent to say: ‘That robe-fund which you, sirs, sent for a monk, is not of any use to that monk.’⁴ Let the gentlemen make use of their own,⁵ let your own things be not lost.’⁶ This is the proper course in this case.”

¹ The silent mode of asking came to be the only one allowed to the monks. But here they are permitted to express their wants in words before they begin their silent standing. ² vāyamamāṇa. ³ According to Vin-a 674 if a monk neither goes himself nor sends a messenger, he falls into an offence of wrong-doing for breaking a custom (vattabheda). ⁴ na tam tassa bhikkhuno kiñci aththaṁ anubhoti.
⁵ yuñjant’ āyasmanto sakaṁ, or “let the gentlemen have the benefit of their own things.” ⁶ mā vo sakāṁ vinas(s)ā ti. ⁷ rañño bhattavetanāhāro, living on a salary and food from a king. ⁸ Cf. earlier definitions of a “householder” as “he who lives in a house,” above, BD 1.47, BD 1.55, BD 1.60. ⁹ Cf. earlier and longer definitions of “robe-fund” at BD 2.55, BD 2.60.
venerable one accept this robe-fund,’ then this messenger should be spoken to thus by this monk: ... ‘... is the monks’ attendant.’ He should not say: ‘Give it to him,’ or ‘He will deposit it,’ or ‘He will barter it,’ or ‘He will get it in exchange.’

If this messenger, instructing this attendant, approaching that monk, should speak thus: ‘Honoured sir, I have instructed the person whom the venerable one pointed out as an attendant; let the venerable one approach at the right time (and) he will present you with a robe’; then, monks, if that monk is in need of a robe, approaching that attendant, he should state and remind him two or three times, saying: ‘Sir, I am in need of a robe.’ He should not say: ‘Give me a robe,’ ‘Fetch me a robe,’ ‘Barter a robe for me,’ ‘Get a robe in exchange for me.’ A second time he should say ... A third time he should say ...

If ... he succeeds in obtaining (that robe), that is good. If he does not succeed in obtaining it, going there, he should stand silently for it; he should not sit down on a seat, he should not accept food, he should not teach dhamma; being asked, ‘Why did you come?’ he should say: ‘You know it, sir.’ If he either sits down on a seat or accepts food or teaches dhamma, he loses an opportunity. A second time he may stand. A third time he may stand. Having stated four times, he may stand four times. Having stated five times, he may stand twice. Having stated six times, he may not stand.

If he, exerting himself further than that, succeeds in obtaining that robe, there is an offence of wrong-doing in the action. It is to be forfeited on acquisition; it should be forfeited to the Order, or to a group, or to an individual. And thus, monks, should it be forfeited: ‘Honoured sirs, this robe obtained by me, by stating more than three times, by standing more than six times, is to be forfeited. I forfeit it to the Order.’ ... ‘... the Order should give back ... let the venerable ones give back ... I will give back this robe to the monk so and so.’

---

¹ na dhammo bhāsitabbo. Vin-a 673 says that if asked to recite a piece of the text (or a blessing, at the beginning of a ceremony) or a grace (at the end of a meal), he should not say anything. ² ṭhānaṁ bhājati—i.e., to go and stand. Vin-a 673 ṭhānaṁ = āgatakāraṇaṁ—i.e., the reason or occasion for which he came (namely, to acquire a robe). ³ (This footnote proved troublesome to typeset due to its length, so it has been moved to an appendix with other long notes on page 2978.)

If he does not succeed in obtaining it, he should either go himself to where the robe-fund was brought from for him, or a messenger should be sent to say: ‘That robe-fund which you, sirs, sent for a monk, is not of any use to that monk. Let the gentlemen make use of their own, let your own things be not lost.’

This is the proper course¹ in this case means: this is the appropriate course² in this case.

---

If he succeeds in obtaining it by stating more than three times, by standing more than six times, thinking that they are more, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he succeeds in obtaining it by stating more than three times, by standing more than six times, but is in doubt (as to the number of times), there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he succeeds in obtaining it by stating more than three times, by standing more than six times, thinking them to be less, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If, stating less than three times, standing less than six times, he thinks them to be more, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If stating less than three times, standing less than six times, he is in doubt (as to the number), there is an offence of wrong-doing. If, stating less than three times, standing less than six times, he thinks them to be less, there is no offence.

---

There is no offence in stating three times, in standing six times; in stating less than three times, in standing less than six times; if himself not stating, he gives; if stating, the owners give; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

The First Division: that on Kaṭhina-cloth³

¹ “Proper course” is sāmīci, etiquette, courtesy; “appropriate course” is anudhammatā, custom; used with regard to the monks. Dhamma here means good social manners and customs. Anudhammatā is a synonym for sāmīci. ² See previous note. ³ kaṭhinavagga. Cf. the Kaṭhinakkhandhaka, Vin 1.253–265.
THIS IS ITS KEY¹
Ten (nights), one night, and a month,
and washing, acceptance,
Three about those who are not relations, of two,
and by means of a messenger.

¹ uddāna, something like a mnemonic verse, an abbreviation, in which only a leading word of each rule is given, and simply to help the memory of the monk who is reciting the rules. All the teaching was oral.
... at Āḷavī in the chief shrine at Āḷavī.¹ At that time the group of six monks, approaching silk-makers,² said: “Sirs, hatch³ many silk-worms, and give them to us, for we want to make a rug⁴ mixed with silk.” These looked down upon, criticised, spread it about, saying:

“How can these recluses, sons of the Sakyans, approaching us, speak thus: ‘Sirs, hatch ... mixed with silk’? It is a loss for us, it is ill-gotten for us that we, for the sake of livelihood, for the sake of wife and children, are bringing (these) many small creatures into destruction.”

Monks heard these men who ... spread it about. Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying:

“How can the group of six monks, approaching silk-makers, say: ‘Sirs, hatch ... a rug mixed with silk’?” Then these monks told this matter to the lord. He said:

“Is it true, as is said, that you, monks, approaching silk-makers, spoke thus: ‘Sirs, hatch ... a rug mixed with silk’?”

“It is true, lord,” they said.

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

“How can you, foolish men, approaching silk-makers, speak thus: ‘Sirs, hatch ... a rug mixed with silk’? It is not, foolish men, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monks should cause a rug to be made mixed with

¹ Cf. BD 1.247. ² kosiyakāraka, those preparing the raw silk, raising silk-worms (kosakāraka), rather than silk-weavers. ³ pacatha, literally boil or cook. ⁴ santhata, something that is spread: a rug, mat or a sheet. See BD 1.247.
silk, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture.”

Whatever means: he who ...

Monk means: ... is monk to be understood in this case.

A rug means: it is made “having spread,” not woven.¹

Should cause to be made means: if he makes it or causes it to be made mixing it with one silken filament,² there is an offence of wrong-doing in the action. It is to be forfeited on acquisition. It should be forfeited to the Order, or to a group, or to an individual. And thus, monks, should it be forfeited: ... ‘Honoured sirs, this rug, which I had made mixed with silk, is to be forfeited. I forfeit it to the Order.’ ... ‘... the Order should give back ... let the venerable ones give back ... I will give back this rug to the venerable one.’

If what was incompletely executed by himself, he has finished by himself, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he makes others finish what was incompletely executed by himself, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If what was incompletely executed by others, he has finished by himself, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he makes others finish what was incompletely executed by others, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he makes it or causes it to be made for another, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If, acquiring what was made for another, he makes use of it, there is an offence of wrong-doing.³

There is no offence if he makes a canopy⁴ or a ground-covering.⁵

¹ I.e., having spread out the material, or by the spreading method; see BD 2, Introduction, p.xxii. ² aṁsu is really the technical name of those small particles of which a thread is composed, not the thread itself. ³ =below, Vin 3.227, Vin 3.229, Vin 3.233, and Vin 4.167, Vin 4.171. ⁴ Nowadays a canopy would be used for putting over shrines. ⁵ Cf. BD 2.46, above.
or a screen-wall\(^1\) or a mattress\(^2\) or a squatting mat\(^3\); if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

\(^1\) Such as a wall made up of cloth. Word occurs at Vin 3.189, Vin 4.269, Ja 2.88.
\(^2\) bhisi; see above, BD 2.47.
\(^3\) bimbohana, such as monks in Ceylon use nowadays in the hall where the uposatha is held and the upasampadā conferred. They are usually padded. These items recur below at BD 2.78, BD 2.82, BD 2.89, and Vin 4.171, Vin 4.279.
... at Vesālī in the Great Grove in the Hall of the Peaked Roof. At that time the group of six monks had a rug¹ made of pure black sheep’s² wool. People, engaged in touring the dwelling-place, seeing them ... spread it about, saying: “How can these recluses, sons of the Sakyans, have a rug made of pure black sheep’s wool, like householders who enjoy pleasures of the senses?” Monks heard these people who ... spread it about. Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying:

“How can the group of six monks have a rug made of pure black sheep’s wool?” Then these monks told this matter to the lord. He said:

“Is it true, as is said, that you, monks, had a rug made of pure black sheep’s wool?”

“It is true, lord,” they said.

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying: “How can you, foolish men, have a rug made of pure black sheep’s wool? It is not, foolish men, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk should cause a rug to be made of pure black sheep’s wool, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture.”

¹ santhata, see above, BD 2.71, n. 4. ² ḫaka, a ram, a wild goat, according to Pali-English Dictionary and Childers. ḫaka (Sanskrit) is a kind of sheep, a ram, a wild goat, according to Monier-Williams. Aja is certainly a goat. The compound aj-ḫaka sometimes occurs, as at DN i.5, seeming to mean the goats and the sheep. In India, the goat and the sheep closely resemble one another: the tails of the former stick up, those of the latter hang down; but the colour and texture of their hair, or wool (loma), are similar.
Whatever means: ... is monk to be understood in this case.

Black means: there are two (kinds of) black: black by nature or dyed black.

A rug means: it is made “having spread,” not woven.

Should cause to be made means: if he makes it or causes it to be made, there is an offence of wrong-doing in the action. It is to be forfeited ... to an individual. And thus, monks, should it be forfeited: ... ‘... this rug which I, honoured sirs, had made of pure black sheep’s wool ...’ ... if he is the first wrong-doer.¹

¹ Cf. Bu-NP 11.
Monks’ Forfeiture (Nissaggiya) 13

... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. At that time the group of six monks said: “It is forbidden by the lord to have a rug made of pure black sheep’s wool.”¹ And these, taking only a little white for the seam,² all the same³ had a rug made of pure black sheep’s wool. Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying:

“How can this group of six monks, taking only a little white for the seam, all the same have a rug made of pure black sheep’s wool?” Then these monks told this matter to the lord. He said:

“Is it true, as is said, that you, monks, taking only a little white for the seam, all the same had a rug made of pure black sheep’s wool?”

“It is true, lord,” they said.
The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

“How can you, foolish men, taking ... pure black sheep’s wool? It is not, foolish men, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“When a new rug is made for a monk, two portions of pure black sheep’s wool may be taken, the third of white, the fourth of reddish brown colours. If a monk should cause a new rug to be made not taking two portions of pure black sheep's wool, the third of white, the fourth of reddish brown colours, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture.”

¹ Bu-NP 12 ² anta. Vin-a 684, “applying (or bringing) white to it, making as it were a border at the edge (anta) of the sheet.” ³ tath’eva, or “as before.”

\[\text{BD 2.77}\]

\textbf{New} means: it is so called with reference to the making.
\textbf{A rug} means: it is made “having spread,” not woven.\textsuperscript{2}
\textbf{Is being made} means: making or causing to be made.

\textbf{Two portions of pure black sheep's wool may be taken} means: being brought, two \textit{tulā} weights\textsuperscript{3} may be taken.

\textbf{The third of white} means: a \textit{tulā} weight of white.

\textbf{The fourth of reddish brown colours} means: a \textit{tulā} weight of reddish brown colours.

\textit{If a monk ... not taking two portions of pure black sheep's wool, the third of white, the fourth of reddish brown colours} means: if he makes or causes a new rug to be made not taking a \textit{tulā}, weight of white, a \textit{tulā}, weight of reddish brown colours, there is an offence of wrong-doing in the action; it should be forfeited on acquisition. It should be forfeited to ... an individual. And thus, monks, should it be forfeited: ‘Honoured sirs, this rug which I caused to be made not taking a \textit{tulā} weight of white, a \textit{tulā} weight of reddish brown colours, is to be forfeited. I forfeit it to the Order.’ ... ‘... the Order should give back ... let them give back ... I will give back this rug to the venerable one.’

If what was incompletely executed by himself, he has finished by \textsuperscript{1} go\textit{cariyānani kapilavaṇṇānaṁ}, Vin-a 684, which seems to indicate “the colour of oxen,” although \textit{cariya} does not mean \textit{vaṇṇa}, colour. Vinaya Texts i.25, n. 2, says, “This is deliberately chosen as an ugly mixture, which would lessen the commercial value of the rug.” It might also be a preventive of unsuitable pride in a fine article. But I think that this rule should be regarded as a continuation of the previous one (\textit{Bu-NP 12}), expanding it, and giving the detail necessary for carrying it out properly. The monks had nothing to do with the “commercial value” of things, but it was important that they should not behave like those leading the household life.

\textsuperscript{2} See above, \textit{BD 2.72, note}, and \textit{BD 2.75}.

\textsuperscript{3} \textit{tulā}, literally balance, a measure of weight.
himself ... (See Bu-NP 11.2.2) ... he makes use of it, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

There is no offence if he makes it taking a tulā weight of white, a tulā weight of reddish brown colours; if he makes it taking more of white, more of reddish brown colours; if he makes it taking only of white, only of reddish brown colours; if he makes a canopy or a ground-covering or a screen-wall or a mattress or a squatting-mat¹; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

¹ Cf. above, BD 2.73, and notes.
... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. At that time monks had a rug made every year. They were intent on begging, intent on hinting,¹ saying: “Give sheep’s wool, we want sheep’s wool.” People ... spread it about, saying: “How can these recluses, sons of the Sakyans, have a rug made every year? How can they be intent on begging, intent on hinting, saying: ‘Give sheep’s wool, we want sheep’s wool’? For, (although) our children soil and wet them² and they are eaten by rats, our rugs once made last for five or six years. But these recluses, sons of the Sakyans, have a rug made every year; they are intent on begging, intent on hinting, saying: ‘Give sheep’s wool, we want sheep’s wool.’”

Monks heard these people who ... spread it about. Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying: “How can monks have a rug made every year? How can they be intent on begging, intent on hinting, saying: ‘... we want sheep’s wool’?” Then these monks told this matter to the lord. He said:

“Is it true, as is said, that you, monks, have a rug made every year, that you are intent on begging, intent on hinting, saying: ‘... we want sheep’s wool’?”

“It is true, lord,” they said.

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying: “Monks, how can these foolish men have a rug made every year? How can they be intent on begging, intent on hinting ... ‘... we want sheep’s wool’? It is not, monks, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

¹ = BD 1.246. ² Cf. Vin 4.129.
“A new rug which a monk has had made should be used for six years. If, within the six years, whether he has got rid of or has not got rid of that (former) rug, he should have a new rug made, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture.”

And thus this rule of training for monks came to be laid down by the lord.

Now at that time a certain monk became ill in Kosambī. Relations sent a messenger to this monk, saying: “Let the revered sir¹ come, we will nurse (him).” Monks spoke thus: “Go, your reverence, relations will nurse you.” He said:

“Your reverences, a rule of training laid down by the lord is that a new rug which a monk has had made should be used for six years; but I am ill, I am not able to set out taking a rug, and without a rug there comes to be no comfort for me. I will not go.”

They told this matter to the lord. Then the lord, on this occasion, in this connection, having given reasoned talk, addressed the monks, saying:

“I allow you, monks, to give a monk who is ill the agreement as to a rug.² And thus, monks, should it be given: That monk who is ill, approaching the Order, arranging his upper robe over one shoulder, honouring the feet of the senior monks, sitting down on his haunches, saluting with joined palms, should speak thus: ‘I, honoured sirs, am ill; I am not able to set out taking a rug. Thus I, honoured sirs, request the Order for the agreement as to a rug.’ A second time it should be requested, a third time it should be requested. The Order should be informed by an experienced, competent monk, saying: ‘Honoured sirs, let the Order listen to me. This monk so and so is ill. He is not able to set out making a rug. He requests the Order for the agreement as to a rug. If it seems right to the Order, let the Order give this monk

¹ bhaddanto. Cf. above, BD 2.13ff., where an ill monk is allowed to travel without his three robes, if he has the formal agreement of the Order to be regarded as not away, separated from them. ² santhata-sammuti. Vin-a 685 says that he may have a new rug made at the place to which he goes (thereby not waiting for the six years to elapse). Cf. Bu-NP 2.
so and so the agreement as to a rug. This is the motion. Honoured sirs, let the Order listen to me. This monk ... requests the Order for the agreement as to a rug. The Order gives to the monk so and so the agreement as to a rug. If the giving to the monk so and so of the agreement as to a rug is pleasing to the venerable ones, let them be silent; if it does not seem right, they should speak. Agreement as to a rug is given by the Order to the monk so and so; it is pleasing ... So do I understand this.’ And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“A new rug which a monk has had made should last for six years. If, within the six years, whether he has got rid of or has not got rid of that (former) rug, he should have a new rug made, except on the agreement of the monks, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture.”

New means: ... not woven.
Has had made means: making or causing to be made.
Should be used for six years means: it should be used for six years at the minimum.
If within six years means: in less than six years.
Getting rid of ... that (former) rug means: giving it to others.
Not getting rid of means: not giving it to anyone.
Except on the agreement of the monks means: setting aside the agreement of the monks, if he makes or causes another new rug to be made, there is an offence of wrong-doing in the action. It is to be forfeited on acquisition. It should be forfeited to the Order, or to a group, or to an individual. And thus, monks, should it be forfeited: ‘Honoured sirs, this rug, which I had made for me less than six years ago without the agreement of the monks, is to be forfeited. I forfeit it to the Order.’ ... ‘... should give back ... let the venerable ones give back ... I will give back this rug to the venerable one.’

If what was incompletely executed by himself, he has finished by himself, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture ... if he makes others finish what was incompletely executed by others, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture.¹

There is no offence if he makes one after six years; if he makes one after more than six years; if he makes it or causes it to be made for another; if, acquiring what was made for another, he makes use of it; if he makes a canopy or a ground-covering or a screen-wall or a mattress or a squatting-mat²; if there is the agreement of the monks; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

¹ Cf. above, BD 2.72. ² Cf. above, BD 2.73.
... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Then the lord addressed the monks, saying: “Monks, I want to go into solitary retreat for three months. I am not to be approached by anyone except the one who brings the alms-food.”

“Very well, lord,” these monks answered the lord, and accordingly no one here went up to the lord except the one who brought the alms-food. Now at that time an agreement was made by the Order at Sāvatthi, saying: “Your reverences, the lord wishes to go into solitary retreat for three months. The lord should not be approached by anyone except the one who brings the alms-food. Whoever approaches the lord should be made to confess an offence of expiation.”

Then the venerable Upasena, the son of Vaṅganta, approached the lord together with his followers, and having approached and greeted the lord, he sat down at a respectful distance. Now it is the custom for enlightened ones, for lords, to exchange friendly greetings with in-coming monks. The lord said to the venerable Upasena,

---

¹ At sn v.325 the lord dwelt in solitude for three months; at Vin 3.68, SN v.12, SN v.320 for two weeks. ² _desāpetabbo_. ³ Referred to at Vin 1.59, Ja 2.449 for ordaining his _saddhi-vihārika_ only a year after his own ordination. At An i.24 he is called chief among those who are altogether charming (_samanta-pāsādika_, which is also the title of the Vinaya Commentary). Both these points are referred to at _Psalms of the Bretheren_ 261f. He was younger brother to Sāriputta, and had three sisters, Čālā, Upacālā, Sīsupacālā, their mother being Rūpasārī, and his father Vaṅganta; cf. Dhp-a 2.84, where Sāriputta’s father is also said to be Vaṅganta; and _Psalms of the Sisters_, p.96, where the three sisters are said to be junior to Sāriputta. See also Thag 576, Tha-ap 62 for his verses; Ud 46, where he says that he is of great psychic power and majesty; and see _Dictionary of Pali Proper Names_.

518
the son of Vaṅganta, as he was sitting at a respectful distance:

“Upasena, I hope things go well with you, I hope you are keeping going, I hope you have come here with but little fatigue on the journey?”

“Lord, things go well with us, lord, we keep ourselves going, we have come here with but little fatigue on the journey, lord.”

Now at that time the monk who was the fellow-resident of the venerable Upasena, the son of Vaṅganta, was sitting not far from the lord. Then the lord said to this monk: “Monk, are rag-robes pleasing to you?”

“Rag-robes are not pleasing to me, lord,” he said.

“Then how is it, monk, that you are one who wears rag-robes?”

“Lord, my preceptor is one who wears rag-robes, therefore am I also one who wears rag-robes.” Then the lord said to the venerable Upasena, the son of Vaṅganta:

“And is this crowd¹ agreeable to you, Upasena? How is it that you lead² the crowd, Upasena?”

He said: “Lord, I say to whoever asks me for the upasampadā ordination: ‘Your reverence, I am a jungle-dweller, an almsman,³ one who wears rag-robes.⁴ If you also will become a jungle-dweller, an almsman, one who wears rag-robes, then will I confer the upasampadā ordination upon you.’ If he promises me, I confer the upasampadā ordination, but if he does not promise me I do not confer the upasampadā ordination. I say to whoever asks me for help⁵: ‘Your reverence, I am a jungle-dweller, an almsman, one who wears rag-robes. If you also will become a jungle-dweller, an almsman, one who wears rag-robes, then I will give you help.’ If he promises me, I give help; but if he does not promise me, I do not give help. Thus do I, lord, lead the crowd.”

“Good, Upasena, good; it is good, Upasena, that you lead the crowd.

¹ parisā. ² vinesi. ³ piṇḍapātika. This I think is a word that may be correctly rendered by “almsman,” “beggar for alms.” See BD 1, Introduction, p. xii, and Vism 66.
⁴ These three aṅga (practices) are explained in detail at Vism 59ff. Sometimes combined with tecīvara, a wearer of the three robes, as e.g. at Vin 1.253, MN i.214.
⁵ nissaga.
But do you know, Upasena, of the Order’s agreement at Sāvatthī?”

“Lord, I do not know the Order’s agreement at Sāvatthī.”

“At Sāvatthī, Upasena, an agreement was made by the Order: ‘Your reverences, the lord wishes to go into solitary retreat for three months. The lord should not be approached by anyone except the one who brings the alms-food. Whoever approaches the lord should be made to confess an offence of expiation.’”

“Lord, the Order at Sāvatthī will be well known for its own agreement; we will not lay down what is not (yet) laid down, nor will we abolish what has been laid down, but we will dwell in conformity with and according to the rules of training which have been laid down.”

“That is very good, Upasena; what is not (yet) laid down should not be laid down, nor should what is laid down be abolished, but one should dwell in conformity with and according to the rules of training which have been laid down. Upasena, I allow those monks who are jungle-dwellers, who are almsmen, who wear rag-robes to come up for the sake of seeing me, if they wish to.”

At that time several monks¹ who came to be standing outside the gateway,² said: “We will make the venerable Upasena, the son of Vaṅganta, confess to an offence of expiation.” Then the venerable Upasena, the son of Vaṅganta, rising up from his seat with his followers, greeting the lord, departed keeping his right side towards him. Then those monks said to the venerable Upasena, the son of Vaṅganta: “Do you, reverend Upasena, know of the Order’s agreement at Sāvatthī?”

“But, your reverences, the lord said to me: ‘But do you know of the Order’s agreement at Sāvatthī? ... according to the rules of training which have been laid down.’ Your reverences, it is allowed by the lord, who said: ‘Those monks who are jungle-dwellers, who are almsmen, who wear rag-robes may come up for the sake of seeing me, if they wish to.’”

Then these monks said: “What the venerable Upasena says is true; what has not yet been laid down should not be laid down, nor should what has been laid down be abolished, but one should dwell in conformity with and according to the rules of training that have been laid down.”

¹ sambahulā bhikkhū, see above, BD 2.8, n. 6. ² dvārakotṭhaka, or the (store-)room over or by the gate.

Then monks heard: “They say it was allowed by the lord, saying: ‘Those monks who are jungle-dwellers, who are almsmen, who wear rag-robes may come up for the sake of seeing me, if they wish to.’ These, longing for a sight of the lord, discarding their rugs, took upon themselves the practice of jungle-dwellers, the practice of those who are almsmen, the practice of those who wear rag-robes. Then the lord as he was engaged in touring the lodgings together with several monks, saw here and there discarded rugs, and seeing them, he addressed the monks, saying:

“How is it, monks, that there are these discarded rugs here and there?”

Then these monks told this matter to the lord. Then the lord, on that occasion, in that connection, having given reasoned talk, addressed the monks, saying:

“On account of this, monks, I will lay down a rule of training for monks based on ten grounds: for the excellence of the Order, for the comfort of the Order ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“When, (with the addition of part of) a rug, (a piece of) cloth

---

¹ See above, BD 2.71, n. 4. It is on this passage that Vin-a 687 says “their santhata (rugs) counting as a fourth robe.” Reference to a fourth robe, catutthaka cīvara, is made at Vism 65, to be worn principally apparently for the purpose of washing and dyeing the three usual robes, and as either an inner or an outer robe. ² These three aṅgas appear as dhūtaguṇa (together with that of sapadānacārika, continuous alms-begging) at Vin 3.15 (=BD 1.26), and together with others at Vism 59ff. Cf. also Vin 1.253, Vin 2.299 (with tecīvarika) and Vin 2.32. At An iii.391 the three ways of living given above occur with gāmantavīhārī, one who dwells in village-outskirts, nemantanika, the guest, and gaha-paticīvaradhara, the wearer of robes given by a householder. If any one of these does not behave suitably he is ten’aṅgena gārayho, blameworthy as to that attribute (which he has taken on himself)—aṅga being a technical term covering these various modes of scrupulous living. ³ See above, BD 2.8, n. 6. ⁴ =Vin 3.21 (BD 1.37ff.); AN i.98, AN i.100; AN v.70.
to sit upon¹ is being made for a monk, (a piece) the breadth of the accepted span² must be taken from all round an old rug in order to disfigure³ it. If a monk should have made (with the addition of part of) a rug, a new (piece of) cloth to sit upon without taking (a piece) the breadth of the accepted span from all round an old rug, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture.”

A (piece of) cloth to sit upon means: it is so called if it has a border.⁴

A rug means: it is made “having spread,” not woven.⁵

Is being made means: making or causing to be made.

Old rug means: dressed in it once, put on once.⁶ (A piece) the breadth of the accepted span must be taken from all round in order to disfigure it means: cutting a circle or square so that it may become firm,⁷ it should be “spread” in one quarter or it should be “spread” having been unravelled.

If a monk ... without taking (a piece) the breadth of the accepted span from all round an old rug means: if without having ¹ (This footnote proved troublesome to typeset due to its length, so it has been moved to an appendix with other long notes on page 2979.) ² sugatavidatthī, see BD 1.253. ³ dubbaṃkaraṇāya, occurring also below, BD 2.407, in Bu-Pc 58. ⁴ sadasaṁ vuccati. Cf. Vin.iv.123, Vin.iv.171. Sadasa = sa + dasa. At Vin 2.301-307 we get the opposite (adjective), adasaka, again qualifying nisīdana, and where an unbordered, adasaka, nisīdana is not allowed (even if it is of the right size). At Vin 4.170, Vin 4.171 the right size is prescribed for the nisīdana, a border is allowed, and it is said that this border should be a span; if these measurements are exceeded the nisīdana should be cut down (to the proper size) on acquisition. At the Council of Vesālī, Vin 2.294f., it is said that a piece of cloth to sit upon that has no border is not allowable, because a monk who had one of this nature would incur the pācittiya offence involving cutting down (i.e., Bu-Pc 89), Vin 2.307. All the ten matters, vatthu, whose allowability is being questioned at the Council are explained, see Vin 2.300f., except this one and the one concerning gold and silver (Bu-NP 18). ⁵ Cf. above, BD 2.72, BD 2.75, BD 2.77. ⁶ = definition of soiled, or old, robe, above, BD 2.32. Thus the words used are those which usually refer to the putting on of the set of three robes: nivattha and pārula. Buddhaghosa at Vin-a 687, in explaining their meaning in the above passage, defines them as nisinna and nipanna respectively, sat on and lain on. See BD 2, Introduction, p.xxiv. ⁷ thirabhāvāya.

522
taken (a piece) the breadth of the accepted span from all round an old rug, he makes or has made, (with the addition of part of) a rug, a new (piece of) cloth to sit upon, there is an offence of wrong-doing in the action; it should be forfeited on acquisition. It should be forfeited to ... an individual. And thus, monks, should it be forfeited: ‘Honoured sirs, this (piece of) cloth to sit upon having been made (with the addition of part of) a rug, (but) without having taken (a piece) the breadth of the accepted span from all round an old rug is to be forfeited by me. I forfeit it to the Order.’ ... ‘... the Order should give back ... let the venerable ones give back ... I will give back to the venerable one.’

If what was incompletely executed by himself he has finished by himself, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture ... (See Bu-NP 11.2.2) ... if he makes it or causes it to be made for another, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

There is no offence if he makes it having taken (a piece) the breadth of the accepted span from all round an old rug; if, failing to get it, he makes it having taken a smaller (piece)¹; if, failing to get it, he makes it not having taken (any portion)²; if acquiring what was made for another, he makes use of it; if he makes a canopy or a ground-covering or a screen-wall or a mattress or a squatting-mat³; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

¹ alabhanto thokatarani adivivat karoti. Buddhaghosa is silent. ² alabhanto anədiyitvə karoti. ³ Cf. above, BD 2.73, BD 2.75, BD 2.78, BD 2.82; and Vin 4.171ff.
... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time as a certain monk was in the country of the Kosalas¹ going to Sāvatthī, (some) sheep’s wool² accrued³ (to him) on the way. Then that monk went along tying up that sheep’s wool into a bundle with his upper robe.⁴ People, seeing this monk, made fun of him, saying: “For how much have you bought (it), honoured sir, how great will the profit become?”

This monk, being made fun of by these people, became ashamed.⁵ Then that monk, going to Sāvatthī, threw down⁶ the sheep’s wool even as he was standing.⁷ Monks said to this monk: “Why do you, your reverence, throw down this sheep’s wool even as you are standing?”

“Because I, your reverences, was made fun of by (some) people on account of this sheep’s wool.”

“But from how far have you, your reverence, conveyed this sheep’s wool?”

“For more than three yojanas,⁸ your reverences,” he said. Then those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying: “How can this monk convey sheep’s wool for more than three yojanas?” Then these monks told this matter to the lord. He said:

¹ Sāvatthī was the capital of the Kosala country. ² eḷakalomāni. ³ uppajjiṁsu; uppajjati is usually “arises, is produced, is born”; cf. above, BD 2.4, BD 2.24, below, BD 2.99, BD 2.153. ⁴ Cf. above, BD 2.37. ⁵ maṅku, literally staggered or shocked. See AN v.5. ⁶ āsumbhi. ⁷ thitako ’va. Vin-a 687 says, “as men bringing a large burden of wood from the jungle, being weary, let it drop (pātenti) even as they are standing (thitakā ’va), so he let it drop.” ⁸ See RHYS DAVIDS, Ancient Coins and Measures of Ceylon, p.16, for “Tabulated Statement of Passages on the length of the Yojana.” His tentative conclusion is that in fifth-century Pali literature the yojana means between seven and eight miles. CHILDERS reckoned twelve miles to a yojana. See also E.J. THOMAS, Life of Buddha as Legend and History, 1927, p.17. An ascending scale of measures of length is given at Vb-a 343.

“Is it true, as is said, that you, monk, conveyed sheep’s wool for more than three yojanas?”

“It is true, lord,” he said.

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked him, saying:

“How can you, foolish man, convey sheep’s wool for more than three yojanas? It is not, foolish man, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Sheep’s wool may accrue to a monk as he is going along a road. It may be accepted by that monk, if he likes; but having accepted it, it should be conveyed in his (own) hands for three yojanas at the utmost, if there are no carriers. If he should convey it further than that, even if there are no carriers, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture.”

Vin 3.234
Bu-NP 16.2.1

To a monk as he is going along a road means: as he is going on a roadway.¹

Sheep’s wool may accrue means: it may accrue from the Order or from a group or from a relation or from a friend or as rag-robens or by means of his own property.²

If he likes means: if he wishes.

It may be accepted ... but having accepted it, it should be conveyed in his (own) hands for three yojanas at the utmost means: it should be conveyed in his (own) hands for three yojanas at the maximum.

If there are no carriers means: if there is no one who is a carrier, neither a woman nor a man, nor a householder nor one who has gone forth.

If he should convey it further than that, even if there are no carriers means: if he makes the first foot go beyond three yojanas, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he makes the second foot go beyond, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If standing within three yojanas he lets it drop beyond the three yojanas, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he makes it go beyond three yojanas, placing it in a vehicle or a bundle of another (person) without (his) knowing it, it is to be forfeited. It should be forfeited ... to an individual. And thus, monks, should it be forfeited: ‘Honoured sirs, this sheep’s wool, made by me to go beyond three yojanas, is to be forfeited. I forfeit it to the Order.’ ... ‘... the Order should give back ... let the venerable ones give back ... I will give back this sheep’s wool to the venerable one.’

¹ pantha. ² Cf. above, BD 2.27.

If he makes it go beyond more than three yojanas thinking them to be more, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If, being in doubt, he makes it go beyond more than three yojanas, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he makes it go beyond more than three yojanas thinking them to be less, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he thinks that it is less than three yojanas when it is more, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether it is less than three yojanas, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it is less than three yojanas when it is less, there is no offence.

There is no offence if he conveys it for three yojanas; if he conveys it for less than three yojanas; if he conveys it for three yojanas and conveys it back; if desiring a habitation, going three yojanas, he conveys it beyond that¹; if he conveys something stolen that he has got back²; if he conveys something destroyed that he has got back; if he makes another convey goods tied up in a bundle¹; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

¹ Vin-ā 688 says, “going where he is unable to receive the recitation and interrogation (of the Pātimokkha) or necessities and so on, he goes elsewhere beyond that. Elsewhere beyond that means, there is no offence in so conveying it for a hundred yojanas.” ² Vin-ā 688, “thieves stealing it (from him), knowing its uselessness give it back.” This means that thieves took his sheep’s wool when he had done perhaps two and a half yojanas; he retraces his steps and they return him the wool as it is of no value for them; he goes a yojana in order to reach his vihāra. Thus he would have done three and a half yojanas, but the part of the journey due to the robbing incident does not count.

¹ katabhanṇḍa; cf. below, BD 2.98. Vin-a 689 says “goods tied up (kataṁ bhaṇḍam) in a blanket, fleecy cover, sheet and so on, anything even if it is tied up only with a thread.”
... among the Sakyans at Kapilavatthu in the Banyan monastery.¹ At that time the group of six monks had sheep’s wool washed and dyed and combed by nuns. The nuns, through washing, dyeing, combing the sheep’s wool, neglected² the exposition, the interrogation, the higher morality, the higher thought, the higher insight.³ Then Mahāpajāpati the Gotamid approached the lord, and having approached, greeting the lord, she stood at a respectful distance. As she was standing at a respectful distance, the lord spoke thus to Mahāpajāpati the Gotamid:

“Gotami, I hope that the nuns are zealous, ardent, (with) a self

¹ Besides the Nigrodhārāma at Kapilavatthu, there was another at Rājagaha, mentioned, e.g., at DN ii.116. Dictionary of Pali Proper Names says that the one at Kapilavathu was given to the Order by a Sakyā named Nigrodha. If the evidence for this were stronger, it would have been translated “Nigrodha’s monastery.” ² Cf. Vin 1.190, where these same five items are again connected with riñcati, to neglect. ³ adhisīla, adhicitta, adhipaṇṇa, given at DN iii.219 as the “three trainings.” The descriptions given at AN i.235 and of adhicittam-anuyutta at AN i.254ff. to my mind make it quite clear that adhi- points to the higher states of morality, thought and insight, and therefore should not be translated, as would also be possible, by “as to” morality, etc. E.M. Hare, at GS 3.310, translates “further virtue, further thought, further insight.” Moreover the exposition and the interrogation were not “as to” morality, thought and insight. The exposition (uddesa) was the recital of the Pātimokkha rules, and the interrogation (paripuccha) was the asking of all present at the fortnightly recitals if they had seen, heard or suspected any offence.
that is striving?”¹

“Whence, lord, is there zeal in the nuns? The masters, the group of six monks, have sheep’s wool washed and dyed and combed by nuns. The nuns … neglect the exposition, the interrogation, the higher morality, the higher thought, the higher insight.”

Then the lord … gladdened Mahāpajāpatī the Gotamid with dhamma talk. Then Mahāpajāpatī the Gotamid … gladdened by the lord with dhamma talk, greeting the lord, departed keeping her right side towards him. Then the lord, in this connection, on this occasion, having had the Order of monks convened, asked the group of six monks:

“Is it true, as is said, that you, monks, had sheep’s wool washed and dyed and combed by nuns?”

“It is true, lord,” they said.

“Were they relations of yours, monks, or not relations?”

“They were not relations, lord,” they said.

“Foolish men, those who are not relations do not know what is suitable or what is unsuitable, or what is pleasant or what is unpleasant to those who are not relations. Thus you, foolish men, will have sheep’s wool washed and dyed and combed by nuns who are not relations? It is not, foolish men, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased … And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk should have sheep’s wool washed or dyed or combed by a nun who is not a relation, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture.”²

Whatever³ means: he who ...

¹ pahitatta. I take this translation from Mrs. Rhys Davids’s The Birth of Indian Psychology and its Development in Buddhism, p. 347, “the self bedriven”; p. 350, “the man who is pahittatto, he who has the self that has striven.” The commentarial exegesis is usually, if not always, pesitatta, the self expunged, an exegesis in line with the editors’ desire for cessation and waning of the individual self. They were wrongly, though possibly deliberately, deriving pahitatta from pahiṇati, to send, instead of from padahati, to strive. ² Cf. Bu-NP 4, which is referred to under the name of purâna-cīvarasikkhāpada at Vin-a 689. ³ From here to end of this Nissaggiya, cf. Bu-NP 4.2.2.
Monk means: ... is monk to be understood in this case.

(A nun) who is not a relation means: one who is not related on the mother’s side or on the father’s side back through seven generations.

Nun means: one ordained by both Orders.

Wash means: he gives an order—there is an offence of wrong-doing. If washed, it is to be forfeited.¹

Dye means: he gives an order—there is an offence of wrong-doing. If dyed, it is to be forfeited.

Comb means: he gives an order—there is an offence of wrong-doing. If combed it is to be forfeited. It should be forfeited ... to an individual. And thus, monks, should it be forfeited: ‘Honoured sirs, this sheep’s wool, caused by me to be washed by a nun who is not a relation, is to be forfeited. I forfeit it to the Order.’ ... ‘... the Order should give back ... let the venerable ones give back ... I will give back this sheep’s wool to the venerable one.’

If he thinks that a woman is not a relation when she is not a relation and makes her wash sheep’s wool, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he thinks that a woman is not a relation when she is not a relation and makes her wash, makes her dye sheep’s wool, there is an offence of wrong-doing together with an offence involving forfeiture. If he thinks that a woman is not a relation when she is not a relation and makes her wash, makes her comb sheep’s wool, there is an offence of wrong-doing together with an offence involving forfeiture. If he thinks that a woman is not a relation when she is not a relation and makes her wash, makes her dye, makes her comb sheep’s wool, there are two offences of wrong-doing together with an offence involving forfeiture.

If he thinks that a woman is not a relation when she is not a relation and makes her dye sheep’s wool, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he thinks that a woman is not a relation when she is not a relation and makes her dye, makes her comb sheep’s wool, there is an offence of wrong-doing together with an offence involving forfeiture.

¹ In the plural, since animals’ hair or wool, lomāni, is thought of as a plural in Pali.
involving forfeiture. If he thinks that a woman is not a relation when she is not a relation and makes her dye, makes her wash sheep’s wool, there is an offence of wrong-doing together with an offence involving forfeiture. If he thinks that a woman is not a relation when she is not a relation and makes her dye, makes her comb, makes her wash sheep’s wool, there are two offences of wrong-doing together with an offence involving forfeiture.

If he thinks that a woman is not a relation when she is not a relation and makes her comb sheep’s wool, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he thinks that a woman is not a relation when she is not a relation and makes her comb, makes her dye sheep’s wool, there is an offence of wrong-doing together with an offence involving forfeiture. If he thinks that a woman is not a relation when she is not a relation and makes her comb, makes her wash sheep’s wool, there are two offences of wrong-doing together with an offence involving forfeiture. If he thinks that a woman is not a relation when she is not a relation and makes her comb, makes her dye sheep’s wool, there are two offences of wrong-doing together with an offence involving forfeiture.

If he is in doubt as to whether a woman is not a relation ... If he thinks that a woman is a relation when she is not a relation ... If he makes her wash another’s sheep’s wool, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he makes a woman who has been ordained by one (Order only) wash it, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that a woman is not a relation when she is a relation, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether a woman is a relation, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that a woman is a relation when she is a relation, there is no offence.

There is no offence if a female relation is washing it when a woman assistant who is not a relation is (helping); if she washes it unasked; if he makes her wash unused goods tied up in a bundle¹.

¹ Cf. above, BD 2.93, on katabhaṇḍa.
if it is (washed) by a female probationer, by a female novice; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.¹

¹ Cf. above, BD 2.34.
Monks’ Forfeiture (Nissaggiya) 18

... at Rājagaha in the Bamboo Grove at the squirrels’ feeding-place. Now at that time the venerable Upananda,¹ the son of the Sakyans, was dependent as a regular diner on a certain family in Rājagaha. When solid food or soft food came to² that family, a portion from that was set aside for the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans. Now at that time meat came one evening to that family, a portion from that was set aside for the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans. A young boy belonging to that family, getting up in the night towards morning, cried: “Give me meat.” Then the man spoke thus to his wife:

“Give the boy the master’s portion, having got another (portion) in exchange, we will give that to the master.”

Then the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, dressing in the morning and taking his bowl and robe, approached the family, and having approached he sat down on the appointed seat. Then that man approached the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans; having approached, having greeted the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, he sat down at a respectful distance. As he was sitting at a respectful distance, that man spoke thus to the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans:

“Yesterday evening, honoured sir, (some) meat came, a portion from that was set aside for the master. This young boy, honoured sir, got up in the night towards morning and cried: ‘Give me meat,’ and the master’s portion was given to the boy. What could you get with a

¹ See above, BD 2.42, below, BD 2.109. ² uppajjati, cf. above, BD 2.4, BD 2.24, BD 2.90, below, BD 2.153.
kahāpana,¹ honoured sir?”

“(The use of) kahāpanas is given up by me, sir,” he said.

“Yes, honoured sir, it is given up.”

“Nevertheless give me a kahāpana, sir,” he said. Then that man having given the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, a kahāpana, looked down upon, criticised, spread it about, saying:

“As we accept gold and silver,² so do these recluses, sons of the Sakyans, accept gold and silver.”

Monks heard that man who ... spread it about. Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying: “How can the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, accept gold and silver?” Then these monks told this matter to the lord. He said:

“Is it true, as is said, that you, Upananda, accepted gold and silver?”

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked him, saying:

“How can you, foolish man, accept gold and silver?

It is not, foolish man, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk should take gold and silver,³ or should get another to take it (for him), or should consent to its being kept in deposit⁴ (for him), there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture.”

Vin 3.238

Bu-NP 18.2.1

Whatever means: ... is monk to be understood in this case.

¹ (This footnote proved troublesome to typeset due to its length, so it has been moved to an appendix with other long notes on page 2974.) ² (This footnote proved troublesome to typeset due to its length, so it has been moved to an appendix with other long notes on page 2975.) ³ jātarūparajata. Cf. next note above. At Vin 1.245 the lord is recorded to say, “I do not say, monks, that in any way may gold and silver be consented to, may be looked about for.” The Cūḷavagga, in the account of the Council of Vesālī, Vin 2.294ff., includes the acceptance of gold and silver (jātarūparajata) by monks as the last of the ten matters questioned, but ruled not to be permissible. At DN i.5 an ordinary man might say of Gotama that he is one who refrains from accepting jātarūparajata. ⁴ upanikkhittaṁ vā sādiyeyya. See RHYS DAVIDS, Ancient Coins and Measures of Ceylon, p. 7, and Vinaya Texts i.26, n. 4.
Gold means: it is called the colour of the teacher.²
Silver³ means: the kahāpaṇa,⁴ the masaka⁵ of copper,⁶ the māsaka of wood,⁷ the māsaka of lac,⁸ used in business.⁹

Should take means: if he himself takes, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture.

Should get another to take it (for him) means: if he causes another to take it, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture.

Should consent to its being kept in deposit means: if he says: ‘Let this come to be for the master,’ or consents to its being kept in deposit, it is to be forfeited. It should be forfeited in the midst of the Order. And thus, monks, should it be forfeited: That monk, approaching the Order, arranging his upper robe over one shoulder, honouring the feet of the senior monks, sitting down on his haunches, saluting with joined palms, should speak thus: ‘I, honoured sirs, accepted gold and silver,¹⁰ this is to be forfeited by me. I forfeit it to the Order.’¹¹ Having forfeited it, the offence should be confessed.

1 jātarūpa. ² satthuvaṇṇa. ³ rajata. ⁴ See BD 1.28, n. 1; BD 1.71, n. 2; and above, BD 2.100, n. 1. ⁵ See BD 1.71, n. 2, and BD 1.72. ⁶ lohamāsaka. Vin-a 689 says that it is a māsaka (bean) made up of copper and bronze (tamba), etc. ⁷ dārumāsaka. Vin-a 689 says that this is a māsaka made up of strong, durable wood, or of a piece of bamboo, or even of palm leaves, cutting a figure or engraving into it (rūpaṁ chinditvā). ⁸ jatumāsaka. Vin-a 690 says that this is a māsaka made with lac or with resin, on to which a figure has been embossed or introduced (literally caused to be raised up samuṭṭhāpetvā).

It is interesting to note the present-day usage in force in some parts of Tibet: J. Hanbury-Tracy, Black River of Tibet, p. 73, “a collection of shells, short lengths of polished wood with curious markings, bean-pods and round discs. These were the tallies used in tax-collecting.” And BD 2.74, “in some parts of Tibet lumps of silver, in the shape of ponies’ hooves, are used for money.” ⁹ ye vohāraṁ gacchanti. Vin-a 690 says that in all districts where there is business every kind is included, even if made of bone, of hide, of fruit, of seeds of trees, or whether a figure has been raised up on it or not. This passage goes on to say that the things which involve forfeiture are silver, gold, a gold māsaka, a silver māsaka; the things that involve an offence of wrong-doing are pearls and other gems, the seven sorts of grain, slaves, fields, flower-parks and orchards; the things that are allowable include thread, a plough-share, cloth, cotton, cooked pulses, and oil, ghee, butter, honey, molasses as medicine. ¹⁰ rūpiya. ¹¹ Vin-a 691 points out that as rūpiya is not legally allowed (akappiya), neither a group nor an individual may possess it, but only the Order. Therefore it can only be forfeited to the Order.
The offence should be acknowledged by an experienced, competent monk. If an attendant of a monastery or a lay-follower comes there, he should be told: ‘Sir, find out about this.’ If he says: ‘What could be got with this?’ he should not be told: ‘Bring this or that’; oil or ghee or honey or molasses may be mentioned as allowable. If he brings what is allowable, having got it in exchange for this, it may be made use of by all except the one who accepted the gold and silver. If he can undertake to do this in this way,¹ it is well. But if he cannot undertake to do it, he should be told: ‘Sir, remove this.’² If he removes it, it is well. But if he does not remove it, a monk endowed with five qualities³ should be agreed upon as silver-remover⁴: one who would not follow a wrong course through desire, one who would not follow a wrong course through hatred, one who would not follow a wrong course through stupidity, one who would not follow a wrong course through fear,⁵ and one who would know what is removed and what is not removed. And thus, monks, should he be agreed upon: First, the monk is to be requested. Having been requested, the Order should be informed by an experienced, competent monk, saying: ‘Honoured sirs, let the Order listen to me. If it seems right to the Order, the Order should agree upon the monk so and so as silver-remover. This is the motion. Honoured sirs, let the Order listen to me. The Order agrees upon the monk so and so as silver-remover. If it is pleasing to the venerable ones to agree upon the monk so and so as silver-remover, let them be silent; if it is not pleasing, they should speak. The monk ¹ evaṁ ce taṁ labhetha—i.e., to procure what is allowable. This comprises the four medicines (oil, ghee, etc.) mentioned above. Note that the fifth medicine, butter, is absent here. ² imaṁ chāḍdehi. If he cannot go and exchange the rūpiya for something allowable, the rūpiya should be removed, since it is not allowable. ³ Pañciḥ’ aṅgehi samannāgato. Here the qualities are as follows in the text. Another group of qualities are detailed at AN i.162 = SN i.99; these are the constituents of morality, of concentration, of wisdom, of freedom, of freedom by knowledge and insight that are possessed by the adept (asekha)—i.e., the arahan. Cf. below, BD 2.122. ⁴ rūpiya-chāḍdaka. I think that to translate this term as “bullion-remover,” as at Vinaya Texts i.26, n. 4, gives a false notion of the extent of any largesse that a monk might have received. Cf. Thag 620 pupphacchaddaka, a scavenger of flowers, and Vin 4.6, where this is given as one of the low types of work. ⁵ These are the four agatis, see BD 1.323, n. 7.

so and so is agreed upon by the Order as silver-remover, and it is right ... Thus do I understand this.’ It is to be removed by the monk agreed upon making no sign.¹ If, making a sign, he lets it drop, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

If he thinks that it is gold and silver when it is gold and silver, (and) accepts gold and silver, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he is in doubt as to whether it is gold and silver, (and) accepts gold and silver, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he thinks that it is not gold and silver when it is gold and silver, (and) accepts gold and silver, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he thinks that it is gold and silver when it is not gold and silver, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether it is not gold and silver, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it is not gold and silver when it is not gold and silver, there is no offence.

There is no offence if, taking² it or causing (another, to take it within a monastery or within a house,³ he lays it aside, thinking, ‘It will be for him who will take it’⁴; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

¹ The silver-remover must avoid drawing attention to the place where he throws down the rūpiya. ² uggahetvā. ³ ajha-āvasatha. At Vin 4.69ff. āvasatha is a “public rest-house.” But cf. ajjhāvasati, to inhabit, to dwell in a house, above, BD 2.47, n. 5. ⁴ yassa bhavissati so harissati. Probably a monk, whether accepting rūpiya from a lay-person visiting a monastery, or from a lay person whose house he is visiting, should lay it aside at once, so that either the owner may take it again, or someone else may pick it up. Cf. Vin 4.162ff. in reference to a jewel—not given to a monk but picked up by a monk. At all events, in laying it aside, the monk’s responsibility ceases, and he cannot be accused of committing an offence. To be allowed to accept rūpiya at all must be attributed to the courtesy that the monks must display towards the laity: by accepting gifts they confer a boon upon the donors. In view of the anāpatti (no offence) clause, the sikkhāpada (rule) clause even more strongly suggests not that a monk must not take or cause rūpiya to be taken at all, but that he must not take it or cause it to be taken for him with a view to keeping and using it or putting it by in deposit.
Monks’ Forfeiture (Nissaggiya) 19

... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks engaged in various transactions in which gold and silver was used. People ... spread it about saying:

“How can these recluses, sons of the Sakyans, engage in various transactions in which gold and silver is used, like householders who enjoy pleasures of the senses?” Monks heard these people who ... spread it about. Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying:

“How can this group of six monks engage in various transactions in which gold and silver is used?” Then these monks told this matter to the lord. He said:

“Is it true, as is said, that you, monks, engaged in various transactions in which gold and silver is used?”

“It is true, lord,” they said.

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying: “How can you, foolish men, engage in various transactions in which gold and silver is used? It is not, foolish men, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk should engage in various transactions in which gold and silver is used, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture.”

---

¹ samāpājīti, or “came into,” see BD 1.201, n. 3. ² rūpiya-saṁvohāra, which Vina 696 explains as jātarūparajata-panvattana, (involving) the exchange of gold and silver. On rūpiya, jātarūpa and rajata, see above, BD 2.100, n. 2.
Whatever means: ... is monk to be understood in this case.

Various means: shaped¹ and unshaped and (partly) shaped, (partly) unshaped.

Shaped means: intended (as an ornament) for the head, intended (as an ornament) for the neck, intended (as an ornament) for the hand, intended (as an ornament) for the foot, intended (as an ornament) for the hips.

Unshaped means: it is called shaped in a mass.²

(Partly) shaped, (partly) unshaped means: both of these.

Gold and silver³ means: what is the colour of the teacher,⁴ the kahāpaṇa, the māsaka of copper, the māsaka of wood, the māsaka of lac, used in business.⁵

Should engage in means: if he gets shaped in exchange for shaped, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he gets unshaped in exchange for shaped, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he gets (partly) shaped, (partly) unshaped in exchange for shaped, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he gets shaped in exchange for unshaped ... If he gets unshaped in exchange for unshaped ... If he gets (partly) shaped, (partly) unshaped in exchange for unshaped ... If he gets shaped in exchange for (partly) shaped, (partly) unshaped ... If he gets unshaped in exchange for (partly) shaped, (partly) unshaped ... If he gets (partly) shaped, (partly) unshaped in exchange for (partly) shaped, (partly) unshaped ... If he gets (partly) shaped, (partly) unshaped, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. It is to be forfeited in the midst of the Order. And thus, monks, should it be forfeited: That monk, approaching the Order, arranging his upper robe over one shoulder, honouring the feet of the senior monks, sitting down on his haunches, saluting with joined palms, should speak thus: ‘I, honoured sirs, engaged in various transactions in which gold and silver are used; this is to be forfeited by me. I forfeit it to the Order. ’Having forfeited it, the offence should be confessed. The offence should be acknowledged by an experienced, competent monk. If an attendant of a monastery or a lay-follower comes there ... (See Bu-NP 18.2; instead of: except by the one who accepted gold and silver ... and accepts gold and silver read: except by the one who got gold and silver in exchange ... and gets gold and silver in exchange) ... If he thinks that it is gold and silver when it is not gold and silver, (and) gets gold and silver in exchange, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he is in doubt as to whether it is not gold and silver, (and) gets gold and silver in exchange, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he thinks that it is not gold and silver when it is not gold and silver, (and) gets gold and silver in exchange, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether it is not gold and silver, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it is not gold and silver when it is not gold and silver, there is no offence.

---

¹ kata. This means made up into some definite object, an earring or another ornament, for instance, as opposed to akata, unshaped—i.e., still a ghanakata, a (shapeless) mass. ² ghanakata. ³ rūpiya. ⁴ satthuvaṇṇa, see above, BD 2.100, n. 2. ⁵ This definition of rūpiya covers those of jātarūpa and rajata at Vin 3.238, thus giving the impression that rūpiya is a generic term for jātarūpa and rajata. See above, BD 2.100, n. 2.

There is no offence if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.¹

¹ This is the only anāpatti paragraph in the thirty Nissaggiyas where nothing more than these two invariable exemptions are given.
... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at the time the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, came to be skilled in robe-making. He, making an outer cloak of cloth rags, making it well-dyed, well-worked, clothed himself in it. Then a certain wandering student, having clothed himself in a costly cloth, approached the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, and having approached the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, he said:

“Your reverence, this outer cloak of yours is beautiful, give it to me for (this) cloth.”

“Find out about it,” your reverence,” he said.

“Yes, your reverence, I know (about it).”

“Very well, then, your reverence,” he said and gave (it to him).

Then that wandering student, clothing himself in that outer cloak, went to the wandering students’ monastery. The wandering students spoke thus to this wandering student: “This outer cloak of yours is beautiful, your reverence. Where did you get it?”

¹ paṭṭho, to be read throughout as paddha, also said of Upananda at Vin.3.210, of Udāyin at Vin.4.60. See Vin-a 665. ² paṭa-pilotikā, cf. Sn ii.219. ³ paribbājaka, a wanderer, wandering student, wandering teacher. See Rhys Davids, Buddhist India, pp.141ff.; B.M. Barua, Pre-Buddhist Indian Philosophy, p.192, and Dictionary of Pali Proper Names. ⁴ paṭa, or cloak or garment. ⁵ jānāhi. I think that the point of this injunction must be that when the wandering student wished to exchange the garments again (see just below), Upananda refused to do so because he was not going to be “taken in,” and get back the outer cloak which he had managed to barter with the student. For, according to Buddhaghosa (Vin-a 699), his outer cloak was dubbala (worn). ⁶ Special places were given for the accommodation of the wanderers, where they could meet with one another and enter into discussions during their travels. Also, like the Sakyaputtīyas, they did not go on tour during the three months of the rains.

“It was in exchange for my cloth, your reverences.”

“But, your reverence, this outer cloak will do¹ for you for some time (only). That cloth was better for you.”

Then that wandering student, thinking: “What the wandering students said is true. This outer cloak will do for me for some time (only). That cloth was better for me,” approached the venerable Up-ananda, the son of the Sakyans, and having approached he spoke thus to the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans: “Your reverence, here is your outer cloak, give the cloth to me.”

“But, your reverence, did I not say to you, ‘Find out about it’? I will not give it,” he said.

Then that wandering student ... spread it about, saying: “Even householders give back to a householder if he regrets²; but why will one who has gone forth not give back to one who has gone forth?”

Monks heard that wandering student who ... spread it about. Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying: “How can the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, engage in bartering³ together with a wandering student?” Then these monks told this matter to the lord. He said:

“Is it true, as is said, that you, Upananda, engaged in bartering together with a wandering student?”

“It is true, lord,” he said.

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked him, saying:

“How can you, foolish man, engage in bartering together with a wandering student? It is not, foolish man, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk should engage in various kinds of bartering,

¹ bhavissati. ² vipitto. Here it means if he regrets what he has bartered and wants it back again. ³ mavayikakaya, or “buying and selling.” Cetāpeti, to get in exchange, and parivatteti, to exchange or barter (cf. above, BD 2.60, BD 2.67, where the one is defined by the other), also imply a bartering. Here there was no buying and selling, only an exchange of articles.
there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture.”¹

________________________

Whatever means: ... is monk to be understood in this case.

Various means: the requisites of robes, alms-food, lodgings, medicine for the sick, and even a lump of chunam and a toothpick and unwoven thread.²

Should engage in ... bartering means: if he transgresses,³ saying: ‘Give this for that, take this for that, barter this for that, get this in exchange for that,’⁴ there is an offence of wrong-doing. Inasmuch as it is bartered—one’s own goods gone to the hands of another, another’s goods gone to one’s own hands—it is to be forfeited. It should be forfeited ... to an individual. And thus, monks, should it be forfeited: ‘I, honoured sirs, engaged in various kinds of bartering; this is to be forfeited by me. I forfeit it to the Order.’ ... ‘... the Order should give back ... let the venerable ones give back ... I will give back (these goods) to the venerable one.’

If he thinks that it is bartering when it is bartering, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture.⁵ If he is in doubt as to whether it is bartering, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he thinks that it is not bartering when it is bartering, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he thinks that it is bartering when it is not bartering, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether it is not bartering, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it is not bartering when it is not bartering, there is no offence.

________________________

There is no offence if he asks the value, points it out to one who makes it legally allowable,¹ saying: ‘This is ours, and we want this and that’; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

¹ At DN i.5 it is said that an ordinary man might say of Gotama, in speaking praise of him, that he refrains from kayavikka, bartering.² = below, BD 2.161 = Vin 4.154 in definition of lābho. The last three items occur again below, BD 2.149.³ ajjhācarati; cf. BD 1.202, n. 3.⁴ Cf. below, BD 2.135.⁵ There must, I think, be a clause omitted: ‘and engages in bartering.’ Otherwise there is no sense in the offence.

The Second Division: that on Silk

This is its key
Two portions on silk and pure, for six years, a rug,
And two on (sheep’s) wool, on taking, both the various kinds.²

¹ A kappiyakāraka makes a thing allowable by giving it. Vin-a 701, “saying, ‘my utensils are valuable, give your bowl to another.’” ² I.e., rūpiyasaṁvohāra (Bu-NP 19), and kayavikkaya (Bu-NP 20). In the former there was not bartering, but payment in some kind of medium of exchange; in the latter there was exchange and barter, giving and taking.
Monks’ Forfeiture (Nissaggiya) 21

... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks made a hoard of many bowls.¹ People, engaged in touring the dwelling-place² and seeing (this hoard), looked down upon, criticised, spread it about, saying:

“How can these recluses, sons of the Sakyans, make a hoard of many bowls? Will these recluses, sons of the Sakyans, do a trade in bowls or will they set up an earthenware shop?” Monks heard these people who ... spread it about. Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying:

“How can this group of six monks keep an extra bowl?” Then these monks told this matter to the lord. He said:

“Is it true, as is said, that you, monks, keep an extra bowl?”

“It is true, lord.” The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

“How can you, foolish men, keep an extra bowl? It is not, foolish men, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk should keep an extra bowl, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture.”

And thus this rule of training for monks came to be laid down by the lord.

¹ Cf. Vin 4.243. ² vihāra. The laity visited the special vihāras which they themselves supported. This form of interest in the Order’s well-being must have given an added reason for visiting vihāras, like our own way of visiting some charitable or other institution in which we are interested. ³ Cf. above, BD 2.50.
Now at that time¹ an extra bowl had accrued to² the venerable Ānanda, and the venerable Ānanda became desirous of giving this bowl to the venerable Sāriputta; but the venerable Sāriputta was staying at Sāketa. Then it occurred to the venerable Ānanda: “A rule of training laid down by the lord is that an extra bowl should not be kept. And this extra bowl has accrued to me, and I am desirous of giving this bowl to the venerable Sāriputta, but the venerable Sāriputta is staying at Sāketa. Now what line of conduct should be followed by me?” Then the venerable Ānanda told this matter to the lord. He said:

“But, how long, Ānanda, before Sāriputta will come (here)?”

“On the ninth or tenth day, lord,” he said.

Then the lord, on that occasion, in that connection, having given reasoned talk, addressed the monks, saying:

“I allow you, monks, to keep an extra bowl for at most ten days. And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“An extra bowl may be kept for at most ten days. For him who exceeds that (period), there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture.”³

For at most ten days means: it may be kept for ten days at the maximum.⁴

An extra bowl means: one that is not allotted, not assigned.⁵

A bowl⁶ means: there are two kinds of bowls: an iron bowl, a clay bowl.⁷ There are three sizes⁸ for a bowl: a large bowl, a medium-sized bowl, a small bowl. A large bowl means that it takes half an āḷhaka measure of boiled rice, a quarter of that quantity of uncooked rice, a suitable curry. A medium-sized bowl means that it takes a nāḷika measure of boiled rice, a quarter of that quantity of uncooked rice, a suitable curry. A small bowl means that it takes a pattha measure of boiled rice, a quarter of that quantity of uncooked rice, a suitable curry. (A bowl) greater than that is not a bowl, (a bowl) smaller (than that) is not a bowl.

¹ Cf. Bu-NP 1, where the same story is told in the same words about keeping an extra robe. See above, BD 2.4. ² uppanno hoti. ³ At Vin 4.243 the rule is that a hoard of bowls should not be made. There the group of six nuns, as here the group of six monks, are recorded to have made a hoard. There seems some discrepancy between a hoard and an extra bowl. The rule in this Bu-NP 21 may have been altered from “a hoard” to “an extra bowl” to balance that against wearing an extra robe, Bu-NP 1. ⁴ Cf. above, BD 2.6. ⁵ = definition of “extra robe” at BD 2.7 above, and of sannicayaṁ kareyya at Vin 4.244. ⁶ This definition of patta = Vin 4.123, Vin 4.243. ⁷ At Vin 2.112 these two kinds of bowls are “allowed” (anujānāmi). Whoever uses a wooden bowl, a golden or a silver one or one of eight other kinds mentioned there, commits a dukkaṭa offence. ⁸ vañña ti pamāñāṇi, Vin-a 702.

For him who exceeds (that period), there is an offence involving forfeiture means: it is to be forfeited on the eleventh day at sunrise. It should be forfeited to ... an individual. And thus, monks, should it be forfeited: That monk, approaching the Order, arranging his upper robe over one shoulder, honouring the feet of the senior monks, sitting down on his haunches, saluting with joined palms, should speak thus: ‘Honoured sirs, this bowl is to be forfeited by me, the ten days having elapsed. I forfeit it to the Order.’ Having forfeited it, the offence should be confessed. The offence should be acknowledged by an experienced, competent monk; the bowl forfeited should be given (back with the words): ‘Honoured sirs, let the Order listen to me. This bowl of the monk so and so, which had to be forfeited, is forfeited (by him) to the Order. If it seems right to the Order, the Order should give back this bowl to the monk so and so.’

---

1 omaka, inferior, insignificant. RHYS DAVIDS, Ancient Coins and Measures of Ceylon, p.19, calls these “high, middle and low bowls.”

2 For these measures, āḷhaka, nāḷika and pattha, see RHYS DAVIDS, Ancient Coins and Measures of Ceylon, pp.18–20, and BD 1.12, n. 2; BD 1.103, n. 1.

3 tadupiya vyāñjana. On tadupiya see TRENCANNER, Journal of the Pali Text Society 1908, p.131ff., Commentary on Mil 9. He says it is “perhaps properly a Vinaya word.” But it occurs, as he mentions, at SN iii.146, tadupiyaṅca sūpeyyaṁ, translated KS iii.124 “broth for seasoning thereto.” At MN ii.54 we get the same phrase, translated Further Dialogues of the Buddha 2.28 “with curry-stuffs to match.” MN-a 3.287 explains it as tadanurūpa-telaphāñitadini, while Vin-a 703 says: tassa odanassa anurūpaṁ maccha-maṁsa-saka-phala-kaḷirādi byaṅjanaṁ, curry of fish, meat, vegetables, fruits, bamboo-tips suitable to this boiled rice. At Ja 2.160 there is the expression na ca paṅña tadupikā, which is explained to mean, ‘But your wisdom does not match (tadupikā), does not correspond to (anucchavikā) your body’ (which was large).

4 tato ukkaṭṭho apatto, omako apatto. On apattaka, see below, BD 2.123.
That monk, approaching two or three monks ... (See Bu-NP 1.3–Bu-NP 1.4) ... ‘... I will give back this bowl to the venerable one.’ ...

... If he thinks that one is destroyed when it is not destroyed, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he thinks that one is broken\(^1\) when it is not broken, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he thinks that one is stolen when it is not stolen, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. Not forfeiting the bowl which had to be forfeited, if he makes use of it, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that the ten days have elapsed when they have not elapsed, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether the ten days have not elapsed, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that the ten days have not elapsed when they have not elapsed, there is no offence.

____________________

There is no offence if within ten days it is allotted, assigned, bestowed, lost, destroyed, broken, if they tear it from him, if they take it on trust; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.\(^2\)

____________________

Then the group of six monks did not give back a bowl that had been forfeited. They told this matter to the lord. He said: “Monks, a bowl that has been forfeited is not not to be given back. Whosoever should not give it back, there is an offence of wrong-doing.”\(^3\)

\(^1\) In Bu-NP 1, Bu-NP 2, Bu-NP 3, Bu-NP 28 we get “burnt,” of a robe.

\(^2\) Cf. Bu-NP 1, Bu-NP 2, Bu-NP 3, Bu-NP 28 (“burnt”), and Vin 4.245 (“broken”).

\(^3\) See Bu-NP 1, where a similar story is told of a robe that had been forfeited; and Vin 4.245, again a bowl.
... among the Sakyans at Kapilavatthu in the Banyan monastery.¹
Now at that time monks were invited by a certain potter who said: “If these masters need a bowl, I (can supply them) with a bowl.”²
Now at that time monks, not knowing moderation, asked for many bowls. They asked for large bowls for those who had small bowls, they asked for small bowls for those who had large bowls. Then that potter, making many bowls for the monks, could not make other goods for sale,³ and he could not keep himself going and his wife and children suffered. People ... spread it about, saying: “How can these recluses, sons of the Sakyans, not knowing moderation, ask for many bowls? This (man), making many bowls for these (monks), is not able to make other goods for sale, and he cannot keep himself going and his wife and children suffer.”

Monks heard these people who ... spread it about. Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying: “How can these monks, not knowing moderation, ask for many bowls? Then these monks told this matter to the lord. He said:

“Monks, is it true, as is said, that monks, not knowing moderation, asked for many bowls?”
“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

“How, monks, can these foolish men, not knowing moderation, ask for many bowls? It is not, monks, for pleasing those who are not

¹ See above, BD 2.94. ² yesamī ayyānaṁ pattena attho aham pattenā ti. For rest of this par. cf. Bu-Pc 86. ³ vikkāyikam, or “for giving away” — i.e., in exchange or barter; see above, BD 2.110. Cf. Ja 1.201.
(yet) pleased ...” And having rebuked them and given reasoned talk, he addressed the monks, saying:

“Monks, a bowl is not to be asked for. Whoever should ask (for one), there is an offence of wrong-doing.”

Now at that time a certain monk’s bowl became broken. Then it occurred to that monk: “Asking for a bowl is forbidden by the lord,” and being scrupulous; he did not ask (for one); he went about for alms-food (to be put) into his hands. People ... spread it about, saying: “How can these recluses, sons of the Sakyans, go about for alms-food (to be put) into their hands, like followers of other sects?” Monks heard these people who ... spread it about. Then these monks told this matter to the lord. Then the lord on this occasion, in this connection, having given reasoned talk, addressed the monks, saying: “I allow you, monks, when a bowl is destroyed or when a bowl is broken, to ask for a bowl.”

Now at that time the group of six monks said: “It is allowed by the lord to ask for a bowl when a bowl is destroyed or when a bowl is broken”; and these, because (their bowls) were a little broken and a little chipped and a little scratched, asked for many bowls. Then that potter, making many bowls, as before,\(^1\) for the monks, was not able to make other goods for sale, and he did not keep himself going and his wife and children suffered. As before, people ... spread it about, saying: “How can these recluses, sons of the Sakyans, not knowing moderation, ask for many bowls? This (man) making many bowls for these (monks), is not able to make other goods for sale, and he does not keep himself going and his wife and children suffer.” Monks heard these people who ... spread it about. Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying: “How can this group of six monks, when their bowls are a little broken and a little chipped and a little scratched, ask for many bowls?” Then these monks told this matter to the lord. He said:

“Is it true, as is said, that you, monks, when your bowls were a little broken ... asked for many bowls?”

“It is true, lord,” they said.

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

“How can you, foolish men, when your bowls are a little broken ... ask for many bowls? It is not, foolish men, for pleasing those who are not yet pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk should get another new bowl in exchange for a bowl mended\(^2\) in less than five places, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. That bowl is to be forfeited by that monk to the company of monks, and whatever is the last bowl\(^3\) belonging to that company of monks, that should be given to this monk with the words: ‘Monk, this is a bowl for you; it should be kept until it breaks.’\(^4\) That is the proper course in this case.”

\(^1\) tath’ eva, “in that very way,” thus “as before.” \(^2\) bandhanena, from bandhati, to tie together, to unite; and not from bhindati, to break, as appears to have been thought at Vinaya Texts i.27. Critical Pali Dictionary says, “without bands, esp. not riveted (said of alms-bowls).” \(^3\) pattapariyanta. Vin-a 708 says, “the bowl that remains at the end (pariyante) after this handing over.” \(^4\) bhedanāya, bhid. Cf. phrase kāyassa bhedā, on the breaking up of the body.

\(\text{Vin 3.246}\)

\(\text{BD 2.121}\)

\(\text{Bu-NP 22.2.1}\)
A bowl mended in less than five places means: it is not mended, or it is mended in one (place), or it is mended in two (places), or it is mended in three (places), or it is mended in four (places). A bowl with no room for mends means: its rim is not two finger-lengths¹ (in breadth). A bowl with room for mends means: its rim is two finger-lengths (in breadth).

New bowl means: it is so called with reference to the asking for (it).²

Should get in exchange means: he asks for (it). There is an offence of wrong-doing in the action. It is to be forfeited on acquisition. It should be forfeited in the midst of the Order. All should come together taking each the bowl in his keeping.³ An inferior bowl should not be in his keeping if he hopes, ‘I shall receive a costly bowl.’ If an inferior bowl is in his keeping, and he hopes, ‘I shall receive a costly bowl,’ there is an offence of wrong-doing. And thus, monks, should it be forfeited. That monk, approaching the Order, arranging his upper robe over one shoulder, honouring the feet of the senior monks, sitting down on his haunches, saluting with joined palms, should say: ‘Honoured sirs, this bowl, got in exchange by me for a bowl mended in less than five places, is to be forfeited. I forfeit it to the Order.’ Having forfeited it, the offence should be confessed. The offence should be acknowledged by an experienced, competent monk. A monk endowed with five qualities should be agreed upon as assigner of bowls¹: one who would not follow a wrong course through desire, one who would not follow a wrong course through hatred, one who would not follow a wrong course through stupidity, one who would not follow a wrong course through fear,² and one who would know what is taken and what is not taken. And thus, monks, should he be agreed upon. First, the monk is to be requested. Having been requested, the Order should be informed by an experienced, competent monk, saying: ‘Honoured sirs, let the Order listen to me. If it seems right to the Order, the Order should agree upon the monk so and so as assigner of bowls. This is the motion. Honoured sirs, let the Order listen to me. The Order agrees upon the monk so and so as assigner of bowls. If it is pleasing to the venerable ones to agree upon the monk so and so as assigner of bowls, let them be silent; if it is not pleasing, they should speak. The monk so and so is agreed upon by the Order as assigner of bowls, and it is right ... So do I understand.’

¹ dvaṅgulā, as at Vin 2.294, Thig.60. Vin-a 708, commenting upon dvaṅgulā rājī na hoti, says that there is not a rim measuring two finger-lengths below the upper circumference. Cf. Vb-a 343, sattadhaṅnāmāsappamāṇān ēkaṁ angulāṁ. ² Cf. above, BD 2.77, for definition of “new santhata.” ³ adhiṭṭhita-patta. Adhiṭṭhita, from adhiṭṭhati (or adhiṭṭhahati or adhiṭṭheti). This variety of spelling is paralleled by variety of meaning. Critical Pali Dictionary, referring to the above passage, says that adhiṭṭhita-patta is “the obligatory alms-bowl.” Adhiṭṭhita, besides meaning “allotted,” as hitherto rendered, also means “taken in use, taken in possession.” “Allotted bowl” would not be right here, since the “assigner of bowls” is yet to be agreed upon or appointed, which occurs just below. And he is appointed precisely to remedy any tendency of monks to carry an inferior bowl to the meeting of the Order, as though it were his usual one, hoping to get a costly one in its place.

The monk agreed upon should make the bowl pass. He should say to an elder³: ‘Honoured sir, let the elder take the bowl.’⁴ If the elder takes it, the elder’s bowl should be passed to a second.⁵ He should not take it out of regard⁶ for him.⁷ For whoever should not take it, there is an offence of wrong-doing. It should not be made to pass to one ¹ pattagāhāpaka, agent noun from causative gāhāpeti = to make to take, but here “to invite to take,” to say: “be so good as to receive,” “to make the bowl pass from one monk to another.” Cf. Vin 2.177, where it is said that there was no pattagāhāpaka at that time; and AN iii.275, where many of the officials of the Order are mentioned, and are recommended not to be appointed if they follow the four agatis, and cannot make a proper discrimination in their province. ² On the agatis see BD 1.323, n. 7, and cf. above, BD 2.104. Also cf. Vin 1.283 for “receiver of robes” and Vin 2.167 for “assigner of lodgings,” and above, BD 2.104, for “silver-remover.” ³ Vin-a 708, “pointing out what is commendable in the bowl, he should say, ‘This bowl is of the right measure, it is nice and it is suitable for an elder. Take it.’” ⁴ I.e., the new bowl just put at the disposal of the Order. ⁵ To a second elder, according to age. ⁶ anuddayatāya, explained as anukampāya (pity, compassion) at Vin-a 708. But for whoever is contented and says, ‘What good is another bowl to me?’ and does not take it, there is no offence. ⁷ I.e., the elder.

who has what is not a bowl.¹ In this way the bowl should be made to pass down to the youngest member of the Order.²

And whatever is the last bowl belonging to the company of monks should be given to this monk³ with the words⁴: ‘Monk, this is a bowl for you; it should be kept until it breaks’ means: This bowl should not be laid aside by that monk in what is not the right place⁵; it should not be used for improper purposes⁶; it should not be given away⁷ with the words: ‘How can this bowl be lost or destroyed or broken?’ If it is laid aside in the wrong place or used for improper purposes or given away, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

This is the proper course in this case means: this is the appropriate course in this case.

---

¹ apattaka. See Bu-NP 21.3, above, BD 2.115, on apatta. At Vin 1.90 it is said that one who is apattako is not to be ordained. Apattaka means either one who uses what is not a bowl—e.g., gourds and water-pots—or one who has not a bowl—e.g., a titthiya who uses his hands to receive alms-food (Vin 2.114, Vin 2.115). Cf. acivaraka at Vin 1.90, which seems to mean one who has not a robe and who therefore went naked. At Vin 1.93 monks are to be asked at the ordination ceremony whether they are complete as to bowl and robes. ² Everyone receives another bowl, so that the former bowl of the youngest member of the community remains free. ³ I.e., the one who had to forfeit his bowl. ⁴ Doubtless spoken by the “assigner of bowls.” ⁵ adese, on a bench or couch or peg to hang a sunshade on. It is to be laid aside on a stand or stool, Vin-a 709. Dukkha offences for putting bowls away in various wrong ways and places are given at Vin 2.113f. ⁶ I.e., for cooking, colouring or boiling rice-gruel. ⁷ na vissajjetabbu ti aañissa na dátabbo, Vin-a 709.
two places ... in three places ... in four places, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture.

If he gets a bowl with no room for mends in exchange for an unmended bowl, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he gets a bowl that has room for one mend in exchange for an unmended bowl ... If he gets a bowl that has room for four mends in exchange for a bowl that is mended in four places, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture.

If he gets an unmended bowl in exchange for a bowl that has no room for mends, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture ... If he gets a bowl mended in four places in exchange for a bowl that has room for four mends, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture.

If he gets a bowl with no room for mends in exchange for a bowl that has no room for mends ... If he gets a bowl that has room for four mends in exchange for a bowl that has room for four mends, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture.

There is no offence if the bowl is destroyed, if the bowl is broken, if they belong to relations, if they are invited, if it is for another, if it is by means of his own property; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.¹

¹ Cf. above, BD 2.49, BD 2.52, BD 2.57.
... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery.¹ Now at that time the venerable Pilindavaccha,² desiring to make a cave,³ had a (mountain) slope cleared near Rājagaha. Then King Seniya Bimbisāra of Magadha approached the venerable Pilindavaccha, and having approached and greeted the venerable Pilindavaccha, he sat down at a respectful distance. As he was sitting down at a respectful distance, King Seniya Bimbisāra of Magadha spoke thus to the venerable Pilindavaccha:

“What, honoured sir, is the elder having made?”

“Sire, desiring to make a cave, I am having a (mountain) slope cleared,” he said.

“Honoured sir, does the master require an attendant for the monastery?”

“Sire, an attendant for a monastery is not prescribed by the lord.”

“Well, honoured sir, asking the lord, you must tell him of me.”

“Very well, Sire,” the venerable Pilindavaccha answered King Seniya Bimbisāra of Magadha.

Then the venerable Pilindavaccha taught, roused and gladdened King Seniya Bimbisāra of Magadha with dhamma-talk. And when King Seniya Bimbisāra of Magadha had been taught, roused and gladdened with dhamma-talk by the venerable Pilindavaccha, rising up from his seat, greeting the venerable Pilindavaccha, he departed, keeping his right side towards him.

Then the venerable Pilindavaccha sent a messenger to the lord, to say: “Lord, King Seniya Bimbisāra of Magadha desires to present an attendant for a monastery. Now, lord, what line of conduct is to be followed?"

¹ = Vin 1.206–209. ² Cf. BD 1.112. ³ leṇa.

Then the lord, on this occasion, in this connection, having given reasoned talk, addressed the monks, saying: “Monks, I allow an attendant for a monastery.”

Then a second time did King Seniya Bimbisāra of Magadha approach the venerable Pilindavaccha, and having approached and greeted the venerable Pilindavaccha, he sat down at a respectful distance. As he was sitting down at a respectful distance, King Seniya Bimbisāra of Magadha spoke thus to the venerable Pilindavaccha:

“Honoured sir, has the lord prescribed an attendant for a monastery?”

“Yes, Sire,” he said.

“Well, honoured sir, I will give the master an attendant for the monastery.”

Then King Seniya Bimbisāra of Magadha, promising the venerable Pilindavaccha an attendant for the monastery, forgetting (but) remembering after a time, addressed a chief minister who was concerned with all the affairs,¹ saying: “My good man,² has that attendant for the monastery whom I promised, been given to the master?”

“Your Majesty,³ an attendant for the monastery has not been given to the master.”

“My good man, how long is it since it was considered?”

“Then that chief minister, counting up the days, spoke thus to King Seniya Bimbisāra of Magadha: “It is five hundred days,⁴ your Majesty.”

“Well then, give five hundred attendants for the monastery to the master.”

“Very well, your Majesty,” and the chief minister, replying thus to King Seniya Bimbisāra of Magadha, made over to the venerable Pilindavaccha five hundred attendants for the monastery, and a distinct village established itself. They even called it “The Village of the

¹ sabbatthaka mahāmatta. ² bhaṇe. ³ deva. ⁴ “five hundred,” of course, only means “many, several.”
Monastery Attendants,”¹ and they called it Pilinda Village.²

Now at that time the venerable Pilindavaccha came to be dependent (for alms) on the families in this village. Then the venerable Pilindavaccha, dressing in the morning, taking his bowl and robe, entered Pilinda Village for alms-food. Now at that time there came to be a festival in this village; young girls³ wearing ornaments, adorned with garlands, were celebrating it. Then the venerable Pilindavaccha, as he was going about in Pilinda Village on continuous alms-begging, came up to the dwelling of a certain attendant of the monastery, and having come up he sat down on the appointed seat. Now at that time, the daughter of the monastery attendant’s wife, seeing other little girls wearing ornaments, adorned with garlands, cried and said: “Give me a garland, give me an ornament.”

Then the venerable Pilindavaccha said to that monastery attendant’s wife: “Why is this little girl crying?”

“Honoured sir, this little girl is crying because, having seen other little girls wearing ornaments, adorned with garlands, she says: ‘Give me a garland, give me an ornament.’ Whence is there a garland for us who are poor, whence is there an ornament?”

Then the venerable Pilindavaccha, taking a roll of grass,⁴ said to that monastery attendant’s wife: “Now set⁵ this roll of grass on this little girl’s head.” Then that monastery attendant’s wife, taking that roll of grass, set it on the little girl’s head; it became a golden chaplet,⁶ beautiful, good to look upon, charming; there was no golden chaplet like it in the women's quarters of the king. People said to King Seniya Bimbisāra of Magadha:

¹ Ārāmikagamaka. ² Pilindagāmaka. ³ dārikā, with variant reading dārakā. Oldenberg at Vin 3.278, referring to this passage and to the one immediately following, says, ‘I think we ought to read dārakā, dārake.’ See also his notes at Vin 3.382. I think, however, that it is not necessary to take the reading dārakā. The point probably is that the daughter of the monastery attendant’s wife was jealous of “other little girls,” rather than of the children in general. ⁴ tiṇaṇḍupakan ti tiṇacumbaṭakaṁ, Vin-a 709. This is the circular roll or coil of grass (or cloth) which Indians put on the head when they are carrying baskets, water-vessels, etc., on the head. One type of wife, Vin 3.139, is called obhatacumbaṭa, one from whom the pad (for the burdens she carries on her head) is taken. At Ja 1.208 we get the word cumbaṭakalaha, a quarrel about a head-pad. ⁵ paṭimuṇci. Buddhaghosa at Vin-a 709 says paṭimuṇci ti ṭhapesi. ⁶ suvaṇṇamālā; Vin-a 709 says a chaplet of golden lotuses.

“Your Majesty, in the house of a certain monastery attendant there is a golden chaplet, beautiful, good to look upon, charming; there is no golden chaplet like it in the women's quarters of your Majesty. As he is poor, where (could he have got it) from? Undoubtedly it was taken by theft.”

Then King Seniya Bimbisāra of Magadha had that monastery attendant’s family imprisoned. A second time did the venerable Pilindavaccha, dressing in the morning, taking his bowl and robe, enter Pilinda Village for alms-food. As he was going about in Pilinda Village on continuous alms-begging, he came up to that monastery attendant’s dwelling, and having come up, he asked the neighbours: “Where has this monastery attendant’s family gone?”

“Honoured sir, they have been imprisoned by the king on account of that golden chaplet,” they said.

Then the venerable Pilindavaccha went up to the residence of King Seniya Bimbisāra of Magadha, and having gone up he sat down on the appointed seat. Then King Seniya Bimbisāra of Magadha approached the venerable Pilindavaccha, and having approached and greeted the venerable Pilindavaccha, he sat down at a respectful distance. As he was sitting down at a respectful distance, the venerable Pilindavaccha said to King Seniya Bimbisāra of Magadha: “How is it, Sire, that the monastery attendant’s family is imprisoned?”

“Honoured sir, in that monastery attendant’s house there was a golden chaplet, beautiful, good to look upon, charming; there is no golden chaplet like it in our women’s quarters. Where (could he have got it) from, as he is poor? Undoubtedly it was taken by theft.”

Then the venerable Pilindavaccha exercised volitional force,¹ and said: “The palace¹ of King Seniya Bimbisāra of Magadha is golden,” and it became made all of gold.² He said: “Now, Sire, from where have you got so much gold?”

Saying, “I understand, honoured sir, this is the master’s majesty of psychic potency,” he set free the monastery attendant’s family. People, delighted, full of satisfaction because they heard that a state of further-men, a wonder of psychic potency had been shown by master Pilindavacchha to the king and his retinue, presented the five kinds of medicine to the venerable Pilindavacchha, that is to say ghee, fresh butter, oil, honey, molasses. Now the venerable Pilindavacchha was customarily a receiver,³ so when he received the five kinds of medicine he gave them away among his company. And his company came to live in abundance; whatever they received, filling pots and pitchers, they put them away, and filling water-strainers and bags, they hung them up⁴ in the windows. These (pots, etc.) were leaking,⁵ and the dwelling-places became beset and overrun⁶ by rats. People seeing (this) as they were engaged in touring the dwelling-places, looked down upon, criticised, spread it about, saying: “These recluses, sons of the Sakyans, are storing up goods indoors,⁷ like King Seniya Bimbisāra of Magadha.” Monks heard these people who ... spread it about. Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying: “How can monks strive after abundance such as this?” Then these monks told this matter to the lord. He said:

“Is it true, as is said, monks, that monks strive after abundance such as this?”

“It is true, lord,” they said.

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

¹ pāsāda, see above, BD 2.16, n. 5. ² Mentioned at Kv 608. ³ lábhin. He usually got plenty of alms-food, etc., and so did not need the extra amount. ⁴ lageti, or perhaps “packed.” Cf. Vin 2.152, where monks thavikāyo laggenti, hung up or packed up their bags at the foot of beds and chairs. ⁵ olīnavilīnā tiṭṭhanti, were sticking and melting, hence they let through their contents, and hence there came to be rats. The Colombo and Siamese editions of Vin-a read heṭṭhā ca abhato-passtsu ca gālītānī, leaking through the bottom and the sides. ⁶ okiṇṇavikīṇṇā. ⁷ antokotṭhāgārikā. At Ja 3.364, mahicchā ime samaṇā anto°.

560
“Monks, how can these foolish men strive after abundance such as this? It is not, monks, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth.¹

“Those medicines which may be partaken of² by ill monks, that is to say, ghee, fresh butter, oil, honey, molasses: accepting these, they may be used as a store for at most seven days. For him who exceeds that (period), there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture.”³

Those medicines which are partaken of by ill monks means: ghee⁴ is called ghee from cows or ghee from she-goats or ghee from buffaloes; ghee from those whose meat is suitable. Fresh butter means: fresh butter from just these. Oil means: sesame oil, oil of mustard seeds, oil containing honey,⁵ oil of the castor-oil plant, oil from tallow.⁶ Honey means: honey of bees.⁷ Molasses means: what is produced from sugar-cane.

Accepting these, they may be used as a store for at most seven days means: they may be used for seven days at the maximum.

For him who exceeds that (period) there is an offence involving forfeiture means: it is to be forfeited on the eighth day at sunrise. It should be forfeited to ... an individual. And thus, monks, should it be forfeited: ‘Honoured sirs, seven days having elapsed, this medicine of mine is to be forfeited. I forfeit it to the Order.’ ...

¹ At Vin 1.209 instead of this paragraph read, “having rebuked them and given reasoned talk, he addressed the monks, saying:” ² paṭisāyaniyāni ti paṭisāyitab-bāni paribhuñjitabbāni ti attho, Vin-a 710. ³ Vin 1.209, “exceeding that (time) is a matter to be dealt with according to the rule.” From beginning of Bu-NP 23 to here = Vin 1.206–209. Cf. Bu-Pc 38 for rule against eating food that has been stored. The Gandharajātaka (Ja 3.363) was told in reference to this rule.

Beginning with the above rule, the order of the Nissaggiyas which follow is different in the Pali, Sanskrit and Chinese texts. See Le Prātimoksasūtra des Sarvāstivādins, ed. Finot, J.Bu-As, Nov–Dec, 1913, p. 39 (= 499). ⁴ = Vin 4.88, to “sugar-cane,” below. ⁵ madhukatela, or “of the honey-tree,” madhuka being the tree Bassia latifolia. Madhukapuppharasa, not allowed at Vin 1.246; translated at Vinaya Texts ii.133 “liquorice-juice.” ⁶ vasā. At Vin-a 714 five kinds of vasā are given: that from bears, fish, alligators, pigs, donkeys. ⁷ makkhikāmadhu. The bee is called madhumakkhikā.
‘... the Order should give back ... let the venerable ones give back ...
May I give back this medicine to the venerable one?’

If he thinks that seven days have elapsed when they have elapsed, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he is in doubt as to whether the seven days have elapsed, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he thinks that the seven days have elapsed when they have not elapsed, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he thinks that it is allotted¹ when it is not allotted, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he thinks that it is bestowed when it is not bestowed ... If he thinks that it is lost when it is not lost ... If he thinks that it is destroyed when it is not destroyed ... If he thinks that it is burnt when it is not burnt, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he thinks that it is stolen when it is not stolen, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture.

Acquiring something that has been forfeited,² it must not be made use of for bodily enjoyment,³ it must not be consumed, it may be done into⁴ a lamp or black colour,⁵ it may be made use of by another monk for bodily enjoyment, it must not be consumed (by him). If he thinks that the seven days have not elapsed when they have elapsed, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether the seven days have not elapsed, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that the seven days have not elapsed when they have not elapsed, there is no offence.

There is no offence if within seven days it is allotted, bestowed, lost, destroyed, burnt; if they tear it from them; if they take it on trust;

¹ This and the next five cases = Vin 3.197, Vin 3.262, except that avikappita, assigned, does not occur above. For adhiṭṭhita see above, BD 2.7, n. 1. ² nissaṭṭha, cf. above, BD 2.8. ³ Such as anointing the limbs. ⁴ upanetabbani, from upa + yāhī, to bring to. ⁵ kālavaṇṇe. Exact significance unknown, but with padīpa (lamp) is another use for oil, since Vin-a 718 uses the verb makkhetti.
if it is sacrificed, renounced, given up\(^1\) to one who is not ordained; if one devoid of longing,\(^2\) giving (and) acquiring, makes use of it; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

\(^1\) At Vin 3.96 and MN i.37 catto vanto mutto pahino. Vin-a 719, “if the medicine is sacrificed, renounced, given up for the sake of one’s mind, the mind is sacrificed, renounced, given up, then the man is called devoid of longing as to his mind; it means, thus being devoid of longing, giving to a sāmaṇera (novice).”

\(^2\) anapekkha.
... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time a cloth for the rains¹ came to be allowed to monks by the lord.² The group of six monks, saying: “A cloth for the rains is allowed by the lord,” looked about beforehand for robe-material as cloths for the rains, (and) making them beforehand, they put them on, (but going) naked because the cloths for the rains were old, they let their bodies get wet with the rain. Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying: “How can this group of six monks look about beforehand for robe-material as cloths for the rains, (and) making them beforehand put them on, (but) because the cloths for the rains are old, (going) naked,³ let their bodies get wet with the rain?” Then these monks told this matter to the lord. He said:

¹ vassikasāṭikā. These are cloth garments used instead of the robes, for these had been found to become wet and heavy during the rains, Vin 1.253. At Vin 2.177 we get sāṭikā- (= sāṭika-) gāhāpaka, translated at Vinaya Texts iii.223 “receiver of under-garments.” But gāhāpaka is “assigner,” see above, BD 2.122, n. 1. Udakasāṭika occurs at e.g. Vin 1.294, Vin 4.278–279, meaning bathing-cloths (for nuns). This was not a cloth that was put on on top of or under the robes, but was worn instead of them. In the same way the vassikasāṭikā were worn by monks to save the robes and the discomfort of wearing wet robes. At Vin 4.172 the group of six monks had their vassikasāṭikā made to an unsuitable measure. The right measure was therefore prescribed, and was to be in length six spans of the accepted length, in breadth two and a half spans. As editor of Vinaya Texts ii.225, note (q.v.) observes: “this is just enough to go round the loins from the waist half down to the knee.” At Vin 4.173 vassikasāṭikā are defined as “for the four months of the rains,” while at Vin 1.297 it is allowed to allot cloths for the rains during the four months of the rains, after that time to assign them. ² Vin 1.294; the giving of vassikasāṭikā was one of the eight boons conferred upon Visākhā. ³ Cf. above, BD 2.45, where monks complained of monks going naked.
“Is it true, as is said, that you, monks, looking about beforehand for robe-material as cloths for the rains, (and) making them beforehand put them on, (but) because the cloths for the rains were old, (going) naked, you let your bodies get wet with the rain?”

“It is true, lord,” they said.

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

“How can you, foolish men, looking about before-hand for robe-material as cloths for the rains, (and) making them beforehand put them on, (but) because the cloths for the rains were old, (going) naked, let your bodies get wet with the rain? It is not, foolish men, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“If he thinks, ‘A month of the hot weather remains,’ robe material as a cloth for the rains should be looked about for by that monk. If he thinks, ‘Half a month of the hot weather remains,’ making it, it should be put on. If he thinks, ‘More than a month of the hot weather remains,’ and should look about for robe material as a cloth for the rains; if he thinks, ‘More than half a month of the hot weather remains,’ and making it, should put it on, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture.”

If he thinks, ‘A month of the hot weather remains,’ robe material as a cloth for the rains should be looked about for by that monk means: having approached those people who formerly gave robe material as cloths for the rains, he may speak to them thus: ‘It is the time for robe-material as cloths for the rains, it is the season for robe-material as cloths for the rains, and other people are giving robe-material as cloths for the rains.’ He should not say, ‘Give me robe-material as a cloth for the rains, bring me robe-material as a cloth for the rains, barter¹ robe-material for me as a cloth for the rains, get in exchange robe-material for me as a cloth for the rains.’

If he thinks, ‘Half a month of the hot weather remains,’ making it, it should be put on means: making it in the half month of the hot weather remaining, it should be put on.

¹ parivattetha. Cf. above, BD 2.60, BD 2.67, BD 2.111.

If he thinks, 'More than a month of the hot weather remains' means: if he looks about for robe-material as a cloth for the rains while over a month of the hot weather remains,¹ there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture.

If he thinks, 'More than half a month of the hot weather remains,' making it he puts it on while more than half a month of the hot weather remains, it is to be forfeited. It should be forfeited to ... an individual. And thus, monks, should it be forfeited: 'Honoured sirs, this robe-material as a cloth for the rains was looked about for by me while more than a month of the hot weather remained; making it, it was put on² while more than half a month of the hot weather remained; it is to be forfeited. I forfeit it to the Order.' ... '... the Order should give back ... let the venerable ones give back ... I will give back this cloth for the rains to the venerable one.'

If he thinks that more than a month of the hot weather remains when there is more, and looks about for robe-material as a cloth for the rains, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he is in doubt as to whether more than a month of the hot weather remains, and looks about for robe-material as a cloth for the rains, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he thinks that less than a month of the hot weather remains when there is more, and looks about for robe-material as a cloth for the rains, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he thinks that more than half a month of the hot weather remains when there is more, (and) making it, puts it on, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he is in doubt as to whether more than half a month of the hot weather remains, (and) making it, puts it on, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he thinks that less than half a month of the hot weather remains when there is more, (and) making it, puts it on, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If (going) naked, although there is a cloth for the rains, he lets his body get wet with the rain, there is an offence of wrong-doing.\(^1\) If he thinks that more than a month of the hot weather remains when there is less, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether less than a month of the hot weather remains, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that less than a month of the hot weather remains when there is less, there is no offence. If he thinks that more than half a month of the hot weather remains when there is less, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether less than half a month of the hot weather remains, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that less than half a month of the hot weather remains when there is less, there is no offence.

¹ attirekamāse sese gimhâne. ² paridahita here replaces a past participle of nivāseti, otherwise used in this story.

\(^{\text{Vin 3.254}}\)

There is no offence if, thinking, ‘A month of the hot weather remains,’ he looks about for robe-material as a cloth for the rains;
if, thinking, ‘Half a month of the hot weather remains,’ making it, he puts it on; if, thinking, ‘Less than a month of the hot weather remains,’ he looks about for robe-material as a cloth for the rains;
if, thinking, ‘Less than half a month of the hot weather remains,’ making it, he puts it on; if the cloth for the rains that has been looked for is worn out during the rains\(^2\); if the cloth for the rains that has been put on is worn out during the rains; washing them, they should be laid aside, they should be put on (again) at the right season. (There is no offence) if the robe-material is stolen,\(^3\) if the robe-material is destroyed,\(^4\) if there are accidents; if he is mad, if he is the first wrongdoer.

\(^{\text{Vin 3.254}}\)

\(^{\text{BD 2.138}}\)

1 Cf. above, BD 2.45, n. 3. 2 vassaṁ ukkaddhiyyati. Vin-a 721 gives khepetvā khepeti perhaps meaning “to cause to waste.” Ukkaddhiyyati is perhaps “worn out,” cf.
kārtita, from \(√kṛṣ\), one of whose meanings is given as “worn out” in Monier-Williams’ Dictionary. Avakāṛṣati (ava-kṛṣ) can also mean “to take off.” Kṣāpayati given by Monier-Williams as “to destroy, ruin, make an end of, finish.” 3 acchinna-cīvara-ti etam vassikasāti kam sandhāya vuttaṁ, Vin-a 723. It might be stolen by thieves when the monks were bathing. 4 nāṭṭhacīvara, see above, BD 2.47, BD 2.48.
... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans,¹ said to the monk who shared his brother’s cell: “Come, your reverence, we will set out on a tour of the country.”

“I will not go, honoured sir,” he said, “my robe is worn thin.”²

“Come, your reverence, I will give you a robe,” he said and he gave him a robe. Then that monk heard: “It is said that the lord will set out on a tour of the country.” Then it occurred to that monk: “I will not set out on a tour of the country with the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans; I will set out on a tour of the country with the lord.”

Then the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, said to that monk: “Come now, your reverence, we will set out on a tour of the country.”

“I will not set out on a tour of the country with you, honoured sir, I will set out on a tour of the country with the lord.”

“But that robe, your reverence, which I gave you, that will set out on a tour of the country with me,” he said, and angry and displeased,³ he tore it away.⁴ Then that monk told this matter to the monks. Those who were modest monks … spread it about, saying: “How can the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, himself having given a robe to a monk, angry and displeased, tear it away?” Then these monks told this matter to the lord. He said:

“Is it true, as is said, that you, Upananda, yourself having given a

¹ See above, Bu-NP 6, Bu-NP 18, Bu-NP 20. ² dubbala. ³ kupito anattamano, said of Devadatta at Vin 2.189. ⁴ Vin-a 723, by force, balakkārena aggahesi.
monks’ forfeiture (niṣṣaggiya) 25 robe to a monk, angry and displeased, tore it away?”

“It is true, lord,” he said.

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked him, saying:

“How can you, foolish man, yourself having given a robe to a monk, angry and displeased, tear it away? It is not, foolish man, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk, himself having given a robe to a monk, angry and displeased, should tear it away or should cause it to be torn away, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture.”¹

Whatever means: ... is monk to be understood in this case.
To a monk means: to another monk.
Himself means: himself² having given.
A robe means: any one robe of the six (kinds of) robes (including) the least one fit for assignment.³

Angry, displeased means: dissatisfied, the mind worsened, stubborn.⁴

Should tear it away means: if he tears it away himself, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture.

Should cause it to be torn away means: if he commands another, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If having commanded once, he then tears many away,⁵ it is to be forfeited. It should be forfeited to ... an individual. And thus, monks, should it be forfeited: ‘Honoured sirs, having myself given this robe to a monk, it was torn away by me; it is to be forfeited. I forfeit it to the Order.’ ... ‘... the Order should give back ... let the venerable ones give back ... I will give back this robe to the venerable one.’

Having given a robe to one who is ordained thinking that he is

¹ Cf. Bu-Pc 81. ² sāmaṁ explained by sayaṁ. ³ Cf. above, BD 2.7, BD 2.40, BD 2.48. ⁴ Cf. BD 1.281; Vin 4.236; MN i.101. ⁵ Vin-a 723, “if he commands, ‘take robe-material,’ there is an offence of wrong-doing; if, having commanded, he says, ‘take many,’ there is an offence of expiation. If he says, ‘take the outer cloak, the inner and the upper robes,’ for each speech there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he says, ‘take everything given by me,’ for one speech made there are many offences.”
ordained, if angry and displeased, he tears it away or causes it to be torn away, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he is in doubt as to whether one is ordained, (then if) angry and displeased he tears it away or causes it to be torn away, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. Having given a robe to one who is ordained thinking that he is not ordained, if angry and displeased, he tears it away or causes it to be torn away, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. Having given another requisite, if angry and displeased, he tears it away or causes it to be torn away, there is an offence of wrong-doing. Having given another requisite to one who is not ordained, (then if) angry and displeased, he tears it away or causes it to be torn away, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that one is ordained when he is not ordained, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether one is not ordained, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that one is not ordained when he is not ordained, there is an offence of wrong-doing.¹

There is no offence if he gives it or takes (from him) in a friendly manner²; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

---

¹ Here text is surely corrupt, for instead of āpatti dukkaṭassa it should read anāpatti. Oldenberg gives no variant reading. ² vissasanto, putting his trust in him. Text reads vissāsanto; Sinhalese edition vissasanto, which is rather more correct, being from viśvasiti.
Monks’ Forfeiture (Nissaggiya) 26

... at Rājagaha in the Bamboo Grove at the squirrels’ feeding-place. At that time the group of six monks, at the time of robe-making, asked for much yarn,¹ so that when the robe-material was made much yarn came to be over. Then it occurred to the group of six monks: “Now then, your reverences, let us, asking for more yarn, have robe-material woven by weavers.” Then the group of six monks, asking for more yarn, had robe-material woven by weavers, but when the robe-material was woven much yarn came to be over. A second time did the group of six monks, asking for more yarn, have robe-material woven by weavers, but when the robe-material was woven much yarn came to be over. A third time did the group of six monks, asking for more yarn, have robe-material woven by weavers. People ... spread it about, saying:

“How can these recluses, sons of the Sakyans, themselves asking for yarn, have robe-material woven by weavers?”

Monks heard these people who ... spread it about. Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying:

“How can the group of six monks, themselves asking for yarn, have robe-material woven by weavers?” Then these monks told this matter to the lord. He said:

“Is it true, as is said, that you, monks, yourselves asking for yarn, had robe-material woven by weavers?”

“It is true, lord,” they said.

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

“How can you, foolish men, yourselves asking for yarn, have robe-

¹ sutta, yarn or thread.
material woven by weavers? It is not, foolish men, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk, himself asking for yarn, should have robe-material woven by weavers, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture.”

Whatever means: ... is monk to be understood in this case.
Himself means: himself asking.
Yarn means: the six (kinds of) yarn¹: linen, cotton, silk, wool,² coarse hempen cloth,³ canvas.⁴

By weavers⁵ means: if he has it woven by weavers⁶ there is an offence of wrong-doing in the action. It is to be forfeited on acquisition; it should be forfeited to ... an individual. And thus, monks, should it be forfeited: ‘Honoured sirs, this robe caused by me to be woven by weavers, having myself asked for the yarn, is to be forfeited. I forfeit it to the Order.’ ... ‘... the Order should give back ... let the

¹ These are the six kinds of thread for making the six kinds of robe-materials that are allowable to monks. These latter are given in this order at e.g. Vin 1.58 = Vin 1.96, and especially see Vin 1.281, where they are allowed. The six kinds of robe-materials or robes are referred to at e.g. Vin 3.210, Vin 3.213. ² Vin-a 724, yarn of sheep’s wool. ³ The wearing of sāṇa was one of the practices adopted by wanderers belonging to other sects, DN i.166, DN iii.41, AN i.240, MN i.78, Pp 55. The commentaries explain sāṇa by using the word itself, as either sāṇavākasutta (Vin-a 724, yarn of the bark of sāṇa), sāṇa-vākacelāni (DN-a 356 = AN-a 2.354, garments of ...), sāṇavāka-mayaṁ (SN-a i.159, made of ...). Sāṇa was probably a plant, see next note below. At SN ii.202 Kassapa insisted on wearing, and at SN ii.222 accepted from the lord his own, sāṇāni paṁsukūlāni, coarse hempen rag-robes. ⁴ bhaṅga. Vin-a 724, Vin-a 1199 give two meanings: (1) thread made of bark, (2) thread mixed with these five other threads. See Joges Chandra Ray, IHQ. xv.2, 1939, p.197, “the inner bark of the plant yields a strong fibre, fit for strings and ropes, and a coarse cloth, canvas, is woven.” In identifying Bhaṅgā with Soma, the relation of bhaṅga to sāṇa is also brought out, for, according to the lexicographers quoted by Chandra Ray, they also are identical; and the commentarial explanations, that sāṇāni are said to be of bark, are illuminated. I am indebted to this article for the suggestion that “canvas” is a possible translation of bhaṅga. ⁵ tantavāya. ⁶ pesakāra. Cf. Vin 4.7. Monier-Williams: “peśaskāri, f., Ved. a woman who weaves artistically or embroiders.” venerable ones give back ... I will give back this robe to the venerable one.’

If he thinks that it was caused to be woven when it was caused to be woven, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he is in doubt as to whether it was caused to be woven, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he thinks that it was not caused to be woven when it was caused to be woven, there is an offence of wrongful-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether it was not caused to be woven, there is an offence of wrongful-doing. If he thinks that it was not caused to be woven when it was not caused to be woven, there is no offence.

It is no offence to sew a robe¹ to a binding,² to a belt,³ to a shoulder-strap,⁴ to a bag for carrying the bowl in,⁵ to a water-strainer⁶; if it belongs to relations; if they are invited; if it is for another; if it is by means of his own property⁷; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

---

¹ Vin-a 727 says that there is no offence in asking for thread (or yarn) to sew a robe.
² Āyoga. At Vin 2.135 the use of āyoga is allowed to monks. The word is translated at Vinaya Texts iii.141 as “handicraft.” But I think that because the monks ask how an āyoga should be made (omitted at Vinaya Texts iii.141), and are allowed the apparatus belonging to a loom, āyoga should be rendered “bandage” or “binding” in that passage. Cf. Vv 33 (p. 30), where āyogapāṭṭa (preceeded by aṁsavaṭṭaka and that by kāyabandhana) means “strip, bandage.” ³ kāyabandhana. At Vin 2.136 belts or waist-bands were allowed to monks. ⁴ aṁsabandhaka. At Vin 1.204, Vin 2.114 shoulder-straps are allowed to monks. ⁵ pattatthavikā; allowed at Vin 2.114. ⁶ Allowed at Vin 2.118. These five articles are mentioned together again as not giving rise to an offence at Vin 4.170. ⁷ Cf. above, BD 2.27, BD 2.49, BD 2.52, BD 2.57, BD 2.125.
... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. At that time a certain man, going off on a journey,¹ said to his wife:

“Weighing² yarn, give it to a certain weaver; getting him to weave robe-material, take care of it; when I come back I will present³ master Upananda⁴ with robe-material.”

A certain monk, as he was going for alms, heard this man as he was speaking thus. Then this monk approached the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, and having approached he spoke thus to the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans:

“You, reverend Upananda, are of great merit,⁵ for at a certain place a certain man, going off on a journey, said to his wife: ‘Weighing yarn ... I will present master Upananda with robe-material.’”

“Sir, he is my supporter,” he said. For this very weaver was the supporter of the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans. Then the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, approached this weaver, and having approached he spoke thus to the weaver:

“Sir, this robe-material is being specially woven for me; make it long and wide and rough,⁶ make it evenly woven⁷ and well woven⁸

---

¹ pavāsaṁ gacchanto. ² dhārayita ti tuletvā, Vin-a 727. Tuleti is to weigh. ³ acchādeti, see above, BD 2.53, n. 2. ⁴ Cf. Bu-NP 6, Bu-NP 18, Bu-NP 20, Bu-NP 25. ⁵ Same thing said to Upananda at Vin 1.300 and Vin 3.215, Vin 3.217 (BD 2.53, BD 2.58, above). ⁶ Here “soft,” the opposite of “rough,” is omitted. Cf. above, BD 2.56. ⁷ suvīta. Vin-a 727, sabbaṭṭhanesu sammatvatvā, making it level (or even) everywhere. ⁸ suppavāyita. Vin-a 727, sabbaṭṭhaṁsasaṁkatvā tante pasāritaṁ, making it level everywhere, it is stretched on a loom. Really suppavāyita is a synonym for suvīta.
and well scraped\(^1\) and well combed.\(^2\)

“Honoured sir, having weighed this yarn, they gave it to me, saying, ‘Weave robe-material with this yarn.’ Honoured sir, I am not able to make it long or wide or rough, but I am able, honoured sir, to make it evenly woven and well woven and well scraped and well combed.”

“You, if you please, sir, make it long and wide and rough; there will not come to be a shortage\(^3\) of this yarn.”

Then that weaver, as soon as the yarn had been brought,\(^4\) setting it up on the loom, went up to that woman, and having gone up he said to that woman: “The master wants yarn.”

“Were not you, master, told by me: ‘Weave robe-material with that yarn’?”

“It is true that I, lady, was told by you: ‘Weave robe-material with this yarn’; but master Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, said to me: ‘You, if you please, sir, make it long and wide and rough; there will not come to be a shortage of this yarn.’”

Then that woman gave a second time\(^5\) just as much yarn as she had given at first. Then the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, heard it said that “The man is come back from his journey.” Then the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, approached that man’s dwelling and having approached he sat down on the appointed seat. Then that man approached the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, and having approached and greeted the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, he sat down at a respectful distance. As he was sitting down at a respectful distance, that man said to his wife: “Is that robe-material woven?”

“Yes, master, that robe-material is woven.”

---

\(^{1}\) suvilekhita. Vin-a 727 says lekhaniyā suṭṭhu vilikhitāṁ. Perhaps it means that the yarn is well scraped so as to remove any rough bits, but the meaning of lekhani is doubtful.

\(^{3}\) paṭibaddhan ti vekallaṁ. Vin-a 727–728, perhaps “a refusal, a holding back, an obstruction with regard to.”

\(^{4}\) yathābhataṁ suttāṁ. See meanings of yathābhataṁ in Pali-English Dictionary.

\(^{5}\) pacchā, afterwards.
“Bring it, I will present master Upananda with robe-material.” Then that woman bringing that robe-material and giving it to her husband, told him this matter. Then that man, giving that robe-material to the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, looked down upon, criticised, spread it about, saying:

“These recluses, sons of the Sakyans, have great desires, they are not contented; it is not easy to present them with robe-material. How can master Upananda, before being invited by me, going up to a householder’s weavers, put forward a consideration with regard to robe-material?”

Monks heard that man who ... spread it about. Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying: “How can the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, before being invited, going up to a householder’s weavers, put forward a consideration with regard to robe-material?” Then these monks told this matter to the lord.

“Is it true, as is said, that you, Upananda, before being invited, going up to a householder’s weavers, put forward a consideration with regard to robe-material?”

“It is true, lord,” he said.

“Is he a relation of yours, Upananda, or not a relation?”

“He is not a relation, lord.”

“Foolish man, one who is not a relation does not know what is suitable or what is unsuitable, or what is right or what is wrong for one who is not a relation. Thus will you, foolish man, before being invited, going up to a householder’s weavers, put forward a consideration with regard to robe-material. It is not, foolish man, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“A man or a woman householder who is not a relation may cause robe-material to be woven by weavers for a monk. Then if that monk, before being invited, going up to the weavers, should put forward a consideration with regard to the robe-material, saying: ‘Now sirs, this robe-material is being specially woven for

¹ Cf. above, BD 2.53.
monks’ forfeiture (nissaggiya) 27

For a monk⁴ means: for the good of a monk, making a monk an object, being desirous of presenting to a monk.

A man who is not a relation means: one who is not related on the mother’s side or on the father’s side back through seven generations.

A householder means: he who lives in a house.

A woman householder means: she who lives in a house.

By weavers means: by weavers.⁵

Robe-material means: any one robe-material of the six (kinds of) robe-material including the least one fit for assignment.⁶

May cause to be woven means: causes to be woven.

If that monk means: the particular monk for whom the robe-material is being woven.

Before being invited means: before it was said (to him): ‘What kind of robe-material do you want, honoured sir? What kind of robe-material shall I have woven for you?’

Going up to the weavers means: going to the house, approaching (them) anywhere.

Should put forward a consideration with regard to the robe-material means: he says: ‘Now sirs, this robe-material is being specially woven for me. Make it long and wide and rough, and make it evenly woven and well woven and well scraped and well combed. If

¹ āyasmatānaṁ. Polite, perhaps here cajoling, form of address. Cf. above, BD 2.54.
² Anupadajjeyyāma.
³ piṇḍapātamaṭṭam; piṇḍapāta is the alms-food, but enough was usually received for the daily meal to fill a begging-bowl. See Old Commentary, below.
⁴ For the remainder of this Nissaggiya cf. Bu-NP 8.2.
⁵ tantavāyehi ti pesakārehi, cf. above, BD 2.143.
⁶ Cf. above, BD 2.40, BD 2.48, BD 2.140.
you do so we could give the venerable ones something or other in addition.’

And if the monk, speaking thus, should give something or other in addition, even as little as the contents of a begging-bowl means: the contents of a begging-bowl are called conjey and rice¹ and solid food and a lump of chunam² and a tooth-pick and unwoven thread, and he even speaks dhamma.³

If according to what he says, he makes it long or wide or rough, there is an offence of wrong-doing in the action. It is to be forfeited on acquisition. It should be forfeited to ... an individual. And thus, monks, should it be forfeited: ‘Honoured sirs, before I was invited (to take) this robe-material, approaching the weavers of a householder who is not a relation, I put forward a consideration with regard to the robe-material; it is to be forfeited. I forfeit it to the Order.’ ... ‘... the Order should give back ... let the venerable ones give back ... I will give back this robe to the venerable one.’

If, before being invited, going up to the weavers of a householder, thinking that he is not a relation when he is not a relation, he puts forward a consideration with regard to robe-material, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If, being in doubt as to whether he is not a relation, before being invited, going up to the weavers of a householder, he puts forward a consideration with regard to robe-material, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If, before being invited, going up to the weavers of a householder, thinking that he is a relation when he is not a relation, he puts forward a consideration with regard to robe-material, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he thinks that he is not a relation when he is a relation, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether he is a relation, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that he is a relation when he is a relation,

¹ bhatta; cf. Vin 4.129. More usually bhojaniya is combined with, the next, khādaniya.
² This and the next two occur together at Vin 3.241, Vin 3.266; Vin 4.154. ³ Vin-a 728, “he gives dhamma-talk”—i.e., perhaps a blessing, good words—for as the text shows, a monk can give things of the mind (dhamma-dāna, the best of gifts, AN i.91) besides material things.
there is no offence.

There is no offence if it belongs to relations; if they are invited; if it is for another; if it is by means of his own property; if desirous of having costly (robe-material) woven he has (robe-material) costing little woven; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.
... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time a certain chief minister, going on a journey, sent a messenger to the monks, saying: “Let the revered sirs come, I will give a rains-residence (gift).”¹ The monks, thinking: “A rains-residence (gift) at the end of the rains is allowed by the lord,”² being scrupulous, did not go.³ The chief minister … spread it about, saying:

“How can the revered ones not come⁴ when a messenger was sent by me? Well, I am going with the army, life is uncertain, death is uncertain.”⁵

Monks heard that chief minister who … spread it about. Then these monks told this matter to the lord. Then the lord, on this occasion, in this connection, having given reasoned talk, addressed the monks, saying:

¹ vassāvāsika. BURLINGAME, Buddhist Legends, i.228, renders, “food of the season of the rains”; BURLINGAME, Buddhist Legends, ii.8, “lodging during the season of the rains,” but neither of these can be meant here, since the rule is concerned with robes. It means rather something connected with the rains-(vassa-)residence (āvāsa), which may be food, clothing or lodgings, as the story demands. Vassāvāsa occurs at Vin 1.153. ² Cf. Vin 1.153ff. ³ It seems that the minister must have been offering his gift during the rains—i.e., at a time when the monks must travel as little as possible—and not at the end of the rains. Otherwise the scrupulous monks could have gone, and no complaints would have been raised. ⁴ Cf. above, BD 2.64, where Upananda did not wait when bidden by a layman to do so. ⁵ dujjanaṁ jīvitaṁ dujjanaṁ, maraṇam.
“I allow you, monks, having accepted a special robe,¹ to lay it aside.”

Now at that time monks said: “It is allowed by the lord, accepting a special robe, to lay it aside.” These accepting special robes, let the robe-season² pass. These robes tied up in bundles, remained on a bamboo for hanging up robes.³ Then the venerable Ānanda, as he was engaged in touring the lodgings, saw these robes tied up in bundles, that remained on the bamboo for hanging up robes; seeing them he said to the monks:

“Your reverences, whose are these robes, tied up in bundles, that remain on the bamboo for hanging up robes?”

“Your reverence, they are our special robes,” they said.

“But for how long, your reverences, have these robes been laid aside?”

Then these monks told the venerable Ānanda when they had been laid aside. The venerable Ānanda ... spread it about, saying:

“How can these monks, having accepted a special robe, let the ¹ acceka-cīvara, explained at Vin-a 729 as accāyika-cīvara. Cf. Vin 4.166, accāyike karaṇīye, “if there is something urgent (special) to be done” See Vinaya Texts i.29, n. 3, where it is said “special robe’ is no doubt an inadequate rendering; but we have chosen it in reference to the special circumstances in which the donation is made, and in default of a better translation.” Critical Pali Dictionary says of acceka-cīvara that it is “a robe presented to a priest [sic] not at the usual time,” and of accāyika (Sanskrit ātyayika) that it is “not suffering delay, urgent, pressing.” An “exceptional” or “emergency” robe might be a suitable translation, if it is remembered that it is the donor who is in an emergency, who is pressed for time, and who because of some exceptional or unusual circumstances, wants to make his gift without delay, and so gain the “merit” for his act of giving. Here the chief minister wanted to make his gift before he went into the army and faced the uncertainties of life and death. See Old Commentary, below and Vin-a 729 which correlate acceka-cīvara with vassāvāsika, as though a robe given to meet some emergency implies a robe given at an unusual time—i.e., here during the rains. The robe therefore is “special,” both in regard to the reason for giving it, and in regard to the time at which it was given.

² cīvarakālasamaya, see Old Commentary, below. This robe-season is the usual time for accepting, distributing and settling robe-material. Cf. also Bu-NP 1 and Vinaya Texts i.18, n. The word occurs again at Vin 4.286. ³ Cf. above, BD 2.25.
robe-season pass?” Then the venerable Ānanda told this matter to the lord. He said:

“Is it true, as is said, monks, that monks, having accepted a special robe, let the robe-season pass?”

“It is true, lord,” they said.

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

How, monks, can these foolish men, having accepted a special robe, let the robe-season pass? Monks, it is not for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“If a special robe should accrue¹ to a monk ten days before the full moon of the (first) Kattika, three months (of the rains having passed),² it may be accepted by that monk if he thinks of it (as something) special³; having accepted it, it should be laid aside until the robe-season. But if he should lay it aside for longer than that, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture.”

Ten days before means: ten days before the ceremony held at the end of the rains.⁴

The full moon of Kattika, three months (of the rains having passed) means: the ceremony held at the end of the rains is called Kattika.

A special robe means: one is desirous of going with the army, or one comes to be going on a journey, or one comes to be ill, or a woman becomes pregnant, or faith comes to be arisen in one who was without faith, or pleasing comes to be arisen for one who was not pleased.¹ If such a one should send a messenger to the monks saying: ‘Let the revered sirs come, I will give a rains-residence (gift),’ this means a special robe.

It may be accepted by that monk if he thinks of it (as something) special; having accepted it, it should be laid aside until the robe-season means: making a sign,² it must be laid aside; this is a special robe.

The robe-season means: if the kaṭhina cloth has not been (formally) made then the last month of the rains; if it has been (formally) made, it is five months.³

If he should lay it aside for longer than that means: if the kaṭhina cloth has not been (formally) made, and he lets the last day of the rains pass, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture.
If the kaṭhina cloth has been (formally) made and he lets the day for removing the kaṭhina (privileges)⁴ pass, it is to be forfeited. It should be forfeited ... to an individual. And thus, monks, should it be forfeited: ‘Honoured sirs, letting pass the robe-season, this special robe of mine is to be forfeited. I forfeit it to the Order.’ ... ‘... the Order should give back ... let the venerable ones give back ... I will give back this special robe to the venerable one.’

If he thinks that it is a special robe when it is a special robe, and lets the robe-season pass, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he is in doubt as to whether it is a special robe and lets the robe season pass, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he thinks that it is not a special robe when it is a special robe and lets the robe-season pass, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he thinks that one is allotted when it is not

¹ appasannassa vā pasādo uppanno hoti. Cf. above, BD 2.3, n. 1, on the recurring expression: n’ ētān bhikkhave appasannānaṁ vā pasādāya, “it is not for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased.” ² saññānaṁ katvā. Vin-a 729, kiñci nimittāṁ katvā, “making some mark,” presumably on the robe. ³ = Vin 4.286f. Cf. BD 2.5, n. 1, BD 2.26, n. 3 above on atthata, formally made. ⁴ kaṭhinuddhāradivasa, cf. above, p. 5, n. 3.
allotted,¹ there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he thinks that one is assigned when it is not assigned ... If he thinks that one is bestowed when it is not bestowed ... If he thinks that one is lost when it is not lost ... If he thinks that one is destroyed when it is not destroyed ... If he thinks that one is burnt when it is not burnt ... If he thinks that one is stolen when it is not stolen and lets the robe-season pass, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. Not forfeiting the robe which had to be forfeited, if he makes use of it, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it is a special robe when it is not a special robe, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether it is not a special robe, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it is not a special robe when it is not a special robe, there is no offence.

There is no offence if, within the season, it is allotted, assigned, bestowed, lost, destroyed, burnt, if they tear it (from him), if they take it on trust; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.²

¹ This and the next six cases = Vin 3.197, Vin 3.251, see above. ² Cf. Bu-NP 1, Bu-NP 2, Bu-NP 3, Bu-NP 21, Bu-NP 9.
... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time monks who had finished keeping the rains were staying in lodgings in the jungles. Thieves (of the kind who attack monks in the month) of Kattika¹ attacked them, saying: “The monks have received possessions.”² They told this matter to the lord. Then the lord, on this occasion, in this connection, having given reasoned talk, addressed the monks, saying: “I allow you, monks, when staying in lodgings in the jungles, to lay aside one of the three robes inside a house.”³

Now at that time monks thought: “It is allowed by the lord when staying in lodgings in the jungles to lay aside one of the three robes inside a house.” These, laying aside one of the three robes inside a house, were away for more than six nights. These robes were lost and destroyed and burnt and eaten by rats. The monks became badly dressed, wearing shabby robes. (Other) monks spoke thus:

“How is it that you, your reverences, are badly dressed, wearing shabby robes?” Then these monks told this matter to the monks. Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying:

“How can these monks, laying aside one of the three robes inside a house, be away for more than six nights?” Then these monks told this matter to the lord. He said:

“Is it true, as is said, monks, that monks laying aside one of the

¹ kattikacorakā. Vin-a 730, kattikamāse corā—i.e., after the distribution of the robes.
² laddhalābhā. ⁳ So as to be guarded, Vin-a 730. Cf. Bu-NP 2 above, and notes, where an ill monk may be away without his set of three robes for more than a night, if he has the agreement of the monks.
three robes inside a house were away for more than six nights?”

“It is true, lord,” they said.

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

“How, monks, can these foolish men, laying aside one of the three robes inside a house, be away for more than six nights? It is not, monks, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“How, monks, can these foolish men, laying aside one of the three robes inside a house, be away for more than six nights? It is not, monks, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Having spent the rains up to the full moon of Kattika,¹ in case a monk who is staying in such lodgings as those jungle lodgings which are held to be dangerous and frightening, so desires, he may lay aside one of his three robes inside a house; and should there be any reason for that monk to be away, separated from that robe, that monk may be away, separated from that robe for at most six nights. Should he be away, separated (from it) for longer than that, except on the agreement of the monks,² there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture.”

---

¹ Kattikapuṇṇamā, see Old Commentary, below. This is the next full moon to that meant in the last Nissaggiya — i.e., it is the last full moon of Kattika (and of the rains); see Vin-a 658, Vin-a 730 and above, BD 2.153, n. 2. ² Probably the same kind of agreement as in Bu-NP 2 — i.e., the agreement to be regarded as not away, separated from the robe, although in fact the monk was away from it. ³ See above, BD 2.153, n. 2. Vinaya Texts i.324 says: “the epithet cātumāsinī refers to the Vedic Cāturmāsya festival, which falls upon that day” (i.e., the full moon day in the month of Kattika). This day, or night, “is called Komudi (from kumuda, a white water-lily), because that flower is supposed to bloom then,” Dialogues of the Buddha 1.66, note. ⁴ dhanus is a measure of length; according to Monier-Williams it is equivalent to four hastas, or 1/2000 gavyūti. ⁵ So Vin-a 731. ⁶ Cf. below, BD 2.290, and MN-a 2.109.
resting¹ is seen, a place where they are sitting down is seen, a place where they are lying down is seen.

Frightening² means: if, in a monastery, in the precincts of a monastery, people injured by thieves are seen, (people) plundered are seen, (people) beaten down are seen.

In case a monk is staying in such lodgings means: a monk staying in lodgings like these.

Desires means: wanting.

One of his three robes means: the outer cloak or the upper robe or the inner robe.³

May lay aside inside a house means: he may lay it aside in the neighbourhood in a food-village.⁴

And should there be any reason for that monk to be away, separated from that robe means: should there be a reason, should there be (something) to be done.⁵

That monk may be away, separated from that robe for at most six nights means: he may be away, separated (from it) for six nights at the maximum.

Except on the agreement of the monks means: setting aside the agreement of the monks.

Should he be away, separated (from it) for longer than that means: it is to be forfeited at sunrise on the seventh day. It should be forfeited to ... an individual. And thus, monks, should it be forfeited: ‘Honoured sirs, having been away, separated from this robe of mine, for more than six nights, except on the agreement of the monks, it is to be forfeited. I forfeit it to the Order.’ ... ‘... the Order should give back ... let the venerable ones give back ... I will give back this robe to the venerable one.’

If he thinks that it is more when it is more than six nights, (and) is away, separated, except on the agreement of the monks, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he is in doubt as to whether it is more than six nights, and is away, separated, except on the agreement of the monks, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he thinks that it is less when it is more than six nights, (and) is away, separated, except on the agreement of the monks, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he thinks that (the robe) is taken away when it is not taken away\(^1\) ... If he thinks that it is bestowed when it is not bestowed ... If he thinks that it is lost when it is not lost ... If he thinks that it is destroyed when it is not destroyed ... If he thinks that it is burnt when it is not burnt ... If he thinks that it is stolen when it is not stolen, (and) is away except on the agreement of the monks, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. Not forfeiting the robe which had to be forfeited, if he makes use of it, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it is more, when it is less than six nights, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether it is less than six nights, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it is less when it is less than six nights, there is no offence.

¹ ṭhitokāsa. ² Cf. below, BD 2.290, and MN-a 2.109. ³ See above, BD 2.1, n. 2.
⁴ goçara-gāma, Vin-a 731 says: “in the neighbourhood of his jungle lodging.” Cf. Pv-a 12.42. It is a village where food is given to monks; goçara meaning pasturage or grazing. ⁵ karaṇiya.

587

There is no offence if he is away, separated for six nights; if he is away, separated for less than six nights; if, being away, separated for six nights, entering the village-boundary and staying (there) he departs again; if, within six nights, the (robe) is taken away, bestowed, lost, destroyed, burnt, if they tear it from him, if they take it on trust; if there is the agreement of the monks; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.\(^2\)

\(^{1}\) Cf. above, BD 2.22, n. 3.  \(^{2}\) Cf. above, BD 2.23.
Monks’ Forfeiture (Nissaggiya) 30

... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery.¹ Now at that time at Sāvatthī robes and food were prepared for² the Order by a certain guild,³ saying: “Having offered them food,⁴ we will present them with robe-material.” Then the group of six monks approached that guild, and having approached they said to that guild: “Sirs, give these robes to us.”

“How honoured sirs, we will not give; alms-food with robes are got ready by us every year for the Order.”

“Sirs, many are the Order’s benefactors, many are the Order’s devotees.⁵ We are here, depending on you, looking to you, but if you will not give to us, then who is there⁶ who will give to us? Sirs, give these robes to us.”

Then that guild, being pressed by the group of six monks, giving the group of six monks as much robe-material as was prepared, served the Order with a meal. Those monks who knew that robe-material and a meal were prepared for the Order, and did not know that (it) was given to the group of six monks, spoke thus:

“Sirs, dedicate⁷ robe-material to the Order.”

¹ = Bu-Pc 82, Vin 4.155, except that there the offence is procuring something for another person, and not, as here, for oneself. Cf. Bu-Pc 81. ² paṭiyattāṁ. ³ pūja, or group. ⁴ bhojetvā. ⁵ bhattā, with variant reading kattā (see Vin 3.279), and Sinhalese edition bhaddā. Vin-a 732 reads bhadrā, taking it = bhadrāni = lābhamukkhāni (with variant readings bhaddā, bhattā ... bhattāni). It therefore looks more as if a “devotee” were meant than a “meal,” especially in conjunction with dāyakā, benefactors. ⁶ ko carahi. ⁷ oṇojetā ti detha, Vin-a 732; cf. Vin 1.39, AN iv.210, Mil 236, where oṇojeti seems to imply a rite of cleansing by water (udakaṁ oṇojetvā) and also a ceremonial giving, implied by the presence of bhiṅkāra, a ceremonial vessel used in donations.
“Honoured sirs, there is none; the masters, the group of six monks, appropriated\textsuperscript{1} to themselves as much robe-material as was prepared.”

Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying:

“How can the group of six monks knowingly\textsuperscript{2} appropriate to themselves an apportioned\textsuperscript{3} benefit belonging to the Order?” Then these monks told this matter to the lord. He said:

“Is it true, as is said, that you, monks, knowingly appropriated to yourselves an apportioned benefit belonging to the Order?”

“It is true, lord,” they said.

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

“How can you, foolish men, knowingly appropriate to yourselves an apportioned benefit belonging to the Order? It is not, foolish men, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

\textit{Whatever monk should knowingly appropriate to himself an apportioned benefit belonging to the Order, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture.”}

\begin{itemize}
  \item \textbf{Whatever} means: ... is monk to be understood in this case.
  \item \textbf{He knows\textsuperscript{4}} means: either he knows by himself or others tell him or (someone) tells (him).
  \item \textbf{Belonging to the Order} means: it comes to be given to the Order, handed over to (it).\textsuperscript{5}
  \item \textbf{A benefit} means: the requisites of robes, alms-food, lodgings, medicine for the sick, and even a lump of chunam and a toothpick and unwoven thread.\textsuperscript{6}
  \item \textbf{Apportioned} means: it has been expressly said,\textsuperscript{7} “we will give, we will make.”
\end{itemize}

If he appropriates to himself, in the action there is an offence of

\begin{itemize}
\item \textsuperscript{1} pariṇāmesuṁ, causative of pariṇameti; its indicative is pariṇamati. Vin-a 733 says ninna poṇa pabhāra, bending to, leading to, sloping to.
\item \textsuperscript{2} jānaṁ.
\item \textsuperscript{3} pariṇata. This is derived from the same root as pariṇameti; its indicative is pariṇamati.
\item \textsuperscript{4} jānāti, indicative, instead of the jānāṁ, participle, of the Rule.
\item \textsuperscript{5} Cf. Vin 4.43.
\item \textsuperscript{6} Cf. above, BD 2.111, BD 2.149, and Vin 4.154.
\item \textsuperscript{7} vācā bhinnā hoti; cf. vācaṁ bhindeyya at Vin 1.157, “uttering a word,” Vinaya Texts i.326.
\end{itemize}
monks’ forfeiture (nissaggiya) 30

wrong-doing; it is to be forfeited on acquisition. It should be forfeited to ... an individual. And thus, monks, should it be forfeited: ‘Honoured sirs, this apportioned benefit belonging to the Order, knowingly appropriated by me to myself, is to be forfeited. I forfeit it to the Order.’ ... ‘... the Order should give back ... let the venerable ones give back ... I will give back this benefit to the venerable one.’

If he thinks that it was apportioned when it was apportioned (and) appropriates it to himself, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he is in doubt as to whether it was apportioned (and) appropriates it to himself, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he thinks that it was not apportioned when it was apportioned (and) appropriates it to himself, there is an offence of expiation involving forfeiture. If he appropriates what was apportioned to the Order for another (part of the) Order¹ or for a shrine, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he appropriates what was apportioned to a shrine for another shrine or for an Order or for an individual, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he appropriates what was apportioned to an individual for another individual or for an Order or for a shrine, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it was apportioned when it was not apportioned, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether it was not apportioned, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it was not apportioned when it was not apportioned, there is no offence.

There is no offence if he himself being asked, ‘Where do we give?’ says, ‘Give wherever your gift would be used² or could be mended³ or should be for a long time or when for you the mind is peaceful⁴; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

The third Division: that on Bowls

¹ Vin-a 733, for the Order in one vihāra. Saṅgha means, not the whole Order, but five or more monks (see above, BD 2.7, n. 5) staying in various districts and vihāras.
² paribhogāṁ labheyya, literally might receive use.
³ paṭisaṅkhāraṁ labheyya.
⁴ tumhākaṁ cittaṁ pasidati.
THIS IS ITS KEY
Two on bowls, and on medicine, for the rains, the fifth on a gift,
Oneself, causing to be woven, a special robe, dangerous, and for the Order.

Venerable ones, recited are the thirty rules for offences of expiation involving forfeiture. Concerning them, I ask the venerable ones: I hope that you are quite pure in this matter? And a second time I ask: I hope that you are quite pure in this matter? And a third time I ask: I hope that you are quite pure in this matter? The venerable ones are quite pure in this matter, therefore they are silent, thus do I understand this.

*Told are the Offences of Expiation involving Forfeiture*¹

---

¹ Here ends Oldenberg’s Vinayapiṭaka, vol.iii.
At that time the enlightened one, the lord, was staying at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time Hatthaka, the son of the Sakyans, came to be overthrown in debate. He, talking with followers of sects holding other views, having denied, acknowledged, having acknowledged, denied, he shelved the question by (asking) another, he told a conscious lie, having made a rendezvous, he deceived with words. The followers of sects holding other views looked down upon, criticised, spread it about, saying:

“How can this Hatthaka, the son of the Sakyans, talking together with us, having denied, acknowledge, having acknowledged, deny, shelve the question by (asking) another, tell a conscious lie, having made a rendezvous, deceive with words?”

1 Probably not the Hatthaka of Āḷavī, see AN i.26, AN i.88, AN i.136, also AN i.278 (devaputta), AN iv.218. But probably the same as the Hatthaka concerning whom Dhp 264 (na muṇḍakena samaṇo) was uttered. For Dhp-a 3.390, which, though longer, is very similar to Vin-a 736, says that whenever Hatthaka was defeated in argument he would make another appointment with his opponents, then precede them to the appointed place and say: “The followers of other sects are so frightened of me that they dare not meet me; this is like a defeat on their part.” This fits in well with Vinaya story told above. 2 Vin-a 735, Sakyānaṁ putto ti Sakyaputto. 3 vādakkhitto. 4 aṇṇāṁ aṇṇam paṭicarati. Vin-a 735 says, aṇṇena kāraṇena aṇṇaṁ kāraṇaṁ paṭicarati paṭicchādeti ajjhottharati, he answered one question by another, hid it, covered it up. Cf. DN i.94, AN i.187, AN i.198, MN i.250, Vin 4.35. “To meet one question with an answer of quite different contents” (Critical Pali Dictionary), but at Vin 4.35 Channa meets questions by putting other questions. 5 sampajānamusā bhāsati. 6 saṅketaṁ katvā. Cf. Vin 3.53, Vin 3.78. 7 visarṇavadeti. Forestalling his opponents at the rendezvous, he said that they were defeated.
Monks heard these followers of sects holding other views who looked down upon, criticised, spread it about. Then these monks approached Hatthaka, the son of the Sakyans, and having approached, they spoke thus to Hatthaka, the son of the Sakyans:

“Is it true, as is said, that you, reverend Hatthaka, talking together with followers of sects holding other views, having denied, acknowledged ... deceived with words?”

“Your reverences, these followers of sects holding other views should be vanquished in some way; victory should not be given to them thus.”

Those who were modest monks looked down upon, criticised, spread it about, saying: “How can this Hatthaka, the son of the Sakyans, talking together with followers of sects holding other views, having denied, acknowledge, having acknowledged, deny, shelve the question by (asking) another, tell a conscious lie, having made a rendezvous, deceive with words?”

Then these monks told this matter to the lord. Then the lord on this occasion, in this connection, having had the Order of monks convened, questioned Hatthaka, the son of the Sakyans:

“Is it true, as is said, that you, Hatthaka, talking together with followers of sects holding other views, having denied, acknowledged ... deceived with words?”

“It is true, lord,” he said.

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked him, saying:

“How can you, foolish man, talking together with followers of sects holding other views, having denied, acknowledge ... having made a rendezvous, deceive with words? It is not, foolish man, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:
In telling a conscious lie,¹ there is an offence of expiation.”²

Telling a conscious lie means: the words, the utterance, the speech, the talk, the language, the intimation, the un-ariyan statements³ of one intent upon deceiving with words, saying: “I have seen what I have not seen, heard what I have not heard, sensed⁴ what I have not sensed, cognised what I have not cognised.⁵ I have not seen what I have seen, not heard what I have heard, not sensed what I have sensed, not cognised what I have cognised.”

Not seen means: not seen by the eye. Not heard means: not heard

¹ sampajānamusāvāde. Cf. Vin 3.59, Vin 3.66, Vin 3.93f., where this rule has been anticipated; and see BD 1.xxv, Bu-Pj 4 for offences involving defeat for telling a conscious lie. Here Kankhā-vitaraṇī, Simon Hewavitarne Bequest, p. 83, says that all conscious lying is a pācittiya. It, however (p. 82), draws attention to the fact that the conscious lie of claiming a state of further-men is a pārājika (4); that falsely to accuse someone of a pārājika is a saṅghādisesa (8); that unfoundedly to accuse someone of a saṅghādisesa is a pācittiya (76); that falsely to accuse someone of a failure in morality is a dukkaṭa (Bu-Pc 76, Vin 4.148).² pācittiya. See above, BD 2.3, n. 4.³ anariya-vohārā. The above eight are enumerated at Vin 5.125, DN iii.232, AN ii.246, Vb 376.⁴ amutaṁ mutaṁ me. Mutṁa translated at Dialogues of the Buddha 3.127 “felt,” Dialogues of the Buddha 3.223 “thought of,” Further Dialogues of the Buddha 1.3 and GS 2.251 “sensed,” Sacred Books of the East, 2nd edition, p. 198 “thought.” Geiger, Pali Literature, gives “gedacht.” The Old Commentary’s definition of muta shows that the sense-functions of nose, tongue and body had been differentiated by the time that it was compiled. Hence I have translated muta by “sensed” and not by “thought,” although etymologically “thought” may be more correct. Possibly muta, as a term covering these three sense-functions, dates from a time prior to their differentiation. That muta does not include the sense-functions of the eye and ear suggests that these were recognised earlier than the others, their specific terminology emerging earlier. Cf. Vin-a 736; and Buddhist Psychological Ethics, 2nd edition, p. 221, n. 1, for muta pointing to an older tradition of a time when the five senses had not been co-ordinated.⁵ diṭṭha-suta-muta-viññāta, combined at DN iii.232, MN ii.231, MN iii.29, Snp 1086, Snp 1122, Ds 961, It 121. At eight Sutta-nipāta passages d°, s°, m° are combined, sometimes with other items, but not with v°. The first three may therefore belong to some old tradition, originally threefold, viññāta being added later with the rise of interest in mind, manas, of which viññāta is here a function. See Sn 1.270 = Thag 1216, where d°, s°, m° are combined with paṭigha; and cf. Sn-a 1.270. See also Psalms of the Bretheren 398, n. 9, KS i.237, n. 1; and Buddhist Psychological Ethics, 2nd edition, p. 221, n. 1, for Upaniṣad references.
by the ear. Not sensed means: not smelt by the nose, not tasted by the tongue, not felt\(^1\) by the body. Not cognised means: not cognised by the mind.

Seen means: seen by the eye. Heard means: heard by the ear. Sensed means: smelt by the nose, tasted by the tongue, felt by the body. Cognised means: cognised by the mind.

---

There is an offence of expiation for telling the conscious lie\(^2\) that, “In three ways I have seen what I have not seen”: before he has lied he knows, “I am going to lie”; while lying he knows, “I am lying”; having lied he knows, “I lied.”

There is an offence of expiation for telling the conscious lie that, “In four ways I have seen what I have not seen”: before he has lied he knows, “I am going to lie”; while lying he knows, “I am lying”; having lied he knows, “I lied,” misrepresenting his opinion.

There is an offence of expiation for telling the conscious lie that, “In five ways ... I lied,” misrepresenting his opinion, misrepresenting his approval.

There is an offence of expiation for telling the conscious lie that, “In six ways ... I lied,” misrepresenting his opinion, misrepresenting his approval, misrepresenting his pleasure.

There is an offence of expiation for telling the conscious lie that, “In seven ways ... I lied,” misrepresenting his opinion, misrepresenting his approval, misrepresenting his pleasure, misrepresenting his intention.

There is an offence of expiation for telling the conscious lie that, “In three ways I have heard what I have not heard” ... “… sensed what I have not sensed” ... “… cognised what I have not cognised”: before he has lied he knows, “I am going to lie”; while lying he knows, “I am lying”; having lied he knows, “I lied.”

There is an offence of expiation for telling the conscious lie that, “In four ways ... in five ways ... in six ways ... in seven ways ...” misrepresenting his intention.

\(^1\) phuṭṭhaṁ.  \(^2\) From here to end of Bu-Pc 1.2.6 cf. BD 1.162–171.
There is an offence of expiation for telling the conscious lie that, "In three ways I have seen and heard what I have not seen ... for telling the conscious lie that, "In three ways I have seen and sensed what I have not seen" ... "... I have seen and cognised what I have not seen" ... "... I have seen and heard and sensed what I have not seen" ... "... I have seen and heard and cognised what I have not seen" ... "... I have seen and heard and sensed and cognised what I have not seen."

There is an offence of expiation for telling the conscious lie that, "In three ways I have heard and sensed what I have not heard" ... "... I have heard and cognised what I have not heard" ... "... I have heard and seen what I have not heard" ... "... I have heard and sensed and cognised and seen what I have not heard."

There is an offence of expiation for telling the conscious lie that, "In three ways I have sensed and cognised what I have not sensed" ... "... I have sensed and cognised and heard and seen what I have not sensed."

There is an offence of expiation for telling the conscious lie that, "In three ways I have cognised and seen what I have not cognised" ... "... In three ways I have cognised and seen and heard and sensed what I have not cognised."

There is an offence of expiation for telling the conscious lie that, "In three ways I have seen what I have not seen ... heard what I have not heard ... sensed what I have not sensed ... cognised what I have not cognised."

There is an offence of expiation for telling the conscious lie that, "In three ways I have seen what I have heard ... I have seen what I have sensed ... I have seen what I have cognised."

There is an offence of expiation for telling the conscious lie that, "In three ways I have seen what I have heard and what I have sensed ... I have seen what I have heard and what I have cognised ... I have seen..."
what I have heard and what I have sensed and what I have cognised” … “... I have cognised what I have seen and what I have heard and what I have sensed.”

There is an offence of expiation for telling the conscious lie that, “In three ways he is in doubt as to what he has seen: he does not trust what he has seen, he does not remember what he has seen, he becomes confused as to what he has seen. He is in doubt as to what he has heard: he does not trust what he has heard, he does not remember what he has heard, he becomes confused as to what he has heard. He is in doubt as to what he has sensed ... He is in doubt as to what he has cognised ... he becomes confused as to what he has cognised, saying: ‘It was cognised and seen by me’; he becomes confused as to what he has cognised, saying: ‘It was cognised and heard by me’; he becomes confused as to what he has cognised, saying: ‘It was cognised and heard by me’; he becomes confused as to what he has cognised, saying: ‘It was cognised and heard by me’; he becomes confused as to what he has cognised, saying: ‘It was cognised and heard and sensed by me’; he becomes confused as to what he has cognised, saying: ‘It was cognised and seen and heard by me’; he becomes confused as to what he has cognised, saying: ‘It was cognised and seen and heard and sensed by me.’”

There is an offence of expiation for telling the conscious lie that, “In four ways ... in five ways ... in six ways ... in seven ways he is confused as to what he has cognised, saying: ‘It was cognised and seen and heard and sensed by me.’” (These are the seven ways): before he has lied he knows, “I am going to lie”; while he is lying he knows, “I am lying”; having lied he knows, “I lied,” misrepresenting his opinion, misrepresenting his approval, misrepresenting his pleasure, misrepresenting his intention

There is no offence if he speaks in jest,² if he speaks in fun. He speaks in jest means he speaks in haste³; he speaks in fun means, saying: ‘I will speak of this,’ he speaks of that\(^1\); if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

---

¹ Cf. BD 1.284. ² dava. ³ sahasā; Vin-a 737, without considering or reflecting.

\textit{The First}

---

\(^{1}\) As saying \textit{civaraṁ} for \textit{ciraṁ}, Vin-a 737. It is very unusual, if not unique, for commentarial exegesis to occur in the “no offence” paragraph.
... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time, the group of six monks, quarrelling with well behaved monks, insulted the well behaved monks; they jeered at them, they scoffed at them about birth and name and clan and work and craft and disease and distinguishing mark and passion¹ and attainment² and low mode of address.³ Those who were modest monks looked down upon, criticised, spread it about, saying:

“How can this group of six monks, quarrelling with well behaved monks, insult the well behaved monks? How can they jeer at them, scoff at them about birth ... low mode of address?” Then these monks told this matter to the lord. He said:

“Is it true, as is said, that you, monks, quarrelling with well behaved monks, insulted the well behaved monks, jeered at them ... about low mode of address?”

“It is true, lord,” they said.

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying: “How can you, foolish men, quarrelling with well behaved monks, insult the well behaved monks, jeer at them, scoff at them about ... low mode of address?”

¹ kilesa. ² āpatti. ³ akkosa. Critical Pali Dictionary gives “abuse, scolding, reviling,” and Pali-English Dictionary “shouting at, abuse, insult, reproach, reviling.” But from the distinction drawn by the Old Commentary, below, BD 2.177, between hina and ukkāṭṭha akkosa, these words must mean the ways in which you accost or address a person, either with insult or with respect. That the word akkosa came to mean “cursing” is evident from the compound akkosavatthu, (the ten) ways of cursing, referred to at Ja 1.191, which is founded on this Vinaya story. These ways are also referred to at Vin-a 625; Snp-a 364, Snp-a 467; and Dhp-a 1.212 = Snp-a 342, where ten curses are enumerated. These vary somewhat from those given below in the Old Commentary.
address? It is not, foolish men, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ...” And having rebuked them and given dhamma-talk, he addressed the monks, saying:

“Formerly, monks, at Takkasilā,¹ Nandivisāla was the name of an ox belonging to a certain brahmin. Then, monks, Nandivisāla, the ox, spoke thus to the brahmin: ‘Brahmin, you go, bet a thousand² with the great merchant,’³ saying: “My ox will draw a hundred carts tied together.”’ Then, monks, that brahmin made a bet of a thousand with the great merchant, saying: ‘My ox will draw a hundred carts tied together.’ Then, monks, that brahmin having tied together a hundred carts, having yoked Nandivisāla, the ox, spoke thus: ‘Go, hornless one,’⁴ let the hornless one pull them along.”⁵ Then, monks, Nandivisāla, the ox, stood just where he was. Then, monks, that brahmin, having suffered the loss⁶ of a thousand, was overcome by grief.⁷ Then, monks, Nandivisāla, the ox, spoke thus to the brahmin: ‘Why are you, brahmin, overcome by grief?’ ‘Because I, good sir,⁸ suffered the loss of a thousand through you.’ ‘But why do you, brahmin, bring me, who am not hornless, into disgrace with words of deceit?’⁹ Brahmin, you go, bet two thousand with the great merchant, saying: “My ox will draw a hundred carts tied together,” but do not bring me, who am not hornless, into disgrace with words of deceit.’

Then, monks, that brahmin bet two thousand with the great merchant, saying: ‘My ox will draw a hundred carts tied together.’ Then, monks, that brahmin having tied together a hundred carts, having yoked Nandivisāla, the ox, spoke thus: ‘Go, good creature,’¹⁰ let the good creature pull them along.’ Then, monks, Nandivisāla, the ox, drew the hundred carts tied together.

¹ Modern Taxila. Story given again, with slight variations, at Ja 1.191. ² “Pieces,” probably kahāpanas to be understood. ³ seṭṭhi, see above, BD 2.42, n. 4. ⁴ kūṭa, not horned, therefore harmless. Jātaka Translation has “rascal.” Such maimed beasts had not a good reputation for work, Vism 268, Vism 269. Kūṭa also means false, deceitful. ⁵ vahassu. ⁶ parājīta, with instrumental ⁷ pajjhāyi. ⁸ bho. ⁹ kūṭavāda, or “words about being hornless.” ¹⁰ bhadra.
Speak only words of kindness,\(^1\) never words unkind.
For him who spoke him fair, he moved
A heavy load, and brought him wealth, for love.

At that time, monks, jeering and scoffing were not liked by me, so however could jeering and scoffing become liked now? It is not, monks, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus,
monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“In insulting speech\(^2\) there is an offence of expiation.”

---

Insulting speech means: he insults in ten ways: about birth and name and clan and work and craft and disease find distinguishing mark and passion and attainment and mode of address.

Birth means: there are two kinds of birth: low birth and high birth. Low birth means: birth as (a member of) a despised class,\(^3\)

---

\(^1\) manāpa. Ja 1.193 reads manuñña throughout. This seems to be a later word, see Pali-English Dictionary references.

\(^2\) omasavāde.

\(^3\) caṇḍāla. These five kinds of birth occur again at e.g. MN ii.152, MN ii.183, MN iii.169, SN i.93, AN i.107, AN ii.85, Pp 51.
birth as a bamboo-plaiter,\textsuperscript{1} birth as a hunter,\textsuperscript{2} birth as a cartwright,\textsuperscript{3} birth as a refuse-scavenger\textsuperscript{4}—this means low birth. High birth means: birth as a noble, birth as a brahmin—this means high birth.

Name means: there are two (kinds of) name: low name and high name. Low name means: Avakaṇṇaka,\textsuperscript{5} Javakaṇṇaka, Dhaniṭṭhaka, Saviṭṭhaka, Kulavaḍḍhaka, or what is disdained,\textsuperscript{6} disregarded,\textsuperscript{7} scorned,\textsuperscript{8} treated with contempt,\textsuperscript{9} despised\textsuperscript{10} in these districts—this means

\begin{itemize}
  \item \textsuperscript{1} Or basket-weaver, veṇa. Vin-a 738 says veṇajāti ti tacchakajāti veṇukārajāti (with variant reading veḷu\textsuperscript{°}), birth as a veṇa means birth as a carpenter, birth as a bamboo-worker. At Jā 5,306, veṇi is explained by tacchikā, a female carpenter.
  \item \textsuperscript{2} nesāda. Vin-a 738 = SN-a 1.162 = AN-a 2.175 = Pu-a 227 explain by migaluddaka, a hunter or trapper. The Questions of King Milinda 2.211 (Sacred Books of the East) has “savages,” and see loc. cit., n. 2.\textsuperscript{°} \item \textsuperscript{3} rathakāra, or carriage builder, chariot maker.
  \item \textsuperscript{4} pukkusa. Vin-a 738 = SN-a 1.162 = AN-a 2.175 = Pu-a 227 = Ja 4.174 explain by cammakāra, usually a leather-worker. Cammakāra occurs below, BD 2.176, among the low crafts, while rathakāra is among the low kinds of birth; but there seems to be no correspondence between the kinds of low birth and the kinds of low craft, such as would enable one to say that a man of such-and-such a birth follows such-and-such a trade or craft. See Dialogues of the Buddha 1.100, Dialogues of the Buddha 1.102, which distinguishes those who are low by birth and those who follow low occupations, and which draws the inference that there “was no hard-and-fast line, determined by birth, for those who gained their living by these trades.” Mil 313, in a long list of people, gives both rathakāra and cammakāra, as though these represented two different types of occupation. I therefore think that at all events at some time these two words had two distinct meanings.
  \item \textsuperscript{5} Thesefiveare,accordingtoVin-a738,thenamesofslaves.
  \item \textsuperscript{6} oññāta.
  \item \textsuperscript{7} avaññāta.
  \item \textsuperscript{8} hīlita.
  \item \textsuperscript{9} paribhūta.
  \item \textsuperscript{10} acittikata.
\end{itemize}
low name. High name means: connected with the enlightened one, connected with dhamma, connected with the Order, or what is not disdained, not disregarded, not scorned, not treated with contempt, what is esteemed in these districts — this means high name.

Clan means: there are two (kinds of) clan: low clan and high clan. Low clan means: a Kosiya clan, a Bharadvāja clan, or what is disdained, disregarded, scorned, treated with contempt, despised in these districts — this means low clan. High clan means: a Gotama clan, a Moggallāna clan, a Kaccāyana clan, a Vāsiṭṭha clan, or what is not disdained ... what is esteemed in these districts — this means high clan.

Work means: there are two (kinds of) work: low work and high work. Low work means: work of a store-room (keeper), work of a flower-scavenger, or what is disdained ... despised in these districts — this means low work. High work means: agriculture, trade, cattle-keeping, or what is not disdained ... what is esteemed in these districts.
districts\textsuperscript{1}—this means high work.

Craft\textsuperscript{2} means: there are two (kinds of) craft: low craft and high craft. Low craft means: the craft of the basket-maker,\textsuperscript{3} the potter’s craft, the weaver’s craft, the leather-worker’s\textsuperscript{4} craft, the barber’s craft, or what is disdained ... despised in these districts—this means low craft. High craft means: reckoning on the fingers,\textsuperscript{5} calculation,\textsuperscript{6} writing,\textsuperscript{7} what is not disdained ... what is esteemed in these districts—this means high craft.

\textsuperscript{1} These examples of despised and esteemed work are not monks’ but lay-people’s work. This looks like a fragment of original Sakya “left in” from a time when the Founder had the lay-people in mind as well as monks and nuns. \textsuperscript{2} sippa, craft or occupation. Eight are mentioned at MN i.85; another list is at Ud 31–Ud 32. At DN i.51 all the crafts, except the leather-worker’s, termed “low” by Vinaya above, are enumerated under ordinary (puthu) crafts. Here also are included those who follow the crafts of “calculation” and “counting on the fingers” (ganaka, muddika, see below, notes 4 and 5, termed “high crafts” above. \textsuperscript{3} naḷakāra, worker in reeds or rushes. \textsuperscript{4} cammakāra, see above, BD 2.173, n. 7. \textsuperscript{5} (This footnoteproved troublesome to typeset due to its length, so it has been moved to an appendix with other long notes on page 2980.) \textsuperscript{6} ganaṇā. Word occurs, e.g., at DN i.11, MN i.85, Ud 31, Vin 1.77 = Vin 4.128, Mil 59, Mil 78; see previous note. According to Critical Pali Dictionary ganaṇā means “the counting (of numbers) in unbroken series,” in contradistinction to the last, as noticed by Rhys Davids, Dialogues of the Buddha 1.22, n. 1. Vin-a 739 = DN-a 1.95 = MN-a 2.56 = Ud-a 205 explain by achiddaka (variant readings acchinaka-, achinda-) ganaṇā. At Vin 1.77 = Vin 4.128 both ganaṇā and lekhā are considered unsuitable occupations for the boy Upāli to study. At DN i.11 and Ud 31–Ud 32 muddā and ganaṇā are followed by saṅkhānā, reckoning, with lekhā coming next to this. See Sacred Books of the Buddhists 8.38 and notes, and The Questions of King Milinda 1.91, n. 2. \textsuperscript{7} lekhā. Word occurs at Ud 32, Mil 59, Mil 178; see above, BD 2.176, n. 4. Also at Vin 1.77 = Vin 4.128 (see previous note). At Vin 3.76 we find: “He praises by means of writing (lekhāya) means: if he cuts a writing there is a dukkaṭa offence for each syllable (akkharakkharāya),” while at Vin 4.305 there is no offence for a nun to learn what is written. Vin-a 739 explains by akkharatekhā, writing, tracing, scratching or engraving syllables, as on a piece of metal, wood, a leaf or clay; see Vin-a 452. Some such process was probably known in India before writing as we understand it. Ud-a 205 says that the craft of writing (lekhā-sippa) is “the craft of writing (likhana) syllables in various ways, or the knowledge of writing (likhā).” See BD 1.131, n. 1. These sippāni, like the kammāni above, BD 2.175, were not intended to be followed by monks, and the distinction between “high” and “low” is probably mainly for the laity, although it gives the monks a guide as to the social standing of the laity.
All diseases are low, except that diabetes\(^1\) is a high (kind of) disease.

Distinguishing mark\(^2\) means: there are two (kinds of) distinguishing mark: low distinguishing mark and high distinguishing mark. Low distinguishing mark means: (being) very tall, very short, very dark, very fair—this means low distinguishing mark. High distinguishing mark means: not (being) very tall, very short, very dark, very fair—this means high distinguishing mark.

All passions\(^3\) are low.

All attainments\(^4\) are low, except that stream-attainment and higher attainment\(^5\) are high.

Mode of address\(^6\) means: there are two modes of address: low mode of address and high mode of address. Low mode of address means: he says, “You are a camel, you are a ram, you are an ox, you are an ass, you are an animal, you are (destined) for a state of woe,\(^7\) a good bourn is not for you, but a bad bourn is to be expected for you,” or by adding ya or bha (to the end of his name),\(^8\) or by calling him male and female\(^9\)—this means low mode of address. High mode of address means: he says, “You are learned, you are experienced, you are wise, you are clever, you are a speaker of dhamma,\(^10\) a bad bourn is not for you, but a good bourn is to be expected for you”—this means high mode of address.

---

\(^1\) madhumeha. Pali-English Dictionary suggests diabetes, and it is so translated at gs 5.75. \(^2\) liṅga, or characteristic. Cf. Vin 3.169. \(^3\) kilesa. \(^4\) At Vin 2.93 sota and sam-āpatti are called āpatti not subject to legal question. See Vinaya Texts iii.44, n. The play on the words āpatti, sot-āpatti, sam-āpatti cannot well be reproduced in English if we regard āpatti in its more secondary sense of “fault, transgression, offence,” as seems to be the usual meaning in Vinaya, and as the translators of DN iii.212, AN i.84, AN i.94, Ds 1329 take it. When āpatti is combined with sota and sam- it has the more primary meaning of acquiring, obtaining, entering into a relationship with. On āpatti as an offence, see Buddhist Psychological Ethics, 2nd edition, p.321. \(^5\) sam-āpatti. For note on the samāpattis see Buddhist Psychological Ethics, 2nd edition, p.321, n. \(^6\) See above, BD 2.171, n.3. \(^7\) nerayika. \(^8\) yakārena vā bhakārena vā—i.e., as a diminutive and therefore as a disparaging ending. \(^9\) kāṭakoṭacikā. \(^10\) Inclusion here is characteristic of the respect in which the dhamma-kaṭhika was held.
If one who is ordained, desiring to jeer at, desiring to scoff at, desiring to shame one who is ordained speaks of a low thing—(a member of) a despised class, a bamboo-plaiter, a hunter, a cartwright, a refuse-scavenger, with low words and says: “You are (a member of a) despised class, you are a bamboo-plaiter, you are a hunter, you are a cartwright, you are a refuse-scavenger,” for each sentence there is an offence of expiation.

If one who is ordained, desiring to jeer at ... desiring to shame one who is ordained speaks of a high thing—an noble, a brahmin, with low words and says: “You are (a member of) a despised class ... you are a refuse-scavenger,” for each sentence there is an offence of expiation.

If one who is ordained, desiring to jeer at ... desiring to shame one who is ordained speaks of a low thing—(a member of) a despised class ... a refuse-scavenger, with high words and says: “You are a noble, you are a brahmin,” for each sentence there is an offence of expiation.

If one who is ordained, desiring to jeer at ... desiring to shame one who is ordained speaks of a high thing—a noble, a brahmin, with high words and says: “You are a noble, you are a brahmin,” for each sentence there is an offence of expiation.

If one who is ordained, desiring to jeer at ... desiring to shame one who is ordained speaks of a high thing—an Avakaṇṇaka, a Javakaṇṇaka, a Dhaniṭṭhaka, a Savitṭhaka, a Kulavaḍḍhaka, with low words, for each sentence there is an offence of expiation.

If one who is ordained, desiring to jeer at ... desiring to shame one who is ordained speaks of a low thing—an Avakaṇṇaka ... you are a Kulavaḍḍhaka,” for each sentence there is an offence of expiation.

If one who is ordained, desiring ... to shame one who is ordained speaks of a high thing—a Buddharakkhita, a Dhammarakkhita, a Saṅgharakkhita with low words and says: “You are an Avakaṇṇaka ... you are a Kulavaḍḍhaka,” for each sentence there is an offence of expiation.

If one who is ordained, desiring ... to shame one who is ordained speaks of a low thing with high words ... speaks of a high thing with high words ... for each sentence there is an offence of expiation.

---

If one is ordained, desiring ... to shame ... speaks of a low thing—a Kosiya, a Bhāradvāja with low words ... speaks of a high thing—a Gotama, a Moggallāna, a Kaccāyana, a Vāsiṣṭha with low words ... speaks of a low thing with high words ... speaks of a high thing with high words ... there is an offence of expiation.

If one who is ordained, desiring ... to shame ... speaks of a low thing—a store-room keeper, a flower-scavenger with low words ... speaks of a high thing—a cultivator,¹ a trader,² a cattle-keeper³ with low words ... speaks of a low thing with high words ... speaks of a high thing with high words ... there is an offence of expiation.

If one who is ordained, desiring ... to shame ... speaks of a low thing—a basket-maker, a potter, a weaver, a leather-worker, a barber with low words ... if he speaks of a high thing—a reckoner,⁴ an arithmetician,⁵ a scribe⁶ with low words ... speaks of a low thing with high words ... speaks of a high thing with high words ... there is an offence of expiation.

If one who is ordained, desiring ... to shame ... speaks of a low thing—one afflicted with leprosy, with boils, with eczema, with consumption, with epilepsy⁷ with low words ... if he speaks of a high thing—one afflicted with diabetes with low words ... if he speaks of a low thing with high words ... if he speaks of a high thing with high words ... there is an offence of expiation.

If one who is ordained, desiring ... to shame ... speaks of a low thing—one afflicted with leprosy, with boils, with eczema, with consumption, with epilepsy⁷ with low words ... if he speaks of a high thing—one afflicted with diabetes with low words ... if he speaks of a low thing with high words ... if he speaks of a high thing with high words ... there is an offence of expiation.

¹ kassaka, or husbandman, ploughman; not as above, BD 2.175, agriculture or ploughing, kasi. ² vāṇija; not vāṇijjā, trading, trade, as above, BD 2.175. ³ Presumably this, in the accusative gorakkhaṁ, is in the nominative gorakka here, and not gorakkhā as above, BD 2.175. ⁴ muddika, so translated at Dialogues of the Buddha 1.68. At DN i.51 muddika is included under ordinary (puthu) crafts. Word occurs at SN iv.376, translated ks iv.267 “ready-reckoner.” SN-a iii.113 defines as one who is good at computing by reckoning on the fingers. Above, BD 2.176, we had muddā. ⁵ gaṇaka, or computer, accountant; also an ordinary craft at DN i.51. Word also occurs at SN iv.376, translated ks iv.267 “accountant.” SN-a iii.113 says it means one who is good at computing in unbroken series. Above, BD 2.176, we had gaṇanā. ⁶ lekhaka, clerk or scribe, not mentioned at DN i.51. But see Mil 42. ⁷ These are all included in list of diseases at Vin 2.271, AN v.110, Mnd 17, Mnd 47, Cnd 304.
thing—(being) very tall, very short, very dark, very fair, with low words—speaks of a high thing—not (being) very tall, not very short, not very dark, not very fair with low words ... speaks of a low thing with high words ... speaks of a high thing with high words ... of expiation.

If one who is ordained, desiring ... to shame ... speaks of a low thing ... of one obsessed¹ by passion, of one obsessed by hatred, of one obsessed by confusion with low words ... speaks of a high thing—of one without passion, of one without hatred, of one without confusion with low words ... speaks of a low thing with high words ... speaks of a high thing with high words ... of expiation.

If one who is ordained, desiring ... to shame ... speaks of a low thing with low words—of being guilty of an offence of defeat,² of being guilty of an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order, of being guilty of a grave offence, of being guilty of an offence of expiation, of being guilty of an offence which ought to be confessed, of being guilty of an offence of wrong-doing, of being guilty of an offence of wrong speech ... speaks of a high thing—a stream-attainer with low words ... speaks of a low thing with high words ... speaks of a high thing with high words ... there is an offence of expiation.

If one who is ordained, desiring ... to shame ... speaks of a low thing—a camel, a ram, an ox, an ass, an animal, one (destined) for a state of woe, and says, “You are a camel ... you are (destined) for a state of woe, a good bourn is not for you but a bad bourn is to be expected for you,” for each sentence there is an offence of expiation.

If one who is ordained, desiring ... to shame ... speaks of a high thing—a learned person, an experienced, wise, clever person, one who is a speaker of dhamma with low words, and says, “You are a camel ... but a bad bourn is to be expected for you,” for each sentence there is an offence of expiation.

If one who is ordained, desiring ... to shame ... speaks of a low thing—a camel ... one (destined) for a state of woe with high words, and says, “You are learned, you are experienced, you are wise, you are clever, you are a speaker of dhamma, a bad bourn is not for you but a good bourn is to be expected for you,” for each sentence there is an offence of expiation.

¹ pariyutthita. ² Cf. Vin 3.164.

If one who is ordained, desiring ... to shame ... speaks of a high thing—a learned person ... and says, “... but a good bourn is to be expected for you,” for each sentence there is an offence of expiation.

If one who is ordained, desiring ... to shame one who is ordained, speaks thus, saying: “There are here some (members of) despised classes, bamboo-plaiters, hunters, cartwrights, refuse-scavengers,” for each sentence there is an offence of wrong-doing.

If one who is ordained, desiring ... to shame ... speaks thus, saying: “There are here some nobles and brahmins,” for each sentence there is an offence of wrong-doing.

If one who is ordained, desiring ... to shame ... speaks thus, saying: “There are here some Avakaṇṇakas, Javakaṇṇakas, Dhaniṭṭhakas, Saviṭṭhakas, Kulavaḍḍhakas ... Buddhakakakakas, Dhammakakakakas, Saṅghakakakakas ... Kosiyas, Bhāradvājas ... Gotamas, Moggallānas, Kaccānas, Vāsiṭṭhas ... store-room (keepers), flower-scavengers ... cultivators, traders, cattle-keepers ... basket-makers, potters, weavers, leather-workers, barbers ... reckoners, arithmeticians, scribes ... those afflicted by leprosy, by boils, by eczema, by consumption, by epilepsy ... those afflicted by diabetes ... (those who are) very tall, very short, very dark, very fair ... (those who are) not very tall, not very short, not very dark, not very fair ... (those who are) obsessed by passion, obsessed by hatred, obsessed by confusion ... (those who are) without passion, without hatred, without confusion ... (those who are) guilty of an offence involving defeat ... guilty of an offence of wrong speech ... (those who are) stream-attainers ... camels, rams, oxen, asses, animals, (those destined) for a state of woe, a good bourn is not for these, but a bad bourn is to be expected for these ... learned, experienced, wise, clever people, speakers of dhamma, a bad bourn is not for these, but a good bourn is to be expected for these,” for each sentence there is an offence of wrong-doing.

¹ koṭṭhakā; cf. above, BD 2.175, where we had koṭṭhakakam."

If one who is ordained, desiring ... to shame one who has been ordained, speaks thus, saying: “What now if these are (members of) a despised class, bamboo-plaiters, hunters, cartwrights, refuse-scavengers?” ... saying: “What now if these are learned, experienced, wise, clever people, speakers of dhamma?”, for each sentence there is an offence of wrong-doing.

If one who is ordained, desiring ... to shame one who has been ordained, speaks thus, saying: “We are not (members of) a despised class, bamboo-plaiters, hunters, cartwrights, refuse-scavengers” ... saying, “We are not learned, experienced, wise, clever people, speakers of dhamma, a bad bourn is not for us, but a good bourn is to be expected for us,” for each sentence there is an offence of wrong-doing.

If one who is ordained, desiring ... to shame one who is not ordained,¹ speaks of a low thing with low words, of a high thing with low words, of a low thing with high words, of a high thing with high words, of a learned person, of an experienced, wise, clever person, of a speaker of dhamma, saying: “You are learned, you are experienced, you are wise, you are clever, you are a speaker of dhamma, a bad bourn is not for you but a good bourn is to be expected for you,” for each sentence there is an offence of wrong-doing.

If one who is ordained, desiring ... to shame one who is not ordained, speaks thus: “There are here some members of low castes ..., we are not learned people, experienced, wise, clever people, not speakers of dhamma, a bad bourn is not for us, but a good bourn is to be expected for us,” for each sentence there is an offence of wrong-doing.

¹ Kankhā-vitaraṇi, BD 2.85, says that here it is meant that nuns also are “not ordained.”
If one who is ordained, not desiring to jeer at, not desiring to scoff at, not desiring to shame one who is ordained, (but having) a fondness for joking, speaks of a low thing—of a (member of a) despised class, a bamboo-plaiter, a hunter, a cartwright, a refuse-scavenger with low words, and says: “You are (a member of) a despised class ... you are a refuse-scavenger,” for each sentence there is an offence of wrong speech.

If one who is ordained, desiring not ... to shame one who is ordained, (but having) a fondness for joking, speaks of a high thing—a noble, a brahmin with low words, and says: “You are (a member of) a despised class ... you are a refuse-scavenger” ... speaks of a low thing with high words ... speaks of a high thing with high words—of a noble, a brahmin, and says: “You are a noble, you are a brahmin,” for each sentence there is an offence of wrong speech.

If one who is ordained, not desiring ... to shame one who is ordained, (but having) a fondness for joking, speaks of a low thing with low words ... speaks of a high thing with low words ... speaks of a low thing with high words ... speaks of a high thing with high words—of a learned person ...” ... but a good bourn is to be expected for you,” for each sentence there is an offence of wrong speech.

If one who is ordained, not desiring ... to shame one who is not ordained, (but having) a fondness for joking, speaks of a low thing with low words ... of a high thing with low words ... of a low thing with high words ... of a high thing with high words—of a learned person ... “... but a good bourn is to be expected for you,” for each sentence there is an offence of wrong speech.
If one who is ordained, not desiring ... to shame one who is not ordained, (but having) a fondness for joking, speaks thus: “There are here some (members of a) despised class ... we are not learned people, experienced, wise, clever people, we are not speakers of dhamma, a bad bourn is not for us, but a good bourn is to be expected for us,” for each sentence there is an offence of wrong speech.

There is no offence if he is aiming at (explaining) the goal, if he is aiming at (explaining) dhamma, if he is aiming at (explaining) the teaching,¹ if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

The second

¹ = Vin 3.130 (BD 1.218) = Vin 4.277. Vin-a 740 “praising the goal.”
... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks brought slander\(^1\) against monks for quarrelling, for disputing, for engaging in contention\(^2\); hearing of this they were proclaimed for that and this dissension; hearing of that they were proclaimed\(^3\) for this and that dissension, so that quarrels that had not arisen arose, and also quarrels that had arisen rolled on for becoming more, for expansion. Those who were modest monks looked down upon, criticised, spread it about, saying:

“How can this group of six monks bring slander against monks for quarrelling, (so that) hearing of this ... they were proclaimed ... for expansion.”

Then these monks told this matter to the lord. He said:

“Is it true, as is said, that you, monks, brought slander against monks for quarrelling, (so that) hearing of this ... they were proclaimed ... for expansion?”

“It is true, lord,” they said.

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

“How can you, foolish men, bring slander against monks for quarrelling, (so that) hearing of this ... they were proclaimed ... for expansion. It is not, foolish men, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased, nor for increase in those who are pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“In slander by monks,\(^4\) there is an offence of expiation.”

\(^1\) pesuññaṁ upasaṁharanti.  \(^2\) These three words are defined at Vin.4.150 as “engaging in legal questions,” so it may be supposed that the “quarrels,” etc., were of a doctrinal rather than of a personal nature. \(^3\) akkhāyanti. \(^4\) bhikkhu pesuññe.
Slander means: slander comes to be in two ways: making dear or desiring dissension.

One brings slander in ten ways: on account of birth and on account of name and on account of clan and on account of work and on account of craft and on account of disease and on account of distinguishing mark and on account of passion and on account of attainment and on account of mode of address.

Birth means: there are two (kinds of) birth: low birth and high birth. Low birth means: birth as (a member of) a despised class, birth as a bamboo-plaiter, birth as a hunter, birth as a cartwright, birth as a scavenger of refuse—this means low birth. High birth means: birth as a noble, birth as a brahmin—this means high birth.

Mode of address means: there are two modes of address: low mode of address and high mode of address. Low mode of address means: he says, “You are a camel...” by calling him male and female—this means low mode of address. High mode of address means: he says, “You are learned... a good bourn is to be expected for you”—this means high mode of address.

One who is ordained, hearing of one who is ordained, brings a slander against the one who is ordained, saying: “So and so calls him ‘a (member of a) despised class, a bamboo-plaiter, a hunter, a cartwright, a refuse-scavenger,’” for each sentence there is an offence of expiation.

One who is ordained, hearing of one who is ordained, brings a slander against the one who is ordained, saying: “So and so calls him ‘a noble, a brahmin’”... “So and so calls him ‘an Avakaṇṇaka, a Javakaṇṇaka, a Dhaniṭṭhaka, a Saviṭṭhaka, a Kulavaḍḍhaka’”... saying: “So and so calls him ‘a camel, a ram, an ox, an ass, an animal, one (destined) for a state of woe, a good bourn is not for him, but

---

¹ piyakamyassa. Vin-a 740, “he says, ‘Thus will I become dear to him,’ desiring to be dear himself.” ² Cf. above, BD 2.171; here ablative is used throughout. ³ For the rest of this pācittiya, cf. Bu-Pc 2. ⁴ For this passage, cf. above, BD 2.178f.
a bad bourn is to be expected for him,’... saying: “So and so calls him ‘learned, experienced, wise, clever, a speaker of dhamma, a bad bourn is not for him, but a good bourn is to be expected for him,’” for each sentence there is an offence of expiation.

One who is ordained, hearing of one who is ordained, brings a slander against the one who is ordained, saying: “So and so says that ‘there are here some (members of a) despised class, bamboo-plaiters, hunters, cartwrights, refuse-scavengers,’ he does not say anything else, he says just this,” for each sentence there is an offence of wrong-doing.

One who is ordained ... brings a slander against the one who is ordained, saying: “So and so says that ‘there are here some nobles, brahmins,’ he does not say anything else, he says just this” ... “So and so says that, ‘There are here some learned, experienced, wise, clever people, speakers of dhamma, there is no bad bourn for these, but a good bourn is to be expected for these,’ he does not say anything else, he just says this,” for each sentence there is an offence of wrong-doing.

One who is ordained ... brings a slander against the one who is ordained, saying: “So and so says, ‘What now if these are (members of a) despised class, bamboo-plaiters, hunters, cartwrights, refuse-scavengers?’ he does not say anything else, he says just this” ... “So and so says, ‘What now if these are learned, experienced, wise, clever people, speakers of dhamma?’ He does not say anything else, he says just this,” for each sentence there is an offence of wrong-doing.

One who is ordained ... brings a slander against the one who is ordained, saying: “So and so says, ‘We are (members of a) despised class’” ... So and so says, ‘We are not learned, experienced, wise, clever people, speakers of dhamma, a bad bourn is not for us, but a good bourn is to be expected for us,’ he does not say anything else, he says just this,” for each sentence there is an offence of wrong-doing.

If one who is ordained, hearing of one who is ordained, brings a slander against the one who is ordained, for each sentence there is an offence of expiation. If one who is ordained, hearing of one who is ordained, brings a slander against one who is not ordained, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If one who is ordained, hearing of one who is not ordained, brings a slander against one who is ordained, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If one who is ordained, hearing of one who is not ordained, brings a slander against the one who is not ordained, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

There is no offence if he is not making dear, if he is not desiring dissension, if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

The Third
... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time, the group of six monks made lay-followers speak dhamma line by line¹; the lay-followers were disrespectful, not deferential towards the monks, they did not live in harmony.² Those who were modest monks looked down upon, criticised, spread it about, saying:

“How can this group of six monks make lay-followers speak dhamma line by line? The lay-followers are disrespectful ... they do not live in harmony.”

Then these monks told this matter to the lord ...

“Is it true, as is said, that you, monks, made lay-followers speak dhamma line by line, (and that) lay-followers ... in harmony?”

“It is true, lord.” The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

“How can you, foolish men, make lay-followers speak dhamma line by line, (so that) lay-followers ... in harmony? It is not, foolish men, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased, nor for increase in those who are pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk should make one who is not ordained speak dhamma line by line, there is an offence of expiation.”

¹ pada-so. Vin-a 741, padaṁ = koṭṭhāsaṁ. Commentary also calls pada a fourth part of a verse (gāthāpada), the others being anupada, anvakkhara, anuvyañjana. Cf. mn-a 1.2, where is given the number of paddas and akkharas of which Majjhima is said to consist; see W.A. de SILVA, Catalogue of Palm Leaf Manuscripts, i.xx., who also says, “eight letters (akkhara) are a Pada, four Pada, a Gāthā.” ² Cf. AN iii.14.
Not ordained means: setting aside monk and nun, the rest are called not ordained.

A line, the next line, every syllable, the next phrase. A line means: starting together they end together. The next line means: starting singly they end together. Every syllable means: saying “form is impermanent” (rūpaṁ aniccaṁ) he drops the rū. The next phrase means: while saying “form is impermanent,” he utters the sound, “feelings are impermanent.” Whatever is line and whatever is next line and whatever is every syllable and whatever is next phrase, all this means dhamma line by line.

Dhamma means: spoken by the enlightened one, spoken by disciples, spoken to holy men, spoken by devatās, connected

---

1. pada, see above, BD 2.190, n. 1.
2. ekato paṭṭhapetvā ekato osāpenti. Vin-a 741 says that beginning every line together with a novice, so it is ended together.
3. anu-pada. Vin-a 741 says dutiya-pada. Vin-a ’s assumption is that a thera and a novice are reciting a verse, Dhp 1 being cited.
4. pāṭekkaṁ paṭṭhapetvā ekato osāpenti. A thera says the first line alone and a novice says the second line together with him, Vin-a 741.
6. run ti opāteti, he drops run. Pali-English Dictionary gives “sound-particle” for run. Cf. Ja 1.418, sā run ti saddaṁ akāsī. Variant readings of text are ruppaṁ, rūpaṁ; of Vin-a , rū. The Sinhalese version of Vinaya reads, rūpaṁ ti osāpeti, he ends at rūpaṁ; he thus drops (opāteti) aniccaṁ, which is not the same as dropping a single syllable out of one word, and which seems to be the offence.
7. anubyañjana. The offence here is for a thera and a novice to say “form” and “feelings” simultaneously, instead of the latter waiting to begin his line until the former has finished his.
8. The novice, see Vin-a 741–742.
9. Vin-a 742 says, “the whole Vinayapiṭaka, Abhidhammapiṭaka, Dhammapada, Cariyapiṭaka, Udāna, Itivuttaka, Jātaka, Suttanipāta, Vimānavatthu, Petavatthu, the Brahmagālā and other Suttas.”
10. Vin-a 742 says, “spoke by disciples belonging to the fourfold congregation: the Anaṅgana, Sammādiṭṭhi, Anumāna, Cūḷavedalla, Mahāvedalla Suttas and others,” all Majjhima Suttas. mn-a 2.67 records that the ancients call the Anumāna the Bhikkhu Pātimokkha.
11. Isibhāsīta. Vin-a 742 says, “spoken to wanderers outside (the Sakyaputtiya Orders): the whole of the Paribbājakavagga,” in the Majjhima.
with the goal,\(^1\) connected with dhamma.\(^2\)

Should make speak\(^3\) means: he makes (him) speak by line, for every line there is an offence of expiation. He makes (him) speak by syllable, for every syllable there is an offence of expiation.

---

If he thinks that he is not ordained when he is not ordained (and) makes him speak dhamma line by line, there is an offence of expiation. If he is in doubt as to whether he is not ordained (and) makes him speak dhamma line by line, there is an offence of expiation. If he thinks that he is ordained when he is not ordained (and) makes him speak dhamma line by line, there is an offence of expiation. If he thinks that he is not ordained when he is ordained, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether he is ordained, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that he is ordained when he is ordained, there is no offence.

---

There is no offence in making (him) recite it together,\(^4\) in studying it together,\(^5\) if while speaking he drops a phrase\(^6\) usually familiar,\(^7\) if he drops it while expounding,\(^8\) if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

The Fourth

\(^1\) atthupasaṁhito ti atṭhakathānissito; so Vin-a 742, meaning apparently what is connected with the Commentary—a far cry from attha as originally the goal, the aim, the thing sought. \(^2\) dhammupasaṁhito ti pālinissito; so Vin-a 742, thus identifying dhamma with the text. This definition of dhamma occurs again below, BD 2.206. Again not the earlier meaning of dhamma. \(^3\) Below, BD 2.206, where same explanation is given for deseyya, should teach. According to Vin-a 742–Vin-a 743 it is an offence to speak line by line any matter included at the three Councils; also various suttas, named, but not so included; and various other compilations, enumerated, and called abuddhavacana. \(^4\) Vin-a 743, if taking an exposition with an unordained person, he speaks it with him. \(^5\) With one who is not ordained, so Vin-a 743. \(^6\) Text, gandha; Vin-a 743 gantha with variant reading gaṇṭha. \(^7\) Vin-a 743 says that “if the half-line of a verse does not come (to him), but the rest comes, this is called yebhuyyena paguṇagantho.” \(^8\) I.e., a sutta, so Vin-a 744.
... at Āḷavī in the chief shrine at Āḷavī.\(^1\) Now at that time lay-followers came to the monastery for the sake of hearing dhamma. When dhamma had been spoken, the monks who were elders went to their own dwelling-place,\(^2\) (but) the monks who were novices lay down in a sleeping-place\(^3\) just there in the attendance hall\(^4\) together with the lay-followers, careless, thoughtless, naked, mumbling,\(^5\) snoring.\(^6\) The lay-followers\(^7\) looked down upon, criticised, spread it about, saying:

“How can the revered sirs lie down in a sleeping-place careless, thoughtless, naked, mumbling, snoring?”

Monks heard these lay-followers who looked down upon, criticised, spread it about. Those who were modest monks looked down upon, criticised, spread it about, saying:

“How can these monks lie down in a sleeping-place with one who is not ordained?”

Then these monks told this matter to the lord. He said:

“Is it true, as is said, monks, that monks lay down in a sleeping-

\(^1\) See BD 1.247, for Āḷavī; and Ja 1.160, for this story. \(^2\) yathāvihāra. \(^3\) seyyāṁ kappeti. It is clear from Old Commentary below that seyyā is to be taken as a separate word; hence I have added “in a sleeping-place.” There is the verb nipajjati, to lie down, but not necessarily in a recognised sleeping-place. \(^4\) upaṭṭhānasālā. Monks and laymen can stay here for a night. The upaṭṭhānasālā means a hall where help and support is given, food and so on, by the dāyakas or benefactors, for the monks who come from outside. It is like the dānasālā, of the present day in Ceylon. \(^5\) vikū-jamānā, which Vin-a 744 paraphrases as vippalapamānā. \(^6\) kākacchamānā, which Vin-a 744 says is like making the noise of a crow, in the nose, emitting senseless noises. Also at AN iii.299. \(^7\) i.e., the first-mentioned ones, Vin-a 744. place with one who is not ordained?”

“It is true, lord,” they said.

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

“How, monks, can these foolish men lie down in a sleeping-place with one who is not ordained? It is not, monks, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk should lie down in a sleeping-place with one who is not ordained, there is an offence of expiation.”

And thus this rule of training for monks came to be laid down by the lord.

Then the lord,¹ having stayed at Āḷavī for as long as he found suitable, set out on tour for Kosambi. Going along on tour, he arrived in due course at Kosambi. The lord stayed there at Kosambi in the Badarikā monastery.² Monks spoke thus to the venerable Rāhula:

“Reverend Rāhula, a rule of training laid down by the lord says that there should be no lying down in a sleeping-place with one who is not ordained. Reverend Rāhula, find a sleeping-place.”³

Then the venerable Rāhula, not obtaining a sleeping-place, lay down in a privy. Then the lord, getting up in the night towards morning, approached this privy, and having approached, he coughed and the venerable Rāhula also coughed.

“Who is here?” he said.

“It is I, lord, Rahula,” he said.

“Why are you sitting there, Rahula?”

Then the venerable Rahula told this matter to the lord. Then the

---

¹ Again, cf. Ja 1.160–Ja 1.161, where this story is given in greater detail. The sudden appearance of Rāhula in the Vinaya version gives the appearance of material left out.

² One of the four establishments for the Order at Kosambi.

³ According to Ja 1.161, before this rule was laid down, the monks had always welcomed Rāhula as though the place were his own. But from the day that it was laid down they would not give him a resting-place, for fear of transgressing.
lord in this connection, on this occasion, having given reasoned talk,¹ addressed the monks, saying:

“I allow you, monks, to lie down in a sleeping-place with one who is not ordained for two or three nights. And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk should lie down in a sleeping-place with one who is not ordained for more than two or three nights, there is an offence of expiation.”

__________________________

Whatever means: ... is monk to be understood in this case.
Not ordained means: setting aside monk, the rest are called not ordained.²
More than two or three nights means: exceeding two or three nights.
With means: together with.
Sleeping-place³ means: if it is fully covered,⁴ if it is fully closed round, if it is partially covered, if it is partially closed round.

Should lie down in a sleeping-place means: if at sunset on the fourth day a monk lies down⁵ while one who is not ordained is lying down, there is an offence of expiation. If one who is not ordained lies down while a monk is lying down,⁶ there is an offence of expiation. Or if both lie down, there is an offence of expiation. If getting up, they lie down again, there is an offence of expiation.

__________________________

If he thinks that one is not ordained when he is not ordained (and) lies down in a sleeping-place for more than two or three nights, there is an offence of expiation. If he is in doubt as to whether one is not ordained (and) lies down in a sleeping-place for more than two or three nights, there is an offence of expiation. If he thinks that one is ordained when he is not ordained (and) lies down in a sleeping-place for more than two or three nights, there is an offence of expiation. If it is half covered, half closed round, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that one is not ordained when he is ordained, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether one is ordained, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that one is ordained when he is ordained, there is no offence.

¹ At Ja 1.161, Sāriputta is reprimanded by the lord, because if he did not know about Rāhula, what would he know about other youths? But in the Vinaya version Rāhula, judging by the prefix āyasmā to his name, is considered as ordained. It was not therefore that ordained monks should not lie down with him, but that he should not lie down with unordained persons.² Cf. above, BD 2.191, where we get “setting aside monk and nun.”³ seyyā. In the rule only the phrase seyyāni kappeyya occurs; this is explained next. Another definition of seyyā, occurs below, BD 2.244.⁴ I.e., by a roof.⁵ nipajjati.⁶ Monks’ nipanne, variant readings given at Vin 4.355.

There is no offence if he stays for two or three nights; if he stays for less than two or three nights; if having stayed for two nights, departing before dawn on the third night, he stays again; if it is fully covered (but) not fully closed round; if it is fully closed round (but) not fully covered; if it is partially uncovered, partially not closed round; if the monk sits down while one who is not ordained is lying down; if one who is not ordained sits down while the monk is lying down; or if both sit down; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

The Fifth

---

1 Cf. below, BD 2.378.
... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the venerable Anuruddha, going to Sāvatthī through the country of Kosala, in the evening arrived at a certain village. Now at that time a rest-house¹ in that village had been made ready by a certain woman. Then the venerable Anuruddha approached that woman,² and having approached he spoke thus to that woman:

“Sister, if it does not inconvenience you, we would stay for one night in the rest-house.” “Do stay, honoured sir,” she said. But other travellers came up to that woman, and having come up, they spoke thus to that woman:

“Lady, if it does not inconvenience you, we would stay for one night in the rest-house.”

“But this master, the recluse, arrived first. If he allows it, do stay,” she said.

Then these travellers approached the venerable Anuruddha, and having approached, they spoke thus to the venerable Anuruddha:

“If it does not inconvenience you, honoured sir, we would stay for one night in the rest-house.”

“Do stay, sirs,” he said.

Then that woman, on account of his appearance, fell in love with the venerable Anuruddha. Then that woman approached the venerable Anuruddha, and having approached, she spoke thus to the venerable Anuruddha:

¹ āvasathāgāranti āgantukānaṁ vasaṇāgārami, a dwelling-house for those coming in, Vin-a 750. Cf. āvasatha-piṇḍa, below, BD 2.303. ² Vin-a 750 says that he had heard of this resting-place from other people.
“Honoured sir, the master will not be comfortable, crowded with these people. Honoured sir, it would be good if I were to prepare a couch within for the master.”

The venerable Anuruddha consented by becoming silent.

Then that woman, having prepared a couch within for the venerable Anuruddha, having decked herself up in ornaments, smelling of perfumes, approached the venerable Anuruddha, and having approached she spoke thus to the venerable Anuruddha:

“Honoured sir, the master is beautiful, good to look upon, charming; I also am beautiful, good to look upon, charming. It were good, honoured sir, if I were to become the master’s wife.”

When she had spoken thus, the venerable Anuruddha was silent. A second time ... A third time that woman spoke thus to the venerable Anuruddha:

“Honoured sir, the master is beautiful, good to look upon, charming; I also am beautiful, good to look upon, charming. Pray, honoured sir, let the master take me as well as all the wealth.”

A third time the venerable Anuruddha became silent. Then that woman, having slipped off her outer cloak, walked up and down before the venerable Anuruddha, then she stood, then she sat down, then she lay down. Then the venerable Anuruddha, keeping control over (his) faculties, neither so much as looked at that woman nor addressed her. Then that woman said:

“Indeed it is wonderful, good sir, indeed it is marvellous, good sir, many men send for me with a hundred or a thousand, but this recluse, being himself begged by me does not desire to take me as well as all the wealth,” and dressing in her outer cloak, saluting the feet of the venerable Anuruddha with her head, she spoke thus to the venerable Anuruddha:

“Honoured sir, a transgression has overcome me, in that I acted

---

¹ Cf. Vin 4.161. ² nikkhipitvā, ni+khipati, to put down or off. ³ okkhipitvā, ava+khipati, to cast or throw down; figuratively usually applied to the eyes, and thence to the other senses; thus meaning to control, to have under control. Cf. AN iv.254, where Anuruddha again indriyāni okkhipi. ⁴ kahāpaṇas presumably. ⁵ kahāpaṇas presumably. ⁶ Following passage = DN i.85. Cf. also MN i.438.
thus, foolish, misguided,\(^1\) wrong that I was. Honoured sir, let the master acknowledge for me the transgression as a transgression for the sake of restraint in the future.”

“Truly, sister, a transgression overcame you in that you acted thus, foolish, misguided, wrong that you were. But if you, sister, seeing the transgression as a transgression, confess\(^2\) according to the rule, we acknowledge it for you; for, sister, in the discipline of the noble, this is growth\(^3\): whoever, seeing a transgression as a transgression, confesses according to the rule, and\(^4\) attains restraint in the future.”

Then that woman, at the end of that night, having with her own hands satisfied and served the venerable Anuruddha with abundant food, both solid and soft, greeting the venerable Anuruddha when he had eaten and removed his hand from the bowl, sat down at a respectful distance. As she was sitting down at a respectful distance, the venerable Anuruddha gladdened, roused, pleased, delighted that woman with talk on dhamma. Then that woman, gladdened, roused, pleased, delighted by the venerable Anuruddha with talk on dhamma, said to the venerable Anuruddha:

“Excellent, honoured sir, it is excellent, honoured sir; even as one, honoured sir, would set upright what is overturned, or would uncover what is hidden, or would point out the way to one who is astray, or would bring out an oil lamp into the darkness, so that those with eyes could see forms—even so has dhamma been explained in many a figure by master Anuruddha. Honoured sir, I myself go to the lord as refuge, to dhamma and to the Order of monks; let the master receive me as a lay-follower from this day forth, so long as life lasts, as one gone for refuge.”\(^5\)

Then the venerable Anuruddha, having gone to Sāvatthī, told this matter to the monks. Those who were modest monks, looked down upon, criticised, spread it about, saying:

“How can the venerable Anuruddha lie down in a sleeping-place with a woman?” Then these monks told this matter to the lord ...

---

\(^1\) mūḷha, or erring, infatuated, blind.
\(^2\) paṭikarosi. Above, BD 2.8, the word translated “confess” was deseti.
\(^3\) Vuddhi h’esa ariyassa vinaye.
\(^4\) ca omitted at DN i.85.
\(^5\) A stock formula—e.g., DN i.85; AN i.56.
“Is it true, as is said, that you, Anuruddha, lay down in a sleeping-place with a woman?”

“It is true, lord,” he said.

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked him, saying:

“How can you, Anuruddha, lie down in a sleeping-place with a woman? Anuruddha, it is not for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk should lie down in a sleeping-place with a woman, there is an offence of expiation.”

_Whatever_ means: ... is monk to be understood in this case.

_Woman_ means: a human woman, not a female _yakkha_, not a female departed one, not a female animal, even a little girl born this very day, all the more an older one.

_With_ means: together.

_Sleeping-place_ means: if it is fully covered, if it is fully closed round, if it is partially covered, if it is partially closed round.

_Should lie down in a sleeping-place_ means: if at sunset a monk lies down when a woman is lying down, there is an offence of expiation. If a woman lies down when a monk is lying down, there is an offence of expiation. Or if both lie down there is an offence of expiation. If getting up, they lie down again, there is an offence of expiation.

If he thinks that it is a woman when it is a woman (and) lies down in a sleeping-place with (her), there is an offence of expiation. If he is in doubt as to whether it is a woman (and) lies down in a sleeping-place with (her), there is an offence of expiation. If he thinks that it is not a woman when it is a woman (and) lies down in a sleeping-place with (her), there is an offence of expiation. If it is half covered, half closed round, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he lies down in a sleeping-place with a female yakkha or with a female departed one or with a eunuch or with a female animal, there is an offence of wrong-doing.¹ If he thinks that it is a woman when it is not a woman, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether it is not a woman, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it is not a woman when it is not a woman, there is no offence.

---

¹ This seems unfair, as Anuruddha is shown not to have lain down with the woman. He was a cousin to Gotama, and one of his most eminent disciples. At _AN_ i.23 he is called chief of those of deva-like sight, a gift he highly prized; see _MN_ i.213.

² _Cf. BD_ 1.202, _BD_ 1.332. ³ _sahā ti ekato_. ⁴ _Cf. above, BD_ 2.196. ⁵ _Cf. above, BD_ 2.196; _Vin_ 4.138. ⁶ _Cf. below, BD_ 2.206, _BD_ 2.358.

There is no offence if it is fully covered (but) not fully closed round, if it is fully closed round (but) not fully covered, if it is partially uncovered, partially not closed round, if the monk sits down while the woman is lying down, if the woman sits down while the monk is lying down, or if both sit down; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.²

The Sixth

¹ Cf. below, BD 2.207, BD 2.358. ² Cf. above, BD 2.197.
... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the venerable Udāyan frequented families, and he approached many families. Then the venerable Udāyan, dressing in the morning, taking his bowl and robe, went up to a certain family. Now at that time the house-wife¹ was sitting at the entrance-door,² and the daughter-in-law of the house³ was sitting at the door of the living-room.⁴ Then the venerable Udāyan went up to the house-wife, and having gone up he gave dhamma privately⁵ to the house-wife. Then the daughter-in-law of the house thought thus:

“What now, is this recluse the mother-in-law’s lover, or is he speaking offensively?”

Then the venerable Udāyan, having given dhamma privately to the house-wife, approached the daughter-in-law of the house, and having approached he gave dhamma privately to the daughter-in-law of the house. Then the house-wife thought:

“What now, is this recluse the lover of the daughter-in-law of the house, or is he speaking offensively?”

Then the venerable Udāyan, having given dhamma privately to the daughter-in-law of the house, departed. Then the house-wife said to the daughter-in-law of the house:

“Well now, what did this recluse say to you?”

“Lady, he taught dhamma to me⁶; but what did he say to the lady?”

¹ gharani = gharasamini, Vin-a 750 = Pv-a 174. Cf. kulagharani at sn i.201; gharani at Vin 1.271, Pv 3.1.9. ² nivesanadvare ti nivesanassa mahadvare, Vin-a 750. ³ gharasunhā. ⁴ āvasathadvare ti ovarakadvare, Vin-a 750. ⁵ upakāṇhake, literally into the ear. ⁶ me the first time, mayhaṁ the second.
“He also taught dhamma to me,”¹ she said.

These (women) looked down upon, criticised, spread it about, saying:

“How can master Udāyin teach dhamma privately? Should not dhamma be given clearly² and openly?”

Monks heard these women who looked down upon, criticised, spread it about. Those who were modest monks looked down upon, criticised, spread it about, saying:

“How can the venerable Udāyin teach dhamma to women?”³

Then these monks told this matter to the lord ...

“Is it true, as is said, that you, Udāyin, taught dhamma to women?”

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked him, saying:

“How can you, foolish man, teach dhamma to women? It is not, foolish man, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk should teach dhamma to women, there is an offence of expiation.”

And thus this rule of training for monks came to be laid down by the lord.

Now at that time female lay-followers, seeing monks, spoke thus:

“Please, masters, teach dhamma.”

“Sisters, it is not allowable to teach dhamma to women.”

“Please, masters, teach dhamma in five or six sentences,⁴ it is possible to learn dhamma in a few (sentences).”

“Sisters, it is not allowable to teach dhamma to women,” and being scrupulous, they did not teach. The female lay-followers looked down upon, criticised, spread it about, saying:

¹ me the first time, mayhaṁ the second. ² vissattkena, which Pali-English Dictionary, quoting Vin 2.99 (vissatthena), calls “in confidence.” Vin-a 750 says, vissāţţhena ti suniggatenâ saddena. ³ Note how the emphasis is shifted from “privately” to “to women”; probably such a shifting bears the mark of a later editorial hand, when women no longer occupied the comparatively high place that was theirs under early Buddhism. ⁴ vācā, or word, saying, speech.
“How can these masters, being asked by us, not teach dhamma?”

Monks heard these female lay-followers who looked down upon, criticised, spread it about. Then these monks told this matter to the lord. Then the lord, on this occasion, in this connection, having given reasoned talk, addressed the monks, saying:

“Monks, I allow you to teach dhamma to women in five or six sentences. And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk should teach dhamma to women in more than five or six sentences, there is an offence of expiation.”

And thus this rule of training for monks came to be laid down by the lord.

Now at that time the group of six monks thought: “It is allowed by the lord to teach dhamma to women in five or six sentences”; and these, making an unlearned man sit down near by, taught dhamma to women in more than five or six sentences. Those who were modest monks looked down upon, criticised, spread it about, saying:

“How can the group of six monks, making an unlearned man sit down near by, teach dhamma to women in more than five or six sentences?”

Then these monks told this matter to the lord ...

“Is it true, as is said, that you, monks ... to women?”

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

“How can you, foolish men ... to women? It is not, foolish men, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk should teach dhamma to women in more than five or six sentences, except a learned man (be present), there is offence of expiation.”

Whatever means: ... is monk to be understood in this case.

¹ aviññūṁ purisaviggaṁ. ² viññunā purisaviggahena. Vin-a 750 says, “not a yakkha, not a departed one, not an animal.”
Woman means: a human woman, not a female yakkha, not a female departed one, not a female animal, one who is learned, competent to know good speech and bad speech, what is lewd and what is not lewd.¹

In more than five or six sentences means: exceeding five or six sentences.

Dhamma means: spoken by the enlightened one, spoken by disciples, spoken to holy men, spoken by devatās, connected with the goal, connected with dhamma.²

Should teach means: if he teaches by line, for every line there is an offence of expiation. If he teaches by syllable, for every syllable there is an offence of expiation.³

Except a learned man (be present) means: setting aside a learned man.

A learned man means: one who is competent to know good speech and bad speech, what is lewd and what is not lewd.

If he thinks that it is a woman⁴ when it is a woman (and) teaches dhamma in more than five or six sentences, except a learned man (be present), there is an offence of expiation. If he is in doubt as to whether it is a woman (and) ... except a learned man (be present), there is an offence of expiation. If he thinks that it is not a woman when it is a woman ... except a learned man (be present), there is an offence of expiation. If he teaches dhamma in more than five or six sentences to a female yakkha or to a female departed one or to a eunuch or to an animal in woman's form, except a learned man (be present), there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it is a woman when it is not a woman, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether it is not a woman, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it is not a woman when it is not a woman, there is no offence.

¹ = BD 1.215, BD 1.337.   ² = above, BD 2.192.   ³ Cf. above, BD 2.192, where there is the same explanation for vāceyya as here for deseyya.   ⁴ Cf. above, BD 2.202, below, BD 2.358.
There is no offence if a learned man (be present); if he teaches dhamma in five or six sentences; if he teaches dhamma in less than five or six sentences; if he teaches having risen, having sat down again; if the woman having risen sits down again, and he teaches at that (moment)¹; if he is teaching a different woman; if she asks a question; if (she) having asked a question, he speaks; if talking for the good of another, a woman hears²; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

'The Seventh'

¹ tasmīṁ deseti; Vin-a 751, tasmīṁ khaṇe deseti.
² Cf. BD 2.272, BD 2.275.
Monks’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 8

… at Vesāli in the pavilion of the Gabled Hall in the Great Grove. Now at that time¹ many monks who were friends and companions went for the rains to the banks of the river Vaggumudā. At that time Vajji was short of alms-food, which was difficult to obtain; it was suffering from a famine, and food-tickets were being issued. Nor was it easy to keep oneself going by gleaning or by favour. Then these monks said to one another:

“At present Vajji is short of alms-food ... Nor is it easy to keep oneself going by gleaning or by favour. What now if we, by some strategem, all together, being on friendly terms and harmonious, should spend a comfortable rainy season and not go short of alms-food?”

Some spoke thus: “Look, your reverences, we could superintend the business of householders, thus they will think to give to us; thus we, all together, being on friendly terms and harmonious, will spend a comfortable rainy season and not go short of alms-food.”

Some spoke thus: “Enough, your reverences, of super-intending the business of householders. Look, your reverences, we will execute householders’ commissions, thus they will think to give to us; thus we, all together, being on friendly terms and harmonious, will spend a comfortable rainy season and not go short of alms-food.”

Some spoke thus: “Enough, your reverences, of super-intending the business of householders and of executing householders’ commissions. Look, your reverences, we will speak praise to householders concerning this or that condition of further-men, saying: ‘Such a monk is possessed of the first musing, such a monk is possessed of the second musing, such a monk is possessed of the third musing, such a monk is possessed of the fourth musing, such a monk is a stream-attainer, such a monk is a once-returner, such a monk is a non-returner, such a monk is man perfected, such a monk is a three-fold wisdom man, such a monk is a sixfold super-knowledge man.’ Thus these (householders) will think to give to us; thus we, all together, being on friendly terms and harmonious, will spend a comfortable rainy season and not go short of alms-food. It is better, your reverences, to speak praise to householders concerning this or that condition of further-men.”

¹ Cf. Bu-Pj 4, where it is an offence involving defeat unfoundedly to claim a condition of further-men (uttarimanussa-dhamma). See BD 1.151ff. for notes.

Then these monks spoke praise to householders concerning this or that condition of further-men, saying, “Such a monk is possessed of the first musing ... such a monk is a sixfold super-knowledge man.” Then these (men) thought: “Surely we have gained, surely there is a profit for us that such monks have come to us for the rains. Surely such monks as these monks, virtuous and of good character, never came to us for the rains before.” Accordingly these did not on their own account eat meals—they gave not to parents, they gave not to wife and children, they gave not to slave or servant, they gave not to friend or colleague, they gave not to blood-relations, as they gave to the monks. Accordingly these did not on their own account take savoury solid foods or drinks—they gave not to parents, they gave not to wife and children, they gave not to slave or servant, they gave not to friend or colleague, they gave not to blood-relations, as they gave to the monks. Thus these monks became handsome, of rounded features, their complexions bright, their skins clear.

Now it was the custom for monks who had finished keeping the rains to go and see the lord. Then these monks who had finished keeping the rains, the three months having elapsed, packing away their bedding taking their bowls and robes, went up to Vesālī. In the course of time they came up to Vesālī, the Great Grove, the pavilion of the Gabled Hall, and to the lord, and having approached the lord, they greeted him and sat down at a respectful distance. At that time the monks who had spent the rains in those regions had become lean, wretched, of a bad colour, having become very yellow, their veins standing out all over their bodies; but the monks from the banks of the Vaggumudā had become handsome, of rounded features, their complexions bright, their skins clear. Now it was the custom for enlightened ones, for lords, to exchange friendly greetings with incoming monks. So the lord said to the monks from the banks of the Vaggumudā:

“I hope, monks, that things went well with you, I hope that you had enough to support life, I hope that, all together, being on friendly terms and harmonious, you spent a comfortable rainy season and did not go short of alms-food?”

“Things did go well with us, lord, we had enough to support life, lord, and all together we, lord, being on friendly terms and harmonious, spent a comfortable rainy season and did not go short of alms-food.”

Tathāgatas knowing (sometimes) ask; knowing (sometimes) do not ask; they ask, knowing the right time (to ask), and they do not ask, knowing the right time (when not to ask). Tathāgatas ask about what belongs to the goal, not about what does not belong to the goal; the breaking of the bridge of the Tathāgatas is among what does not belong to the goal. Enlightened ones, lords, question monks concerning two matters, either: “Shall we teach dhamma?” or, “Shall we make known a rule of training for disciples?”

Then the lord spoke thus to the monks from the banks of the Vaggumudā:

“In what way did you, monks, all together, being on friendly terms and harmonious, spend a comfortable rainy season and not go short of alms-food?” Then these monks told this matter to the lord.

“Indeed, monks, I wonder if that is a fact?”

“It is a fact,¹ lord,” they said.

¹ At Vin 3.89 (BD 1.154), the answer is, “It is not a fact,” or it is a falsehood (abhūta).
The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

“How can you, monks, for the sake of your stomachs, speak praise to householders concerning this or that condition of further-men? It is not, monks, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk should speak of a condition of further-men to one who is not ordained—if it is a fact,¹ there is an offence of expiation.”

Whatever means: ... is monk to be understood in this case.

Not ordained means: setting aside monk and nun, the rest are called not ordained.

Condition of further-men² means: musing, freedom, concentration, attainment, knowledge and insight, making the Way to become, realisation of the fruits, destruction of the corruptions, delight in solitude for the mind devoid of the hindrances.

Musing means: the first musing, the second musing, the third musing, the fourth musing.

Freedom means: void freedom, signless freedom, freedom in which there is no hankering.

Concentration means: void concentration, signless concentration, concentration in which there is no hankering.

Attainment means: void attainment, signless attainment, attainment in which there is no hankering.

Knowledge and insight³ means: the three knowledges.

Making the Way to become means: the four presences of mindfulness, the four right efforts, the four bases of psychic potencies, the five faculties, the five powers, the seven parts of enlightenment, the noble eightfold Way.

Realisation of the fruits means: realisation of the fruit of stream-attainment, realisation of the fruit of once-returning, realisation of the fruit of no-return, realisation of the fruit of perfection.

¹ If it is not a fact, then there is a Pārājika offence (Bu-Pj 4).
² From here to end of this Pācittiya, cf. Vin 3.92–100 (BD 1.161–171).
³ At Vin 3.93, simply ņāṇa, knowledge.
Destruction of the corruptions means: the destruction of passion, the destruction of hatred, the destruction of confusion.

For the mind devoid of the hindrances means: the mind devoid of the hindrance of passion, the mind devoid of the hindrance of hatred, the mind devoid of the hindrance of confusion.

Delight in solitude means: during the first musing there is delight in solitude, during the second musing... during the third musing... during the fourth musing there is delight in solitude.

Should speak of means: there is an offence of expiation for saying to one who is not ordained, “I will attain the first musing.”

Should speak of means: there is an offence of expiation for saying to one who is not ordained, “I am attaining the first musing.”

Should speak of means: there is an offence of expiation for saying to one who is not ordained, “I attained the first musing.”... “I am possessed of the first musing... I am master of the first musing... The first musing is realised by me.”

Should speak of means: there is an offence of expiation for saying to one who is not ordained: “I will attain the second... third... fourth musing. I am attaining the second... third... fourth musing. I attained the second... third... fourth musing. I am possessed of the... fourth musing. I am master of the... fourth musing. The... fourth musing is realised by me.”

Should speak of means: there is an offence of expiation for saying to one who is not ordained: “I will attain... I am attaining... I attained the void freedom, the signless freedom, the freedom in which there is no hankering, the void concentration, the signless concentration, the concentration in which there is no hankering, I am possessed of... I am master of the concentration in which there is no hankering, the concentration in which there is no hankering is realised by me.”

Should speak of means: there is an offence of expiation for saying to one who is not ordained: “I will attain... I am attaining... I attained the void attainment, the signless attainment, the attainment...
in which there is no hankering, I am possessed of ... I am master of the attainment in which there is no hankering, the attainment in which there is no hankering is realised by me.”

Should speak of means: there is an offence of expiation for saying to one who is not ordained: “I will attain the three knowledges ... I am possessed of the three knowledges ...”

Should speak of means: there is an offence of expiation for saying to one who is not ordained: “I will attain ... I am possessed of the four presences of mindfulness, the four right efforts, the four bases of psychic potencies ...”

Should speak of means: there is an offence of expiation for saying to one who is not ordained: “I will attain ... I am possessed of the five faculties, the five powers ... I am possessed of ... I am master of the five powers, the five powers are realised by me.”

Should speak of means: there is an offence of expiation for saying to one who is not ordained, “I will attain the seven parts of enlightenment ... I am possessed of the seven parts of enlightenment ...”

Should speak of means: there is an offence of expiation for saying to one who is not ordained, “I will attain the noble eightfold Way ... I am possessed of the noble eightfold Way ...”

Should speak of means: there is an offence of expiation for saying to one who is not ordained, “I will attain the fruit of stream-attainment, the fruit of once-returning, the fruit of no-return, perfection ... I am possessed of perfection ...”

Should speak of means: there is an offence of expiation for saying to one who is not ordained, “Passion is given up by me, hatred is given up by me, confusion is given up by me ... renounced ... sacrificed ... destroyed ... forsaken ... thrown aside ... rejected.”

Should speak of means: there is an offence of expiation for saying to one who is not ordained, “My mind is devoid of the hindrance of passion ... of hatred ... my mind is devoid of the hindrance of confusion.”

Should speak of means: there is an offence of expiation for saying to one who is not ordained: “In solitude I will attain the first musing ... the second musing ... the third ... the fourth musing ... in solitude I am possessed of the fourth musing ...

Should speak of means: there is an offence of expiation for saying to one who is not ordained, “I will attain the first musing and the second musing is realised by me.”

Should speak of means: there is an offence of expiation for saying to one who is not ordained, “I will attain the first musing and the third musing ... the first musing and the fourth musing are attained by me.”

Should speak of means: there is an offence of expiation for saying to one who is not ordained, “I will attain the first musing and the void freedom and the signless freedom and the freedom in which there is no hankering and the void concentration and the signless concentration and the concentration in which there is no hankering ... is realised by me.”

Should speak of means: there is an offence of expiation for saying to one who is not ordained, “I will attain the first musing and the void attainment and the signless attainment and the attainment in which there is no hankering ... is realised by me.”

Should speak of means: there is an offence of expiation for saying to one who is not ordained, “I will attain the first musing and the three knowledges ... is realised by me.”

Should speak of means: there is an offence of expiation for saying to one who is not ordained, “I will attain the first musing and the four presences of mindfulness and the four right efforts and the four bases of psychic potencies ... realised by me.”

Should speak of means: there is an offence of expiation for saying to one who is not ordained, “I will attain the first musing and the five faculties and the five powers ... realised by me.”

Should speak of means: there is an offence of expiation for saying to one who is not ordained, “I will attain the first musing and the seven parts of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold Way, and the fruit of stream-attainment, and the fruit of once-returning, and the fruit of no-return, and perfection ... realised by me.”

Should speak of means: there is an offence of expiation for saying to one who is not ordained, “I will attain the first musing ... I attained ... and passion is given up by me, and hatred is given up by me, and confusion is given up by me, and ... rejected.”

Should speak of means: there is an offence of expiation for saying to one who is not ordained, “I will attain the first musing ... I am attaining ... realised by me ... and my mind is devoid of the hindrance of passion ... of the hindrance of hatred ... of the hindrance of confusion.”

Should speak of means: there is an offence of expiation for saying to one who is not ordained, “I will enter upon the second musing and the third musing, and the second musing and the fourth musing ... and my mind is devoid of the hindrance of confusion.”

Should speak of means: there is an offence of expiation for saying to one who is not ordained, “I will attain the second musing and the first musing ... attained by me.”

Should speak of means: there is an offence of expiation for saying to one who is not ordained, “My mind is devoid of the hindrance of confusion and I will attain the first musing and the second musing and the third musing and the fourth musing ... realised by me ...”

Should speak of means: there is an offence of expiation for saying to one who is not ordained, “My mind is devoid of the hindrance of confusion and my mind is devoid of the hindrance of hatred ...”

Should speak of means: there is an offence of expiation for saying to one who is not ordained, “I will attain ... I am attaining ... I attained the first musing and the second musing and the third musing and the fourth musing and the void freedom and the signless freedom and the freedom in which there is no hankering and the void concentration and the signless concentration and the concentration in which there is no hankering and the void attainment and the signless attainment and the attainment in which there is no hankering and the three knowledges and the four presences of mindfulness and the four right efforts and the four bases of psychic potencies and theive faculties and the five powers and the seven parts of enlightenment and the noble eightfold Way and the fruit of stream-attainment and the fruit of once-returning and the fruit of no-return and perfection and passion is given up by me ... and hatred is given up by me ... and confusion is given up by me, renounced, sacrificed, destroyed, forsaken, thrown aside, rejected, and my mind is devoid of the hindrance of passion and my mind is devoid of the hindrance of hatred and my mind is devoid of the hindrance of confusion.”

Should speak of means: there is an offence of expiation for saying to one who is not ordained, “I will attain the first musing,” and for acknowledging it, if he is desirous of saying, “I will attain the second musing”; but if he does not acknowledge it, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

Should speak of means: there is an offence of expiation for saying to one who is not ordained, “I will attain the first musing,” and for acknowledging it, if he is desirous of saying, “I will attain the second musing ... the fourth musing ... the void freedom ... and my mind is devoid of the hindrance of confusion”; but if he does not acknowledge it, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

Should speak of means: there is an offence of expiation for saying to one who is not ordained, “My mind is devoid of the hindrance of hatred,” and for acknowledging it, if he is desirous of saying, “I will attain the first musing” ... for saying, for acknowledging ... “I will attain the first musing ...”; but if he does not acknowledge it, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

Should speak of means: there is an offence of expiation for saying to one who is not ordained, “I will attain the first musing and the second musing and the third musing and the fourth musing ... and my mind is devoid of the hindrance of hatred,” and for acknowledging it, if he is desirous of saying, “My mind is devoid of the hindrance of confusion”; but if he does not acknowledge it, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

Should speak of means: there is an offence of expiation for saying to one who is not ordained, “I will attain the second musing and the third musing ... and my mind is devoid of the hindrance of confusion,” and for acknowledging it, if he is desirous of saying, “I will attain the first musing”; but if he does not acknowledge it, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

There is an offence of wrong-doing for saying to one who is not ordained, “The monk who lives in this dwelling-place will attain ... is attaining ... attained the first musing, this monk is possessed of, master of the first musing, the first musing is realised by this monk.”

There is an offence of wrong-doing for saying to one who is not ordained, “The monk who lives in this dwelling-place will attain ... is attaining ... attained the second musing, the third musing, the fourth musing, the void freedom ... perfection ... Passion is given up by this monk ... hatred is given up ... confusion is given up by this monk, renounced ... rejected. This monk’s mind is devoid of the hindrance of passion ... of hatred ... is devoid of the hindrance of confusion.”

There is an offence of wrong-doing for saying to one who is not ordained, “The monk who lives in this dwelling-place will attain ... is attaining ... attained the first musing in solitude ... the second musing ... the third musing ... the fourth musing in solitude ... This monk is possessed of the fourth musing in solitude, is master of ... The fourth musing is realised by this monk in solitude.”

There is an offence of wrong-doing for saying to one who is not ordained, “The monk who uses your dwelling-place, who uses your robes, who uses your alms-food, who uses your lodgings, who uses your medicines for the sick ... by whom your dwelling-place was used, by whom your robes were used, by whom your alms-food was used, by whom your lodgings were used, by whom your medicine for the sick were used ... to whom, thanks to you, he gave a dwelling-place, he gave robes, he gave alms-food, he gave lodgings, he gave medicines for the sick, that monk attained the fourth musing in solitude ... the fourth musing was realised by that monk in solitude.”

There is no offence if he speaks of what is a fact¹ to one who is ordained; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

The Eighth

¹ bhūta.
... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, came to be making a quarrel with the group of six monks. He, having fallen into the offence of intentional emission of semen,¹ begged the Order for probation on account of this offence. The Order granted him probation on account of this offence. At that time a certain guild at Sāvatthī had food for the Order. He, being under probation, sat down in the refectory at the end of a seat. The group of six monks said to these lay-followers:

“How your reverences, this venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, an esteemed dependent of yours, is eating the gift of faith with the very same hand as that which he used to emit semen. He, falling into the offence of intentional emission, begged the Order for probation on account of that offence. The Order granted him probation on account of that offence, so that being under probation, he is sitting at the end of a seat.”

Those who were modest monks looked down upon, criticised, spread it about, saying:

“How can this group of six monks speak of a very bad offence² of a monk to one who is not ordained?”

“How is it true, as is said, that you, monks, spoke of a very bad offence of a monk to one who is not ordained?”

¹ Bu-Ss 1, Vin 3.112 = BD 1.196. Cf. also Bu-Pc 64.
“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

“How can you, foolish men, speak of a monk’s very bad offence to one who is not ordained? It is not, foolish men, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk should speak of a monk’s very bad offence to one who is not ordained, except on the agreement of the monks,¹ there is an offence of expiation.”

---

Whatever means: ... is monk to be understood in this case.

Of a monk’s means: of another monk’s.

Very bad offence means: both the four involving defeat and the thirteen involving a formal meeting of the Order.²

Not ordained means: setting aside monk and nun, the rest are called not ordained.³

Should speak of means: should speak of to a woman or to a man or to one who leads the household life⁴ or to one who has gone forth.

Except on the agreement of the monks means: setting aside the agreement of the monks.

There is agreement of the monks limited to offences,⁵ not limited to families; there is agreement of the monks limited to families, not limited to offences; there is agreement of the monks limited to offences and limited to families; there is agreement of the monks neither limited to offences nor limited to families.

Limited to offences means: if he says: “he should be spoken to concerning just those offences,”⁶ offences come to be taken up.

Limited to families means: if he says: “he should be spoken to among just those families,” families come to be taken up.

¹ Cf. above, BD 2.15, BD 2.157. ² = Vin 4.128. ³ Cf. above, BD 2.191, BD 2.211. ⁴ gahaṭṭha. ⁵ āpattipariyantā. Cf. Vin 2.58, āpattipariyantaṁ na jānāti, rattipariyantaṁ na jānāti; translated at Vinaya Texts ii.416 “he was not aware of the degree of the offences and was not aware of the duration of the times.” Cf. below, BD 2.371, bhesajjapariyantā and rattipariyantā. ⁶ ettakāhi āpattīhi. ⁷ āpattiyo pariggahitāyo.
Limited to offences and limited to families means: if he says: “he should be spoken to concerning just those offences among just those families,” offences come to be taken up and families come to be taken up.

Neither limited to offences nor limited to families means: there come to be offences that are not taken up and there come to be families that are not taken up.

In “limited to offences,” if setting aside those offences which come to be offences that are not taken up, he speaks about other offences, there is an offence of expiation. In “limited to families,” if setting aside those families which come to be families that are not taken up, he speaks among other families, there is an offence of expiation. In “limited to offences and limited to families,” if setting aside those offences which come to be offences that are taken up, and if setting aside those families which come to be families that are taken up, he speaks about other offences among other families, there is an offence of expiation. In “neither limited to offences nor limited to families,” there is no offence.

If he thinks that it is a very bad offence when it is a very bad offence (and) tells one who is not ordained, except on the agreement of the monks, there is an offence of expiation. If he is in doubt as to whether it is a very bad offence (and) tells one who is not ordained, except on the agreement of the monks, there is an offence of expiation. If he thinks that it is not a very bad offence when it is a very bad offence (and) tells one who is not ordained, except on the agreement of the monks, there is an offence of expiation. If he tells of an offence that is not very bad, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he tells one who is not ordained of a transgression\(^1\) which is very bad or which is not very bad, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it is a very bad offence when it is not a very bad offence, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether it is not a very bad offence, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it is not a very bad offence when it is not a very bad offence there is an offence of wrong-doing.\(^2\)

\[\text{Bu-Pc 9.2.3} \]

There is no offence if he speaks of an example but not of an offence; if he speaks of an offence but not of an example\(^3\); if there is the agreement of the monks; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

\textit{The Ninth}

\(^1\) \textit{ajjhācāra}. Examples are given at \textit{Vin 3.121} (coming into physical contact with a woman), \textit{Vin 3.128} (offending a woman by lewd speech); see \textit{BD 1.202, n. 3}. At \textit{Vinaya Texts} i.184 \textit{ajjhācāra} is taken to be transgression in conduct, consisting in offences against the minor rules of the Pātimokkha. \textit{Vin 1.172} is cited in support of this, for here failures in good behaviour, \textit{ācāravipatti}, are said to be grave offences, those of expiation, those of confession, those of wrong-doing and those of wrong speech. This is what \textit{Vin-a 754} must be referring to when it says that “beginning with five rules, a transgression is called very bad; the rest are not very bad.”\(^2\) This should surely read \textit{anāpatti}.\(^3\) According to \textit{Vin-a 754} if he names some transgression done by someone, there is no offence; likewise if he merely mentions an offence into which a monk has fallen, beginning with a \textit{Pārājika} and going down to one of wrong speech, there is no offence. But if he names the type of offence and gives an example of it, such as saying, “This (monk) has fallen into an offence involving a formal meeting of the Order, for having emitted impurely,” there is an offence for bringing forward (\textit{ghaṭetvā}) the offence together with an example of it. The word translated as “example” is \textit{vatthu}, matter, substance.
... at Āḷavī in the chief shrine at Āḷavī. Now at that time the monks of Āḷavī, making repairs, dug the ground and had it dug. People looked down upon, criticised, spread it about, saying:

“How can these recluses, sons of the Sakyans, dig the ground and have it dug? These recluses, sons of the Sakyans, are harming life that is one-facultied.”¹

Monks heard these people who looked down upon, criticised, spread it about. Those who were modest monks looked down upon, criticised, spread it about, saying:

“How can these monks of Āḷavī dig the ground and have it dug?”

... “Is it true, as is said, that you, monks, dig the ground and had it dug?”

“It is true, lord,” they said.

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

“How can you, foolish men, dig the ground and have it dug? For, foolish men, people having consciousness as living beings are in the ground. It is not, foolish men, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth: “Whatever monk should dig the ground or have it dug, there is an offence of expiation.”

____________________

Whatever means: ... is monk to be understood in this case.

Ground means: there are two (kinds of) ground: natural ground

¹ Cf. Vin 3.156 = BD 1.266f.
MONKS’ EXPIATION (PĀCITTĪYA) 10

and artificial ground.¹ Natural ground means: pure soil, pure clay, (with) few stones, (with) few pebbles, (with) few potsherds, (with) little gravel,² (with) little sand, almost all soil, almost all clay. Natural ground is also called not burnt.³ And whatever heap of soil or heap of clay is (left) damp⁴ for more than four months, this too is called natural ground. Artificial ground means: pure stone, pure pebbles, pure potsherds, pure gravel, pure sand, little soil, little clay, almost all stones, almost all pebbles, almost all potsherds, almost all gravel, almost all sand. Artificial ground is also called burnt. And whatever heap of soil or heap of clay is (left) damp for less than four months, this too is called artificial ground.

Should dig means: if he himself digs, there is an offence of expiation.

Should have (it) dug means: if he commands another, there is an offence of expiation. Commanding once, if he then digs many times, there is an offence of expiation.

If he thinks that it is ground when it is ground (and) digs it or has it dug or breaks it or has it broken or burns it or has it burnt,⁵ there is an offence of expiation. If he is in doubt as to whether it is ground (and) digs it … or has it burnt, there is an offence of expiation. If he thinks that it is not ground when it is ground (and) digs it … or has it burnt, there is no offence. If he thinks that it is ground when it is not ground, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether it is not ground, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it is not ground when it is not ground, there is no offence.

¹ jātāca pathavi ajātāca pathavi. ² marumbā, or perhaps coarse sand. At Vin 2.121 monks are allowed to spread marumbā, in a damp or swampy cell. Cf. Vin 2.142, Vin 2.153; also Mil 197. ³ By the potter. ⁴ ovaṭṭha; Vin-a 756 ovaṭṭa with variant readings ovaṭṭa, ovaṭṭha, ovaṭṭha. ⁵ Even by making a fire for cooking a bowl, Vin-a 758.
There is no offence if he speaks, saying: “Find\textsuperscript{1} this, give this, convey this, this is wanted, make this allowable”; if it was unintentional,\textsuperscript{2} if (he was) not thinking, if he did not know, if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.\textsuperscript{3}

\textbf{The Tenth}

\textbf{This Is Its Key}
Lying, insulting speech, slander, lines, then two on lying down, Except a learned man (be present), facts, very bad offence, digging.

\textbf{The First Division}

\textsuperscript{1} jāna; Vin-a 758 reads jānāhi, and indicates that these four activities refer to holes dug for stakes, to heavy clay, clay for chaff (thusamattikā) and soil. \textsuperscript{2} = Below, BD 2.229, BD 2.262, and Vin 4.125, Vin 4.185, and cf. Vin 3.78 (BD 1.136). \textsuperscript{3} Cf. below, end of Bu-Pc 11.
... at Āḷavī in the chief shrine at Āḷavī. Now at that time the monks of Āḷavī, making repairs, were cutting down trees and having them cut down; and a certain monk of Āḷavī cut down a tree, and the devatā living in that tree said to this monk:

“Do not, honoured sir, desiring to make an abode for yourself, cut down my abode.”

This monk, taking no notice, cut it down, and in doing so, struck the arm of that devatā’s son. Then it occurred to that devatā:

“What now if I, just here, should deprive this monk of life?” Then it occurred to that devatā:

“But this would not be suit ing in me, that I were, just here, to deprive this monk of life. What now if I were to tell this matter to the lord?”

Then this devatā approached the lord, and having approached she told this matter to the lord.

“Very good, devatā, it is good that you, devatā, did not deprive this monk of life. If today you, devatā, had deprived this monk of life, you, devatā, would also have produced much demerit. You go, devatā; in a certain place there is a solitary tree, go you into it.”

People looked down upon, criticised, spread it about, saying:

“How can these recluses, sons of the Sakyans, cut down trees and have them cut down? These recluses, sons of the Sakyans, are harming life that is one-facultied.”¹ Monks heard these people who looked down upon, criticised, spread it about. Those who were modest monks looked down upon, criticised, spread it about, saying:

¹ As in Bu-Pc 10.
“How can these monks of Āḷavī cut down trees and have them cut down?” ...

“Is it true, as is said, that you, monks, cut down trees and had them cut down?”

“It is true, lord,” they said.

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

“How can you, foolish men, cut down trees and have them cut down? It is not, foolish men, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“For destruction of vegetable growth there is an offence of expiation.”

Vegetable growth means: there are five kinds of propagation: (what is) propagated from roots, propagated from stems,² propagated from joints, propagated from cuttings,³ and fifthly (what is) propagated from seeds.⁴

Propagated from roots⁵ means: turmeric, ginger, orris root, white orris root, garlic,⁶ black hellebore, khus- khus,⁷ nut-grass,⁸ or

---

¹ bhūtagāma; translation taken from MRS. RHYS DAVIDS, To Become or Not to Become, p. 118. Vin-a 761 says gāmo ti rāsi, and that standing green grass and trees is a synonym for bhūtagāma. Dialogues of the Buddha 1.6 has “growing plants” for this word. This rule is referred to at Dhp-a 3.302; Snp-a 3. At Mil 266 the destruction of bhūtagāma is said to be no sin in the eyes of the world, but a sin in the teaching of the Jina (an epithet for both Gotama and the Jain, Mahāvīra). Cf. MN i.180 = MN iii.34.² khandhabīja. ³ aggabīja. Dialogues of the Buddha 1.6: “propagated from buddings,” with note that “it may mean ‘graftings’ if the art of grafting was then known in the Ganges valley.” But the plants mentioned could not be propagated by buddings, which, moreover, does not seem to be a recognised botanical term. These plants are propagated by cuttings.⁴ For this list, cf. DN i.5, DN iii.44, DN iii.47 (= Dialogues of the Buddha 3.40, Dialogues of the Buddha 3.42, “things grown from tubers, or shoots, or berries, or joints, or fifthly from seeds”), sn iii.54 (= ks iii.46, “root-seed, trunk-seed, seed from shoots, seed from joints, grain-seed, making five in all”); cf. DN-a 77, SN-a ii.272.⁵ Cf. DN-a 81 to end of Bu-Pc ii.1.1 below.⁶ ativisā, or dried ginger; an antidote to poison.
whatever others are born from a root, arise from a root; this means propagated from roots.

Propagated from stems means: the fig-tree,¹ the banyan-tree, (a kind of) fig-tree,² (another kind of) fig-tree,³ the Indian cedar wood,⁴ the wood-apple,⁵ or whatever others are born from a stem, arise from a stem; this means propagated from stems.

Propagated from joints means: sugar-cane, bamboo, reeds or whatever others are born from a knot, arise from a knot⁶; this means propagated from joints.

Propagated from cuttings means: basil,⁷ camel-grass,⁸ a kind

---

¹ usīra, probably Andropogon muricatum. Cf. below, BD 2.240, where one of the four kinds of stools or settees (koccha) is made of usīra. At Vin 2.130 one of the three kinds of fans allowed is made of usīra. In some parts of the East the roots are woven into sweet-smelling mats and baskets and are used in making perfume. ² bhaddamut-taka, probably Cyperus rotundus. Has underground edible tubers. See Vin 1.201, where these roots (or tubers) are allowed medicinally for flavouring foods which otherwise would be too unpalatable, for ill monks to take. Decoction of these roots used today in Ceylon as medicine for fever and stomach complaints. ³ This list is the same as that at sn v.96. ⁴ Or Toon tree, kacchaka. Cedar suggested at ks v.80. Pali-English Dictionary gives Cedrela Toona; Path of Purity ii.210 (= Vism 183), “black fig.” ⁵ kapiṭṭhaka. Variant readings are kapiṭṭhaka, kapitthana, kapittana. Pali-English Dictionary says that it is the tree Thespesia populneaoides, as does Childers under kapitano. KS v.80 and Path of Purity ii.210, both reading kapiṭṭhaka, render by “wood-apple.” The Dictionaries, placing “wood-apple” under kapiṭṭha, kapittha, call it Feronia elephantum. There is, however, no family connection between Thespesia populneaoides and Feronia elephantum. The former has a hard, dry, inedible fruit; the latter an edible fruit with a hard woody shell filled with a soft pulp, also used for medicinal purposes. Neither is a fig-tree (as tentatively suggested at ks v.80), but Feronia is more like a fig, and would be meant if we were certain that the context was suggesting a tree with an edible fruit. ⁶ pabba, joint, knot or section. Word hitherto translated as “joint” is phaḷu. ⁷ ajjuka. Pali-English Dictionary and Critical Pali Dictionary give Ocimum gratissimum. Probably the ordinary basil, Ocimum basilicum, is meant, as O. gratissimum is sometimes used as a synonym for this.
of andropogon,¹ or whatever others are born from a cutting, arise from a cutting; this means propagated from cuttings.

Propagated from seeds means: grain, pulses,² or whatever others are born from a seed, arise from a seed; this means propagated from seeds.

---

If he thinks that it is a seed when it is a seed (and) cuts it or has it cut or breaks it or has it broken or cooks it or has it cooked, there is an offence of expiation. If he is in doubt as to whether it is a seed (and) cuts it ... or has it cooked, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it is not a seed when it is a seed (and) cuts it ... or has it cooked, there is no offence. If he thinks that it is a seed when it is not a seed, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether it is not a seed, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it is not a seed when it is not a seed, there is no offence.

---

There is no offence if he speaks, saying: “Find this, give this, convey this, this is wanted, make this allowable”; if it was unintentional, if (he was) not thinking, if he did not know; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.³

---

The First

---

¹ phanijaka = bhūtanaka, Ja 6.536. Childers calls it the plant samīraṇa, which, according to Monier-Williams, is the plant maruvaka. (I cannot discover what is meant by this.) Pali-English Dictionary calls bhūtanaka, Andropogon schoenanthus. Camel-grass yields aromatic oil, mostly used for medicinal purposes. ¹ hirivela, occurring also at Ja 6.537. Pali-English Dictionary suggests as above. Monier-Williams gives hirvela, a kind of perfume = hrīvera, a kind of drug and perfume (= bāla, bālaka). Under bāla he gives “a kind of perfume or fragrant grass, Andropogon schoenanthus.” Childers also gives hiriveram, a perfume, Andropogon schoenanthus. ² Cf. BD 1.83, n. 3. ³ Cf. above, end of Bu-Pc 10; also below, BD 2.262, and Vin 4.125. Vin-a 766 says that the clauses “Find this,” etc., refer to medicines made from roots, to roots and leaves, to trees or creepers, to flowers and fruits, and to trees or creepers or fruits respectively. Vin-a 767 refers to an anujānāmi at Vin 2.109, in which monks are allowed to eat fruit that has become allowable to recluses in five ways.
Monks’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 12

... at Kosambi in Ghosita’s monastery. Now at that time the venerable Channa, having indulged in bad habits,¹ being examined for an offence² in the midst of the Order, shelved the question(s) by (asking) others,³ saying, “Who has committed? What has he committed? On what ground has he committed? How has he committed? What do you say? Why do you say (it)?” Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying:

“How can the venerable Channa, being examined for an offence in the midst of the Order, shelve the question(s) by (asking) others, saying: ‘Who has committed ... Why do you say (it)?’ ... “It is true, lord,” he said.

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked him, saying:

“How can you, foolish man, being examined for an offence in the midst of the Order ... saying, ‘... Why do you say (it)?’? ... It is not, foolish man, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ...” and having rebuked him and given reasoned talk, he addressed the monks, saying:

“Well then, monks, let the Order bring a charge of evasion⁴ against the monk, Channa. And thus, monks, should he be charged: the Order should be informed by an experienced, competent monk, saying:

¹ As at BD 1.309. Cf. Channa at Vin 2.292, DN ii.154. ² At Vin 2.88, when monks charge a monk with failure in conduct, ācāravipatti, there is a legal question arising out of censure. ³ aṇñen’ aṇñāṁ paṭicarati; cf. above, BD 2.164. ⁴ aṇñavādakaṁ ropetu. Aṇñavāda is the person who prevaricates, who evades the issue by talking about something else, “who prefers to talk about something else, shuffling and evading the thing in question” (Critical Pali Dictionary). Verbal evasion only is meant, see Old Commentary.
\'Honoured sirs, let the Order listen to me. This monk, Channa, being examined for an offence in the midst of the Order, shelved the question(s) by (asking) others. If it seems right to the Order, the Order should bring a charge of evasion against the monk, Channa. This is the motion. Honoured sirs, let the Order listen to me. This monk, Channa ... by (asking) others. The Order brings a charge of evasion against the monk, Channa. If the bringing of a charge of evasion against the monk, Channa, seems right to the venerable ones, let them be silent; if it does not seem right, they should speak. A charge of evasion is brought by the Order against the monk, Channa, and it is right ... So do I understand.\’"

Then the lord having rebuked the venerable Channa in many a figure for his difficulty in maintaining himself ... "... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“In evasion,¹ there is an offence of expiation.”

And thus this rule of training for monks came to be laid down by the lord.

Now at that time the venerable Channa, being examined for an offence in the midst of the Order, thinking, “Shelving the question(s) by (asking) others, I will fall into an offence,” (so) having become silent, he vexed² the Order. Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying:

“How can the venerable Channa, being examined for an offence in the midst of the Order, having become silent, vex the Order?” ...

“Is it true, as is said, that you, Chaiina, being examined for an offence in the midst of the Order, having become silent, vexed the Order?”

“It is true, lord,” he said.

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked him, saying:

“How can you, foolish man ... vex the Order? It is not, foolish man, ¹ aññavādake. ² tuṇhibhūto saṅgham viheseti. Vin-a 770 says that vihesaka, vexing, is a name for becoming silent.

for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ...” and having rebuked him and given reasoned talk, he addressed the monks, saying:

“Well then, monks, let the Order bring a charge of vexing¹ against the monk, Channa. And thus, monks ... (as above in Bu-Pc 12.1.1; instead of evasion read vexing; instead of shelving the question(s) by (asking) others read having become silent, he vexes the Order) ... should this rule of training be set forth:

“In evasion, in vexing, there is an offence of expiation.”²

Evasion means: being examined in the midst of the Order on an example³ or for an offence, not wishing to speak of it, not wishing to bring it forward,⁴ he shelves the questions by (asking) others, saying: ‘Who has committed? What has he committed? On what ground has he committed? How has he committed? What do you say? Why do you say (it)?’—this means evasion.

Vexing means: being examined in the midst of the Order on an example or for an offence, not wishing to speak of it, not wishing to bring it forward, having become silent, he vexes the Order—this means vexing.

If he is not being charged with evasion (but) is being examined in the midst of the Order on an example or for an offence, (and) not wishing to speak of it, not wishing to bring it forward, he shelves the question(s) by (asking) others, saying: ‘Who has committed? ... Why do you say (it)?’ there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is not being charged with vexing (but) is being examined ... not wishing to speak of it, not wishing to bring it forward, having become silent, he vexes the Order, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is being charged with evasion (and) is being examined ... he shelves the question(s) by (asking) others, saying: ‘... Why do you say (it)?’, there is an offence of expiation. If he is being charged with vexing (and) is being examined

¹ vihesakaṁ ropetu. ² aññavādake vihesake pācittiyaṁ. Vin-a 770 says that in the two-fold matter there is a twofold pācittiya. ³ vatthusmiṁ; cf. vatthu + āpatti above, BD 2.222. ⁴ na ughṭetukāma.
... having become silent, he vexes the Order, there is an offence of expiation.

Bu-Pc 12.3.2

If he thinks that it is a legally valid act when it is a legally valid act, in evasion, in vexing, there is an offence of expiation. If he is in doubt as to whether it is a legally valid act, in evasion, in vexing, there is an offence of expiation. If he thinks that it is not a legally valid act¹ when it is a legally valid act, in evasion, in vexing, there is an offence of expiation. If he thinks that it is a legally valid act when it is not a legally valid act, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether it is not a legally valid act, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it is not a legally valid act when it is not a legally valid act, there is no offence.²

Bu-Pc 12.3.3

There is no offence if, not knowing, he asks; if, being ill, he does not speak; if, thinking: ‘Quarrel or dispute or strife or contention will come to be for the Order,’ he does not speak; if, thinking: ‘There will come to be schism in the Order or dissension in the Order,’³ he does not speak; if, thinking: ‘He will carry out an (official) act⁴ according to what is not the rule,⁵ or by an incomplete congregation,⁶ or against one who is not suitable for an (official) act,’⁷ he does not speak; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

The Second

¹ adhammakamma, explained at Vin 1.317. ² Cf. BD 1.302, BD 1.307, BD 1.313, BD 1.327; below, BD 2.237. ³ Cf. Vin 4.128, Vin 4.153, Vin 4.217. Saṅghabheda and saṅgharājī discussed at Vin 2.303; referred to at Vb-a 428. ⁴ Six kinds of kamma, official acts, given at Vin 1.317. ⁵ adhammena. Cf. Vin 1.115, where it is allowed to protest against an (official) act that is being conducted according to what is not the rule. ⁶ vaggena, by a section only of the Order, not all the members being present. Cf. Vin 1.108, Vin 1.111; also below, BD 2.269, and Vin 4.126. ⁷ na kammārahā. Cf. Vin 4.126, Vin 4.152, Vin 4.153; Vin 5.221.
... at Rājagaha in the Bamboo Grove at the squirrels’ feeding-place. Now at that time the venerable Dabba, the Mallian, assigned lodgings to the Order and distributed meals.\(^1\) Now at that time monks who were followers of Mettiya and Bhummajaka were newly ordained as well as of little merit; they obtained whatever inferior lodgings belonged to the Order and inferior meals.\(^2\) These made monks look down upon\(^3\) the venerable Dabba, the Mallian, saying:

“Dabba, the Mallian, assigns lodgings through favouritism and distributes meals through favouritism.”

Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying:

“How can monks who are followers of Mettiya and Bhummajaka make monks look down upon the venerable Dabba, the Mallian?” ... “Is it true, as is said, that you, monks, made monks look down upon Dabba, the Mallian?”

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them saying:

“How can you, foolish men, make monks look down upon Dabba, the Mallian? It is not, foolish men, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“In making (someone) look down upon,\(^5\) there is an offence of expiation.”

---

\(^1\) Cf. Vin 3.158 (= BD 1.272ff.) and Vin 4.154. \(^2\) Cf. Vin 3.160 = BD 1.275. \(^3\) ujjhāpenti. Vin-a 770 says avajānāpenti avaṇāñāya olokāpenti lāmakato va cintāpenti ti attho; cf. above, BD 2.2, n. 3, on ujjhāyanti. \(^4\) chandāya = pakkhapātena, Vin-a 771. \(^5\) ujjhā-panake; in full probably meaning “in making a monk look down upon another monk,” see Old Commentary, below.
And thus this rule of training for monks came to be laid down by the lord.

Now at that time monks who were followers of Mettiya and Bhumajaka thought: “Making (someone) look down upon is forbidden by the lord, (but) this much shall the monks hear,” and in the neighbourhood of monks, they criticised¹ the venerable Dabba, the Mallian, saying:

“Dabba, the Mallian, assigns lodgings through favouritism and distributes meals through favouritism.”

Those who were modest monks ... (as in Bu-Pc 13.2.1 instead of “make monks look down upon” read “criticise”) ... “... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“In making (someone) look down upon, in criticising,² there is an offence of expiation.”

Making (someone) look down upon means: if he makes (someone) look down upon or if he criticises one who is ordained, desiring to bring blame, desiring to bring discredit, desiring to bring shame³ to one who is ordained (and) agreed upon by the Order as assigner of lodgings or as distributor of meals or as apportioner of coney or as apportioner of fruit or as apportioner of solid foods or as disposer of trifles,⁴ there is an offence of expiation.

¹ khīyanti. Khīyati (Sanskrit क्षियते) is explained in the Dictionaries to mean “to be exhausted, to waste away, to become dejected, to fall away from” (Pali-English Dictionary); “geht zu Ende” (Geiger, Pali Literature, p. 115); “to wane, to decrease, to be diminished, to waste away, perish” (Monier-Williams). But Vin-a 296, Vin-a 771 gives pakāsenthi, to show up, illustrate, explain, make known, give information about (Pali-English Dictionary). Cf. above, BD 2.2, n. 4. ² kiya-ka—i.e., the action of a person. Pali-English Dictionary calls this “a falling-away offence (legal term denoting the falling away from a consent once given),” as in Bu-Pc 79, Bu-Pc 81 (kiyadhamma); also see Vin 2.94, Vin 2.100, An iii.269, An iv.374. ³ māṅku, literally staggering, so shock, confusion, shame; see An v.v. This trio also occurs below, BD 2.280. ⁴ Cf. Vin 4.155. At Vin 2.176f. the qualifications that a monk appointed “distributor,” etc., should possess, are given. The items that the last, appamattakavis-sajjaka, is to dispose of, are enumerated at Vin 2.177. Cf. also An iii.275.
If he thinks that it is a legally valid act when it is a legally valid act, in making (someone) look down upon, in criticising, there is an offence of expiation. If he is in doubt as to whether it is a legally valid act, in making (someone) look down upon, in criticising, there is an offence of expiation. If he thinks that it is not a legally valid act when it is a legally valid act, in making (someone) look down upon, in criticising, there is an offence of expiation. If he makes (someone) look down upon or if he criticises one who is not ordained, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he makes (someone) look down upon or if he criticises one who is ordained or one who is not ordained, desiring to bring blame, desiring to bring discredit, desiring to bring shame to one who is ordained (but) not agreed upon by the Order as assigner of lodgings ... as disposer of trifles there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he makes (someone) look down upon or if he criticises one who is ordained or one who is not ordained, desiring to blame, desiring to bring discredit, desiring to bring shame to one who is not ordained, (but) agreed upon or not agreed upon by the Order as assigner of lodgings ... or as disposer of trifles, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it is a legally valid act when it is not a legally valid act, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether it is not a legally valid act, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it is not a legally valid act when it is not a legally valid act, there is no offence.

There is no offence if he makes (someone) look down upon or if he criticises one acting by nature from desire, from hatred, from stupidity, from fear; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

The Third

¹ Cf. BD 1.302, BD 1.307, BD 1.313, BD 1.327; above, BD 2.233, and Vin 4.155. ² These are the four agatis. Only a monk not endowed with them can be appointed a distributor of the various items mentioned here and in other parts of Vinaya. See Vin 2.176f.; also cf. the “silver-remover,” above, BD 2.104, the assigner of bowls, above, BD 2.122, and Vin 3.183, Vin 3.185; see BD 1.323, n. 7, for further references. ³ Cf. Vin 4.155.
... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time, monks preparing lodgings in winter-time in the open air, drying their bodies in the sun, when the time was announced, setting forth neither removed them nor had them removed, (but) set forth without having asked (for permission). The lodgings became damp. Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying:

“How can monks, preparing lodgings in the open air, setting forth, neither remove them nor have them removed, (but) set forth without having asked (for permission, so that) the lodgings are (left) damp?”

Then these monks told this matter to the lord ...

“Is it true, as is said, monks, that monks preparing lodgings in the open air ... (left) damp? ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk, spreading or having spread in the open air

---

¹ A definition of senāsana given at Vb 251 is a catalogue of things to sit and lie on, various types of buildings, caves, etc. It does not include seyyā, obviously thought of as a senāsana, below, BD 2.244. Vb-a 365 merely says that if he sleeps and sits there, it is a "lodging." ² Vin-a 770 says, “for the gruel meal.” ³ uddharati. Same word as ubbhata (+ kathina) of Bu-NP 1–Bu-NP 3 ⁴ anāpucchā. Cf. āpucchā and anā° at Vin 4.100, Vin 4.101, Vin 4.165, Vin 4.166. Cf. also Vin 2.211, where monks set out without asking permission as to the lodgings. It is there said, and cf. Old Commentary, below, that a monk, or, failing him, a probationer, or, failing him, a monastery-attendant should be asked for permission; this is in order that such a person may take care of the lodgings during the monks’ absence. ⁵ ovaṭṭham hoti. Vin-a 770 says that what remained became damp owing to the snow and rain. Ovaṭṭha occurs above, BD 2.224, in connection with heaps of clay and soil. ⁶ saññhata. Cf. above, BD 2.72, n. 1, but not used in that sense here.
a couch or a chair or a mattress or a stool belonging to the Order, setting forth, should neither remove it nor have it removed, or should go away without asking (for permission), there is an offence of expiation.”

And thus this rule of training for monks came to be laid down by the lord.

Now at that time monks, staying in the open air, were bringing back lodging early in the morning. Now the lord saw these monks bringing back lodgings early in the morning, and seeing them, in this connection, on this occasion, having given reasoned talk, he addressed the monks, saying:

“I allow you, monks, for the eight months (of the time) not appointed for keeping the rains to put aside lodgings in a hut or at the foot of a tree, wherever crows or vultures do not leave droppings.”

Whatever means: ... is monk to be understood in this case. Belonging to the Order means: it comes to be given to the Order, handed over to it.

---

¹ koccha. See Old Commentary, below. Vinaya Texts i.34, n., says, “it is apparently therefore of wicker work.” Called at Vinaya Texts iii.165 (= Vin 2.149) “a cane-bottomed chair.” Allowed at Vin 2.149. ² atiharanti, or removing from one place to another. ³ avassika-saṅkete. At Vin 1.298 vassika-saṅkete is one of the five occasions when a monk may lay aside his outer cloak. Saṅketa at BD.1. was rendered “rendezvous”—i.e., an appointment, an appointed time. See Vinaya Texts ii.234, note, on this word. At Vin 1.107 it is an offence of wrong-doing to recite the Pātimokkha in cell after cell without making a rendezvous or appointment (asaṅkêtena), since incoming monks did not know where the uposatha was to be held. Vin-a 772 says that the four months of the cold and the four months of the hot seasons are the eight months not thus appointed (evaṁ apaññatte) as months of the rains. ⁴ maṇḍape. Vin-a 772 says, “a maṇḍapa (shed or hut) of sākhā (branches), or a maṇḍapa of padara (boards, planks of wood; or this might be a maṇḍapa in a crevice). ⁵ N.B.—This is not a sikkhāpada, rule, but an anujānāmi, “allowance.” ⁶ Cf. above, BD 2.161.
Couch means:¹ there are four (kinds of) couch: a long one,² one with slats,³ one with curved legs,⁴ one with removable legs.⁵

Chair means: there are four (kinds of) chair: a long one, one with slats, one with curved legs, one with removable legs.⁶

Mattress means: there are five (kinds of) mattress: a mattress (made) of wool, a mattress (made) of cotton-cloth, a mattress (made) of bark, a mattress (made) of tina-grass, a mattress (made) of leaves.⁷

Stool means: made of bark or made of khus-khus⁸ or made of muñja-grass or made of reeds⁹; it is bound, having tucked them in.¹⁰

Spreading means: himself spreading.

Having spread¹¹ means: making another spread. If he makes one who is not ordained spread (it), it is an impediment¹² for him.¹³ If he makes one who is ordained spread it, there is an impediment for the one who spreads (it).¹⁴

¹ This definition of mañca occurs at Vin 4.168, Vin 4.169; Vb-a 365. These four kinds of couches and four kinds of chairs are allowed at Vin 2.149. ² masāraka. Vin-a 773 says, “it is made by boring a hole into the feet of the couch, and putting a knotted end through there.” ³ bundikābaddha. Vin-a 773 says, “it is made by holding the bedstead together, having burnt the feet of the couch with knotted ends.” ⁴ kulirapādaka, or carved. Vin-a 773, “made with feet like the feet of horses, rams, etc. Whatever has curved feet (vainkapādaka, literally curved as to the feet) is called kulirapadaka” (literally a crab-footer). ⁵ āhaccapādaka. Vin-a 774 says that “it is made by piercing the leg (aṅge). Then having pierced the knotted end, putting a knot through there, and giving a pin (or peg, āṇiṁ) above, the couch that is made should be called an āhaccapādaka. “This probably means that the pin can be removed at pleasure, when the couch would collapse. At Vin 4.46 it is defined as aṅge vijjhitā thito hoti, standing, having pierced the leg—i.e., having put the pin through. Āhacca-pādaka means literally a “take-away footer”—i.e., one whose feet can be taken away. ⁶ = Vin 4.168, Vin 4.169, Vb-a 365. ⁷ Same definition given at Vb-a 365. These five kinds of bhisi are allowed at Vin 2.150. Cf. above, BD 2.47, n. 1, on bhisi. ⁸ usīra, one of the plants “propagated from roots,” cf. above, BD 2.228. ⁹ babba, or bulrushes. Shoes made of this and of muñja-grass were not to be worn, Vin 1.190. ¹⁰ anto sariveṇṭhavā baddhān hoti. Vin-a 774 says that it is bound in the middle and spread out above and below. The middle, being made of the hides of lions and tigers, gives the senāsana the appearance of being made of gold. ¹¹ Causative. ¹² palibodha, or obstacle, obstruction. Cf. Vinaya Texts ii.157, n. 2. ¹³ Vin-a 774, for the one who causes it to be spread out. ¹⁴ santhāraka, at Vin 2.113, Vin 2.116, Vin 2.148, meaning a (tiṇa-grass) mat. Here it must refer to the person spreading out the things.
Setting forth, should neither remove it means: should not himself remove it.

Nor have it removed means: should not make another remove it.

Or should go away without asking (for permission) means: not asking a monk or a novice or a monastery attendant (for permission),¹ if he goes further than the outward stone-throw of a man of average height,² there is an offence of expiation.

If he thinks that it belongs to the Order³ when it belongs to the Order, spreading it or having it spread in the open, setting forth should neither remove it nor have it removed, or should go away without asking (for permission), there is an offence of expiation. If he is in doubt as to whether it belongs to the Order ... there is an offence of expiation. If he thinks that it belongs to an individual when it belongs to the Order, spreading it or ... in the open air ... without having asked (for permission), there is an offence of expiation. If it is a carpet⁴ or a bed-cover⁵ or a ground-covering⁶ or a straw-mat⁷ or an animal’s skin⁸ or a mat for the feet⁹ or a wooden chair,¹⁰ spreading it or having it spread in the open air, setting forth should neither remove it nor have it removed, or should go away without having asked ¹ Cf. Vin 2.211. ² Cf. BD 1.74 = Vin 3.46. ³ Cf. Bu-Pc 15, Bu-Pc 16. ⁴ cimilikā. At Vin 2.150 monks are allowed to use cola, cotton-cloth, as a cimilikā. Editor, Vinaya Texts iii.167, n. 2, says, cilimika may be a “rug ... It is probably the same word as, or connected with, cimilikā.” See same note for Buddhaghosa’s definition of this word. Here he says, Vin-a 775, when the earth is prepared with plaster it is made for preserving its texture, spreading it below, they spread out a kaṭasāraka (a mat for sitting or lying on) above. ⁵ uttaratharaṇa, see above, BD 2.46, n. 3. ⁶ bhumattharaṇa, see above, BD 2.46, n. 4. ⁷ taṭṭikā. Vin-a 776 says, “made of palm-leaves or of bark.” Cf. Ja 1.141, Vism 97. ⁸ cammakhaṇḍa. At Vin 2.122 this was allowed as a water vessel (vāraka). Above it means a skin used as a mat, as at Mil 366 and Vism 99 (translated Path of Purity, p.115, “piece of leather”). ⁹ pādapuñchanī. At Vin 2.174 monks are allowed to use a bear-skin, a piece of drapery (cakkali), and a little piece of cloth as a pādapuñchanī. This, according to Vinaya Texts iii.218, is a mat to wipe the feet on, not to sit upon. Vin-a 776 says that it is made of rope and rags for wiping the feet on. ¹⁰ Phalaka-piṭha, a chair (made) of a board, plank or slips of wood. Also called at Vin-a 776 dārumayapiṭha, a chair made of wood.

(for permission), there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it belongs to the Order when it belongs to an individual, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether it belongs to an individual, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it belongs to an individual when it belongs to an individual (but) to another individual, there is an offence of wrong-doing; if it belongs to the individual himself, there is no offence.

There is no offence if, having removed it, he goes away; if, having caused it to be removed, he goes away; if, having asked (for permission), he goes away; if, drying himself in the sun, he goes away¹; if it comes to be taken possession of by something²; if there are accidents³; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

The Fourth

¹ otāpento gacchati. Vin-a 776 says there is no offence if, drying himself in the heat of the sun, he thinks, ‘Coming back I will remove it.’ ² kenacipalibuddhaṁ hoti. Vin-a 776 says that if a senior monk, turning (the owner) out (uṭṭhāpetvā), takes it, if a yakha or a departed one, coming along, sits on it, or if some ṛṣi, coming along, takes it, or if lions and tigers stand on it, the lodging becomes taken possession of. ³ āpadāsu—i.e., Vin-a 777 says there is no offence if there are accidents (antarāya) to those leading the brahma-life for their life-time. Cf. Bu-Pc 15, Bu-Pc 16
... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of seventeen monks were companions. Staying, they just stayed together, setting forth, they just set forth together. These, spreading¹ a sleeping-place in a certain dwelling belonging to the Order, setting forth, neither removed it nor had it removed, (but) set forth without having asked (for permission). The lodging became eaten by white ants. Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying:

“How can this group of seventeen monks, spreading a sleeping-place in a dwelling belonging to the Order, setting forth, neither remove it nor have it removed, (but) set forth without having asked (for permission, so that) the lodging is eaten by white ants?” Then these monks told this matter to the lord ... He said:

“Is it true, as is said, monks, that the group of seventeen monks ... belonging to the Order, setting forth neither removed it ... eaten by white ants?”

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

“How, monks, can these foolish men ... eaten by white ants? It is not, monks, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatsoever monk, spreading a sleeping-place or having it spread in a dwelling belonging to the Order, setting forth, should neither remove it nor have it removed, or should go away without asking (for permission), there is an offence of expiation.”

¹ santharitvā, see Introduction, BD 2.xxii.
Whatever means: ... is monk to be understood in this case.

Belonging to the Order means: it comes to be given to the Order, handed over to it.¹

Sleeping-place² means: a mattress,³ a carpet,⁴ a bed-cover, a ground-covering, a straw mat, an animal’s skin,⁵ a piece of cloth for sitting on,⁶ a sheet,⁷ a grass-mat,⁸ a leaf mat.

Spreading means: himself spreading.⁹

Having spread means: making another spread.¹⁰

Setting forth, should neither remove it means: should not himself remove it.¹¹

Nor have it removed means: should not make another remove it.¹²

Or should go away without asking (for permission) means: not asking a monk or a novice or a monastery-attendant (for permission), if he goes further than the fence of a fenced-in monastery, there is an offence of expiation; if he goes further than the precincts¹³ of a monastery not fenced-in, there is an offence of expiation.

If he thinks that it belongs to the Order¹⁴ when it belongs to the Order, spreading a sleeping-place or having it spread, setting forth should neither remove it nor have it removed, or should go away without asking (for permission) there is an offence of expiation. If he is in doubt as to whether it belongs to the Order ... without asking (for permission), there is an offence of expiation. If he thinks that it belongs to an individual when it belongs to the Order, spreading a sleeping-place ... or should go away without asking (for permision), there is an offence of expiation. If, spreading a sleeping-place or having it spread in the precincts of a dwelling-place or in an assembly-room or in a hut or at the foot of a tree, setting forth should neither remove it ... or should go away without asking (for permission), there is an offence of wrong-doing.

¹ Cf. above, BD 2.161, BD 2.239. ² Another definition of seyyā given above, BD 2.196. ³ Cf. above, BD 2.240. ⁴ Cf. above, BD 2.241, for this and the next four words. ⁵ Cf. above, BD 2.241, for this and the next four words. ⁶ nisīdana. Defined at Vin 3.232, Vin 4.123, Vin 4.171. ⁷ paccattharaṇa. Buddhaghosa at Vin-a 777 calls it pāvāro kojavo, a cloak (mantle?), a rug or cover with long hair. ⁸ tiṇa-santhāra. Vin-a 777 says a mat of any grasses whatsoever; the same for a leaf-mat. ⁹ Cf. above, BD 2.241. ¹⁰ Cf. above, BD 2.241. ¹¹ Cf. above, BD 2.241. ¹² Cf. above, BD 2.241. ¹³ upacāra. ¹⁴ Cf. Bu-Pc 14, Bu-Pc 16.

If, spreading a couch or a chair or having it spread in a monastery or in the precincts of a monastery or in an assembly-room or in a hut or at the foot of a tree, setting forth should neither remove it ... or should go away without asking (for permission), there is an offence of wrong-doing.\(^7\) If he thinks that it belongs to the Order when it belongs to an individual, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether it belongs to an individual, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it belongs to an individual when it belongs to an individual (but) to another individual, there is an offence of wrong-doing; if it belongs to the individual himself, there is no offence.

There is no offence if, having removed it, he goes away; if, having caused it to be removed, he goes away; if, having asked (for permission), he goes away; if it comes to be taken possession of by something; if going with the expectation, standing there, he asks (for permission); if he becomes taken possession of by something; if there are accidents; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.\(^9\)

The Fifth

\(^1\) Vin-a 778 says that this means a cell, \textit{parivena}.\(^2\) \textit{upāṭṭhānasālā}. Cf. above, BD 2.194, n. 4. Vin-a 778 calls this \textit{parivenabhōjanasālā}, a refectory and cells.\(^3\) \textit{maṇḍapa}. Cf. above, BD 2.239, n. 4. Vin-a 778 says \textit{parivena-maṇḍapo}.\(^4\) Vin-a 778 says \textit{parivenarukkhamūla}.\(^5\) Vin-a 778 here merely says \textit{bhōjanasālā}, refectory.\(^6\) Vin-a 778 here says that it is \textit{maṇḍapa}, whether covered or not, for the assembly of many people.\(^7\) Apparently not a \textit{pācittiya} as there is not so much danger of the things being eaten by white ants if spread in these places, Vin-a 778.\(^8\) \textit{sāpekkho}.\(^9\) Vin-a 780, by full rivers, robber chiefs, and is unable to return.\(^10\) Cf. Bu-Pc 14.2.3.
... at Sāvatthi in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks took possession of the best sleeping-places.¹ The monks who were elders turned them away. Then it occurred to the group of six monks:

“What now if we, by some stratagem, should spend the rainy season² in this very place?” Then the group of six monks, encroaching upon³ (the space intended for) monks who were elders, lay down in the sleeping-places, saying:

“He for whom it becomes too crowded may depart.” Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying:

“How can the group of six monks lie down in sleeping-places, encroaching upon (the space intended for) monks who are elders?” Then these monks told this matter to the lord. ...

“Is it true, as is said, that you, monks, lay down in sleeping-places ... for monks who are elders?”

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

“How can you, foolish men, lie down in sleeping-places, encroaching upon (the space intended for) monks, who are elders? It is not, foolish men, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus,

¹ varaseyyāyo palibuddhanti = Vin 2.166. For palibuddha, cf. above, BD 2.242, BD 2.245f.
² Cf above, BD 2.208.
³ anupakhajja = anpavisitva according to Old Commentary, and Vin-a 780. Word occurs again in Bu-Pc 43 and at Vin 2.213. Editor, Vinaya Texts iii.285, n. 3, says that sense intended in these three passages is the same, while it is different at Vin 2.88, there explained by Buddhaghosa as antopavisati. At Vin 1.47 the monk who shares the cell of his preceptor is not to sit down so as to encroach upon the elders (na there bhikkhū anupakhajja nisīditabbaṁ).
monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk should lie down in a sleeping-place in a dwelling belonging to the Order, knowing that he is encroaching upon (the space intended for) a monk who arrived first, saying, ‘He for whom it becomes too crowded may depart,’ doing it for just this object, not for another,¹ there is an offence of expiation.”

__________

Whatever means: ...

A dwelling belonging to the Order means: it comes to be given to the Order, handed over to it.²

He knows³ means: he knows, thinking, ‘He is an old man’⁴; he knows, thinking, ‘He is an ill man’; he knows, thinking, ‘It was given to the Order.’

Encroaching upon means: forcing a way into.⁵

Should lie down in a sleeping-place means: if entering or departing he spreads a sleeping-place or has one spread in the precincts of a couch or a chair, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he sits down on it or lies down on it, there is an offence of expiation.

Doing it for just this object, not for another means: there comes to be no other object whatever for which to lie down, encroaching, in a sleeping-place.

__________

If he thinks that it belongs to the Order when it belongs to the Order, (and) encroaching, lies down, there is an offence of expiation. If he is in doubt as to whether it belongs to the Order, (and) encroaching, lies down, there is an offence of expiation. If he thinks that it belongs to an individual when it belongs to the Order, (and) encroaching, lies down, there is an offence of expiation. If entering or departing, setting aside the precincts of a couch or chair, he spreads a sleeping-place or causes one to be spread, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he sits down on it or lies down on it, there is an

¹ Cf. below, BD 2.352, and Vin 4.149, Vin 4.150.
² Cf. Vin 3.266, and above, BD 2.244.
³ Cf. above, BD 2.161.
⁴ vuḍḍho; therefore he should not be made to get up, Vin-a 780.
⁵ anupavisitvā, or entering into = Vin 4.95. Cf. Vin-a 780.
offence of wrong-doing. If he spreads a sleeping-place or causes one to be spread in the precincts of a dwelling-place or in an assembly-room or in a hut or at the foot of a tree or in the open air,¹ there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he sits down on it or lies down on it, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it belongs to the Order when it belongs to an individual, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether it belongs to an individual, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it belongs to an individual when it belongs to an individual (but) to another individual, there is an offence of wrong-doing; if it belongs to the individual himself, there is no offence.²

There is no offence if an ill man enters, if one pressed by cold or by heat enters, if there are accidents; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

_The Sixth_

¹ Cf. above, BD 2.241. ² Cf. Bu-Pc 14, Bu-Pc 15.
... at Sāvatthī¹ in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. At that time the group of seventeen monks were repairing a large dwelling-place in the neighbourhood,² thinking: “We will spend the rains here.”

The group of six monks saw the group of seventeen monks as they were repairing the dwelling-place, and seeing them, they said: “Your reverences, this group of seventeen monks are repairing a dwelling-place. Come, we will turn them away.”

Some spoke thus: “Wait, your reverences, until they have repaired it; when it is repaired, we will turn them away.”

Then the group of six monks said to the group of seventeen monks: “Go away,³ your reverences, the dwelling-place belongs to⁴ us.”

“My reverences, should not this have been explained before, and we would have repaired another?”

“My reverences, does not the dwelling-place belong to the Order?”

“Yes, your reverences, the dwelling-place belongs to the Order.”

“Go away, your reverences, the dwelling-place belongs to us.”

“My reverences, the dwelling-place is big⁵; you stay, and we too will stay.”

“Go away, your reverences, the dwelling-place belongs to us,” and angry, displeased, taking them by the throat they threw them out.

¹ This story also forms the introductory story to Kd 16.11=Vin 2.166. ² paccantima, adjoining, bordering, next to. ³ uttha, or get up. ⁴ pāpuṇāti. ⁵ mahallaka, said of a vihāra at Vin 3.156 (= BD 1.267). A big building containing several rooms to accommodate a number of people (Tiśā); implies a permanent building.
These being thrown out, wept. Monks said (to them):

“Why do you, your reverences, weep?”

“You reverences, this group of six monks, angry, displeased threw us out of a dwelling-place belonging to the Order.”

Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying:

“How can this group of six monks, angry, displeased, throw out monks from a dwelling-place belonging to the Order?” Then these monks told this matter to the lord...

“Is it true, as is said, monks, that you, angry and displeased ... to the Order?”

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

“How can you, foolish men, angry ... belonging to the Order? Foolish men, it is not for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatsoever monk, angry, displeased, should throw out a monk or cause him to be thrown out from a dwelling-place belonging to the Order, there is an offence of expiation.”

---

Whatever means: ... is monk to be understood in this case.

Monk¹ means: another monk.

Angry, displeased² means: dissatisfied, the mind worsened, stubborn.

A dwelling-place belonging to the Order means: it comes to be given to the Order, handed over to it.³

Should throw out means: if, taking (him) in the room⁴ he throws him out on to the verandah,⁵ there is an offence of expiation. If, taking him on the verandah, he throws him outside,⁶ there is an offence of expiation. If, with one effort⁷ he makes him pass through many doors, there is an offence of expiation.

Should cause him to be thrown out means: if he commands another, there is an offence of wrong-doing. When once commanded, if he makes him pass through many doors, there is an offence of expiation.

If he thinks that it belongs to the Order\(^1\) when it belongs to the Order, (and) angry, displeased, throws him out or causes him to be thrown out, there is an offence of expiation. If he is in doubt as to whether it belongs to the Order, (and) angry ... causes him to be thrown out, there is an offence of expiation. If he thinks that it belongs to an individual when it belongs to the Order, (and) angry ... to be thrown out, there is an offence of expiation. If he throws out or causes his requisites to be thrown out, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he throws (a monk) out or causes (him) to be thrown out from the precincts of a dwelling-place or from an assembly-room or from a hut or from the foot of a tree or from the open air, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he throws out or causes his requisites to be thrown out, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he throws out or causes one who is not ordained to be thrown out from a dwelling-place or from the precincts of a dwelling-place ... or from the open air, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he throws out or causes his requisites to be thrown out, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it belongs to the Order when it belongs to an individual, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is doubtful as to whether it belongs to an individual, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it belongs to an individual when it belongs to an individual, (but) to another individual, there is an offence of wrong-doing; if it belongs to the individual himself, there is no offence.

There is no offence if he throws out or causes one who is not scrupulous to be thrown out, if he throws out or causes his requisites to be thrown out; if he throws out or causes to be thrown out one who is mad, if he throws out or causes his requisites to be thrown out; if he throws out or causes to be thrown out one who makes strife, one who makes quarrels, one who makes contention, one who makes brawls, one who makes disputes in the Order,¹ if he throws out or causes his requisites to be thrown out; if he throws out or causes to be thrown out a novice or one who shares a cell or one who is not proceeding fitly,² if he throws out or causes his requisites to be thrown out; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

\(^1\) Cf. Bu-Pc 14–Bu-Pc 16.

The Seventh

¹ These same words said of the nun Caṇḍakālī at Vin.4.230. See also Vin.1.328; and AN iii.252, where five dangers to be expected for such a monk are enumerated.
² na sammāvattanta.
Monks’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 18

... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time two monks (were) in a lofty cell with an upper part, in a dwelling-place belonging to the Order; one lived below, one above. The monk above sat down suddenly on a couch with removable feet. The foot of the couch, falling off, hit the lower monk on the head, (and) this monk uttered a cry of distress. Monks, running up, said to this monk:

“Why do you, your reverence, utter a cry of distress?”

Then that monk told this matter to the monks. Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying:

“How can a monk, in a lofty cell with an upper part, in a dwelling-place belonging to the Order, sit down suddenly on a couch with removable feet?”

Then these monks told this matter to the lord...

“Is it true, as is said, that you, monk, in a lofty cell with an upper part, in a dwelling-place belonging to the Order, sat down suddenly on a couch with removable feet?” ...

1 upari-vehāsa-kuṭī. Meaning is obscure. For vehāsa as “above ground,” see BD 1.79. Vehāsa-kuṭī seems to be a lofty cell, as Old Commentary, says it is one which will not knock the head of a man of medium height. Pali-English Dictionary gives “air-hut, airy room.” Probably means the cell was so high that there was room for an “upper berth” (see Dickson, Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society, 1876, 128, n. 1), not a single-roomed cell. Vin-a 782 says uparivehāsakuṭī is a two or three storeyed cell without a roof (acchannatala).

2 āhaccapādaka, see above, BD 2.240, in definition of “couch” and “chair.” Āhaccapādaka mañca allowed at Vin 2.149.

3 nippatītivā = nipatītivā, nikkhamitvā, Vin-a 782.

“... It is not, foolish man, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth: "Whatever monk, in a lofty cell with an upper part, in a dwelling place belonging to the Order, should sit down¹ or lie down on a couch or chair with removable feet, there is an offence of expiation."

¹ Whatever means: ... is monk to be understood in this case.

² Dwelling-place belonging to the Order means: it comes to be given to the Order, handed over to it.

³ Lofty cell means: it does not touch the head³ of a man of medium height.

⁴ Couch with removable feet means: having perforated⁴ the legs, it stands.

⁵ Chair with removable feet means: having perforated the legs, it stands.

⁶ Should sit down on means: if he sits down on it, there is an offence of expiation.

⁷ Should lie down on means: if he lies down on it, there is an offence of expiation.

If he thinks that it belongs to the Order when it belongs to the Order, (and) sits down on or lies down on a couch or a chair with removable feet in a lofty cell with an upper part, there is an offence of expiation. If he is in doubt as to whether it belongs to the Order ... If he thinks that it belongs to an individual when it belongs to the Order...

¹ Note that sahasā, suddenly, hastily, is omitted in the Rule; it is put in at Vinaya Texts i.34. Cf. this for translation of upariveśasakūṭī; also Gogerly’s version, Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society, 1862, p. 443, and Dickson’s, Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society, 1876, p. 111. The latter also puts sahasā (“hurriedly”) into the Rule, and it would seem more logical to do so; for if no couch or chair with removable legs were to be sat or lain on in an upper storey, there was little point in allowing these objects there at all. ² Cf. above, BD 2.161, BD 2.239, BD 2.244, BD 2.248, BD 2.251.

³ asiṣaghāṭṭā. Vin-a 782, none of the lower beams or rafters touch (or knock) the head of a man of medium (middle or average, majjhima) measure. ⁴ cf. above, BD 2.240, and Vin-a 774.
... with an upper part, there is an offence of expiation. If he thinks that it belongs to the Order when it belongs to an individual, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether it belongs to an individual, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it belongs to an individual when it belongs to an individual (but) to another individual, there is an offence of wrong-doing; if it belongs to the individual himself, there is no offence.

There is no offence if he is in a cell that is not lofty¹; if he is in one that touches the head; if the one below comes to be not in use; if there comes to be an accumulation of boards²; if a pin is provided³; if standing on it he takes down from or hangs up on⁴; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

The Eighth

¹ avehāsakuṭiya. Vin-a 782, made among sāl-leaves on the ground, for it is not possible to hurt another person there. ² padara-saṅcitāṁ hoti. Vin-a 783 (the cell) of which the upper-most floor (tala) is spread over thickly with sticks and planks. ³ paṭāṇi dinnā hoti. This means the pin or peg which must be inserted in a couch or chair whose feet are removable in order that the foot will not fall off when the chair is sat upon; Vin-a 783, and cf. Vin-a 774. ⁴ Vin-a 783, “standing on a couch or chair whose feet are removable, he says, ‘take down a robe or anything hung up on a peg (nāgadanta)’ or hangs up another, there is no offence for him.”
... at Kosambī in Ghosita’s monastery. Now at that time a chief minister, the venerable Channa’s supporter, was having a dwelling-place built for the venerable Channa.¹ Then the venerable Channa again and again had the finished dwelling-place roofed, again and again had it plastered. The overloaded dwelling-place fell down. Then the venerable Channa, collecting grass and sticks, despoiled the cornfield of a certain brahmin. Then that brahmin looked down upon, criticised, spread it about, saying:

“How can the revered ones despoil our cornfields?” Monks heard this brahmin who ... spread it about. Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying:

“How can the venerable Channa again and again have a finished dwelling-place roofed, again and again have it plastered (so that) the overloaded dwelling-place falls down?” Then these monks told this matter to the lord...

“Is it true, as is said, that you, Channa, again and again had a finished dwelling-place roofed ... so that the overloaded dwelling-place fell down?”

“It is true, lord,” he said.

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked him, saying:

“How can you, foolish man, again and again have a finished dwelling place roofed, again and again have it plastered, (so that) the overloaded dwelling-place falls down? It is not, foolish man, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

¹ Cf. BD 1.266, where a householder was building a dwelling-place for him.

“When a large dwelling-place is being built for a monk, an enclosure of two or three roofings may be determined upon for placing the door-bolts, for making the window-holes as far as the door-way, in establishing it where there are no crops. If, though established where there are no crops, he should determine upon (something) more than that, there is an offence of expiation.”

Large means: it is so called if it is a dwelling-place having a benefactor.

Dwelling-place means: it comes to be smeared inside or smeared outside or smeared inside and outside.

Is being made means: making or causing to be made.

As far as the door-way means: a reach of the hand from all round the door-posts and lintel.

For placing the door-bolts means: for placing the door-way.

For making the window-holes means: for making windows:

1 paryāya. Vin-a 784 says pariyāyaṁ vuccati parikkhepo. Parikkhepo is closing round, surrounding, enclosure. Paryāya can also mean method.

2 ālokasandhi, small holes for light and air.

3 dvārakosa. Dwāra is “the aperture and not that by which the aperture could be closed.” This is called kavāṭa. See Vinaya Texts iii.160, n. 3. Kosa is a cavity or enclosure containing something.

4 appaharita, “little or no grass” (Critical Pali Dictionary), but Old Commentary points to “crops.”

My translation of this rule differs considerably from that given at Vinaya Texts i.35, where editor says, “This rule ... is somewhat obscure, owing to our want of information as to the mode in which such dwellings should be put up.” Vinaya Texts i.35 has “rectified” for adhiṭṭhātabbaṁ, which I have translated as “determined upon.” For the point of this rule is that when the vihāra is built and everything is ṭhito, fixed, established, a monk must not ask the dāyaka, benefactor, donor, to change the positions of doors and windows or make any additions or rectifications. If he does so, he incurs a pācittiya offence.

6 Cf. Vin 3.156 (= BD 1.267, BD 1.268).

8 Vin-a 783 says that here dvārakosa means a space (okāsa) the measure of the door's breadth from all round the door-posts and lintel; it quotes other authorities giving different measures. Apparently doors and windows must not be made nearer than this distance to the doorway.

9 piṭṭhasaṅgāṭa. Allowed at Vin 2.120, Vin 1.148. See Vinaya Texts iii.105, n. 2.

10 vātapāna. Three kinds allowed at Vin 2.148, but not the kinds given above. Vin-a 784 takes it as vātapānakavāṭa, shutters, which perhaps makes more sense here.
An enclosure of two or three roofings should be determined upon, in establishing it where there are no crops means: crops mean: grain and pulses. If it is established where there are crops (and) he determines upon (some alteration), there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is roofing with a way, having determined upon two ways, commanding a third way, he may depart. If he is roofing with an enclosure, having determined upon two enclosures, commanding a third enclosure, he may depart.

If, though established where there are no crops, he should determine upon (something) more than that means: if he is roofing with tiles, for every tile there is an offence of expiation. If he is roofing with stones, for every stone there is an offence of expiation. If he is roofing with plaster, for every lump there is an offence of expiation. If he is roofing with grass, for every wisp there is an offence of expiation. If he is roofing with leaves, for every leaf there is an offence of expiation.

If he thinks that it is more when it is more than two or three enclosures (and) determines upon, there is an offence of expiation. If he is in doubt as to whether it is more than two or three enclosures

---

1 All these items are allowed, in other connections, at Vin 2.121, also at Vin 2.117 with two more not occurring above. Cf. Vin 2.172. “Whitewash” is setavāṇṇa, or plaster; “black colouring” is kāḷavaṇṇa, or blacking. These three colourings are allowed to be used in vihāras at Vin 2.150. ² These four kinds of design are allowed in another connection at Vin 2.152. ³ makaradantaka. The meaning is not at all clear, but “a design in painting or carving” (Pali-English Dictionary). ⁴ pañcapaṭṭhika. For lack of better translation, I follow Vinaya Texts iii.97, q.v. n. 3. But the meaning is very doubtful. ⁵ See BD 1.83, n. 4. ⁶ Vin-a 785, having had it roofed in two ways, maṅga, but because it was badly done he may have it roofed again in a third way—doubtless he may choose three of the five ways mentioned immediately below. ⁷ Vin-a 785 says, “upon a fourth way or enclosure over and above the three ways and enclosures.” ⁸ These five kinds of roofing are allowed at Vin 2.154. It is meant here that once the building is finished he must not add one tile or stone and so forth. ⁹ Presumably more roofings or enclosures.
(and) determines upon, there is an offence of expiation. If he thinks that it is less when it is more than two or three enclosures (and) determines upon, there is an offence of expiation. If he thinks that it is more when it is less than two or three enclosures, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether it is less than two or three enclosures, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it is less when it is less than two or three enclosures, there is no offence.

There is no offence if there are two or three enclosures; if there are less than two or three enclosures; if it is in a cave, if it is in a hut, if it is in a tiṇa-grass hut; if it is for another; if it is by means of his own property¹; except it be as a house there is no offence in any other circumstances; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.²

The Ninth

¹ I was told in Ceylon that this means that a monk gives something—rice, paddy, fruit—to a family, which then uses it in preparing a meal for him. ² Cf. Vin 3.155, and BD 1.264, notes.
... at Āḷavī in the chief shrine at Āḷavī. Now at that time the monks of Āḷavī, doing repairs, knowing that the water contained life, sprinkled grass and clay and had them sprinkled. Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying:

“How can the monks of Āḷavī, knowing that the water contained life ... and have them sprinkled?” Then these monks told this matter to the lord...

“Is it true, as is said, that you, monks, knowing that the water contained life ... and had them sprinkled?”

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

“How can you, foolish men, knowing that the water contained life ... and have them sprinkled? It is not, foolish men, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk, knowing that the water contains life, should sprinkle grass or clay or should have them sprinkled, there is an offence of expiation.”

Whatever means: ... is monk to be understood in this case.

He knows means: either he knows by himself or others tell him.

Should sprinkle means: if he himself sprinkles, there is an offence of expiation.

Should have sprinkled means: if he commands another, there is an offence of expiation. When once commanded, if he sprinkles many times, there is an offence of expiation.

¹ Cf. BD 2.161, BD 2.297.

If he thinks that it contains life when it contains life, (and) sprinkles grass or clay or has them sprinkled, there is an offence of expiation. If he is in doubt as to whether it contains life ... has them sprinkled, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it does not contain life when it contains life ... has them sprinkled, there is no offence.¹ If he thinks that it contains life when it does not contain life, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether it does not contain life, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it does not contain life when it does not contain life, there is no offence.

There is no offence if it was unintentional, if he was not thinking, if he did not know²; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

The Tenth

This is its Key

Vegetable-growth, by another, making (someone) look down upon, these two on setting forth, First, throwing out, removable (feet), and on doors, containing life.

The Second Division: that on Vegetable-growth

¹ Oldenberg says, Vin 4.358, that in his manuscript called “C.” this case is left out.
² Cf. above, BD 2.225, BD 2.229, and Vin 4.125.
... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time monks who were elders, exhorting nuns, came to receive\(^1\) requisites of robes, alms-food, lodgings, medicines for the sick.\(^2\) Then it occurred to the group of six monks:

“Your reverences, at present monks who are elders, exhorting nuns, come to receive requisites ... for the sick. Come, your reverences, let us too exhort nuns.”

Then the group of six monks, approaching nuns, spoke thus:

“Now, approach us, sisters, then we will exhort (you).”

Then those nuns approached the group of six monks, and having approached and greeted the group of six monks, they sat down at a respectful distance. Then the group of six monks, giving the nuns merely inferior talk on dhamma, spending the day in worldly talk,\(^3\) dismissed them, saying: “Go, sisters.”

Then these nuns approached the lord, and having approached and greeted the lord, they stood at a respectful distance. As they were standing at a respectful distance, the lord spoke thus to these nuns:

“I hope, nuns, that the exhortation was effective?”\(^4\)

“Lord, how could the exhortation be effective? The masters, the group of six monks, giving merely inferior talk ... dismissed us, saying, ‘Go, sisters.’”

Then the lord gladdened, roused, pleased, delighted these nuns with talk on dhamma. Then these nuns, gladdened ... delighted by \(^1\) lābhino honti, literally came to be receivers of.

\(^2\) = BD 2.279.
\(^3\) tiracchānakathā. Various species of this, talk of kings, robbers, and so on, given at Vin 4.164; DN i.7, DN i.179; MN i.513; SN v.419; AN v.128, etc.
the lord with talk on dhamma, greeting the lord, departed, keeping their right sides towards him. Then the lord, on this occasion, in this connection, having had the Order of monks convened, questioned the group of six monks, saying:

“Is it true, as is said, that you, monks, giving nuns merely inferior talk ... ‘Go, sisters’?”

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

“How can you, foolish men, giving nuns merely inferior talk on dhamma ... dismiss them, saying: ‘Go, sisters’? It is not, foolish men, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ...” And having rebuked them, and given reasoned talk, he addressed the monks, saying:

“Monks, I allow (you) to agree upon’ an exhorter of nuns. And thus, monks, should he be agreed upon. First, a monk should be requested, and having been requested, the Order should be informed by an experienced, competent monk, saying: ‘Honoured sirs, let the Order listen to me. If it seems right to the Order, let the Order agree upon the monk so and so as exhorter of nuns. This is the motion. Honoured sirs, let the Order listen to me. The Order agrees Upon the monk so and so as exhorter of nuns. If it pleases the venerable ones, let the monk so and so be agreed upon as exhorter of nuns ... they should speak. And a second time I tell this matter ... And a third time I tell this matter. Let the Order listen to me ... they should speak. The monk so and so is agreed upon by the Order as exhorter of nuns, and it is right ... Thus do I understand this.’”

Then the lord, having rebuked the group of six monks in many a figure for their weakness ... “... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk, not agreed upon, should exhort nuns, there is an offence of expiation.”

And thus this rule of training for monks came to be laid down by the lord.

---

1 Cf. above, BD 2.14, BD 2.81, BD 2.157 for other “agreements,” sammuti.
Now at that time monks who were elders, (and who had been) agreed upon, exhorting nuns, came to receive, as before, requisites of robes, alms-food, lodgings, medicines for the sick. Then it occurred to the group of six monks:

“Your reverences, at present, the monks who are elders, (and who have been) agreed upon, exhorting nuns, are receiving, as before, requisites ... for the sick. Come, your reverences, let us, going outside the boundary, agreeing upon one another as exhorted of nuns, exhort the nuns.”

Then the group of six monks, going outside the boundary, agreeing upon one another as exhorted of nuns, approaching the nuns, said:

“Now we, sisters, are agreed upon, so approach us and we will exhort (you).”

Then these nuns ... (etc., as above Bu-Pc 21.1.1) ... having rebuked them, and given reasoned talk, addressed the monks, saying:

“I allow you, monks, to agree upon a monk endowed with eight qualities as exhorted of nuns: one who is virtuous, who lives restrained by the restraint of the Pātimokkha, who is possessed of good behaviour and lawful resort, who sees danger in the slightest faults, who undertaking, trains himself in the rules of training, who has become very learned, who knows the learning by heart, who is a store of learning. Those things which, lovely at the beginning, lovely at the middle, lovely at the ending, declare with the spirit, with the letter the Brahma-life completely fulfilled, wholly purified—such things come to be much learned by him, learnt by heart, repeated..."
out loud, carefully pondered over, well penetrated by vision\(^1\); both the Pātimokkhas come to be properly handed down\(^2\) to him in detail, well sectioned, well regulated, well investigated rule by rule,\(^3\) as to the linguistic form.\(^4\) He comes to be of charming speech, of charming delivery\(^5\); as a rule he becomes dear to nuns, liked (by them), he becomes competent to exhort nuns, he does not come to be one who, on going forth for the sake of the lord, on being clad in the yellow robes, has previously committed (some offence) against an important rule\(^6\); he comes to be one of twenty years’ standing\(^7\) or of more than twenty years’ standing. Monks, I allow you to agree upon a monk endowed with these eight qualities\(^6\) as exhorter of nuns.”

\(^1\) diṭṭhiyā = paññāya, Vin-a 788. \(^2\) svāgatāni = suṭṭhu āgatāni, Vin-a 790. See also AN iv.140, GS 4.95, translated: “properly handed down,” and Vinaya Texts iii.51, “completely handed down.” Passage also occurs Vin 1.65, where it is the fifth of the five necessary qualities in a monk who is to ordain a nun. At Vin 1.68 a sixth quality is added. See also Vin 2.249. \(^3\) suttaso or suttato. See Vinaya Texts i.xxix, BD 1.X, for sutta in such contexts meaning “rule,” or “clause,” rather than “discourse.” Translated as “rule” at Vinaya Texts iii.317. \(^4\) anubyāñjana. Vin-a 790 explains: akkharapadapāripūriyā, as to the completion of line and syllable. \(^5\) Vin-a 790, madhurassara, sweet-toned, sweet-voiced. Cf. AN ii.97, AN iii.114. \(^6\) garudhamma, esteemed or principal rule. Vinaya Texts iii.322 translates garudhammā as “chief rules,” GS 4.183 as “cardinal rules.” Given in detail below and also at Vin 2.255; AN iv.276. See also Vinaya Texts i.35, n. 2. These “important rules” were recited to Mahāpajāpati when Gotama told her that women might become nuns, and they were to count as her ordination. Vin-a 790 says that in his time as a householder, he (i.e., the monk agreed upon) had not committed unchastity with nuns, female novices or probationers. \(^7\) Vin-a 791, since his upasampadā ordination. \(^8\) The eight qualities are summarised at Vin-a 791. \(^9\) niṭṭicatuttha kamma. Cf. below, BD 2.275. \(^10\) Cf. above, BD 2.32.
another rule, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he exhorts one who has been ordained by one (Order only), there is an offence of wrong-doing.

When that monk has been agreed upon, sweeping the cell, providing drinking water and water for washing, making ready a seat, taking a colleague, they should sit down. The nuns going there, greeting that monk, should sit down at a respectful distance. They should be asked by that monk: ‘Sisters, are you all come?’ If they say: ‘Master, we are all come,’ he says: ‘Sisters, are the eight important rules being kept up?’ If they say: ‘Master, they are being kept up,’ he, saying: ‘This, sisters, is the exhortation,’ should deliver it. If they say: ‘Master, they are not being kept up,’ he should expound them:

A nun who has been ordained (even) for a century must greet respectfully, rise up from her seat, salute with joined palms, do proper homage to a monk ordained but that day. This rule is to be honoured, respected, revered, venerated, never to be transgressed during her life.

A nun must not spend the rains in a residence where there is no monk. This rule is to be honoured ... her life.

Every half month a nun should desire two things from the Order

---

1. aañena dhammena. 2. dutiya. Vin-a 792 says this means that a dutiya should be wanted for setting him free from offence in teaching dhamma; cf. above, BD 2.206, where in teaching dhamma to women a learned man should also be present.

3. nisiditabbaṁ. Vin-a 792, “they should all sit down at the place of arrival, not at the outskirts of or in the middle of the vihāra, not at the door of the uposatha-hall or of the refectory.”

4. samagga ‘ttha bhāginiyo. Samagga also means “in unity, harmonious,” but Vin-a 792 explains by sabbā agaman’ attha, ‘are you all come?’

5. garudhamma, see above, BD 2.266.

6. Vattanti = āgacchanti, Vin-a 792.

7. osāretabbā, but Vin-a 792 reads osāretabbo.

8. See Horner, Women under Primitive Buddhism, p. 120, where the eight garudhammā, their infringements and remodelling are set out in some detail. These eight principal rules occur again at Vin 2.255.

9. abhikkhuke āvāse. GS 4.183, “where there is no resident monk.” Vin-a 792 says, “if the monks giving exhortation do not live within half a yojana of the nunnery (or nuns’ quarters), this means a residence without monks (ayaṁ abhikkhuko āvāso nāma).” For then she could not go for the exhortation. This rule is the same as the 56th Bhikkhuni Pācittiya, Vin 4.313. 10. paccāsiṁsitabbā, expect or ask for. Vin-a 794 gives icchitabbā, desire.
of monks: the asking (as to the date) of the Observance day, and the coming for the exhortation. This rule is to be honoured ... her life.

After the rains, a nun must keep the ceremony held at the end of the rains before both Orders, in respect of three matters: what was seen, what was heard, what was suspected. This rule is to be honoured ... her life.

A nun, offending against an important rule, must undergo the mānatta discipline for half a month before both Orders. This rule ... her life.

When, as a novice, she has trained in the six rules for two years, she should seek ordination from both Orders. This rule ... her life.

A monk is not to be reviled or abused in any way by a nun. This rule ... her life.

From today, admonition of monks by nuns is forbidden, admonition of nuns by monks is not forbidden. This rule is to be honoured, respected, revered, venerated, never to be transgressed during her life.

If, saying, ‘Master, we are all come,’ he speaks another rule, there

---

1 I.e., whether it is to be held on the fourteenth or fifteenth day of the month, see Vinaya Texts iii.323, n. 2, and Vin-a 794.
2 ovādupasaṅkamana. Nuns should ask for this. Cf. Vin 4.315 and Vin-a 795. The vicissitudes which led to a monk going to the nuns, instead of the nuns to a monk, are set out at Vin-a 794f., quoting Vin 2.263ff. This rule is the same as the 59th Bhikkhunī Pācittiya, Vin 4.315. The 58th Bhikkhunī Pācittiya is that it is an offence for a nun not to go for exhortation.
3 pavāretabbaṁ. At this ceremony, the pavāraṇā, monks and nuns were mutually invited to avow offences seen, heard, or suspected. GS 4.183 translates “Invitation Festival.” See GS 4.183, n. 3. Failure of a nun to keep this rule is a pācittiya for her, Vin 4.314 (= Bi-Pc 57). Nuns’ shortcomings with regard to the pavāraṇā are told at Vin 2.275, together with the means of carrying it out properly. Cf. Vin 1.159
4 See BD 1.195–196.
5 pakkhamānatta.
6 Eventually only nuns were allowed to carry out a formal act (kamma) against nuns, Vin 2.260, though not here specifically the mānatta. I.e., for novices. Referred to, Bi-Pc 63–Bi-Pc 67.
7 = Bi-Pc 52.
8 Cf. akkositabbo. Cf. akkosa, “mode of address,” at BD 2.171 above.
9 kenacipariyāyena.
10 vacanapatha. Ed. Vinaya Texts iii.324 says, “the reference is, no doubt, to the various kinds of official admonitions given in detail in chapter 20 below” = Vin 2.276. Vin-a 800 says she should not exhort or instruct a monk; while Commentary on AN iv.277 says that vacanapatha is ovādanusāsanadhammakathā, talk on dhamma and instruction and exhortation.
is an offence of wrong-doing. If, saying, ‘Master, we are not all come,’¹ he speaks the eight important rules, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If, not delivering² the exhortation, he speaks another rule, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

If he thinks that it is not a legally valid act³ when it is not a legally valid act (and) exhorts, thinking that it is not all come when the Order of nuns is not all come, there is an offence of expiation. If he thinks that it is not a legally valid act when it is not a legally valid act (and) exhorts, being in doubt as to whether the Order of nuns is not all come, there is an offence of expiation. If he thinks that it is not a legally valid act when it is not a legally valid act (and) exhorts, thinking that it is all come when the Order of nuns is not all come, there is an offence of expiation.

If he is in doubt as to whether it is not a legally valid act (and) exhorts, thinking that it is not all come when the Order of nuns is not all come ... If he is in doubt as to whether it is not a legally valid act (and) exhorts, being in doubt as to whether the Order of nuns is not all come ... thinking that they are all come ... there is an offence of expiation.

If he thinks that it is a legally valid act when it is not a legally valid act (and) exhorts, thinking that it is not all come when the Order of nuns is not all come ... (and) exhorts, being in doubt as to whether it is not all come ... (and) exhorts, thinking that it is all come when the Order of nuns is not all come, there is an offence of expiation.

If he thinks that it is not a legally valid act when it is not a legally valid act (and) exhorts, thinking that it is not all come when the Order of nuns is all come ... (and) exhorts, being in doubt as to whether it is not all come ... (and) exhorts, thinking that it is all come when the Order of nuns is all come, there is an offence of expiation.

If he is in doubt as to whether it is not a legally valid act (and) exhorts, thinking that it is not all come when the Order of nuns is all come ... (and) exhorts, being in doubt as to whether it is not all come ... (and) exhorts, thinking that it is all come when the Order of nuns is all come, there is an offence of expiation.

¹ vagga. See Vinaya Texts i.36, n. 2 (from BD 2.35), where it is said that “vagga is vyagra, the opposite of samagga.” ² aniyyâdetvā is according to Vin-a 800 avatvā. ³ The (legal) act is here the formal act (kamma) appointing the exhorter, Vin-a 800.

If he thinks that it is a legally valid act when it is not a legally valid act (and) exhorts, thinking that it is not all come when the Order of nuns is not all come ... (and) exhorts, being in doubt as to whether it is not all come ... (and) exhorts, thinking that it is all come when the Order of nuns is not all come, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

If he is in doubt as to whether it is a legally valid act (and) exhorts, thinking that it is not all come ... being in doubt ... thinking that it is all come when the Order of nuns is not all come, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

If he thinks that it is a legally valid act when it is a legally valid act (and) exhorts, thinking that it is not all come ... being in doubt ... thinking that it is all come when the Order of nuns is not all come, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

If he thinks that it is not a legally valid act when it is a legally valid act (and) exhorts, thinking that it is all come when the Order of nuns is all come ... is in doubt ... thinking that it is not all come when the Order of nuns is all come, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

If he is in doubt as to whether it is a legally valid act (and) exhorts, thinking that it is all come when the Order of nuns is all come ... there is an offence of wrong-doing.

If he thinks that it is a legally valid act when it is a legally valid act (and) exhorts, thinking that it is not all come when the Order of nuns is all come, there is an offence of wrong-doing ... (and) exhorts, being in doubt as to whether the Order of nuns is all come, there is an offence of wrong-doing ... thinking that the Order of nuns is all come when it is all come, there is no offence.

There is no offence (in) giving an exposition,\(^1\) giving an interrogation\(^2\); if he expounds being called upon: ‘Expound, master’\(^3\) if she asks a question\(^4\); if, having, asked a question, he speaks; if, talking for the good of another, nuns hear; if it is to a female probationer, if it is to a female novice; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.\(^5\)

The First

---

\(^1\) Cf. Vin 1.75, Vin 2.219. Vin-a 808, “reciting the text of the eight important rules.”

\(^2\) paripucchā. Cf. below, BD 2.275, BD 2.278, BD 2.395, and Vin 1.70, Vin 2.219. Vin-a 800, “speaking an explanation on the text of the important rules.”

\(^3\) Vin-a 800, the important rules.

\(^4\) Vin-a 801, “if a nun asks a question about the eight important rules or about the khandhas, whatever the monk says to that is no offence for him.”

\(^5\) Cf. BD 2.207, BD 2.275.
... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time monks who were elders exhorted the nuns in turn.\(^1\) Now at that time it came to be the turn of the venerable Cūḷapanthaka\(^2\) to exhort the nuns. The nuns said:

“Now today the exhortation will not be effective,\(^3\) for now master Cūḷapanthaka will speak the same stanza\(^4\) again and again.”

Then these nuns approached the venerable Cūḷapanthaka, and having approached and greeted the venerable Cūḷapanthaka, they sat down at a respectful distance. As they were sitting down at a respectful distance, the venerable Cūḷapanthaka spoke thus to these nuns:

“Sisters, are you all come?”\(^5\)
“Master, we are all come.”
“Sisters, are the eight important rules being kept up?”\(^6\)
“They are being kept up, master.”
“Sisters, this is the exhortation,” (and) delivering (it) he spoke this stanza again and again:

“For the sage, high-minded, zealous, trained in paths of wisdom,\(^7\)
For such, tranquil, ever mindful,\(^8\)

\(^1\) pariyāyena. \(^2\) At an i.23 called chief among monks skilled in creating forms by mind-power and mental “evolution.” His verses are at Thag 557–Thag 566. See Dictionary of Pali Proper Names for details of his life. \(^3\) Iddha, cf. above, BD 2.263. \(^4\) Udāna. \(^5\) Cf. above, BD 2.267. \(^6\) Cf. above, BD 2.267. \(^7\) (This footnote proved troublesome to typeset due to its length, so it has been moved to an appendix with other long notes on page 2980.) \(^8\) Sadā satīmato = SN i.81.
sorrows come not to be.”¹

The nuns spoke thus: “Is it not as we said? The exhortation will not now become effective today, for now master Cūḷapanthaka will speak the same stanza again and again.”

The venerable Cūḷapanthaka heard this conversation of those nuns. Then the venerable Cūḷapanthaka, rising up above the ground,² paced up and down in the air, in the sky, then he stood, then he sat down, then he lay down in a sleeping-place, then he was obscured, then blazed forth, then he disappeared; he spoke this same stanza and another long utterance of the enlightened one. The nuns spoke thus:

“Indeed it is wonderful, good-sir, indeed it is marvellous, good sir, indeed never before has an exhortation come to be so effective as this one of master Cūḷapanthaka.”

Then the venerable Cūḷapanthaka, exhorting these nuns until the dark of the night, dismissed them, saying: “Go, sisters.” Then these nuns, staying outside the town because the town-gate was closed, entered the town in the morning.³ People looked down upon, criticised, spread it about, saying:

“These nuns are not leading the Brahma-life; having remained together with monks in the monastery, now they are entering the town.”

Monks heard these people who ... spread it about. Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying:

“How can the venerable Cūḷapanthaka exhort nuns after sunset?”

... “Is it true, as is said, that you, Cūḷapanthaka, exhorted nuns after sunset?”

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked him, saying:

“How can you, Cūḷapanthaka⁴ ... after sunset? Cūḷapanthaka, it is not for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks,

¹ = Ud 43 = Thag 68. ² vehāsa, cf. BD 179. ³ Cf. below, BD 2.401. ⁴ Note Gotama calls him by his name here, and not moghapurisa, “foolish man.”
this rule of training should be set forth:

“If a monk, even though agreed upon, should exhort nuns after sunset, there is an offence of expiation.”

Agreed upon means: agreed upon by an (official) act at which the motion is put three times and then followed by the decision.¹

After sunset means: after the sun has gone down.

Nuns means: ordained by both Orders.

Should exhort means: if he exhorts concerning the eight important rules or concerning another rule, there is an offence of expiation.²

If he thinks that (the sun) has set when it has set (and) exhorts, there is an offence of expiation. If he is in doubt as to whether it has set (and) exhorts, there is an offence of expiation. If he thinks that it has not set when it has set (and) exhorts, there is an offence of expiation. If he exhorts one who has been ordained by one (Order only), there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it has set when it has not set, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether it has not set, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it has not set when it has not set, there is no offence.

There is no offence (in) giving an exposition, giving an interrogation; if he expounds being called upon: ‘Expound, master if she asks a question; if, having asked a question, he speaks; if, talking for the good of another, nuns hear; if it is to a female probationer, if it is to a female novice; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.³

The Second

¹ Cf. above, BD 2.267. ² Cf. above, ibid. ³ Cf. above, BD 2.207, BD 2.272.
... among the Sakyans at Kapilavatthu in the Banyan monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks, approaching the nuns’ quarters, exhorted the group of six nuns. Nuns spoke thus to the group of six nuns: “Come, ladies, we will go for exhortation.”

“Well, ladies, we would go for the sake of exhortation, (but) the group of the six masters exhort us in this very place.”

Those who were modest nuns ... spread it about, saying:
“How can the group of the six monks, approaching nuns’ quarters, exhort nuns?”

Then these nuns told this matter to the monks. Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying:
“How can the group of six monks ... exhort nuns?” ...
“Is it true, as is said, that you, monks ... exhorted nuns?”
“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:
“How can you, foolish men ... exhort nuns? Foolish men, it is not for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatsoever monk, approaching nuns’ quarters, should exhort nuns, there is an offence of expiation.”

And thus this rule of training for monks came to be laid down by the lord.
Now at that time Mahāpajāpatī the Gotamid became ill. Monks who were elders approached Mahāpajāpatī the Gotamid, and having approached they spoke thus to Mahāpajāpatī the Gotamid:

“Gotami, we hope things are going well with you, we hope you are keeping going.”

“Masters, things are not going well with me, I am not keeping going. Please, masters, give dhamma.”

“Sister, it is not allowable, approaching nuns’ quarters, to give dhamma to a nun,” they said, and being scrupulous they did not give it. Then the lord, dressing in the morning, taking his bowl and robe, approached Mahāpajāpatī the Gotamid, and having approached he sat down on the appointed seat. As he was sitting down, the lord spoke thus to Mahāpajāpatī the Gotamid:

“Gotami, I hope things are going well with you, I hope you are keeping going.”

“Formerly, lord, monks who were elders, coming to me, gave dhama: because of this comfort came to be for me.¹ But now they say it is forbidden by the lord, and being scrupulous they do not give it; because of this comfort does not come to be for me.”

Then the lord having ... delighted Mahāpajāpatī the Gotamid with talk on dhamma, rising up from his seat, departed. Then the lord, on this occasion, in this connection, having given dhamma-talk, addressed the monks, saying:

“I allow you, monks, approaching nuns’ quarters, to exhort a nun who is ill. And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatsoever monk, approaching nuns’ quarters, should exhort the nuns except at a right time, there is an offence of expiation. This is a right time in this case: if a nun comes to be ill; this, in this case, is a right time.”

__________________________

Whatever means: ... is monk to be understood in this case.

Nuns’ quarters means: where nuns stay even for one night.

Approaching means: going there.

¹ Cf. below, BD 2.342, BD 2.399.
Nuns means: ordained by both Orders.

Should exhort means: if he exhorts concerning the eight important rules, there is an offence of expiation.

Except at a right time means: setting aside a right time.

An ill nun means: if she is unable to go for exhortation or for communion.¹

---

If he thinks that she is ordained when she is ordained, (and) approaching the nuns’ quarters, exhorts her—except at a right time, there is an offence of expiation. If he is in doubt as to whether she is ordained ... at a right time, there is an offence of expiation. If he thinks that she is not ordained when she is ordained ... at a right time, there is an offence of expiation. If he exhorts (her) concerning a different rule, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he exhorts one who is ordained by one (Order only), there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that she is ordained when she is not ordained, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether she is not ordained, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that she is not ordained when she is not ordained, there is no offence.

---

There is no offence if it is at a right time, (in) giving an exposition, giving an interrogation (as Bu-Pc 22.2.3) ... if he is the first wrong-doer.

The Third

---

¹ saṁvāsa. For definition of this, see Old Commentary’s exegesis on asaṁvāsa in each Pārājika (BD.1).
... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time monks who were elders, exhorting nuns, came to receive requisites of robes, alms-food, lodgings, medicines for the sick.¹ The group of six monks spoke thus:

“The monks who are elders are not doing a service² in exhorting nuns; the monks who are elders are exhorting nuns for the sake of gain.”

Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying:

“How can this group of six monks speak thus: ‘The monks who are elders ... for the sake of gain’?” ...

“Is it true, as is said, that you, monks, spoke thus: ‘The monks who are elders ... for the sake of gain’?”

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

“How can you, foolish men, speak thus: ‘The monks who are elders ... for the sake of gain’? It is not, foolish men, for pleasing, those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk should speak thus: ‘The monks who are elders are exhorting nuns for the sake of gain,’ there is an offence of expiation.”

________________________

Whatever means: ... is monk to be understood in this case.

¹ = BD 2.263. ² na bahukatā. Vin-a 804 says na katabahumāna dhammabahumānaṃ katvā, “not revering, not doing reverence to dhamma,” apparently not rendering a service.
For the sake of gain means: for the sake of robes, for the sake of alms-food, for the sake of lodgings, for the sake of the requisite of medicines for the sick, for the sake of honour, for the sake of respect, for the sake of reverence, for the sake of homage, for the sake of veneration.

Should speak thus means: if desiring to bring blame,\(^1\) desiring to bring discredit, desiring to bring shame\(^2\) to one who is ordained (and) agreed upon by the Order as exhorter of nuns, he speaks thus, saying: ‘He is exhorting for the sake of robes ... for the sake of veneration,’ there is an offence of expiation.

If he thinks that it is a legally valid act when it is a legally valid act, (and) speaks thus, there is an offence of expiation. If he is in doubt as to whether it is a legally valid act, (and) speaks thus, there is an offence of expiation. If he thinks that it is not a legally valid act when it is a legally valid act, (and) speaks thus, there is an offence of expiation. If, desiring to bring blame, desiring to bring discredit, desiring to bring shame to one who is ordained (but) not agreed upon by the Order as exhorter of nuns, he speaks thus, saying: ‘He is exhorting for the sake of robes ... for the sake of veneration,’ there is an offence of wrong-doing. If, desiring to bring blame ... to bring shame to one not ordained,\(^3\) agreed upon or not agreed upon by the Order as exhorter of nuns, he speaks thus, saying, ‘He is exhorting ... for the sake of veneration,’ there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it is a legally valid act when it is not a legally valid act, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether it is not a legally valid act, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it is not a legally valid act when it is not a legally valid act, there is no offence.

There is no offence if he usually speaks exhorting for the sake

\(^1\) avaṇṇam kattukāmo. Cf. above, BD 2.236.
\(^2\) maṅkuṁ kattukāmo. See above, BD 2.178 and n. 5.
\(^3\) Such as a learned probationer, Vin-a 804.
MONKS’ EXPIATION (PĀCITTIYA) 24

of robes ... for the sake of veneration; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

The Fourth
... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time a monk was walking for alms in Sāvatthī along a certain road. And a nun was walking for alms along that road. Then that monk spoke thus to that nun: “Go, sister, in such and such a place alms-food is being given.” And she spoke thus: “Go, master, in such and such a place alms-food is being given.”

These had become friends through constantly seeing (one another). Now at that time robe-material was being distributed to the Order. Then that nun, going for exhortation, approached that monk, and having approached and greeted that monk, she stood at a respectful distance. As she was standing at a respectful distance, that monk spoke thus to that nun:

“Sister, this is my share of the robe-material, you may accept it.”

“Yes, master, my robe is worn thin.” Then that monk gave that nun the robe-material. Then that monk became one whose robe was worn thin. Monks spoke thus to this monk.

“Your reverence, make up your robe-material now.” Then that monk told this matter to the monks. Those who were modest monks spread it about, saying:

“How can a monk give robe-material to a nun?”...

“Is it true, as is said, that you, monk, gave robe-material to a nun?”

“It is true, lord.”

“Is she a relation of yours, monk, or not a relation?”

“She is not a relation, lord,” he said.

“Foolish man, one who is not a relation does not know what is suitable or what is unsuitable, or what is right or what is wrong for a nun who is not a relation.¹ How can you, foolish man, give robe-material to a nun who is not a relation? It is not, foolish man, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk should give robe-material to a nun who is not a relation, there is an offence of expiation.”

And thus this rule of training for monks came to be laid down by the lord.

Then scrupulous monks did not give robe-material in exchange to nuns.² The nuns ... spread it about, saying:

“How can the masters not give robe-material to us in exchange?”

Monks heard these nuns who ... spread it about. Then these monks told this matter to the lord. Then the lord on this occasion, in this connection, having given reasoned talk addressed the monks, saying:

“Monks, I allow you to give in exchange to five (classes of people): to a monk, a nun, a female probationer, a male novice, a female novice. I allow you, monks, to give in exchange to these five (classes of people). And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk should give robe-material to a nun who is not a relation, except in exchange, there is an offence of expiation.”³

Whatever means: ... is monk to be understood in this case.

Not a relation means: one who is not related on the mother’s side or the father’s side back through seven generations.⁴

Nun means: one ordained by both Orders.

Robe-material means: any one robe-material of the six (kinds of) robe-materials, (including) the least one fit for assignment.⁵

¹ Cf. above, BD 2.39, BD 2.44. ² Cf. above, BD 2.39, where scrupulous monks did not accept robes in exchange. ³ Cf. Bu-NP 5, where it is an offence for a monk to receive a robe from a nun who is not related, except in exchange. ⁴ See above, BD 2.31. ⁵ See above, BD 2.7.
Except in exchange means: setting aside (the fact that) he gives in exchange, there is an offence of expiation.

Bu-Pc 25.3.2

If he thinks that she is not a relation when she is not a relation, (and) gives robe-material (to her), except in exchange, there is an offence of expiation. If he is in doubt as to whether she is a relation ... If he thinks that she is a relation when she is not a relation ... there is an offence of expiation. If he gives robe-material to one ordained by one (Order only), except in exchange, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that she is not a relation when she is a relation, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether she is a relation, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that she is a relation when she is a relation, there is no offence.

Bu-Pc 25.3.3

There is no offence if she is a relation; if there is an exchange; if there is a large thing for a small thing, or a small thing for a large thing; if a nun takes it on trust; if she takes it for the time being; if he gives another requisite, except robe-material; if she is a female probationer, a female novice; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.¹

The Fifth

¹ Cf. above, BD 2.41, and below, BD 2.287.
... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the venerable Udāyin¹ became skilled² in making robes. A certain nun³ approached the venerable Udāyin, and having approached she spoke thus to the venerable Udāyin:

“Honoured sir, it were good if the master sewed a robe for me.”

Then the venerable Udāyin, having sewed a robe for this nun, having made it well dyed, well worked, having raised⁴ up a bold design⁵ in the middle, having folded it up,⁶ laid it aside. Then that nun approached the venerable Udāyin, and having approached she spoke thus to the venerable Udāyin:

“Where, honoured sir, is that robe?”

“Come, sister, having taken this robe as it was folded up, having laid it aside, when the Order of nuns comes for exhortation, then, having put on this robe, come at the back of the Order of nuns.”

Then that nun, having taken this robe as it was folded up, when ¹ Vin-a 804 calls him Lāḷudāyi. See Dictionary of Pali Proper Names. ² paṭṭha. Above, BD 2.109, same thing said of Upananda. Cf. also above, BD 2.42. ³ Vin-a 804 says she was his former wife. ⁴ vuṭṭhāpetvā, variant reading samuṭṭhāpetvā. ⁵ paṭībhānacitta. Vin-a 804 says paṭībhānacittan ti attano paṭībhaṇena, katacittan, so kira cīvaraṁ rajitvā tassa majhe nānāvaṇṇehi vippakatamethunaṁ itthipurisarūpaṁ akāsi, which seems to mean a design (or painting, citta) made by his own wit (or ingenuity, intelligence). They say that he, dyeing the robe-material, made in the middle, with various colours, the form of a woman and a man in interrupted intercourse (so Pali-English Dictionary for vippakatamethuna). Cf. Vin 2.151, where the group of six monks had “imaginative drawings (paṭībhānacitta) painted on their vihāras, figures of men and figures of women” (Vinaya Texts iii.172, q.v., n. 3). Paṭībhānacitta occurs again as being in a cittāgāra, picture-gallery, at Vin 4.298. ⁶ saṁharitvā. Cf. Vin 1.46; Vin 2.117, Vin 2.150.

the Order of nuns came for exhortation, then, having put on this robe, she came at the back of the Order of nuns. People ... spread it about, saying:

“How little these nuns fear blame, they are sly, they have no shame, inasmuch as they raise up a bold design on a robe.”

Nuns spoke thus: “Whose work is this?”

“Master Udāyin’s,” she said.

“A thing like this should not adorn these who have little fear of blame, who are sly, who have no shame. Is it not master Udāyin’s?” they said.

Then the nuns told this matter to the monks. Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying:

“How can the venerable Udāyin sew a robe for a nun?” ...

“Is it true, as is said, that you, Udāyin, sewed a robe for a nun?”

“It is true, lord.”

“Is she a relation of yours, Udāyin, or not a relation?”

“She is not a relation, lord,” he said.

“Foolish man, one who is not a relation does not know what is suitable or what is unsuitable, or what is pleasing or what is unpleasing for a woman who is not a relation. How can you, foolish man, sew a robe for a nun who is not a relation? It is not, foolish man, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk should sew or should cause a robe to be sewn for a nun who is not a relation, there is an offence of expiation.”

Whatever means: ... is monk to be understood in this case. Not a relation means: one who is not related on the mother’s side or on the father’s side back through seven generations. Nun means: one ordained by both Orders.

1 = Vin 3.128 = BD 1.214. 2 Cf. above, BD 2.31, BD 2.47. 3 Cf. above, BD 2.32, BD 2.40.
A robe means: any one robe of the six (kinds of) robes.¹

Should sew means: if he himself sews, in each insertion of the awl² there is an offence of expiation.

Should cause to be sewn means: if he commands another, there is an offence of expiation. When once commanded, if he sews much, there is an offence of expiation.

If he thinks that she is not a relation when she is not a relation, (and) sews or causes a robe to be sewn, there is an offence of expiation. If he is in doubt as to whether she is not a relation ... If he thinks that she is a relation when she is not a relation ... there is an offence of expiation. If he sews or causes a robe to be sewn for one ordained by one (Order only), there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that she is not a relation when she is a relation there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether she is a relation, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that she is a relation when she is a relation, there is no offence.

There is no offence if she is a relation; if he sews or causes another requisite to be sewn, except a robe; if she is a female probationer, a female novice; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.³

The Sixth

¹ Cf. below, BD 2.407. Vin-a 804 and Vin-a 863 say this means that which he is able to put on, to dress in, using the verbs nivāsetuṁ and pārupituṁ, which refer to the inner robe and to the upper robe and outer cloak; see above, BD 2.32, n. 2, n. 3. Vin-a 863 expressly says that the robe which is the least one fit for assignment is not meant (at Vin 4.120); presumably it is not meant here either. ² ārāpathe. ³ Cf. above, BD 2.284.
… at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks, having arranged together with nuns, were going along the same high-road.¹ People ... spread it about, saying:

“Just as we tour with our wives, so do these recluses, sons of the Sakyans, tour together with nuns.”

Monks heard these people who ... spread it about. Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying:

“How can this group of six monks, having arranged together with nuns, go along the same high-road?” ...

“Is it true, as is said, that you, monks ... the same high-road?”

“It is true, lord.” The enlightened one, the lord rebuked them, saying:

“How can you, foolish men ... same high-road? It is not, foolish men, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of trailing should be set forth:

“Whatever monk, having arranged together with a nun, should go along the same high-road, even among villages,² there is an offence of expiation.”

And thus this rule of training for monks came to be laid down by the lord.

Now³ at that time several⁴ monks and nuns came to be going along the high-road from Sāketa to Sāvatthī. Then these nuns spoke

¹ Cf. Vin 4.131, Vin 4.133. ² gāmantaraṁ. ³ Cf. below, BD 2.292. ⁴ sambahulā, usually in Vinaya “two or three,” a gaṇa.
thus to these monks:

“We will go along with the masters.”

“Sisters, it is not allowable, having arranged together with a nun, to go along the same high-road. Either you go first, or we will go (first).”

“Honoured sirs, the masters are the highest men,\(^1\) so let the masters go first.”

Then as those nuns were going last thieves robbed them on the way and assaulted them. Then these nuns, having arrived at Sāvatthi, told this matter to the nuns. The nuns ... to the monks. The monks ... to the lord. Then the lord, on this occasion, in this connection, having given reasoned talk, addressed the monks, saying:

“I allow you, monks, to go along the same high-road, having arranged together with a nun, if it is on a road agreed upon as dangerous, frightening,\(^2\) (where) one must go with a weapon.\(^3\) And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatver monk, having arranged together with a nun, should go along the same high-road, even among villages, except at the right time, there is an offence of expiation. In this case this is the right time: if a road becomes agreed upon as dangerous, frightening, (where) one must go with a weapon. This is the right time in this case.”

\(^{Bu-Pc\ 27.2.3}\)

Whatever means: ... is monk to be understood in this case.

Nun means: one ordained by both Orders.

Together with means: together.

Having arranged\(^4\) means: if one arranges, saying, ‘We are going, sister, we are going, master, we are going, master, we are going, sister,

\(^1\) aggapūrīsa, or foremost, chief among men.  \(^2\) Cf. above, BD\ 2.158, for these two words; and cf. MN i.134.  \(^3\) sattagāmanīya. I follow rendering of Vinaya Texts i.37: “when the road is so insecure and dangerous that travellers on it have to carry arms,” and not the “caravan-road” of Pali-English Dictionary. For Old Commentary’s definition would, in conjunction with this phrase, make nonsense if “caravan-road” were meant. Sattha may be, more specifically, “knife,” cf. Bu-Pj 3  \(^4\) Cf. below, BD\ 2.293, and Vin 4.131.
we are going either today or tomorrow\(^1\) or the next day,'\(^2\) there is an offence of wrong-doing.

Even among villages means: in a village close enough for a cock (to walk),\(^3\) among every (such) village,\(^4\) there is an offence of expiation. For every half yojana\(^5\) in what is not a village, in a jungle,\(^6\) there is an offence of expiation.\(^7\)

Except at the right time means: setting aside the right time.\(^8\)

A road where one must go with a weapon means: it comes to be impossible to go without a weapon.

Dangerous\(^9\) means: if, on this road, a place where thieves are halting is seen, a place where they are eating is seen, a place where they are resting is seen, a place where they are sitting down is seen, a place where they are lying down is seen.

Frightening\(^10\) means: if on this road people injured by thieves are seen, (people) plundered are seen, (people) beaten down are seen.

Having gone to a frightening (place), having seen that it is not frightening, they should be dismissed, with the words, ‘Go, sisters.’

If he thinks that it was arranged when it was arranged, (and) goes along the same high-road even among villages, except at the right time, there is an offence of expiation. If he is in doubt as to whether it was arranged ... If he thinks that it was not arranged when it was arranged ... there is an offence of expiation. If a monk arranges (and) a nun does not arrange, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it was arranged when it was not arranged, there is an

\(^1\) hiyyo, usually “yesterday.” Cf. Hindustani kāl, meaning both “yesterday” and “tomorrow.”
\(^2\) pare, or it can mean “in the future.”
\(^3\) kukkuṭasampāte gāme.
\(^4\) kukkuṭasampātika.
\(^5\) kukkuṭasampāte gāme.
\(^6\) Vin-a 806 says, “setting out from a village a cock goes on foot to another village.”
\(^7\) gāmantare gāmantare.
\(^8\) See Rhys Davids, Ancient Coins and Measures of Ceylon, p.16.
\(^9\) See definition of “jungle” at BD 1.74, BD 1.85.
\(^10\) gāmantare gāmantare.

---

\(^1\) hiyyo, usually “yesterday.” Cf. Hindustani kāl, meaning both “yesterday” and “tomorrow.”
\(^2\) pare, or it can mean “in the future.”
\(^3\) kukkuṭasampāte gāme.
\(^4\) kukkuṭasampātika.
\(^5\) kukkuṭasampāte gāme.
\(^6\) gāmantare gāmantare.
\(^7\) See Rhys Davids, Ancient Coins and Measures of Ceylon, p.16.
\(^8\) See definition of “jungle” at BD 1.74, BD 1.85.
\(^9\) gāmantare gāmantare.

---

714
offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether it was not arranged, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it was not arranged when it was not arranged, there is no offence.

There is no offence if it is at the right time; if he goes not having arranged; if the nun arranges (and) the monk does not arrange; if they go without (making) a rendezvous¹; if there are dangers²; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.³

The Seventh

¹ visaṁketena. Vin-a 807, “If they say: we will go before the meal, and they go after the meal; if they say: we will come today, and they go on the morrow, thus as it is not at the time of the rendezvous (kālavisaṁkete) there is no offence.” Cf. asaṁketena above, BD 2.239, n. 3.
² Vin-a 807, “when there is dissension in the kingdom and the country people mount their carts and drive away”; a stock phrase, cf. AN i.178, AN iii.66, AN iii.104.
³ Cf. below, BD 2.294, and Vin 4.132, Vin 4.133.
Monks’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 28

... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks, having arranged together with (some) nuns, embarked in one boat. People ... spread it about, saying:

“Just as we amuse ourselves in a boat with our wives, so do these recluses, sons of the Sakyans, having arranged together with nuns, amuse themselves in a boat.”

Monks heard these people who ... spread it about. Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying:

“How can this group of six monks, having arranged together with nuns, embark in one boat?” ...

“Is it true, as is said, that you, monks, having arranged together with nuns, embarked in one boat?”

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

“How can you, foolish men ... embark in one boat? It is not, foolish men ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk, having arranged together with a nun, should embark in one boat, going either upstream or downstream, there is an offence of expiation.”

And thus this rule of training for monks came to be laid down by the lord.

Now¹ at that time several monks and nuns were going along the high-road from Sāketa to Sāvatthī. On the way there was a river to be crossed. Then these nuns spoke thus to these monks:

¹ Cf. above, BD 2.288.
“We will cross over together with the masters.”

“Sisters, it is not allowable, having arranged together with a nun, to embark in one boat. Either you cross over first, or we will cross over (first).”

“Honoured sirs, the masters are the highest men, so let the masters cross over first.”

Then as those nuns were crossing over last thieves robbed them and assaulted them. Then these nuns, having arrived at Sāvatthī, told this matter to the nuns. The nuns ... to the monks. The monks ... to the lord. Then the lord on this occasion, in this connection, having given reasoned talk, addressed the monks, saying:

“I allow you, monks, to embark in one boat, having arranged together with a nun, if it is for crossing over to the other bank. And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk, having arranged together with a nun, should embark in one boat, going either upstream or downstream, except for crossing over to the other bank, there is an offence of expiation.”

Whatever means: ... is monk to be understood in this case. Nun means: one ordained by both Orders. Together with means: together. Having arranged¹ means: if one arranges, saying, ‘We are embarking, sister, we are embarking, master, we are embarking, sister, we are embarking either today or tomorrow or the next day,’ there is an offence of wrong-doing. If the monk embarks when the nun has embarked, there is an offence of expiation. If the nun embarks when the monk has embarked, there is an offence of expiation. Or if both embark there is an offence of expiation.

Going upstream² means: upstream.³

The Eighth

\textbf{Going downstream} means: downstream.
\textbf{Except for crossing over to the other bank} means: setting aside for crossing over to the other bank.

In a village close enough for a cock (to walk), among every (such) village, there is an offence of expiation. For every half yojana in what is not a village, in a jungle, there is an offence of expiation.

\begin{footnotesize}
\begin{tabular}{llllll}
1 & adhogāmini. & 2 & \textit{ojavanikāya}. & 3 & Cf. above, \textit{BD 2.290}, and \textit{Vin 4.131}. & 4 & Vin-a 809 says, ‘here it is not only the river, for there is no offence for one who goes from the port of a great ford to Tāmalitti or Suvanṇabhūmi.’ Tāmalitti was a sea-port (the modern Tamluk), formerly on the estuary of the Ganges, and the port from where Asoka sent the branch of the Bodhi-tree to Ceylon. & 5 & Cf. above, \textit{BD 2.291}. \\
\end{tabular}
\end{footnotesize}
Monks’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 29

... at Rājagaha in the Bamboo Grove at the squirrels’ feeding-place. Now at that time the nun Thullanandā¹ came to frequent a certain family as a regular diner. And monks who were elders came to be invited by that householder. Then the nun Thullanandā, dressing in the morning, taking her bowl and robe, approached that family, and having approached, she said to that householder:

“Householder, why is this abundant solid food and soft food prepared?”

“Lady, elders are invited by me.”

“But who are the elders for you, householder?”

“Master Sāriputta,² master Moggallāna the Great,³ master Kaccāna the Great,⁴ master Koṭṭhita the Great,⁵ master Kappina the Great,⁶ master Cunda the Great,⁷ master Anuruddha,⁸ master Re-

¹ Cf. BD 1.110; Vin 4.211, Vin 4.332ff.; SN ii.219, SN ii.222. ² Chief of the disciples of great wisdom, AN i.23. See Thag 340. For reference to all these, see Psalms of the Bretheren; GS 1.16–GS 1.20; and Dictionary of Pali Proper Names ³ Chief of the disciples of psychic potencies, AN i.23. See Thag 382. ⁴ Chief of the disciples who are expounders in full of brief sayings, AN i.23. See Thag 238. ⁵ Chief of the disciples who are masters of logical analysis, AN i.24. See Thag 6. ⁶ Chief of the disciples who are exhorters of monks, AN i.25. See Thag 254. ⁷ Not specially distinguished in AN i. See Thag.118. ⁸ Chief of the disciples who are of deva-sight, AN i.23. See Thag 325.
vata,¹ master Upāli,² master Ānanda,³ master Rāhula.⁴

“But why did you, householder, invite fellows⁵ posing as⁶ great heroes?”

“But who are the great heroes for you, sister?”

“Master Devadatta, master Kokālika, master Kaṭamorakatissaka, master the son of the lady Khaṇḍā, master Samuddadatta.”⁸

Now this chance talk⁹ of the nun Thullanandā was interrupted¹⁰ when these monks who were elders entered. She said:

“Householder, is it true that the great heroes are invited by you?”¹¹

“You, lady, called (them) now ‘fellows,’ now ‘great heroes,’” he said, and he turned her out of the house and put an end to regular dining. Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying:

“How can Devadatta eat alms-food knowing that it was procured through (the intervention of) a nun?”¹²

“Is it true, as is said, that you, Devadatta, ate alms-food knowing that it was procured through (the intervention of) a nun?”

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked him, saying:

“How can you, foolish man, eat alms-food knowing that it was procured through (the intervention of) a nun? It is not, foolish man, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

Vin 4.67

¹ Revata Khadiravaniya, “the acacia woodlander”; at AN i.24 is called “chief of the jungle-dwellers,” while Kaṅkhā-revata is there called chief of musers. Vin-a does not say which one is meant. See Thag 45, Thag 279, Thag 7.

² Chief of those versed in Vinaya, AN i.25. See Thag 168. Also BD.1, Index.

³ Chief of those of wide learning, of those who are mindful, of those of good behaviour, of those who are resolute, of personal attendants, AN i.24f. See Thag 349.

⁴ Chief of those desirous of training, AN i.24. See Thag 183, Gotama’s only son.

⁵ cetaka. Under cetaka, Pali-English Dictionary, referring to this passage, gives “servant, slave, (bad) fellow,” while for cetaka it gives “decoy-bird.” Commentary of no help.

⁶ tiṭṭhamāna.

⁷ Mahā-nāga, nāga also meaning snake or elephant.

⁸ The schismatics of Bu-Ss 10, Bu-Ss 11, see BD.1.

¹⁰ vippakata, interrupted, broken off, left unfinished, but Vin-a 808 reads vippakathā ‘ti kayiramānā hoti (variant reading honti).”

¹¹ Vin-a 808, “looking round as the elders came in, she spoke thus, knowing that they had heard her.”

¹² bhikkuniparipācita; Vin-a 809, “procuring it, making it be taken by explaining its qualities.”
“Whatever monk should eat alms-food knowing that it was procured through (the intervention of) a nun, there is an offence of expiation.”

And thus this rule of training for monks came to be laid down by the lord.

Now at that time a certain monk who had gone forth from Kajagaha arrived at a family of (his) relations. People, saying: “At last the revered sir¹ is come,” duly made ready a meal. A nun who frequented that family spoke thus to these people:

“Sirs, give a meal to the master.”

Then that monk, thinking: “It is forbidden by the lord to eat alms-food knowing that it was procured through (the intervention of) a nun,” being scrupulous, did not accept it; he was not able to walk for alms, he became famished.² Then that monk, having gone to the monastery, told this matter to the monks. The monks told this matter to the lord. Then the lord on this occasion, in this connection, having given reasoned talk, addressed the monks, saying:

“I allow you, monks, to eat alms-food knowing that it was procured through (the intervention of) a nun, if there is a prior arrangement with the householder.³ And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatsoever monk should eat alms-food knowing that it was procured through (the intervention of) a nun, unless there is a prior arrangement with the householder, there is an offence of expiation.”

Whatever means: ... is monk to be understood in this case. He knows means: either he knows by himself, or others tell him, or she herself tells him.⁴ A nun means: one ordained by both Orders.

¹ bhaddanto. ² chinnabhātta. ³ pubbe gīhisamārambhe, a prior undertaking on the part of the householder. Vin-a 809 says samārambha is a synonym for pāṭiyādīta, given, arranged, prepared. ⁴ Cf. above, BD 2.161, BD 2.261; below, BD 2.333.
Procures means: previously not desirous of giving, not desirous of treating him, if she says: “The master is a repeater, the master is very learned, the master is versed in the Suttantas, the master is an expert in Vinaya, the master is a speaker of dhamma, give to the master, treat the master”: this means procures.

Alms-food means: any one meal of the five (kinds of) meals.¹

Unless there is a prior arrangement with the house-holder means: setting aside the arrangement with the householder.

An arrangement with the householder means: they are relations or they are invited² or they are ordinarily prepared (for the monk).³

If he says: “I will eat,” and accepts (a meal), unless there is a prior arrangement with the householder, there is an offence of wrongdoing. For each mouthful there is an offence of expiation.

---

¹ Cf. below, BD 2.305. These five kinds of meals are enumerated below, BD 2.330.
² pavārita. ³ pakaṭipatiyatta. Vin-a 809, they (i.e., meals) are usually prepared (paṭiyādita) for that very monk, with the words, ‘we will give to the elder.’ ⁴ Olden-enberg at Vin 4.359 says that in this and the next case the manuscript called “C.” has āpatti pācittiyassa, an offence of expiation.
There is no offence if there is a prior arrangement with the householder; if a female probationer procures it, if a female novice procures it; setting aside the five (kinds of) meals, there is no offence in (eating) any others\(^1\); if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

The Ninth

\(^1\) I.e., in eating rice-gruel, cakes, and fruits prepared for a nun, Vin-a 809. Cf. below, BD 2.305, BD 2.314, BD 2.320.
... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the former wife of the venerable Udāyin¹ had gone forth among the nuns. She frequently came to the venerable Udāyin, and the venerable Udāyin frequently went to this nun. Now at one time the venerable Udāyin was sitting down in a private place together with this nun, the one with the other.² Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying:

“How can the venerable Udāyin sit down in a private place together with a nun, the one with the other?” ...

“Is it true, as is said, that you, Udāyin, sat down in a private place together with a nun, the one with the other?”

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked him, saying:

“How can you, foolish man, sit down in a private place together with a nun, the one with the other? It is not, foolish man, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk should sit down in a private place together with a nun, the one with the other, there is an offence of expiation.”³

---

Whatever means: ... is monk to be understood in this case.

---

¹ Mentioned in Bu-Ss 2–Bu-Ss 5, to which Vin-a 809 refers, always in connection with women. In both Aniyatas, he is discovered sitting in private with a lay woman. Opening phrases of this pācittiya = Bu-NP 4. ² eko ekāya. ³ Cf. Bu-Pc 44, Bu-Pc 45.
Nun means: one ordained by both Orders.
Together with means: together.
The one with the other means: there is a monk and also a nun.
A private place means: private from the eye, private from the ear. Private from the eye means: if covering the eye, or raising the eyebrow, or raising the head, he is unable to see. Private from the ear means: it is impossible to hear ordinary talk¹ (from him and the woman).
Should sit down means: if a nun is sitting and a monk comes to be sitting or lying down close (to her), there is an offence of expiation; if a monk is sitting and a nun comes to be sitting or lying down close (to him), there is an offence of expiation. Or if both are sitting or if both are lying down, there is an offence of expiation.²

If he thinks that it is a private place when it is a private place (and) sits down, the one with the other, there is an offence of expiation. If he is in doubt as to whether it is a private place ... If he thinks that it is not a private place when it is a private place ... is an offence of expiation. If he thinks that it is a private place when it is not a private place, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether it is not a private place, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it is not a private place when it is not a private place, there is no offence.

There is no offence if some learned friend comes to be (present); if he stands, does not sit; if he is not desirous of a private place; if he sits down thinking about something else³; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.⁴

The Tenth

THIS IS ITS KEY
Not agreed upon, the setting sun,

¹ Cf. BD 1.332, and below, BD 2.358, BD 2.361.
² Cf. below, BD 2.358, BD 2.361.
³ aññāvihita.
⁴ Cf. below, BD 2.358, and Vin 4.269.
quarters, gain, because of a gift, he sews,
A high-road, a boat, should eat, the one with the other: these ten.

The Third Division: that on Exhortation
... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time, not far from Sāvatthī, alms-food came to be prepared in a public rest-house\(^1\) by some guild. The group of six monks, dressing in the morning, taking their bowls and robes, entering Sāvatthī for alms-food, (but) not obtaining alms-food, went to the public rest-house. People, saying: “At last the revered ones are come,” duly waited upon them. Then the group of six monks also on the second day ... also on the third day, dressing in the morning ... going to the public rest-house, ate (a meal). Then it occurred to the group of six monks:

“What difference do we make?\(^2\) Having gone to the monastery, then tomorrow\(^3\) it will be right to return just here.”\(^4\) Staying on and on\(^5\) just there, they ate alms-food at the public rest-house. Followers of other sects went away. People ... spread it about, saying:

“How can the recluses, sons of the Sakyans, staying on and on, eat alms-food at the public rest-house? The alms-food at the public rest-house is not prepared merely\(^6\) for them, the alms-food at the public rest-house is prepared simply for everybody.”

Monks heard these people who ... spread it about. Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying:

“How can the group of six monks, staying on and on, eat alms-food at a public rest-house?” ...

“Is it true, as is said, that you, monks ... rest-house?”

---

\(^{1}\) āvasathapiṇḍa. See Vinaya Texts i.37, n. 3, for information and references. Cf. āvasathāgāra, above, BD 2.198.
\(^{2}\) kiṁ mayaṁ karissāma.
\(^{3}\) hiyyo. Vin-a 810 reads bhīyyo pi ti sve pi.
\(^{4}\) idh’eva āgantabbāṁ bhavissati.
\(^{5}\) anuvasitvā anuvasitvā.
\(^{6}\) eva.
“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

“How can you, foolish men ... rest-house? It is not, foolish men, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“One meal at a public rest-house may be eaten. If he should eat more than that, there is an offence of expiation.”

And thus this rule of training for monks came to be laid down by the lord.

Now at that time the venerable Sāriputta, going through the Kosalan country to Sāvatthī, approached a certain public rest-house. People saying: “At last the elder is come,” duly waited upon (him). Then when the venerable Sāriputta had eaten, a painful affliction arose, he was not able to leave that public rest-house. Then on the second day these people spoke thus to the venerable Sāriputta: “Eat, honoured sir.” Then the venerable Sāriputta, thinking: “It is not allowed by the lord, staying on and on, to eat alms-food at a public rest-house,” and being scrupulous, he did not accept; he became famished. Then the venerable Sāriputta, having gone to Sāvatthī, told this matter to the monks. The monks told this matter to the lord. Then the lord in this connection, on this occasion, having given reasoned talk, addressed the monks, saying:

“I allow you, monks, when a monk is ill, staying on and on, to eat alms-food at a public rest-house. And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“One meal in a public rest-house may be eaten by a monk who is not ill. If he should eat more than that, there is an offence of expiation.”

Not ill means: he is able to leave that public rest-house. Ill means: he is not able to leave that public rest-house.

Meal in a public rest-house means: any one meal of the five (kinds of) meals; as much as is wanted is prepared, not specially for him, in a hall or in a hut or at the foot of a tree or in the open air.

By a monk who is not ill means: (a meal) may be eaten once (only). If he accepts more than that, thinking: “I will eat,” there is an offence of wrong-doing; for each mouthful, there is an offence of expiation.

---

If he thinks that he is not ill when he is not ill, (and) eats more than a meal at a public rest-house, there is an offence of expiation. If he is in doubt as to whether he is not ill ... If he thinks that he is ill when he is not ill ... offence of expiation. If he thinks that he is not ill when he is ill, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether he is ill, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that he is ill when he is ill, there is no offence.

---

There is no offence if he is ill; if he eats once when he is not ill; if he eats going out or coming in; if the proprietors, having invited him, offer him food, if it is specially prepared (for him); if what is prepared is not as much as is wanted; setting aside the five (kinds of) meals there is no offence in (eating) any others; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

The First

---

¹ Cf. above, BD 2.298; below, BD 2.330. ² yāvadattho. Vin-a 810, “such a lot of food not being allotted.” ³ anodissa. Vin-a 810, “prepared for all.” ⁴ maṇḍapa. ⁵ Cf. above, BD 2.298. ⁶ odissa, thus disproving Pali-English Dictionary’s “only in negative”. ⁷ Vin-a 811, “and he takes very little.” ⁸ Cf. above, BD 2.299; below, BD 2.314, BD 2.320.
... at Rājagaha in the Bamboo Grove at the squirrels’ feeding-place. Now at that time¹ Devadatta, gain and honour lost, ² ate with his friends, having asked and asked ³ among households. People ... spread it about, saying:

“How can the recluses, sons of the Sakyans, eat, having asked and asked among households? Who is not fond of well-cooked things? Who does not like sweet things?”⁴

Monks heard these people who ... spread it about. Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying:

“How can Devadatta eat with his friends, having asked and asked among households?” ...

“Is it true, as is said, that you, Devadatta, ate with your friends, having asked and asked among households?”

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked him, saying:

“How can you, foolish man, eat with your friends, having asked and asked among households? It is not, foolish man, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

¹ Cf. Vin 2.196. Vinaya Texts iii.250, n. 2, referring to this pācittiya, says that it is “a rule the previous existence of which is implied in the decision given here”—i.e., that (not more than) three monks shall eat a group meal at people’s houses. Whoever does so shall be dealt with yathādhamma, according to the rule—this means Bu-Pc 32. ² pahīnalābhasakkāra. Even Ajātasattu turned against him, when Devadatta, attempting to murder the Buddha, had a fierce elephant let loose on the road by which Gotama was to travel. See Vin-a 811. Whole story told Vin 2.184ff. ³ viññāpetvā viññāpetvā. ⁴ = below, BD 2.341.
In a group-meal,¹ there is an offence of expiation.”
And thus this rule of training for monks came to be laid down by the lord.

Now at that time people invited ill monks to a meal. The monks, being scrupulous, did not consent, saying: “A group-meal is forbidden by the lord.” They told this matter to the lord. Then the lord on this occasion, in this connection, having given reasoned talk, addressed the monks, saying:

“I allow you, monks, when a monk is ill to eat a group-meal. And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

In a group-meal, except at a right time, there is an offence of expiation. In this case a right time is a time of illness; this is a right time in this case.”

And thus this rule of training for monks came to be laid down by the lord.

Now at that time people, at the time of giving robes, having prepared a meal with the robes, invited monks, saying: “Having offered food, we will clothe (you) with robes.” The monks, being scrupulous, did not consent, saying: “A group-meal is forbidden by the lord.” Little robe-material accrued (to them).² They told this matter to the ¹ gaṇabhojane, group- or party-meal. Two to four monks constitute a gaṇa, group. See Old Commentary, below, and Vin-a 812. Vinaya Texts i.38, Vinaya Texts ii.151, “in a body”—i.e., a meal taken in a body, a group, instead of singly. At Vin 2.196 one of the three reasons why monks may not eat in a body is kulānuddayā, compassion for households. Unrestricted, obviously they might become too heavy a burden. But at Vin 1.254 a group-meal is allowable after the making of the kathina cloth. Gaṇabhojana, paramparabhojana (Bu-Pc 33) and (an)attiritabhojana (Bu-Pc 35) form the subject of a controverted point at Kv 552. At Vism 67 one of the advantages of being a piṇḍapātika, almsman, living more or less on scraps, is said to be that such a monk will not fall into the offences, contained in this section of the Vinaya, of eating a group-meal or an out-of-turn meal. ² uppajjati. Vin-a 811 says, “Not taking the meal they did not give robes, therefore little accrued.” Cf. below, BD 2.318, BD 2.364. Here Vinaya Texts i.38, n. 4, says this exception was “simply to guard against the stock of robes falling short.” Cf. Vinaya Texts ii.150, n. 1.

---

lord. He said:

“I allow you, monks, at a time of giving robes, to eat a group-meal.¹ And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

In a group-meal, except at a right time, there is an offence of expiation. In this case a right time is a time of illness, a time of giving robes; this is a right time in this case.”

And thus this rule of training for monks came to be laid down by the lord.

........................................

Now at that time people, at the (time of) making robes,² invited monks to a meal. The monks, being scrupulous, did not consent, saying: “A group-meal is forbidden by the lord.” They told this matter to the lord. He said:

“I allow you, monks, at a time of making robes, to eat a group-meal. And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

In a group-meal, except at a right time, there is an offence of expiation. In this case a right time is a time of illness, a time of giving robes, a time of making robes; this is a right time in this case.”

And thus this rule of training for monks came to be laid down by the lord.

........................................

Now at one time monks were going on a journey together with (some) men. Then these monks said to these men:

“Sirs, wait a moment, we will go for alms-food.” These said:

“Honoured sirs, eat just here.” The monks, being scrupulous, did not accept (food), saying: “A group-meal is forbidden by the lord.” They told this matter to the lord. He said:

“I allow you, monks, at a time of going on a journey, to eat a group-meal. And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

In a group-meal, except at a right time, there is an offence of expiation. In this case a right time is a time of illness, a time of giving ¹ Cf. Vin 1.254. ² cīvarakārake. Here samaya is omitted; it is inserted in the “allowance” and in the “rule,” cīvarakārasamaya, below.

robes, a time of making robes, a time of going on a journey; this is a right time in this case.”

And thus this rule of training for monks came to be laid down by the lord.

Now at that time monks were going in a boat together with (some) men. Then these monks said to these men:

“Sirs, take us to the bank for a moment, we will go for alms-food.” These said:

“Honoured sirs, eat just here.” The monks, being scrupulous, did not accept (food), saying: “A group-meal is forbidden by the lord.” ...

“I allow you, monks, at a time of being embarked in a boat, to eat a group-meal. And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

In a group-meal, except at a right time, there is an offence of expiation. In this case a right time is a time of illness, a time of giving robes, a time of making robes, a time of going on a journey, a time of being embarked in a boat; this is a right time in this case.”

And thus this rule of training for monks came to be laid down by the lord.

Now at that time, monks having spent the rains in (various) districts,¹ came to Rājagaha to see the lord. People, having seen the monks from various parts of the country,² invited them to a meal. The monks, being scrupulous, did not consent.

“I allow you, monks, to eat a group-meal when there is a great scarcity.³ And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

In a group-meal, except at a right time, there is an offence of expiation. In this case a right time is a time of illness ... a time of

¹ Disā. ² nānāverajjake, or various provinces, different kingdoms. Cf. AN iii.263. ³ mahāsamaye. See Old Commentary below, and Vin-a 813. Four Monks may not beg, but when a great scarcity comes, this rule is waived, otherwise it might be impossible for all to get a meal. Samaya also means both time and concourse; for the latter, cf. Mahāsamayasuttanta of DN embarking in a boat, when there is a great scarcity; this is a right time in this case.”

And thus this rule of training for monks came to be laid down by
the lord.

Now at one time a blood-relation of King Seniya Bimbisāra of Magadha had gone forth among the Naked Ascetics. Then that Naked Ascetic approached King Seniya Bimbisāra of Magadha, and having approached, he spoke thus to King Seniya Bimbisāra of Magadha:
“I, sire, wish to make a meal for all heretics.”

“If, you, honoured sir, would first entertain the Order of monks with the enlightened one at their head, you might do this.”

Then that Naked Ascetic sent a messenger to the monks, saying:
“Let the monks consent to (take) a meal with me on the morrow.”

The monks, being scrupulous, did not consent, saying: “A group-meal is forbidden by the lord.” Then that Naked Ascetic approached the lord, and having approached he exchanged friendly greetings with the lord, and having exchanged greetings of friendliness and courtesy, he stood at a respectful distance. As he was standing at a respectful distance, that Naked Ascetic spoke thus to the lord:
“The revered Gotama is gone forth; I, too, am gone forth. One who has gone forth is worthy to accept the alms-food of one who has gone forth. Let the revered Gotama consent to (take) a meal with me on the morrow together with the Order of monks.”

The lord consented by becoming silent. Then that Naked Ascetic, having obtained the lord’s consent, departed. Then the lord, on that occasion, in that connection, having given reasoned talk, addressed the monks, saying:
“I allow you, monks, to eat a group-meal at a meal-time of recluses. ²
And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:
“In a group-meal, except at a right time, there is an offence of expiation. In this case, a right time is a time of illness, a time of

¹ sabbapāsandikabhatta. ² Samaṇabhattasamaya. Samaṇa is a member of a permanent body, either belonging to Gotama’s Order, saddhammika, or to another ascetic-body, aññatitthiya.
giving robes, a time of making robes, a time of going on a journey, a time of being embarked in a boat, when there is a great scarcity, a meal-time of recluses; this is a right time in this case.”

Group-meal means: when four monks eat, invited to any one meal of the five (kinds of) meals, this is called a group-meal.

Except at a right time means: setting a right time to one side.

Time of illness means: even when the feet become split\(^1\); this means that at a time of illness (a group-meal) may be eaten.

Time of giving robes means: the last month of the rainy season when the kāṭhina cloth is not (formally) made, the five months when the kāṭhina cloth is (formally) made\(^2\); this means that at the time of giving robes (a group-meal) may be eaten.

Time of making robes means: when the robes are being made; this means that at the time of making robes (a group-meal) may be eaten.

Time of going on a journey means: if he thinks: “I will go for half a yojana,” (a group-meal) may be eaten, it may be eaten by him going out, it may be eaten by him coming in.\(^3\)

Time of being embarked in a boat means: if he thinks: “I will embark in a boat,” (a group-meal) may be eaten, it may be eaten by him embarking, it may be eaten by him disembarking.

A great scarcity means: when two or three monks, walking for alms-food, keep themselves going, (but) when a fourth has come they do not keep themselves going; this means that when there is a great scarcity (a group-meal) may be eaten.

Meal-time of recluses means: whoever makes a meal, being one who has attained (to the stage of) a wanderer,\(^4\) this means that at the meal-time of recluses (a group-meal) may be eaten.

---

\(^1\) pādāpi phālitā honti, so that a monk cannot go to a village for alms, Vin-a 812. Not an uncommon complaint among people who usually go barefoot. \(^2\) = below, BD 2.366. Cf. above, BD 2.5, BD 2.26, for atthata kāṭhina. \(^3\) Cf. below, BD 2.405. \(^4\) paribbājakasamāpanna. Vin-a 813 says this is a certain one among co-religionists and members of other sects. For definition of paribbājaka, see Vin 4.92, Vin 4.285.
If, except at the right time, he accepts (food), thinking, “I will eat,” there is an offence of wrong-doing. For every mouthful there is an offence of expiation.

---

If he thinks that it is a group-meal when it is a group-meal, (and) eats, except at a right time, there is an offence of expiation. If he is in doubt as to whether it is a group-meal ... If he thinks that it is not a group-meal when it is a group-meal ... offence of expiation. If he thinks that it is a group-meal when it is not a group-meal, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether it is not a group-meal, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it is not a group-meal when it is not a group-meal, there is no offence.

---

There is no offence if it is at a right time; if two or three eat together¹; if having walked one by one for alms, they eat having assembled together; if it is the regular supply of food; if it is food (allowed by) ticket²; if it is (food given) on a day of the waxing or waning of

---

¹ Vin-a 814 distinguishes five groups of four persons: (1) those not invited, where one of those invited does not come, but someone else arrives and receives food: no offence; (2) those going for alms, where one does not accept the invitation but receives his share as he is going to the village: no offence; (3) those not ordained, when monks are invited with a probationer: no offence; (4) those sending out their bowls, where one going away sends out his bowl: no offence; (5) those who are ill, where monks are invited with one who is ill: no offence for the ill one. ² salākabhātta. At times when alms-food was short, food-tickets were issued (salākāvutta) by a monk in charge of the meals—a kind of steward. See, e.g., BD 1.11, BD 1.26, BD 1.151. This and the next three terms occur at Vin 1.58, Vin 1.96; Vin 2.175. At Vin 1.58 = Vin 1.96 these four kinds of meals, together with those derived from three other sources, are called “extra allowances,” while at Vism 66 it is said that the almsman, pīṇḍapātika (one who follows an ascetic practice), should not accept fourteen kinds of meals, including food given by ticket and the next three kinds, as above. At Vin 2.175, at a time when Rājagaha was short of alms-food, Gotama allows the monks to obtain food in each of these (seven) ways. This and the next (as pakkhikabhātta) occur also at Ja 2.209f.
the moon,¹ if it is (given) on an Observance day,² if it is (given) on the day after an Observance day³; setting aside the five (kinds of) meals, there is no offence in (eating) any other⁴; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

The Second

¹ pakkhikaṁ. Cf. Vism 66, translated at Path of Purity i.75, “on the day of the waxing or waning of the month”; this emphasises the lunar control of such givings rather better than does the “each fortnight” of Vinaya Texts i.173, or the “during a fortnight” of Vinaya Texts iii.220. See Vinaya Texts iii.220, n. 6, and Pali-English Dictionary. A fortnight, however, was one half of the lunar month: the light, moonlit half, or the dark, moonless half. Pakkhikaṁ means food given any day once a fortnight, while the next two expressions each refer to a particular day in the fortnight. ² uposathikaṁ, the last day of each fortnight—i.e., either the full moon day or the dark moon day. Uposathika is a fasting day for the lay people, but monks recite the Pātimokkha then, therefore it is a day to be observed or kept. Months are calculated from uposathika. As it is the last day of each fortnight, the day after it is the beginning of a month.³ pāṭipadikaṁ. Path of Purity i.75 has “on the first day of the moonlit fortnight”—i.e., at the beginning of a month, full moon to new moon or new moon to full moon.⁴ Cf. above, BD 2.299, BD 2.305.
Monks’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 33

... at Vesālī in the Great Grove in the hall of the Gabled Roof. Now at that time in Vesālī a succession of meals of sumptuous foods came to be arranged.¹ Then it occurred to a certain poor workman: “This² will not be inferior, in that these people duly prepare a meal. What now if I were to prepare a meal?” Then that poor workman approached Kirapatika,³ and having approached, he said to Kirapatika:

“I, master,⁴ want to prepare a meal for the Order of monks with the enlightened one at the head. Give me a wage.”

Now Kirapatika had faith and was virtuous. Then Kirapatika gave more than a wage⁵ to this poor work-man. Then the poor workman went up to the lord, and having gone up, having greeted the lord, he sat down at a respectful distance. As he was sitting down at a respectful distance, the poor workman spoke thus to the lord:

“Lord, may the lord, together with the Order of monks, consent to a meal with me tomorrow.”

“But, sir, do find out, the Order of monks is large.”

“Lord, let the Order of monks be large. Many are the jujube fruits⁶ prepared by me, the things to be drunk⁷ will be perfect on account of the juice of the jujube fruits.”¹

¹ Vesāliyāṁ paṇītānaṁ bhattānāṁ bhattappaṭipāṭi adhiṭṭhitā hoti. Cf. Vin 1.248, Kusinārāyam ... hoti, translated Vinaya Texts ii.138, “a succession had been fixed, in which the inhabitants of Kusināra should each in succession provide food for the Saṅgha.” ² Vin-a 816, this teaching or this gift to the Order. ³ A clansman (kulaputta) named Kira, evidently influential (patika), giving out work and paying wages monthly, by the season, by the year, Vin-a 817. Mentioned nowhere but here, I believe. ⁴ ayyaputta. ⁵ abhatireka vetana. ⁶ badara. ⁷ peyya.

The lord consented by becoming silent. Then that poor workman, having obtained the lord’s consent, having risen up from the seat, having greeted the lord, departed, keeping his right side towards him. Monks heard it said:

“The Order of monks, with the enlightened one at the head, is invited for tomorrow by a poor workman. The things to be drunk will be perfect on account of the juice of jujube fruits.” These ate, walking for alms that morning. People heard it said: “The Order of monks, with the enlightened one at the head, is invited by, the poor workman.” These conveyed much solid food and soft food for the poor workman. Then that poor workman, at the end of that night, having had sumptuous solid food and soft food prepared, had the time announced to the lord, saying: “Lord, it is time, the meal is ready.” Then the lord, dressing in the morning, taking his bowl and robe, approached the poor workman’s dwelling, and having approached he sat down on the appointed seat together with the Order of monks. Then that poor workman served the monks in a refectory. The monks spoke thus:

“Sir, give a little, give a little, sir.” He said: “Do not you, honoured sirs, accept so very little saying, ‘This is a poor workman.’ Much solid food and soft food was prepared for me. Honoured sirs, accept as much as you please.”

“Sir, it is not for this reason that we accept so very little, but we ate, having walked for alms this morning; that is why we are accepting so very little.”

Then that poor workman looked down upon, criticised, spread it about, saying:

“How can the revered sirs, invited by me, eat elsewhere?”² Yet am I

¹ badaramissena. Vin-a 817 explains by badarasāḷavena. According to Pali-English Dictionary, badaramissa is “mixture or addition of the juice of the jujube fruits,” while it says that sāḷava is “perhaps a kind of salad.” At Atthasālinī 320 lapila, cf. lambila, bitter or astringent, is defined as badarasāḷava-kapiṭṭhasāḷavadi, the s° of the jujube, the s° of the wood-apple is astringent. ² Cf. Vin 3.66, where monks accepted lodgings elsewhere, thus annoying their would-be host, who also refers to them as bhaddantā.
Monks heard this poor workman who ... spread it about. Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying:

“How can these monks, invited somewhere, eat elsewhere?” ...

“Is it true, as is said, monks, that the monks, invited somewhere, ate elsewhere?”

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

“How, monks, can these foolish men ... eat elsewhere? It is not, monks ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth: In an out-of-turn meal,² there is an offence of expiation.”

And thus this rule of training for monks came to be laid down by the lord.

Now at that time a certain monk became ill. A monk, taking alms-food, went up to that monk, and having gone up he spoke thus to that monk: “Eat, your reverence.”

“Very well, your reverence, but there is for me the expectation of a meal.”

Alms-food was conveyed to that monk in the evening. That monk did not eat as much as expected. They told this matter to the lord.

---

¹ na cāhaṁ paṭibalo. OLDENBERG, Vin 4.359, says: “The ‘na’ appears not to be correct.” It is only correct if the sentence is interrogative, na ca = but not. ² paramparabho-jane. Vinaya Texts i.38, “there is pācittiya in taking food in turn,” with note (q.v.) to say, “that is, in picking and choosing with regard to food, or in regard to different invitations. The bhikkhus were to eat straight on whatever was given, and to accept invitations in the order in which they were received.” Pali-English Dictionary gives phrase as “taking food in succession,” successive feeding. Gogerly, Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society, 1862, p.445, gets the gist of the notion without literal accuracy: “If a priest eat his ordinary meal when under an invitation to dine, except on allowed occasions, it is Pachittiyan.” Also DICKSON, Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society, 1876, p.112: “A sin is committed when a priest takes food in any other order than that in which it is offered to him.” HUBER, J. Bu-As., Nov–Dec, 1913, does not attempt a translation. Path of Purity 1.76 calls it “a meal subsequent to the acceptance of a previous one.” This kind of meal should not be accepted by the piṇḍapātika, almsman; see above, BD 2.307, n. 1.
Then the lord on this occasion, in this connection, having given reasoned talk, addressed the monks, saying:

“I allow you, monks, when a monk is ill, to eat an out-of-turn meal. And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

In an out-of-turn meal, except at a right time, there is an offence of expiation. In this case, a right time is a time of illness; this is a right time in this case.”

And thus this rule of training for monks came to be laid down by the lord.

At that time people, at the time of giving robes, having had a meal prepared together with the robes, invited monks, saying: “Having offered food, we will present (you) with robes.” The monks, being scrupulous, did not consent, saying: “It is forbidden by the lord to eat an out-of-turn meal.” ... (See Bu-Pc 32.3, Bu-Pc 32.4) ... “... should be set forth:

“In an out-of-turn meal, except at a right time, there is an offence of expiation. In this case a right time is a time of illness, a time of giving robes, a time of making robes; this is a right time in this case.”¹

And thus this rule of training for monks came to be laid down by the lord.

Then the lord, dressing in the morning, taking his bowl and robe, with the venerable Ānanda as his attendant,² came up to a certain household, and having come up he sat down on the appointed seat. Then these people gave a meal to the lord and to the venerable Ānanda. The venerable Ānanda, being scrupulous, did not accept (it).

“Take it, Ānanda,” he said.

“Very well, lord, (but) there is for me the expectation of a meal.”

“Well now, Ānanda, having assigned it (to another), take (this food).”

¹ Cf. above, BD 2.308; below, BD 2.365. ² Cf. BD 1.20, n. 1.
Then the, lord, on this occasion, in this connection, having given reasoned talk, addressed the monks, saying:

“I allow you, monks, having assigned (food to another), to eat an out-of-turn meal. And thus, monks, should it be assigned: ‘I will give the meal that I am expecting to so and so.’”¹

An out-of-turn meal means: invited to any one meal of the five (kinds of) meals, having set this to one side, if he eats any one other meal of the five (kinds of) meals, this means an out-of-turn meal. Except at a right time means: setting aside a right time. Time of illness means: sitting in one seat he is not able to eat as much as he pleases: this means that at a time of illness (an out-of-turn meal) may be eaten. Time of giving robes means: ... Time of making robes means: ... (see Bu-Pc 32).

If, except at a right time, he accepts (food), saying: “I will eat ...” (see Bu-Pc 32.9.1) ... If he thinks that it is not an out-of-turn meal when it is not an out-of-turn meal there is no offence.

There is no offence if it is at a right time; if he eats, having assigned (a meal); if he eats two or three invitations together²; if he eats the invitations in succession³; if invited by a whole village he eats anywhere in that village; if invited by a whole guild he eats anywhere in that guild; if being invited, he speaks saying: “I will take alms-food”⁴; if it is the regular supply of food; if it is food (allowed by) ticket; if it is (food given) on a day of the waxing or waning of the moon; if it is (given) on an Observance day; if it is (given) on the day after an Observance day; setting aside the five (kinds of) meals,

¹ Either to one who is present, or if he sees no one, then he should assign it to one person among the five kinds of his co-religionists. Vin-a 817. ² Vin-a 817, two or three families invite him, and he puts the food into one bowl, eats it in one place. ³ nimantanaṇaṭipatiyā bhūnāti. This must mean in the order in which they are given. ⁴ Vin-a 819, “I do not require your meal.” there is no offence in (eating) any other; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.¹

The Third

¹ Cf. Bu-Pc 32.9.3.
... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time a woman lay-follower, the mother of Kāṇā,¹ had faith and was virtuous. Kāṇā² came to be given³ to a certain man in a village. Then Kāṇā went to her mother’s house on some business or other. Then Kāṇā’s husband sent a messenger to Kāṇā, saying: “Let Kāṇā come back, I desire Kāṇā’s return.” Then the woman lay-follower, Kāṇā’s mother, saying: “It is awkward to go empty-handed,”⁴ cooked a cake.⁵ When the cake was cooked, a certain monk walking for alms came up to the dwelling of the woman lay-follower, Kāṇā’s mother. Then the woman lay-follower, Kāṇā’s mother, gave the cake to that monk. He, having gone away, told another, and she gave him a cake. He, having gone away, told another, and she gave him a cake.⁶ As soon as a cake was ready it disappeared. A second time did Kāṇā’s husband send a messenger to Kāṇā, saying: “Let Kāṇā, come back, I desire Kāṇā’s return.” A second time did the woman lay-follower, Kāṇā’s mother, saying: “It is awkward to go empty-handed” ... it disappeared. A third time did Kāṇā’s husband send a messenger to Kāṇā, saying: “Let Kāṇā, come back, I desire Kāṇā’s return. If Kāṇā does not come back, I will take another wife.” A third time did the woman lay-follower, Kāṇā’s mother, saying: “It is awkward to go empty-handed” ... it disappeared. Then Kāṇā’s husband procured another wife. Kāṇā heard: “It is said that another wife is taken by this man.” She stood weeping. Then the lord, dressing in the morning, taking his bowl and robe, came up to the dwelling of that woman lay-follower, Kāṇā’s mother, and having come up he sat down on the appointed seat. Then the woman lay-follower, Kāṇā’s mother, approached the lord, and having approached and greeted the lord, she sat down at a respectful distance. As she was sitting down at a respectful distance, the lord spoke thus to the woman lay-follower, Kāṇā’s mother:

¹ Kāṇāmātā. The Babbu-Jātaka was told on account of Kāṇāmātā. The Introduction to this Jātaka (Ja 1.477) differs somewhat from the above account, and also says that Kāṇāmātā was a stream-attainer (as does Vin-a 819) and a disciple of the noble ones. Different version again at Dhp-a 2. 149ff. (on Dhp 82). Kāṇāmātā and Kāṇā mentioned only in this Jātaka, pācittiya 34 and Dhp-a. ² She was so beautiful that when people saw her they became blind (Kāṇā) through passion, blinded (andha) with passion, so she was called Kāṇā because she caused blindness in others, Vin-a 819. ³ I.e., in marriage. ⁴ kismiṁ viya rittahatthān gantuṁ. Cf. Ja 1.477, kathamiṁ tuccha-hatthā va gamissasi; and see above, BD 2.43, “it is awkward to go out with (only) one piece of cloth,” kismiṁ viya ekasāṭakāṁ gantuṁ, with n. 4. Vin-a 819 explains by kidisaṁ viya, lajjanaṁ viya hoti; it is like that, it is like causing shame. ⁵ pūva. Vinaya Texts i.39, “sweetmeats,” which it was “the custom to send as presents from one house to another” (Vinaya Texts i.39, n. 1). ⁶ Possibly a fourth monk came and was given a cake, although the sentence is omitted. In the next paragraph four monks went to the caravan for alms, and in the Babbu-Jātaka four cats make the mouse give them food. Kāṇāmātā is said to have been the mouse, and the four monks the cats.

“Why does this Kāṇā weep?”

Then the woman lay-follower, Kāṇā’s mother, told this matter to the lord. Then the lord, having ... gladdened the woman lay-follower, Kāṇā’s mother, with talk on dhamma, rising up from his seat, departed.

---------------------------

Now at that time a certain caravan was desirous of going from Rājagaha to the south. A certain monk, walking for alms-food, entered that caravan for alms-food. A certain lay-follower had barley-meal given to that monk. He, having gone away, told another, and he had barley-meal given to him. He, having gone away, told another, and he had barley-meal given to him. He, having gone away, told another,

¹ Vin-a 819: As she was a disciple of the noble ones, when she saw monks she was unable not to give, thus as soon as she gave everything disappeared. ² āneti, lead back. ³ paṭi-y-āloka. Same phrase occurs at Vin 4.131; Vin-a 868 supports above rendering. ⁴ (This footnote proved troublesome to typeset due to its length, so it has been moved to an appendix with other long notes on page 2981.)
and he had barley-meal given to him. As soon as provisions for the journey were ready, they disappeared. Then that lay-follower said to these people:

“Masters, wait until tomorrow. As soon as provisions for the journey are ready, they are given to the masters. I will prepare provisions for the journey.”

Saying: “Master, we are unable to wait, the caravan is setting out,” they went away. Then as that lay-follower, having prepared provisions for the journey, was going along last, thieves robbed him. People ... spread it about, saying:

“How can there be recluse sons of the Sakyans, not knowing moderation, accept provisions? This man having given to them, going along last, was robbed by thieves.”

Monks heard these people who ... spread it about. Then these monks told this matter to the lord. Then the lord in this connection, on this occasion, having given reasoned talk, addressed the monks, saying:

“Because of this, monks, I will make known a rule of training for monks, founded on ten reasons: for the excellence of the Order ... for following the rules of restraint.¹ And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“If a monk, going up to a family, (who) asking, should invite him (to take) cakes or barley-gruel,² two or three bowlfuls may be accepted by a monk desiring them. Should he accept more than that, there is an offence of expiation. Having accepted two or three bowlfuls, having taken them back ³ from there, they must be shared together with the monks. This is the proper course in this case.”

If a monk, going up to a family means: a family means: there

¹ Cf. BD 1.37, and above, BD 2.87. ² abhihaṭṭhum pavāreyya. See above, BD 2.51, n. 1. ³ mantha. Combined with madhupiṇḍdika, honey-ball, at Vin 1.4. See above, BD 2.322, n. 4. ⁴ I.e., to the monastery.
are four (kinds of) family: noble family, brahmin family, merchant family, low-class family.¹

Going up to means: going there.

A cake means: whatever is prepared as a present.²

Barley-gruel means: whatever is prepared as provisions for a journey.

Asking, should invite means: they say, ‘take just as much as you want.’

Desiring means: wanting.

Two or three³ bowlfuls may be accepted means: two or three⁴ bowlfuls may be accepted.

Should he accept more than that means: if he accepts more than that, there is an offence of expiation.

Having accepted two or three bowlfuls, while taking them back from there, seeing a monk, he should be told: ‘Two or three bowlfuls were accepted by me in such and such a place, so do not accept (anything) there.’ If, seeing (him), he does not tell (him), there is an offence of wrong-doing.⁵ If, although told, he accepts, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

Having taken them back from there, they must be shared together with the monks means: returning, having taken them back,⁶ they must be shared.

This is the proper course in this case means: this is the appropriate course\(^1\) in this case.

¹ = Vin 3.184; Vin 4.177, Vin 4.272. ² pahiṇaka. Vin-a 819 explains by paṇṇāka, a donation, present, gift. ³ dvitti ... dve tayo. ⁴ dvitti ... dve tayo. ⁵ There was a case in Colombo not long ago where monks visited for alms-food the hut of some very humble people, who that very day had managed to collect for themselves a rather less scanty meal than usual. The monks did not tell others that they had called here; and it happened that others followed them, so the people had to give away all the food they had. The matter was looked into by the Order and the monks’ attention drawn to this Pācittiya. ⁶ paṭikkamanāni niharitvā. Vin-a 820 says that if two or three bowlfuls are taken, putting one aside for himself, one or two respectively should be given to the Order. Cf. paṭikkamanasālā at Snp-a 53. Vin-a 820 says, āsanasālāni gacchantena ca chaḍḍitasālā na gantabbaṁ yathā hi bhikkhusaṅgho nisidati tattha gantabbaṁ—that is, the monk must go there where the Order is sitting down, to a hall with seats.

If he thinks that there are more when there are more than two or three bowlfuls, (and) accepts, there is an offence of expiation. If he is in doubt as to whether there are more than ... If he thinks that there are less when there are more than two or three bowlfuls, (and) accepts, there is an offence of expiation. If he thinks that there are more when there are less than two or three bowlfuls, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether there are less than two or three bowlfuls, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that there are less when there are less than two or three bowlfuls, there is no offence.

There is no offence if he accepts two or three bowlfuls; if he accepts less than two or three bowlfuls; if they give what is prepared neither as a present nor as provisions for a journey; if they give the remainder of what is prepared either as a present or as provisions for a journey; if they give because the journey is given up\(^2\); if they belong to relations; if they are invited; if they are for the good of another; if it is by means of his own property; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

The Fourth

\(^1\) anudhammatā; cf. above, BD 2.69.
\(^2\) gamane paṭippassaddhe. Vin-a 820 says, “seeing an accident on the road, or not wanting (to travel), they say, ‘We will not set forth, we will not go,’” thus the journey is paṭippassaddhe, upacchinne, broken off, interrupted.
... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time, a certain brahmin, having invited the monks, gave them a meal. The monks, having eaten,¹ being satisfied,² went to relations and families, and some ate, some went out taking the alms-bowl. Then that brahmin spoke thus to the neighbours³:

“Masters, the monks were satisfied⁴ by me; come and I will satisfy you.” These said:

“How will you, master, satisfy us? For those invited by you came to our houses, some ate, others went out taking the alms-bowl.”

Then that brahmin looked down upon, criticised, spread it about, saying:

“How can thereveredsirs, having eaten in our house, eat elsewhere?⁵ Yet am I not competent to give as much as they please?”⁶ Monks heard that brahmin who ... spread it about. Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying:

¹ bhuttāvin. ² pavāritā. Pavāreti in conjunction with bhuttāvin seems in Vinaya to mean “to offer, to invite,” also “to satisfy,” as in Pali-English Dictionary Vinaya Texts i.39, Vin 2.74, Vin 2.76, Vin 2.118 use “to offer” or “invite.” Vin-a 821 says that the brahmīn told the monks to take as much as they wanted, but they asked for only a little. Lower down there is another verb, santappati, meaning to satisfy, just as nimanteti means “to invite.” Doubtless the notion of offering implied satisfying, and here “refusing” on the part of the monk. Vin-a 821 says, “the offer made, the refusal made,” which probably means, as Vinaya Texts i.39 suggests, that the monk, though he has finished his meal, is still invited to continue eating—but refuses to do so. Cf. abhihaṭṭhuṁ pavāreyya at BD 2.51 above. At Mil 266 one of the offences into which an arahan may fall is said to be that of thinking food was not offered when it was offered. ³ paṭivissake. Cf. MN i.126. ⁴ santappitā. ⁵ Cf. BD 1.110, and above, BD 2.317. ⁶ Cf. above, BD 2.317.
“How can these monks, having eaten, being satisfied, eat elsewhere?”…

“Is it true, as is said, that you, monks … ate elsewhere?”

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

“Monks, how can these foolish men, having eaten, being satisfied, eat elsewhere? Monks, it is not for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased … And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth: “Whatever monk, having eaten, being satisfied, should eat or partake of solid food or soft food,¹ there is an offence of expiation.”

And thus this rule of training for monks came to be laid down by the lord.

Now at that time monks brought back sumptuous alms-food for ill monks.² The ill monks did not eat as much as expected, (and) the monks threw these away.³ The lord heard a loud noise, a great noise, a noise (like) the cawing of crows,⁴ and hearing this he addressed the venerable Ānanda, saying:

“What, Ānanda, is this loud noise, this great noise, this noise (like) the cawing of crows?” Then the venerable Ānanda told this matter to the lord.

“But, Ānanda, monks should eat what is left over by ill (monks).⁵”

“They would not eat it, lord.”

Then the lord on this occasion, in this connection, having given reasoned talk, addressed the monks, saying:

“I allow you, monks, to eat what is left over⁶ both by one who is ill and by one who is not ill. And, monks, (what is left over) should be made left over,¹ saying, ‘All this is enough.’² And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

¹ The two terms for eating, khādeyya and bhuñjeyya, correspond to the two classes of food, khādaniya, solid food, and bhojaniya, soft food. Vinaya Texts i.39, n. 5, gives some account of what these comprise, and see Old Commentary below. ² At Vin 1.293 the monk who tends the sick, Monks’ gilānupaṭṭāko, is the one who brings back food for him. ³ chaḍḍenti, or rejected them, tāni. ⁴ = Vin 1.239. The last of these three noises is kākoravasadda. ⁵ gilānātiritta. ⁶ atiritta. Cf. Mil 266, where one of the offences into which an arahan may fall is said to be that of thinking food is left over when it is not left over.

“Whatever monk, having eaten, being satisfied, should eat or partake of solid food or soft food that is not left over,³ there is an offence of expiation.”

Whatever means: ... is monk to be understood in this case. Having eaten means: any one meal of the five (kinds of) meals,⁴ and even (as little as) becomes eaten with a blade of grass.⁵ Being satisfied means: eating is to be seen,⁶ a meal is to be seen, standing within a reach of the hand,⁷ he asks⁸ (him), a refusal is to be seen.⁹

What is not left over¹⁰ means: it becomes made not allowable¹¹;

¹ atirittāṁ kātabbaṁ. ² alaṁ etāṁ sabbāṁ, spoken by the ill monk. If he is too ill to speak, he makes a sign. ³ anatiritta. Exceptions are made to this rule at Vin.1.213, Vin.1.214, Vin.1.215 in times of scarcity. But at Vin.1.238, the time of scarcity having passed, the exception does not stand, and the monk is to be dealt with according to rule—i.e., to this Bu-Pc 35. Referred to also at Vism 69. In the account of the Council of Vesālī (Kd 12) it is affirmed that gāmantarakaṁpa—i.e. (as explained at Vin.2.300), going amidst villages, having eaten, being satisfied—it is not allowable to eat food that is left over because (Vin.2.306) it violates a pācittiya rule. It is also affirmed that amathitakaṁpa—i.e. (as explained at Vin.2.301), having eaten, being satisfied—it is not allowable to drink milk that is left over, because it violates a pācittiya rule (Vin.2.307). ⁴ Those mentioned below, BD 2.330. ⁵ Cf. below, BD 2.100. ⁶ asanaṁ paññāyati. Vinaya Texts i.39, n. 2, reads asanaṁ, and translates tentatively, “a seat for him is there.” Vin-a 821 says, “a meal left unfinished means ‘he is satisfied’ ... it is to be seen (dissati).” ⁷ hatthapāse thito. Vin-a 821, “if, taking enough of the meal offered, the donor comes to be in a place distant two and a half cubits (from him)”; cf. above, BD 2.200, n. 1. ⁸ abhiharati—i.e., the donor or benefactor, dāyaka, offers him food with a gesture. Buddhaghosa at Vin-a 821, Vin-a 825 takes “standing within a reach of the hand” and “he asks (him)” as separate items, while at Vin-a 822 he says that in five ways is an offer or invitation, pavāraṇā, to be seen (or is apparent, visible), and then he enumerates the five occurring in this paragraph. ⁹ paṭikkhepo paññāyati. The monk refuses what was offered by a gesture or by voice. This is called “being satisfied” according to the fifth of the ways given at Vin-a 822. See preceding note, and also BD 2.326, n. 2. ¹⁰ anatiritta—i.e., if the following means have not been carried out. ¹¹ akappiyakataṁ hoti. Kata in this and the following phrases is comparable in meaning to the atirittāṁ kātabbaṁ above.
it becomes made not formally accepted\(^1\); it becomes made not delivered\(^2\); it becomes made not within a reach of the hand\(^3\); it becomes made by one who has not eaten\(^4\); it becomes made by one who has eaten, has been satisfied (and) has risen from his seat; it does not come to be said, ‘All this is enough’; it does not come to be left over by one who is ill: this means what is not left over.\(^5\)

What is left over means: it becomes made allowable; it becomes made formally accepted; it becomes made being delivered; it becomes made within a reach of the hand; it becomes made by one who has eaten; it becomes made by one who has eaten, has been satisfied (and) has not risen from his seat; it comes to be said, ‘All this is enough’; it comes to be left over by one who is ill: this means what is left over.

Solid food means: setting aside the five (kinds of) meals, and food (that may be eaten) during a watch of the night,\(^6\) during seven days,\(^7\) during life,\(^8\) the rest means solid food.

Soft food means: the five (kinds of) meals: cooked rice,\(^9\) food

\(^1\) appaṭiggahitakatāṁ hoti—i.e., by the monk (Vin-a 829).
\(^2\) anuccāritakatāṁ hoti.
\(^3\) Vin-a 829 says kappiyaṁ kārāpetuṁ āgatena bhikkhunā īsakaṁ pi anukkhitatāṁ vā anapanāmitatāṁ vā kataṁ.
\(^4\) Vin-a 829, to make it allowable is done by standing beyond the reach of the hand of one coming in.
\(^5\) Vin-a 829 says that whoever saying, ‘This is enough,’ makes it left over, it is made (allowable) by one who has not eaten (though) a sufficient meal was offered.
\(^6\) This footnote proved troublesome to typeset due to its length, so it has been moved to an appendix with other long notes on page 2981.
\(^7\) sattāhakālika. Vinaya Texts ii.144 states that “this also refers to certain medicines; see the 23rd Nissaggīya.” These medicines are the same as those referred to at Kd 6.1.5 = Kd 6.1.2 (Vin 1.199).
\(^8\) yāvajīvika. Vinaya Texts ii.144, n. 4, says, “what this refers to is unknown to us.”
\(^9\) odana. Vin-a 822 says odana is sāḷī (rice), vihi (paddy, rice), yava (corn, barley), godhūma (wheat), kaṅgu (millet), varaka (a bean), kudrīsaka (perhaps rye, see Dialogues of the Buddha 3.70, n. 1)—i.e., the seven kinds of grain, dhaṅña. At Vin 4.264 these seven appear in definition of āmakadhaṅña, grain in its raw, uncooked state. Cf. DN-a 78, BD 1.83, n. 4. Vin-a 822 defines all these grains.
made with flour,¹ barley-meal,² fish, meat. If he accepts, thinking, ‘I will eat, I will partake of,’ there is an offence of wrong-doing. For every mouthful there is an offence of expiation.

If he thinks that it is not left over when it is not left over (and) eats or partakes of solid food or soft food, there is an offence of expiation. If he is in doubt as to whether it is not left over ... If he thinks that it is left over when it is not left over ... an offence of expiation. If he accepts for the sake of nutriment (food to be eaten) during a watch of the night, during seven days, during life, there is an offence of wrong-doing. For every mouthful there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it is not left over when it is left over, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether it is left over, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it is left over when it is left over, there is no offence.

There is no offence³ if, having caused it to be made left over, he eats; if, having caused it to be made left over, he accepts it, thinking: “I will eat”; if he goes away, conveying it for the sake of another; if he eats the remainder of an ill (monk’s meal); if, when there is a reason,⁴ he makes use of (food to be eaten) during a watch of the night, during seven days, during life; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

The Fifth

¹ kummāsa. Vin-a 823 says that it is yavehi katakkumāso, a junket made with barley; see yava in previous note. ² sattu, see above, BD 2.322, n. 4. ³ Cf. Bu-Pc 36 below, BD 2.334. ⁴ sati paccaye. Vin-a 831 says that if he is thirsty and makes use of the food to be eaten during the periods mentioned above, for the sake of slaking his thirst, or if he has a pain that could be eased, and uses these foods for that purpose, there is no offence.
... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time two monks were travelling to Sāvatthī along a high-road in the Kosalan districts. One monk indulged in bad habits; the second monk said to this monk: “Your reverence, do not do that, it is not allowable.” He grumbled at him.¹ Then these monks arrived at Sāvatthī. Now at that time food for the Order was (prepared) by a certain guild² in Sāvatthī. The second monk, having eaten, came to be satisfied. The monk who grumbled,³ having gone to his relations, taking alms-food, approached that monk, and having approached he said to that monk:

“Do eat, your reverence.”

“No need, I am full, your reverence.”

“Your reverence, the alms-food is delicious, do eat.”

Then this monk, being pressed by that monk, ate that alms-food.

The monk who grumbled said to that monk:

Your reverence, you think that I should be advised (by you), when you, having eaten, being satisfied, eat soft food that is not left over?”

“Your reverence, should it not be spoken about?”

“Your reverence, should it not be inquired into?”

Then that monk told this matter to the monks. Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying:

“How can a monk, asking a monk who has eaten, who is satisfied, invite him (to take) soft food that is not left over?”

¹ To here = Vin 2.118, but where the story proceeds to a tragic ending. ² Cf. above, BD 2.160. ³ upanandha bhikkhu, explained by janita-upanāha, produced a grudge, ill-will, Vin-a 831.
“Is it true, as is said, that you, monk, asking a monk ... soft food that is not left over?”
“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked him, saying:
“How can you, foolish man, asking a monk who has eaten, who is satisfied, invite him (to take) soft food that is not left over? It is not, foolish man, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk, asking a monk who has eaten, who is satisfied, should invite him (to take) solid food or soft food that is not left over, saying: ‘Now, monk, eat or partake of,’ knowing, desiring to find fault with, in the eating there is an offence of expiation.”

___________

Whatever means: ... is monk to be understood in this case.

Monk means: another monk.

Having eaten means: ... (see Bu-Pc 35.3) ... this means what is not left over.

Solid food means: ... (see Bu-Pc 35.3) ... meat.

Asking, should invite means: he says, “Take just as much as you want.”

He knows means: either he knows by himself, or others tell him, or he tells him.

Desiring to find fault with means: if he asks (him), saying: ‘I will reprove him for this, I will remind him, I will blame him, I will make him think back, I will shame him,’ there is an offence of wrong-doing. If, at his bidding, he accepts, saying: ‘I will eat, I will partake of,’ there is an offence of wrong-doing. For every mouthful there is an offence of wrong-doing. At the end of the meal there is an offence of expiation.

---

¹ Above, BD 2.51, BD 2.323. ² Above, BD 2.327. ³ I.e., knowing by means of one of the three ways of knowing (see Old Commentary) that that monk is satisfied.

⁴ असाधानापेक्षा. Vin-a 831, desiring to arouse insult, rebuke, shame.

⁵ Above, BD 2.51, BD 2.324. ⁶ Above, BD 2.161, BD 2.297. ⁷ I.e., that monk.

⁸ maṅkum karoti, cf. above, BD 2.178.
If he thinks that he was satisfied when he was satisfied (and), asking him, invites him (to take) solid food or soft food that is not left over, there is an offence of expiation. If he is in doubt as to whether he was satisfied ... offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that he was not satisfied when he was satisfied ... is no offence.¹ If he asks him (to take) for the sake of nourishment (food to be eaten) during a watch of the night, during seven days, during life, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If, at his bidding, he accepts, saying: ‘I will eat, I will partake of,’ there is an offence of wrong-doing. For every mouthful there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that he was satisfied when he was not satisfied, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether he was not satisfied, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that he was not satisfied when he was not satisfied, there is no offence.

There is no offence² if, having caused it to be made left over, he gives it; if, having caused it to be made left over, he gives it, saying, “Eat”; if he gives it, saying: “Go away, conveying it for the sake of another”; if he gives the remainder of an ill (monk’s meal); if, when there is a reason, he gives (food to be eaten) during a watch of the night, during seven days, during life, saying, “Make use of it”; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

The Sixth

¹ Variant reading āpatti dukkātassa, see Vin 4.360. ² Cf. Bu-Pc 35, above, BD 2.331.
... at Rājagaha in the Bamboo Grove at the squirrels’ feeding-place. Now at that time, in Rājagaha there came to be a festival on a mountain top.¹ The group of seventeen monks went to see the festival on the mountain-top. People, seeing the group of seventeen monks, having bathed, having anointed themselves, having offered (them) (food), gave solid food. The group of seventeen monks, taking the solid food, having gone to the monastery, said to the group of six monks:

“Take, your reverences, eat solid food.”
“Where did your reverences obtain solid food?” they said.

The group of seventeen monks told this matter to the group of six monks.

“Then do you, your reverences, eat a meal at the wrong time?”²
“Yes, your reverences.”

The group of six monks looked down upon, criticised, spread it about, saying:

“How can the group of seventeen monks eat a meal at the wrong

¹ giraggasamajja. See on samajja interesting n. 4 at Dialogues of the Buddha 1.7, also Vinaya Texts iii.71. At Vin 2.107–108 the group of six monks went to see such a festival, at which there was singing, dancing, music: made a dukkaṭa offence. At Vin 4.267, when the group of six monks went, the offence incurred is a pācittiya. Word occurs again at Vin 2.150. In Vinaya the festival seems always to have been held on a mountain near Rājagaha. Cf. Ja 3.538, where it is mentioned as being held all over Jambudīpa. Vin-a 831 says that samajja (festival) is a high place on a mountain or a high festival on a mountain. Also that it was announced seven days beforehand, and held on level ground in the shadow of a mountain slope outside a city. See also Dictionary of Pali Proper Names. Samajja mentioned alone at Ja 1.394, Ja 3.541.

² vikāle. Cf. Bu-Pc 85.
time?" Then this group of six monks told this matter to the monks. Those who were modest monks looked down upon, criticised, spread it about, saying:

"How can the group of seventeen monks eat a meal at the wrong time?" These monks told this matter to the lord.

"Is it true, as is said, that you, monks, ate a meal at the wrong time?"

"It is true, lord."

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

"How can you, foolish men, eat a meal at the wrong time? It is not, foolish men, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

"Whatever monk should eat or partake of solid food or soft food at the wrong time, there is an offence of expiation."

___________

Whatever means: ... is monk to be understood in this case.
The wrong time means: after noon has passed until sunrise.³
Solid food means: ... Soft food means: ... meat. If he accepts it, thinking: “I will eat, I will partake of,” there is an offence of wrongdoing. For every mouthful there is an offence of expiation.

___________

¹ Buddhaghosa at Vin-a 832ff. enumerates various kinds of solid food under the following categories: roots, tubers, roots of lotuses, top sprouts, leaves, flowers, stones of fruits, eatables made from flour (piṭṭhakhā-daniya, cf. Vin 1.248, Vin 1.249, where this was allowed to monks), resins. ² vikāle, see Old Commentary, just below. At Vin 1.200 the five medicines are allowed to be used at the right time and at the wrong time. Also at Vin 1.200 regulations are laid down for receiving, cooking, mixing fat at the right time and at the wrong time. At Mil 266 it is said that a meal at the wrong time is not a sin in the eyes of the world, but in the Jina's teaching. The account of the Council of Vesālī (Vin 2.294ff.) affirms that the dvaṅgula-kappa (i.e., when the shadow has turned by two finger-breathths, Vin 2.300) is not allowable, because it violates the vikalābhōjana pācittiya —i.e., eating at the wrong time.

See the vivid description attributed to Udāyin, at MN i.448f., of his feelings at the successive injunctions for monks to give up day and evening meals, and his ultimate conviction of the lord’s wisdom in stopping alms-giving in the dark of the night. Cf. also MN i.124, MN i.473; and MN i.437, where Bhaddālī confessed that he had not been able to keep to the regimen of one meal a day. ³ Cf. Vin 4.166.
If he thinks that it is the wrong time when it is the wrong time (and) eats or partakes of solid food or soft food, there is an offence of expiation. If he is in doubt as to whether it is the wrong time ... If he thinks that it is the right time when it is the wrong time ... offence of expiation. If he accepts for the sake of nourishment (food to be eaten) during a watch of the night, during seven days, during life, there is an offence of wrong-doing. For every mouthful there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it is the wrong time when it is the right time, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether it is the right time, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it is the right time when it is the right time, there is no offence.

There is no offence¹ if, when there is a reason, he makes use of (food) to be eaten during a watch of the night, during seven days, during life; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

The Seventh

---
¹ Cf. above, BD 2.331, BD 2.334.
Monks’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 38

... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the venerable Belaṭṭhasīsa,¹ the preceptor of the venerable Ānanda, was staying in the jungle. He, having walked for alms-food, having conveyed boiled rice² to the monastery, having had it dried, laid it aside; when he came to need it for food, then moistening it with water, he ate it; after a long time he entered the village for alms-food. Monks spoke thus to the venerable Belaṭṭhasīsa: “How is it that you, your reverence, after a long time enter the village for alms-food?” Then the venerable Belaṭṭhasīsa told this matter to the monks. They said:

“But do you, your reverence, eat a meal that was stored³?”
“Yes, your reverences.” Those who were modest monks ...
“Is it true, as is said, that you, Belaṭṭhasīsa, ate a meal that was stored?”
“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked him, saying:
“How can you, Belaṭṭhasīsa, eat a meal that was stored? It is not, Belaṭṭhasīsa, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatsoever monk should eat or partake of solid food or soft food

---
¹ Vin-a 838 says he was the prominent great therā of the thousand jaṭilas, or matted hair ascetics. His verses given at Thag 16. In Commentary, on this (see Psalms of the Bretheren, p. 21) it is said that with these ascetics he was tamed by Gotama, and attained arahanship after the Utterance on Burning (Vin 1.35). He suffered from eczema, Vin 1.202, Vin 1.295. ² sukkhakūra; Vin-a 838 calls it asūpabyañjana odana, boiled rice without the curry and sauce. ³ sannidhikārakabhojana.
that was stored,¹ there is an offence of expiation.”

__________

Whatever means: ... is monk to be understood in this case. Stored means: accepted today, it becomes eaten the next day. Solid food means: ... soft food means: ... meat. If he accepts it, saying, “I will eat, I will partake of,” there is an offence of wrong-doing. For every mouthful there is an offence of expiation.

__________

If he thinks that it is stored when it is stored (and) eats or partakes of solid food or soft food, there is an offence of expiation. If he is in doubt as to whether it is stored ... If he thinks that it is not stored when it is stored ... expiation. If he accepts for the sake of nutriment food (to be eaten) during a watch of the night, during seven days, during life, there is an offence of wrong-doing. For every mouthful there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it is stored when it is not stored, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether it is not stored, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it is not stored when it is not stored, there is no offence.

__________

There is no offence if, having stored² (food) for the time being,³ he eats it in that time; if, having stored (food to be eaten) during a watch of the night, he eats it in a watch of the night⁴; if, having stored (food to be eaten during seven days, he eats it in seven days; if, when there is a reason, he uses (food to be eaten) during life⁵; if he is mad; if he is the first wrong-doer.

¹ Cf. rules against storing up medicines for more than seven days at Vin 1.209, Vin 3.251. It is said that an arahan cannot become one to use for sensual pleasure what is stored up, dn iii.235 = mn i.523, an iv.370. Cf. also sannidhiśā at dn i.6. In the Cūḷavagga account of the Council of Vesālī, Vin 2.294ff., it is called not allowable to carry about salt in a horn, so as to put salt on to what is not salted (Vin 2.300), as by so doing the “sannidhiśāraḥ kabhojanapācittiya” would be infringed (Vin 2.306). ² nidahītvā, or hoarding. ³ yāvakālika. Vin-a 839, it may be eaten until noon. Cf. above, bd 2.330, n.1. ⁴ Vin-a 839, it may be eaten until the last watch of the night. ⁵ Cf. Vin 1.251 on relations of right and wrong times for eating these foods.

761
The Eighth
Monks’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 39

... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks, having asked for sumptuous foods¹ for themselves,² ate them. People ... spread it about, saying:

“How can the recluses, sons of the Sakyans, having asked for sumptuous foods for themselves, eat them? Who is not fond of well-cooked things? Who does not like sweet things?”³ Monks heard these people who ... spread it about. Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying:

“How can this group of six monks, having asked for ... eat them?”

... “Is it true, as is said, that you, monks, having asked for ... ate them?”

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

“How can you, foolish men, having asked for ... eat them? It is not, foolish men, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

Whatever are sumptuous foods, that is to say, ghee, fresh butter, oil, honey, molasses,⁴ fish, meat, milk, curds—whatever monk, having asked for sumptuous foods such as these for himself, should eat them, there is an offence of expiation.”

And thus this rule of training for monks came to be laid down by the lord.

---

¹ paṇītabhojanāṇī ti uttamabhojanam, Vin-a 840. ² attano atthāya.
³ = Vin 2.196 = Vin 4.71. ⁴ The five standard medicines.
Now at that time monks became ill. Monks, enquiring after the ill ones, spoke thus to the ill monks:

“We hope that your reverences are better, we hope that you are keeping going.”

“Formerly, your reverences, we, having asked for sumptuous foods for ourselves, ate them. Therefore there came to be comfort for us. But now it is forbidden by the lord, and being scrupulous, we do not ask, therefore there comes to be no comfort for us.”¹

They told this matter to the lord. Then the lord, on this occasion,² having given reasoned talk, addressed the monks, saying:

“I allow you, monks, when a monk is ill, having asked for sumptuous foods for himself, to eat them. And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever are sumptuous foods, that is to say, ghee, fresh butter, oil, honey, molasses, fish, meat, milk, curds—whatever monk who is not ill, having asked for sumptuous foods such as these for himself, should eat them, there is an offence of expiation.”

Whatever are sumptuous foods³: ghee⁴ is called ghee from cows or ghee from she-goats or ghee from buffaloes, ghee from those whose meat is allowable.⁵ Fresh butter means fresh butter from just these. Oil means sesame oil, oil of mustard seeds, oil containing honey, oil of the castor-oil plant, oil from tallow. Honey means honey of bees. Molasses means what is produced from sugar-cane. Fish means it is called one that lives in water. Meat means the meat of those whose meat is allowable. Milk means milk of cows or milk of she-goats or milk of buffaloes, milk of those whose meat is allowable. Curds means curds from just these.

Whatever means: ... is monk to be understood in this case.

¹ Cf. above, BD 2.277; below, BD 2.399, BD 2.402. ² etasminiḥ pakaraṇe, “in this connection,” omitted here. ³ Vin-a 840 says that besides these (nine)—i.e., ghee and so on—sumptuous foods are also those prepared from the seven kinds of grain. Cf. Vinaya Texts ii.133, n. 3. ⁴ From here to “sugar-cane” = Vin 3.251. See above, BD 2.131. ⁵ Various kinds of meat which, if eaten, give rise to dukkaṭa offences are given at Vin 1.218f.
Sumptuous foods such as these means: sumptuous foods like these.

Not ill means: for whom there comes to be comfort without sumptuous foods. Ill means: for whom there does not come to be comfort without sumptuous foods. Not ill, asks for himself, for every request,¹ there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he accepts (alms) thinking, “I will eat on acquisition,” there is an offence of wrong-doing. For every mouthful, there is an offence of expiation.

If he thinks that he is not ill when he is not ill, (and) having asked for sumptuous foods for himself, eats them, there is an offence of expiation. If he is in doubt as to whether he is not ill ... If he thinks that he is ill when he is not ill ... expiation. If he thinks that he is not ill when he is ill, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether he is ill, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that he is ill when he is ill, there is no offence.

There is no offence if he is ill; if having become ill, having asked, one who is not ill eats (the alms); if he eats the remainder of an ill (monk’s meal),² if they belong to relations; if they are invited; if it is for the good of another; if it is by means of his own property; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

The Ninth

¹ payoge payoge; each time he asks there is an offence.
² Cf. above, BD 2.331.
Monks’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 40

Bu-Pc 40.1.1  BD 2.344

... at Vesālī in the Great Grove in the Hall of the Gabled Pillars. Now at that time a certain monk, wearing robes made entirely of rags, was staying in a cemetery. He did not want to accept gifts¹ from people. And himself taking (food) put down for the departed masters² in a cemetery and at the foot of a tree and on a threshold,³ he ate it. People ... spread it about, saying:

“How can this monk, himself taking (food) put down for our departed masters, eat it? This monk is strong,⁴ he is fat,⁵ for certain he eats meat (belonging to) people.”⁶

Monks heard these people who ... spread it about. Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying:

“How can a monk convey to his mouth⁷ nutriment not given?” ...

“Is it true, as is said, that you, monk, conveyed to your mouth nutriment not given?”

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked him, saying:

“How can you, foolish man, convey to your mouth nutriment not given? It is not, foolish man, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

¹ diyyamāna. ² ayyavosāṭitakāni. Vin-a 842 says ayyā are the ancestors who have done their time (here), and vosāṭitakāni are the solid and soft foods put down in cemeteries and so on for these by their relations. ³ ummāre; cf. Vin 4.100, Vin 4.160. ⁴ thero = thiro ghanabaddho, Vin-a 842. ⁵ vadhara = thūla, Vin-a 842, reading vaṭhara. ⁶ Meat is a “soft food,” cf. above, BD 2.330, and bhuñjati is the verb technically associated with it. Here we get manussamaṁsaṁ khādati. At Vin 1.218 manussamaṁsa is combined with paribhuñjati, and certainly means human flesh. ⁷ mukhadvādra, the door of the face.
“Whatever monk should convey to his mouth nutriment not given, there is an offence of expiation.”

And thus this rule of training for monks came to be laid down by the lord.

Now at that time monks were scrupulous in regard to water for cleansing the teeth.¹ They told this matter to the lord. He said:

“I allow you, monks, yourselves having taken water for cleansing the teeth, to partake of it. And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatsoever monk should convey to his mouth nutriment not given, except water for cleansing the teeth, there is an offence of expiation.”

___________

Whatever means: ... is monk to be understood in this case.
Not given means: it is called not accepted.²
Given means: if in giving by means of the body or by means of something attached to the body³ or by means of something that may be cast,⁴ standing within a reach of the hand, if he accepts by means of the body or by means of something attached to the body,⁵ this is called given.

Nutriment means: setting aside water for cleansing the teeth, whatever is fit to eat, this is called nutriment.
Except water for cleansing the teeth means: setting aside water for cleansing the teeth.

If he takes it, thinking: ‘I will eat, I will partake of,’ there is an offence of wrong-doing. For every mouthful there is an offence of expiation.

___________

If he thinks that it is not accepted when it is not accepted (and)

¹ udakadantapona, also a tooth-cleaner. Vinaya Texts i.40 takes this compound as “water and a tooth-cleaner.” ² Vin-a 843 points out that in Bu-Pj 2, ‘not given’ means not appropriated from others. ³ E.g., a spoon, Vin-a 843. ⁴ Cf. BD 1.208. ⁵ E.g., a bowl, Vin-a 843.
conveys to his mouth nutriment that is not given, except water for cleansing the teeth, there is an offence of expiation. If he is in doubt as to whether it is not accepted ... If he thinks that it is accepted when it is not accepted ... offence of expiation. If he thinks that it is not accepted when it is accepted, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether it is accepted, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it is accepted when it is accepted, there is no offence.

There is no offence in regard to water for cleansing the teeth; if himself, having taken the four foul things, he makes use of them when there is a reason (and if) there is no one to make them allowable; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

The Tenth

THIS IS ITS KEY

A meal, a joint (meal), an out-of-turn (meal), a cake, and two on having eaten, being satisfied, At the wrong time, storing, milk, with water for cleansing the teeth—these ten.

The Fourth Division: that on Food

---

1 cattāri mahāvikatāni. These are given at Vin 1.206 as remedies for a monk who was bitten by a snake. Further said that these things might be accepted sati kappiyakārake (if there is anyone there who, by offering a thing, makes that thing kappiya, allowable), but if there is no one there to offer and hence to make allowable, then a monk may take these things himself.

2 Again, cf. Vin 1.206, where it is said, anujānāmi bhikkhave sati kappiyakārake patīgagāpetuṁ asati kappiyakārake sāmaṁ gahetvā paribhuṅjītun ti, I allow, monks, (these things) to be accepted if there is anyone there to make them allowable; if there is no one there to make them allowable, (I allow a monk) himself taking them, to make use of them.

3 paraṁ here.
Monks’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 41

... at Vesālī in the Great Grove in the Hall of the Gabled Pillars. Now at that time there came to be abundant¹ solid food for the Order. Then the venerable Ānanda told this matter to the lord. He said:

“Well, Ānanda, give the cakes² to those who eat scraps of food.”³

“Very well, lord,” and the venerable Ānanda, having answered the lord, having made those who eat scraps of food sit down one after the other,⁴ giving a cake to each, gave two cakes to a certain female wanderer, thinking that they were one. Neighbouring female wanderers spoke thus to this female wanderer:

“This recluse is your lover.”

“This recluse is not my lover; he gave two cakes, thinking that they were one.”

A second time ... A third time did the venerable Ānanda, giving a cake to each one, give two cakes, thinking that they were one, to this female wanderer. Neighbouring female wanderers spoke thus to this female wanderer: ...

“This recluse is not my lover; he gave two cakes, thinking that they were one.”

Saying, “The lover is not a lover,” they quarrelled.

Then a certain Naked Ascetic went to a distribution of food. A certain monk, mixing cooked rice with a quantity of ghee, gave a large alms-meal to that Naked Ascetic. Then the Naked Ascetic, taking that alms-meal, went away. A certain Naked Ascetic said to that Naked Ascetic:

¹ uśsanna. At Vin 1.285 said of robes; at Bu-Pc 47 of medicines. ² pūvaṁ, or “sweet-meats,” see above, BD 2.321. ³ vighāsādda, not Sakyan monks who should not eat what is left over, see above, BD 2.328. Word occurs at Ja 1.348, Ja 2.96, Ja 3.191. ⁴ paṭipāṭiyā, successively, in order.

“Where, your reverence, was an alms-meal obtained by you?”

“It was obtained, your reverence, at a distribution of food (made) by a shaven householder¹ of that recluse Gotama.”

Lay followers heard this talk of those Naked Ascetics. Then these lay followers approached the lord, and having approached, having greeted the lord, they sat down at a respectful distance. As they were sitting down at a respectful distance, these lay followers spoke thus to the lord:

“Lord, these adherents of other sects desire blame for the enlightened one, they desire blame for dhamma, they desire blame for the Order. It were well, lord, that the masters did not give to the adherents of other sects with their (own) hand(s).”

Then the lord gladdened ... delighted these lay followers with dhamma-talk. Then these lay followers, having been gladdened ... delighted by the lord with dhamma-talk, rising from (their) seats, having greeted the lord, departed, keeping their right sides towards him. Then the lord, on this occasion, having given reasoned talk, addressed the monks, saying:

“On account of this, monks, I will lay down a rule of training for monks, founded on ten reasons: for the excellence of the Order, for the comfort of the Order ... for establishing what is dhamma indeed, for following the rules of restraint.² And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk should give with his own hand solid food or soft food to a naked ascetic³ or to a wanderer or to a female wanderer, there is an offence of expiation.”

Whatever means: ... is monk to be understood in this case.

¹ muṇḍagakapati, clearly a term of disparagement. It may be in apposition to “that recluse Gotama.”

² = Vin 3.21 (BD 1.37f.).

³ Here acelaka, previously ājīvaka. See BD 2, Introduction, p. xiii, n. 2.
Naked ascetic\(^1\) means: whoever being naked has reached (the stage of) a wanderer.\(^2\)

Wanderer means: setting aside monk and novice, whoever has reached (the stage of) a wanderer.\(^3\)

Female wanderer means: setting aside nun and female probationer and female novice, whoever has reached (the stage of) a female wanderer.\(^4\)

Solid food means: setting aside the five (kinds of) meals (and) water for cleansing the teeth, what remains is called solid food.

Soft food means: the five (kinds of) meals: cooked rice, food made with flour, barley-meal, fish, meat.\(^5\)

Should give means: if he gives by means of the body or by means of something attached to the body or by means of something that may be cast, there is an offence of expiation.

If he thinks that he is an adherent of another sect when he is an adherent of another sect, (and) gives with his (own) hand solid food or soft food, there is an offence of expiation. If he is in doubt as to whether he is an adherent of another sect ... If he thinks that he is not an adherent of another sect when he is an adherent of another sect ... of expiation. If he gives water for cleansing the teeth, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that he is an adherent of another sect when he is not an adherent of another sect, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether he is not an adherent of another sect, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that he is not an adherent of another sect when he is not an adherent of another sect, there is no offence.

There is no offence if he gets someone to give,\(^6\) (but) does not

---

\(^1\) Here acelaka, previously ājīvaka. See Introduction, BD 2.xiii, n. 2.
\(^2\) paribbājakasamāpanna. This definition = Vin 4.285.
\(^3\) = Vin 4.285.
\(^4\) Vin 4.285
\(^5\) = Vin 4.83.
\(^6\) dāpeti—e.g., one who is not ordained—Vin-a 855.
(himself) give; if he gives depositing (it) near\(^1\); if he gives ointment for external (use)\(^2\); if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.\(^3\)

The First

\(^1\) I.e., not giving “with his own hand,” but putting food on the ground or in his bowl, and inviting the recipient to take from there.
\(^2\) bāhirālepaṁ; offences are incurred by giving a member of another sect things to eat or drink, even water for washing the teeth. Ālepa occurs at Vin 1.274.
\(^3\) = Vin 4.303.
... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, spoke thus to a monk, who shared (his) brother’s cell:

“Come, your reverence, we will enter the village for alms-food.” Without having had (alms-food) given to him, he dismissed him, saying: “Go away, your reverence. Neither talking nor sitting down with you comes to be a comfort for me; either talking or sitting down alone comes to be a comfort for me.”

Then that monk, when the meal-time was near, was not able to walk for alms, and returning he did not achieve participation in the meal; he became famished.¹ Then that monk, having gone to the monastery, told this matter to the monks. Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying: “How can the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, saying to a monk, ‘Come, your reverence, we will go into the village for alms-food,’ without having had (alms-food) given to him, dismiss him ...?” ...

“Is it true, as is said, that you, Upananda, saying to a monk, ‘Come ...’ dismiss him? It is not, foolish man, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk, saying to a monk, ‘Come, your reverence, we will go into a village or little town² for alms-food,’ either causing to be given or not causing to be given (alms-food) to him, should dismiss him, saying, ‘Go away, your reverence, neither talking nor sitting down with you comes to be a comfort for me; either

---
¹ Cf. Vin 4.70, Vin 4.175.
² nigama; cf. above, BD 2.63, n. 2.
talking or sitting down alone comes to be a comfort for me’—if doing it for just this object, not for another, there is an offence of expiation.”

Whatever means: ... is monk to be understood in this case.
Monk means: another monk.
Come, your reverence, to a village or little town means: a village and a little town and a town, a village as well as little town.
Causing to be given (alms-food) to him means: causing conjey or solid food or soft food to be given.
Not causing to be given means: not causing anything to be given.
Should dismiss means: if desiring to laugh, desiring to sport together with a woman, if desiring to sit down in private, if desiring to indulge in bad habits, he speaks thus: ‘Go away, your reverence, neither talking ... sitting down alone comes to be a comfort for me,’ (and) dismisses him, there is an offence of wrong-doing. Dismissing him from sight or from hearing is an offence of wrong-doing. When he is dismissed, there is an offence of expiation.
If doing it for just this object, not for another means: there comes to be no other object whatever (for which) to dismiss him.

If he thinks that he is ordained when he is ordained, (and) dismisses him, there is an offence of expiation. If he is in doubt as to whether he is ordained ... If he thinks that he is not ordained when he is ordained, (and) dismisses him, there is an offence of expiation. If he finds fault with another, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he dismisses one who is not ordained, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he finds fault with another, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that he is ordained when he is not ordained there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether he is not ordained, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that he is not ordained when he is not ordained, there is an offence of wrong-doing.¹

¹ = above, BD 2.248; Vin 4.149, Vin 4.150. ² uyyojeti. ³ dassanāpācāraṁ (literally the precincts of sight) vijahantassa; cf. below, BD 2.376. ⁴ kalisāsananā āropeti. ⁵ kalisāsananā āropeti.

There is no offence if he dismisses him, saying: ‘Together we will not both keep going’²; if, seeing costly goods, he dismisses him, saying, ‘It will produce a state of greed’³; if, seeing a woman, he dismisses him, saying, ‘She will produce dissatisfaction’; if he dismisses him, saying, ‘Take back coney or solid food or soft food for one who is ill, or for one who is left behind,⁴ or for a guardian of the dwelling-place’; if, not desiring to indulge in bad habits, he dismisses him if it ought to be done; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

The Second

¹ Most probably error for “no offence.” ² yāpeti, or “We will not both go together.” ³ lobhadhamma. ⁴ ohiyyaka, as e.g. on guard at a vihāra (though this notion is covered by next word); cf. Vin 3.208.
Monks’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 43

... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, going to a friend’s house, sat down¹ in a sleeping-room² together with his wife. Then that man approached the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, and having approached, having greeted the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, he sat down at a respectful distance. As he was sitting down at a respectful distance, that man spoke thus to his wife:

“Give alms-food to the master.”

Then that woman gave alms-food to the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans. Then that man spoke thus to the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans:

“You may go, honoured sir, inasmuch as alms-food has been given to the master.”

Then that woman, observing, ‘This man is obsessed,’³ spoke thus to the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans:

“Sit down, honoured sir, do not go away.”

A second time that man ... A third time that man spoke thus to the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans:

“You may go, honoured sir, inasmuch as alms-food has been given to the master.”

A third time did that woman say to the venerable Upananda, the ¹ nisajjam kappeti. ² sayanighara; a definition is given at Vin 4.160. Cf. Vin 1.140. ³ pariyuṭṭhita. Cf. Vin 4.229. Also DN ii.104; MN 1.433; Vin 2.289 (where with citta). Vin-a 856 says rāgapariyuṭṭhito methunādhippayo, obsessed (or possessed) by passion, desiring intercourse.

son of the Sakyans:

“Sit down, honoured sir, do not go away.” Then that man, going out, made monks look down upon¹ (Upananda), saying:

“Honoured sirs, this master Upananda is sitting in the sleeping-room together with my wife; he, being dismissed by me, does not wish to go. We are very busy, there is much to be done.”

Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying:

“How can the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, intruding upon² a family with food,³ sit down?” ...

“Is it true, as is said, that you, Upananda, intruding upon ... sat down?”

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked him, saying: “How can you, foolish man, intruding ... sit down? It is not, foolish man, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk, intruding upon a family with food, should sit down, there is an offence of expiation.”

---

Whatever means: ... is monk to be understood in this case.
Family with food means: there is a woman and also a man, and both the woman and the man are not gone out, both are not without passion.
Intruding means: forcing a way into.⁴

¹ ujjhāpeti. Cf. above, BD 2.235. ² anupakhajja. Cf. above, BD 2.247, and note. ³ sabhojane kule. Vinaya Texts i.41, “into a house where a meal is going on.” Editor, Vinaya Texts i.41, n. 3, remarks that the Vin-a, doubtless to justify the Old Commentary’s definition (see below) with its “suggested implication,” makes sabhojanaṁ equal to saha ubhohi jahēhi(!); or, in the alternative, to sabhogaṁ, since the wife is the bhoga (property) “of a man still given to passion, and the husband the bhoga of a wife ...; it is just possible we should translate, ‘a household still given to pleasure” (cf. Kd 18.5.1), or ‘fond of good food’ (Mil 76).” Huber, J.Bu-As., Nov, “dans une maison ou on ‘mange.’” Pali-English Dictionary suggests very tentatively “sharing food (?).” Sabhojana at Snp 102 means “with food.” At Vin 2.216 (= Kd 18.5.2), a monk who has entered a dwelling for food should cover up his bowl with his robe when he has received the alms, and turn away. ⁴ =above, BD 2.248.
Should sit down means: if he sits down in a large house, having left (the space of) a reach of the hand\(^1\) from door-posts and lintel,\(^2\) there is an offence of expiation; if he sits down in a small house, having gone beyond the beam,\(^3\) there is an offence of expiation.

----------

If he thinks that it is a sleeping-room when it is a sleeping-room (and), intruding upon a family with food, sits down, there is an offence of expiation. If he is in doubt as to whether it is a sleeping-room ... If he thinks that it is not a sleeping-room when it is a sleeping-room ... an offence of expiation. If he thinks that it is a sleeping-room when it is not a sleeping-room, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether it is not a sleeping-room, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it is not a sleeping-room when it is not a sleeping-room, there is no offence.

----------

There is no offence if he sits down in a large house, not having left (the space of) a reach of the hand from door-posts and lintel; if he sits down in a small house, not having gone beyond the beam; if there comes to be a second monk; if both have gone out\(^4\); if both are without passion; if it is not in a sleeping-room; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

The Third

\(^1\) = Vin 4.269.  \(^2\) piṭṭhasaṅghāta. Cf. above, BD 2.258, and Vin 2.120, and Vinaya Texts iii.105, n. 2.  \(^3\) piṭṭhivaṁsa. Vin-a 856 says that if such a sleeping-room is among four large rooms, then piṭṭhivaṁsaṁ atikkamitvā means going beyond the middle (of the house), iminā majjhātikkamaṁ dasseti. The word piṭṭhivaṁsa occurs at Dhp-a 1.52 (translated, Buddhist Legends 1.174, as “the central rafter of the hut”) and at MN-a 3.167.  \(^4\) = Vin 4.161.
... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, having gone to the house of a friend, sat down in a private place on a secluded seat together with his wife. Then that man looked down upon, criticised, spread it about, saying: “How can master Upananda sit down in a private place on a secluded seat together with my wife?”

Monks heard that man who ... spread it about. Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying: “How can the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, sit down in a private place on a secluded seat together with a woman?”

... “Is it true, as is said, that you, Upananda, sat down ... with a woman?”

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked him, saying: “How can you, foolish man, sit down ... with a woman? Foolish man, it is not for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth: “Whatever monk should sit down in a private place on a secluded seat together with a woman, there is an offence of expiation.”¹

Whatever means: ... is monk to be understood in this case.

¹ Cf. the aniyatas, BD 1.330ff.; also Bu-Pc 30 (where monks are forbidden to sit down in private with a nun), and Bu-Pc 45.
THE BOOK OF THE DISCIPLINE

Woman¹ means: a human woman, not a female yakka, not a female departed one, not a female animal, even a girl born this very day, much more an older one.

Together with means: together.

A private place means: private from the eye, private from the ear. Private from the eye means: if covering the eye, or raising the eyebrow, or raising the head, he is unable to see. Private from the ear means: it is impossible to hear ordinary talk.²

A secluded seat means: it is secluded by a wall built of wattle and daub or by a door or by a screen or by a screen-wall or by a tree or by a pillar or by a sack or by anything whatever.

Should sit down means: if a woman is sitting and a monk comes to be sitting or lying down close (to her), there is an offence of expiation; if a monk is sitting and a woman comes to be sitting or lying down close (to him), there is an offence of expiation. Or if both are sitting or if both are lying down, there is an offence of expiation.

______________

If he thinks that it is a woman³ when it is a woman (and) sits down in a private place on a secluded seat, there is an offence of expiation. If he is in doubt as to whether it is a woman ... If he thinks that it is not a woman when it is a woman ... offence of expiation. If he sits down in a private place on a secluded seat with a female yakha or with a female departed one or with a eunuch or with an animal in woman’s form, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it is a woman when it is not a woman, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether it is not a woman, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it is not a woman when it is not a woman, there is no offence.

______________

There is no offence if some learned friend comes to be (present); if he stands, does not sit; if he is not desirous of a private place; if

---

1 From here to end Bu-Pc 44.2.2, cf. BD 1.332.
2 Cf. above, BD 2.301.
3 Cf. above, BD 2.202, BD 2.206.
he sits down thinking about something else; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.¹

The Fourth

¹ Cf. above, BD 2.301, and Vin 4.269.
... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, having gone to the house of a friend, sat down in a private place together with his wife, the one with the other. Then that man ... spread it about, saying:

“How can master Upananda sit down in a private place together with a woman, the one with the other?”

Monks heard this man who ... spread it about. Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saving:

“How can the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, sit down in a private place together with a woman, the one with the other?” ...

“Is it true, as is said, that you, Upananda, sit down ... the one with the other?”

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked him, saying:

“How can you, foolish man, sit down ... the one with the other? It is not, foolish man, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ...

And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk should sit down in a private place together with a woman, the one with the other, there is an offence of expiation.”

Whatever means: ... is monk to be understood in this case.

¹ Cf. the aniyatas, BD 130off., and Bu-Pc 30, Bu-Pc 44, above.
Woman means: a human woman, not a female yakkha, not a female departed one, not a female animal, one who is learned, competent to know good speech and bad speech, what is lewd and what is not lewd.¹

Together with means: together.²

The one with, the other means: there is a monk and also a woman.³

A private place means: ... private from the eye ... ordinary talk.⁴

Should sit down means: ... (see Bu-Pc 44.2.1. Instead of in a private place on a secluded seat read in a private place, the one with the other) ... if he is the first wrong-doer.

The Fifth

---

¹ = BD 1.215f., BD 1.337. ² = BD 1.332, BD 1.337; and above, BD 2.301, BD 2.358.
³ = BD 1.332. ⁴ = BD 1.332, and above, BD 2.301, BD 2.358.
... at Rājagaha in the Bamboo Grove at the squirrels’ feeding-place. Now at that time the family who supported the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, invited the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, to a meal, and they invited other monks to the meal. Now at that time the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, used to visit families before the meal. Then these monks said to these people:

“Sirs, give the meal.”

“Wait, honoured sirs, until master Upananda comes.” A second time these monks ... A third time these monks said to these people:

“How can the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, being invited, and being provided with a meal, call upon families before the meal?” ...
“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked him, saying:

“How can you, foolish man, being invited ... before the meal? It is not, foolish man, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk, being invited, and being (provided) with a meal, should call upon families before the meal, there is an offence of expiation.”

And thus this rule of training for monks came to be laid down by the lord.

Now at that time the family who supported the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, sent solid food for the Order, saying:

“Pointing it out as for master Upananda, it should be given to the Order.” Now at that time the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, had entered the village for alms-food. Then these people, having gone to the monastery, asked the monks: “Where, honoured sirs, is master Upananda?”

“Sirs, this venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, has entered the village for alms-food.”

Honoured sirs, pointing out this solid food as for master Upananda, it should be given to the Order.”

They told this matter to the lord. Then the lord on this occasion, in this connection, having given reasoned talk, addressed the monks, saying:

“Well then, monks, having accepted it, put it aside until Upananda comes back.”

Then the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, thinking, “It is forbidden by the lord to call upon families before a meal,” having visited families after a meal, returned during the day. The solid food was left over. Those who were modest monks ... spread it about.

¹ I.e., for the later part of it, after the meal-time. To here from beginning of this par. cf. Vin 1.213f., but this passage continues differently, ending in an exception to Bu-Pc 35.
saying:
“How can the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, call on families after a meal?”...

“Is it true, as is said, that you, Upananda, called on families after a meal?”
“It is true, lord.”
The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked him, saying:
“How can you, foolish man, call on families after a meal? It is not, foolish man, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:
“Whatever monk, being invited, and being (provided) with a meal, should call upon families before a meal or after a meal, there is an offence of expiation.”

And thus this rule of training for monks came to be laid down by the lord.

Now at that time scrupulous monks,¹ at the time of giving robes, did not visit families; little robe-material accrued. They told this matter to the lord. He said:
“I allow you, monks, at the time of giving robes, to visit families. And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:
“Whatever monk, being invited, and being (provided) with a meal, should call upon families before a meal or after a meal, except at the right time, there is an offence of expiation. In this case this is the right time: the time of giving robes; this is the right time in this case.”² And thus this rule of training for monks came to be laid down by the lord.

Now at that time monks³ were making robes and they came to be in need of needles and thread and scissors. The monks, being scrupulous, did not visit families. They told this matter to the lord. He said:

1 Khādaniyaṁ uśādiyithe. Cf. uśādiyisu at Vin 2.167, and Vinaya Texts iii.202, n. 4. ² Cf. above, BD 2.307, BD 2.318. ³ At Vin 1.254 one of the five things allowed to monks after the kathina-cloth has been made is going to houses of people who have not invited them.

“I allow you, monks, at the time of making robes, to visit families. And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk, being invited and being (provided) with a meal, should call upon families before a meal or after a meal, except at the right time, there is an offence of expiation. In this case this is the right time: the time of giving robes, the time of making robes; this is the right time in this case.”

And thus this rule of training for monks came to be laid down by the lord.

Now at that time monks became ill and came to be in need of medicines. The monks, being scrupulous, did not visit families...

“I allow you, monks, to visit families, having asked (for permission) if a monk be there.¹ And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk, being invited and being (provided) with a meal, not having asked (for permission) if a monk is there, should call upon families before a meal or after a meal, except at a right time, there is an offence of expiation. In this case a right time is the time of giving robes, the time of making robes²; this is the right time in this case.”

Whatever means: ... is monk to be understood in this case.

Invited means: invited to any one meal of the five (kinds of) meals.³

¹ santāṁ bhikkhuṁ, āpucchā. Cf. Vin. 4.165, where, in Bu-Pc 75, āpucchā and anāpucchā occur first without the phrase santāṁ bhikkhuṁ and then with it. Vinaya Texts i.42 has “without having previously spoken about it to a bhikkhu, if there is one there,” and Vinaya Texts i.53 has “without having informed a bhikkhu if one is present.” Cf. also anāpucchā in Bu-Pc 14, Vin. 4.39, translated at Vinaya Texts i.34, “without saying anything to anybody.” ² Time of illness seems to be overlooked here. Cf. above, BD 2.308, BD 2.318. ³ Cf. above, BD 2.51, BD 2.324, BD 2.333. The five are given at BD 2.330.
With a meal means: that to which he is invited with a meal.

If a monk be there means: he is able to enter having asked (for permission).

If a monk be not there means: he is unable to enter having asked (for permission).

Before the meal means: invited to it, he is one who has not eaten it.

After the meal means: invited to it, even (as much as) becomes eaten with a blade of grass.¹

A family means: there are four (kinds of) families: a noble family, a brahmin family, a merchant family, a low-caste family.²

Should call on families means: there is an offence of wrong-doing for entering the precincts of the house of another. If he makes the first foot cross the threshold,³ there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he makes the second foot cross, there is an offence of expiation.⁴

Except at a right time means: setting aside a right time.

Time of giving robes means: the last month of the rainy, season when the kaṭhina cloth is not (formally) made, the five months when the kaṭhina cloth is (formally) made.⁵

Time of making robes means: when the robes are being made.

---

¹ Cf. above, BD 2.328. ² Cf. BD 1.325; Vin 4.80, Vin 4.272. ³ ummāra. At Vin 4.160 indakhila is defined as the threshold (ummādra) of the sleeping-room. ⁴ = Vin 4.160. ⁵ Cf. above, BD 2.311; Vin 4.286.
There is no offence, if at the right time, he enters having asked (for permission) if a monk be there; if he enters not having asked (for permission) if a monk be not there; if the way is through the house of another; if the way is through the precincts of a house; if he is going into a village; if he is going to the nuns’ quarters; if he is going to a sleeping-place of adherents of other sects; if he is going on his way back; if he is going to a house for food; if there are accidents; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

\textit{The Sixth}

---

1 Vin-a 857 says that if his dwelling-place is inside a village and he is going to it.
2 \textit{titthiyaseyyā}. Commentary does not explain.
3 \textit{paṭikkamanāṁ gacchati}.
4 \textit{bhattiyaṭṭhara}. Vin-a 857 says, “the house where he is invited or the house of the donors of ticket-food and so on.”
5 Cf. Vin 4.166.
... among the Sakyans in Kapilavatthu at the Banyan monastery. Now at that time Mahānāma the Sakyan¹ had abundant medicine. Then Mahānāma the Sakyan approached the lord, and having approached, having greeted the lord, he sat down at a respectful distance. As he was sitting down at a respectful distance, Mahānāma the Sakyan spoke thus to the lord:

“I want, lord, to invite the Order (to accept) medicine for four months.”

“Very good, Mahānāma; well then, you, Mahānāma, invite the Order (to accept) medicine for four months.”

The monks, being scrupulous, did not consent. They told this matter to the lord. He said:

“I allow you, monks, to accept² an invitation (to accept) a requisite for four months.”

Then monks asked Mahānāma the Sakyan for a little medicine, (although) Mahānāma the Sakyan had abundant medicine as before.³ A second time did Mahānāma the Sakyan approach the lord ... spoke thus to the lord:

“I want, lord, to invite the Order (to accept) medicine for an additional four months.”

¹ Mahānāma Sakka, a cousin of Gotama, and belonging to a Sakyan family of Kapilavatthu. He had not entered the Order, or he would have been called Sakyanputtiya, literally son of the Sakyan(s), a distinction which should therefore be preserved in translations. Referred to at AN i.26 as an upāsaka, chief of those who give choice things. Cf. AN-a 1.393. ² sāditūṁ, to consent to, to permit. ³ tath’eva.
“Very good, Mahānāma; well then, you, Mahānāma, invite the Order (to accept) medicine for an additional four months.”

Then monks asked Mahānāma the Sakyan for just a little medicine, (although) Mahānāma the Sakyan had abundant medicine as before. A third time did Mahānāma the Sakyan approach the lord and spoke thus to the lord:

“I want, lord, to invite the Order (to accept) medicine for life.”

“Very good, Mahānāma; well then, you, Mahānāma, invite the Order (to accept) medicine for life.”

The monks, being scrupulous, did not consent. They told this matter to the lord. He said:

“I allow you, monks, to accept a permanent invitation.”

Now at that time the group of six monks had become improperly dressed, improperly clothed, not decently attired. Mahānāma the Sakyan became a speaker:

“Why are you, honoured sirs, improperly dressed, improperly clothed, not decently attired? On going forth, should not one become properly dressed, properly clothed, decently attired?”

1 punapavāraṇā, or a further, additional offer or invitation. Cf. AN–a 1.393, where, after a year, the teacher does not consent to Mahānāma’s giving for any further period. ² yeva. ³ One of the boons conferred on Visākhā was that she might give medicines for the sick for life, Vin 1.292ff. ⁴ nippavāraṇā. ⁵ dunnivatthā duppārūtā anākappasampannā. Cf. Vin 1.44, where monks went for alms like this, and Vin 5.212, where they went to the refectory like this, and spread out their outer cloaks (saṅghāṭi). See Vinaya Texts i.152, Vinaya Texts iii.285 for slightly different translations, and see above, BD 2.32, n. 3, n. 4, on nivatthā and pāruta. Rules for going properly clad and with decent deportment into houses for alms are given at Vin 2.213, Vin 2.215, and Bu–Sk 31–Bu–Sk 55 = Vin 4.191ff. The word ākappasampanna occurs at AN iii.78, “it is hard to find one gone forth when old who is ākappā.” ⁶ vattā hoti. Cf. vattar at AN i.32, AN v.79; DN i.139.
it occurred to the group of six monks: “Now, in what way could we bring shame\(^1\) to Mahānāma the Sakyan?” Then it occurred to the group of six monks: “The Order is invited by Mahānāma the Sakyan (to accept) medicine. Come, your reverences, let us ask Mahānāma the Sakyan for ghee.” Then the group of six monks approached Mahānāma the Sakyan, and having approached they spoke thus to Mahānāma the Sakyan:

“Sir, we want a doṇa\(^2\) measure of ghee.”

“Honoured sirs, wait this day (only)\(^3\); people are going to the cattle-pen to get ghee; you may fetch it in the morning.”

A second time... A third time did the group of six monks speak thus: "... in the morning."

“Do you, sir, not give what you invited (us to accept) because you do not desire to give what you invited (us to accept)?”

Then Mahānāma the Sakyan looked down upon, criticised, spread it about, saying:

“How can these revered sirs, being told: ‘Wait this day (only), honoured sirs,’ not wait?”

Monks heard Mahānāma the Sakyan as he ... spread it about. Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying:

“How can this group of six monks being told by Mahānāma the Sakyan, ‘Wait this day (only), honoured sirs,’ not wait?” ...

“Is it true, as is said, that you, monks, being told ... did not wait?”

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

“How can you, foolish men, being told by Mahānāma the Sakyan ... not wait? It is not, foolish men, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“When a monk is not ill, an invitation (to accept) a requisite\(^4\) for four months may be accepted, unless there be a renewed invitation, unless there be a permanent invitation. If one should accept for longer than that, there is an offence of expiation.”

---

\(^1\) \textit{maṅkuṁ kareyyāma}. Cf. above, BD 2.178.
\(^2\) See BD 1.104, n. 2.
\(^3\) Cf. Vin 3.210f. = above, BD 2.64.
\(^4\) Or requisites.
When a monk is not ill, an invitation (to accept) a requisite for four months may be accepted means: an invitation (to accept) a requisite may be accepted by one who is ill.¹

And a renewed invitation may be accepted means: if he thinks, ‘When I become ill, then I will ask.’

And a permanent invitation may be accepted means: if he thinks, ‘When I become ill, then I will ask.’

If one should accept for longer than that means: there is an invitation limited to medicines, not limited to nights²; there is an invitation limited to nights, not limited to medicines; there is an invitation limited to medicines and limited to nights; there is an invitation neither limited to medicines nor limited to nights.

Limited to medicines means: if he says, “I invite (them to accept) just these medicines,” medicines come to be taken up.

Limited to nights means: if he says, “I invite (them to accept) on just these nights,” nights come to be taken up.

Limited to medicines and limited to nights means: if he says, “I invite (them to accept) just these medicines on just these nights,” medicines come to be taken up and nights come to be taken up.

Neither limited to medicines nor limited to nights means: there come to be medicines that are not taken up and there come to be nights that are not taken up.

In “limited to medicines,” if, setting aside those medicines which he came to be invited (to accept), he asks for other medicines, there is an offence of expiation. In “limited to nights,” if, setting aside those nights for which he came to be invited (to accept), he asks for other nights, there is an offence of expiation. In “limited to medicines and limited to nights,” if setting aside those medicines which he came to be invited (to accept), if setting aside those nights for which he came to be invited (to accept), he asks for other medicines for other nights, there is an offence of expiation. In “neither limited to medicines nor limited to nights” there is no offence.

¹ Vin-a 857 says, if at that time he is not ill, it (i.e., the invitation) should not be rejected; if he becomes ill, he says, ‘I will ask.’ ² bhesajjapariyantā na ratti pāriyantā. Cf. above, BD 2.220, āpattipariyantā na kulapariyantā. Cf. also Vin 2.59, āpattipariyantā ca rattipariyantā ca. Vinaya Texts ii.416 translates for the latter, “the duration of the times,” while Pali-English Dictionary gives “limitation of the probationary period.” Here the limitation to nights (the Indian way of saying “days”) seems to refer to the length of time or to particular nights for which the invitation would hold good.

_______________

Bu-Pc 47.2.2

If he asks for medicine that is not to be used as medicine,¹ there is an offence of expiation. If he asks for one medicine that may be used as a different medicine,² there is an offence of expiation. If he thinks that it is for longer than that when it is for longer than that (and) asks for medicine, there is an offence of expiation. If he is in doubt as to whether it is for longer than that ... If he thinks that it is not for longer than that when it is for longer than that ... offence of expiation. If he thinks that it is for longer than that when it is not for longer than that, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether it is not for longer than that, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it is not for longer than that when it is not for longer than that, there is no offence.

_______________

Bu-Pc 47.2.3

There is no offence if he asks for those medicines which he came to be invited (to accept); if he asks for those nights for which he came to be invited (to accept); if he asks, explaining, ‘Of those medicines which we were invited by you (to accept) we need this and that medicine’; if he asks, explaining, ‘Those nights for which we were invited by you have passed and we need medicine’; if they belong to relations; if they are invited; if it is for the sake of another; if it is by means of his own property; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

The Seventh

¹ Vin-a 858 says that if he can keep himself going on mixed food, it is not called “used as medicine.” ² Vin-a 858 says that if offered ghee he asks for oil, if offered an āḷhaka measure (he asks for) a doṇa measure.
Monks’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 48

... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time King Pasenadi of Kosala came to march out against an army.¹ The group of six monks went to see the army fighting.² Then King Pasenadi of Kosala saw the group of six monks coming from afar; on seeing them, sending for them, he spoke thus:

“Why do you, honoured sirs, come here?”

“Sire, we want to see³ your Majesty.”

“What, honoured sirs, is the good of seeing me since it is the battle you delight in?⁴ Should not the lord be seen?”

People ... spread it about, saying:

“How can these recluses, sons of the Sakyans, come to see an army fighting? For us it is not profitable and for us it is ill-gotten; such as we come with the army for the sake of livelihood, on account of child and wife.”

Monks heard these people who ... spread it about. Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying:

“How can this group of six monks go to see an army fighting?”

They told this matter to the lord...

“Is it true, as is said, that you, monks, went to see an army fighting?”

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

¹ senāya abbhuyyāto hoti. Vin-a 858, abbhuyyāto ti abhiuyyāto, parasenarīn abhimukho gamissāmi ti nagarato niggato ti atho,” the meaning is gone out from the town, thinking, ‘I will go forth towards the opposing army.’” Abbhuyyāta occurs at Vin.1342; mn i.124. ² uyyutta, striving. ³ daṭṭhukāma. Cf. Snp 685. ⁴ yuddhābhīhinandinā. Cf. Vin.1.73.
“How can you, foolish men, go to see an army fighting? It is not, foolish men, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

Whatever monk should go to see an army fighting, there is an offence of expiation.”

And thus this rule of training for monks came to be laid down by the lord.

Now at that time the uncle of a certain monk became ill in the army. He sent a messenger to that monk, saying: “I am indeed ill in the army, let the revered sir come. I want the revered sir to come.”

Then it occurred to that monk: “A rule of training laid down by the lord says: ‘There should be no going to see the army fighting,’ but my uncle is ill in the army. What line of conduct should be followed by me?” He told this matter to the lord. Then the lord on this occasion, in this connection, having given reasoned talk, addressed the monks, saying:

“I allow you, monks, to go to an army when there is sufficient reason for it.¹ And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk should go to see an army fighting, unless there is sufficient reason for it, there is an offence of expiation.”

Whatever means: ... is monk to be understood in this case.

Army fighting means: having gone out from the village, it comes to be camped or marched forth.² Army means elephants, horses, chariots, infantry.³ An elephant (has) twelve men,⁴ a horse (has) three men,⁵ a chariot (has) four men,⁶ the infantry (has) four men, hands on arrows.⁷

¹ tathārūpapaccayā. Cf. below, BD 2.399. ² payātā. ³ Cf. Ja 4.494. These four divisions of an army are fairly frequently alluded to in the Jātakas; see Index, under “Army,” to Cambridge translation. ⁴ Vin-a 838, four are mounted, two look after each foot. ⁵ Vin-a 858, one is mounted, two look after the feet. ⁶ Vin-a 858, one is the charioteer, one the warrior, two look after the linch-pins. ⁷ sarahatthā, meaning presumably that each unit of infantry consists of archers.
If he goes to see, there is an offence of wrong-doing. Standing where he sees, there is an offence of expiation. If, having dismissed from sight, he sees again, there is an offence of expiation.

Unless there is sufficient reason for it means: setting aside a sufficient reason for it.

If he thinks that there is fighting when there is fighting, (and) goes to see, unless there is sufficient reason for it, there is an offence of expiation. If he is in doubt as to whether there is fighting ... If he thinks that there is not fighting when there is fighting ... offence of expiation. If he goes to see one or other, there is an offence of wrong-doing. Standing where he sees, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If having dismissed from sight, he sees again, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that there is fighting when there is not fighting, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether there is not fighting, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that there is not fighting when there is not fighting, there is no offence.

There is no offence if, standing in the monastery, he sees; if it comes to a place where a monk is resting or to a place where he is sitting down or to a place where he is lying down; if he, going along the opposite road, sees it; if there is a sufficient reason for it; if there are accidents; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

The Eighth

---

1 dassanūpacāraṁ vijahitvā. Cf. above, BD 2.352. Vin-a 858 says, “if at a distance or down in a hollow he does not see, thinking, ‘Standing here, it is impossible to see,’ going to another place, there is a pācittiya in every act of seeing.”

2 ekamekaṁ. Vin-a 858, one or another of the four divisions of the army, elephants and so on.

3 Vin-a 858 says that one man mounted on an elephant and a man at one foot of an elephant means “not fighting”; also a king going to a pleasure or to a river is “not fighting.”

4 Cf. above, BD 2.158, BD 2.290.
... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks, having gone to the army as there was business, stayed with the army more than three nights. People ... spread it about, saying:

“How can the recluses, sons of the Sakyans, stay with the army? For us it is not profitable and for us it is ill-gotten; such as we stop\(^1\) with the army for the sake of livelihood, on account of child and wife.”

Monks heard these people ... spread it about. Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying:

“How can this group of six monks stay with the army for more than three nights?” ...

“Is it true, as is said, that you, monks, stayed with the army for more than three nights?”

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

“How can you, foolish men, stay with the army for more than three nights? It is not, foolish men, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“If there is for a monk some reason for going to an army, that monk may stay with the army for two or three nights. Should he stay longer than that, there is an offence of expiation.”

\(^1\) paṭivasāma, balancing the monks’ staying in the army; also against “come,” āgacchāma of previous pācittiya, and which balances the monks’ going to see the army.
If there is for a monk some reason for going to an army means: if there is a reason, if there is business.

That monk may stay with the army for two or three nights means: he may stay two (or) three nights.

Should he stay longer than that means: if he stays with the army until sunset on the fourth day, there is an offence of expiation.

If he thinks that it is more when it more than three nights, (and) stays with the army, there is an offence of expiation. If he is in doubt as to whether it is more than three nights ... If he thinks that it is less when it is more than three nights ... offence of expiation. If he thinks that it is more when it is less than three nights, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether it is less than three nights, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it is less when it is less than three nights, there is no offence.

There is no offence if he stays for two (or) three nights; if he stays for less than two (or) three nights; if having stayed for two nights, having departed on the third night before dawn, he stays again¹; if he stays (because he is) ill; if he stays because there is something to be done for one who is ill or if the army becomes invested by the opposing army²; if he comes to be taken possession of by something³; if there are accidents; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

The Ninth

¹ Cf. above, BD 2.197. ² senā vā paṭisenāya ruddhā hoti. Vin-a 859 says, “inasmuch as its approach (or road, sañcāra) is cut off, so it becomes invested.” Cf. nagaraṁ rundhati at Ja 1.409; Ja 3.159; Ja 4.230. ³ If he is invested by an enemy or by a chief, Vin-a 859.
... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks, staying with the army for two (or) three nights, went to a sham-fight and to the troops in array and to the massing of the army and to see a review.¹ Then a certain monk of the group of six, having gone to a sham-fight, became pierced by an arrow. People made fun of that monk, saying:

“Honoured sir, we hope it was a good battle. How many targets were obtained by you?”²

That monk, being made fun of by these people, became ashamed. People ... spread it about, saying:

“How can these recluses, sons of the Sakyans, come to see a sham-fight? For us it is not profitable, and for us it is ill-gotten; such as we come to a sham-fight for the sake of livelihood, on account of child and wife.”

Monks heard these people who ... spread it about. Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying:

“How can this group of six monks go to see a sham-fight?” ...

“Is it true, as is said, that you, monks, went to see a sham-fight?”

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

¹ uyyodidka balagga senābyūha anikadassana. All occur at DN i.6; the first at AN v.47. Vin-a 859 explained the second term as “they know which is chief for strength,” and also says (=DN-a 85), it is the place for counting the strength (or forces) — i.e., roll-calls as at Dialogues of the Buddha 1.9. As to vyūha, Ja 2.406 mentions three types: paduma-(lotus), cakka-(wheel), sakaṭa-(waggon). ² kati te lakkhāni laṭṭhāni. “Target” is lakkha, which also means a mark, or a high numeral, cf. lak (also spelt lac, lack, in modern times always implying rupees).
“How can you, foolish men, go to see a sham-fight? It is not, foolish men, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“If a monk, staying with the army for two nights (or) three nights, should go to a sham-fight or to the troops in array or to the massing of the army or to see a review, then is an offence of expiation.”

If a monk, staying with the army for two nights, three nights means: staying for two (or) three nights.

Sham-fight means: where a conflict¹ is seen.

Troops in array means: so many elephants, so many horses, so many chariots, so many infantry.

Massing of the army means: let elephants be on this side, let horses be on this side, let chariots be on this side, let foot-soldiers² be on this side.

A review means: a review of elephants, a review of horses, a review of chariots, a review of infantry. The least elephant review (has) three elephants, the least horse review (has) three horses, the least chariot review (has) three chariots, the least infantry review (has) four men as infantry, hands on arrows.

If he goes to see, there is an offence of wrong-doing. Standing where he sees, there is an offence of expiation. If, having dismissed from sight, he sees again, there is an offence of expiation. If he goes to see one or other, there is an offence of wrong-doing. Standing where he sees, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If, having dismissed from sight, he sees again, there is an offence of wrong-doing.³

There is no offence if, standing in the monastery, he sees; if a conflict is seen, having come to a place where a monk is resting or to a place where he is sitting down or to a place where he is lying down; if he, going along the opposite road, sees (it); if, going as there is something to be done, he sees (it); if there are accidents; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

¹ sampahāra. ² pattikā here. ³ Cf. above, BD 2.376.

The Tenth

THIS IS ITS KEY
Cakes, talking, three on Upananda, and also (the family who) supported (him), Mahānāma, Pasenadi,
the army, pierced, these ten.

The Fifth Division: that on the Naked Ascetic
Monks’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 51

... touring for alms in the Cetiya country,¹ set out for Bhaddavatikā.² Cowherds, goatherds, yeomen farmers, travellers saw the lord coming from afar, and seeing him they spoke thus to the lord: “Do not, lord, let the lord go to Ambatittha³; lord, in Ambatittha a serpent⁴ lives in a matted-haired ascetic’s hermitage; he has psychic potency, he is a terribly venomous snake; do not let him hurt the lord.”⁵ When they had spoken thus, the lord became silent. And a second time ... And a third time cowherds, goatherds, yeomen farmers, travellers spoke thus to the lord:

“Do not, lord, let the lord go to Ambatittha; ... do not let him hurt the lord.” And a third time the lord became silent. Then the lord, touring for alms, in the course of time arrived at Bhaddavatikā. The lord stayed there at Bhaddavatika. Then the venerable Sāgata⁶ approached the hermitage of the matted-hair ascetic of Ambatittha, and having approached, having entered the fire-room,⁷ having made ready the grass mat,⁸ he sat down cross-legged, the back erect, having caused mindfulness to be present in front of him. Then that serpent, seeing that the venerable Sāgata had entered, bad at heart,¹ blew forth smoke. And the venerable Sāgata blew forth smoke. Then that serpent, not conquering anger, blazed up, and the venerable Sāgata, having attained to the condition of heat,² blazed up. Then the venerable Sāgata, having mastered by heat that serpent’s heat, approached Bhaddavatika. Then the lord, having stayed at Bhaddavatikā for as long as he found suitable, departed on an alms-tour to Kosambī. Lay-followers of Kosambī heard:

¹ Cetiyesu. Dictionary of Pali Proper Names 1.911 says that “the people of Ceti seem to have had two distinct settlements,” and thinks that the one referred to here is probably the later colony, lying to the east of the earlier one. ² A market-town near Kosambi. Dictionary of Pali Proper Names 2.351. ³ A village. ⁴ nāga. ⁵ For this passage cf. Vin 1.24f. and Ja 1.360. The Surāpāna-jātaka is founded on this story. ⁶ No verses in the Theragāthā are ascribed to him. But at AN i.25 he is called chief of those good at the heat-condition. See AN-a 1.324ff. At Vin 1.179 he is called the lord’s attendant at that time, and performed some feats of psychic potency. ⁷ Cf. MN i.501. Agyāgāra called at Further Dialogues of the Buddha 1.353 “fire-hut,” at GS 5.162 (= AN v.234) “fire-house.” Dictionary of Pali Proper Names article on “Ambatittha” speaks of a “fire-place.” ⁸ tiṇasanthāraka.

“They say that master Sāgata came into conflict with the serpent of Ambatittha.”

Then the lord, touring for alms, in the course of time arrived at Kosambī.

Then the lay-followers of Kosambī, having met the lord, approached the venerable Sāgata; having approached, having greeted the venerable Sāgata, they stood at a respectful distance. As they were standing at a respectful distance, the lay-followers of Kosambī spoke thus to the venerable Sāgata:

“Honoured sir, what is hard for the masters to obtain, and liked (by them)? What may we give?”

When they had spoken thus, the group of six monks spoke thus to the lay-followers of Kosambī:

“There is, your reverences, a spirituous liquor called white spirits³; it is hard for the monks to obtain, and liked (by them). Give that.”

Then the lay-followers of Kosambī having given the spirituous liquor, white spirits, in house after house, seeing that the venerable Sāgata had entered for alms-food, spoke thus to the venerable Sāgata:

“Honoured sir, let master Sāgata drink the spirituous liquor, white spirits; honoured sir, let master Sāgata drink the spirituous liquor, white spirits.”

¹ dummano. ² tejodhātu; cf. BD 1.273, where Dabba attained this same condition. ³ kāpotikā nāma pasannā. Called in the Surāpānajātaka, Ja1.360, kāpotikā surā, pasannā kāpotikā and kāpotikā pāsanna, translated in Cambridge edition, Jātaka vol.i, p.207, as “white spirits, clear white spirit.” Vin-a 859 says kāpotikā is a shining red colour like pigeons’ feet; and pasannā is a synonym for surāmaṇḍa, the finest fermented liquor.
Then the venerable Sāgata, having drunk the spirituous liquor, white spirits, in house after house, as he was departing from the town fell down at the town-gate. Then the lord, departing from the town with a great company of monks, saw the venerable Sāgata fallen down at the town-gate; seeing him, he addressed the monks, saying: “Monks, take up Sāgata.”

“Yes, lord,” and these monks having answered the lord, having led the venerable Sāgata to the monastery, made him lie down with his head towards the lord. Then the venerable Sāgata, having turned round, went to sleep¹ with his feet towards the lord. Then the lord addressed the monks, saying:

“Monks, formerly was not Sāgata respectful, deferential towards the Tathāgata?”

“Yes, lord.”

“But monks, is Sāgata respectful, deferential towards the Tathāgata now?”

“No, lord.”

“Monks, did not Sāgata come into conflict with the serpent of Ambatittha?”

“Yes, lord.”

“But, monks, is Sāgata able to come into conflict with the serpent of Ambatittha now?”

“No, lord.”

“But, monks, could he become unconscious, having drunk that which may be drunk?”

“No, lord.”

“Monks, it is not fitting for Sāgata, it is not becoming, it is not suitable, it is not worthy of a recluse, it is not allowable, it is not to be done. How, monks, can Sāgata drink strong drink?² It is not, monks, seyyaṁ kappesi, or “lay down in a sleeping-place.” ² majja. At Vin 1.205 majja was allowed to be put into oil in cases of illness. The six monks put in too much and became drunk. They were to be dealt with according to the rule (i.e., this pācittiya ). And the amount of majja allowed for the oil was such that neither its colour, smell nor taste was perceptible. At DN iii.62, DN iii.63 it is said that majja should not be drunk—one of the five silas. Cf. also Snp 398–Snp 400.

805 for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“In drinking fermented liquor¹ and spirits² there is an offence of expiation.”

Fermented liquor means: if it is fermented liquor from flour, fermented liquor from cakes, fermented liquor from cooked rice, if it is worked-up yeast,³ if it is mixed with ingredients.⁴

Spirits means: if it is an extract from flowers,⁵ an extract from fruits, an extract from honey,⁶ an extract from sugar,⁷ if it is mixed with ingredients.⁸

Should drink means: if he drinks even (as much as) with a blade of grass, there is an offence of expiation.

If he thinks that it is strong drink when it is strong drink, (and) drinks it, there is an offence of expiation. If he is in doubt as to whether it is strong drink ... If he thinks that it is not strong drink when it is strong drink, (and) drinks it, there is an offence of expiation. If he thinks that it is strong drink when it is not strong drink, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether it is not strong drink, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it is not strong drink when it is not strong drink, there is no offence.

There is no offence if he drinks that which is not strong drink though it comes to be the colour of strong drink, the smell of strong drink, the taste of strong drink; if it is in a concoction of broth, in a concoction of meat, in a concoction of oil, in molasses and emblic myrobalam¹; if he drinks a distilled liquor² that is not strong drink; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

¹ surā. ² meraya. At the Council of Vesālī, Vin2.294, it was affirmed that it was not allowable to drink jalogi, unfermented toddy; to do so would be to infringe the “surāmerayapānepācittiya” (Vin2.307). MN i.238 states that the acelaka, naked ascetic, leaders do not drink surā or meraya. ³ kiṇṇapakkhiṭṭa. ⁴ sambhārasaṁyuttā. At DN-a 944, Vv-a 73, Kp-a 26, Vb-a 381 these are given as the fivefold surā. ⁵ pupphāsava. Referred to at Ja 4.117 as a meraya. ⁶ madhvāsava. Pali-English Dictionary says, “wine from the flower of Bassia latifolia.” ⁷ gulāsava. ⁸ =DN-a 944=Vv-a 73=Kp-a 26. At Vb-a 381 these are called five āsavā or extracts.

The First

¹ ámalaka, Phyllanthus erablica (Pali-English Dictionary). One of the fruits allowed as medicine, Vin 1.201. Mentioned again as a medicine at Vin 1.278. ² arīṭṭha, “a kind of liquor” (Critical Pali Dictionary).
... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks made one of the group of seventeen monks laugh by tickling him with the fingers. This monk, faint and unable to get his breath, died.¹ Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying:

“How can the group of six monks make a monk laugh by tickling him with the fingers?”...

“Is it true, as is said, that you, monks ... with the fingers?”

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

“How can you, foolish men ... with the fingers? It is not, foolish men, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“In tickling with the fingers there is an offence of expiation.”

Tickling with the fingers means: if one who is ordained desiring to make laugh one who is ordained, rubs² the body with the body, ¹ = Vin 3.84 (BD 1.146f). Though occurring in the pārājika section, this offence is there said to be one not involving defeat; but as is sometimes the case, it is not said what kind of offence it is. This suggests that Vin 3.84 was formulated earlier than Bu-Pc 52. See BD 1 Introduction, p. xxxvi, for suggestion why the offence of causing death by this treatment is not a pārājika; also for some translations of āngulipatodaka. Sor-thar-pa, p. 63, translated S.C. Vidyabhusana, 1915, p. 30, gives, “pokes a person with the finger”; Le Prātimokṣa-sūtra des Sarvāstivādins, translated Huber, J. Bu-As., Nov, Bu-Pc 63 “chatouille quelqu’un avec le doigt.” Buddhaghosa, Vin-a 860, defines as āngulihi upakacchādighatthanaṁ vuccati, “It is called striking (or touching, ghattana) the arm-pits (loins, legs, upakacchd), and so on, with the fingers.” ² āmasati, see BD 1.203, n. 6.

there is an offence of expiation.

If he thinks that he is ordained when he is ordained, (and) makes him laugh by tickling with the fingers, there is an offence of expiation. If he is in doubt as to whether he is ordained ... If he thinks that he is not ordained when he is ordained ... an offence of expiation. If he rubs something attached to the body with the body, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he rubs the body with something attached to the body ... wrong-doing. If he rubs something attached to the body with something attached to the body ... wrong-doing. If he rubs the body with something that may be cast, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he rubs something attached to the body with something that may be cast ... wrong-doing. If he rubs something that may be cast with something that may be cast, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he rubs the body of one who is not ordained with the body, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he rubs something attached to the body with the body ... the body with something attached to the body ... something attached to the body with something attached to the body ... the body with something that may be cast ... something attached to the body with something that may be cast ... something that may be cast with something that may be cast, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that he is ordained when he is not ordained, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether he is not ordained, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that he is not ordained when he is not ordained, there is an offence of wrong-doing.4

There is no offence if, not desiring laughter, he rubs (him) if there is something to be done; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

The Second

1. kāyapaṭibaddha. Cf. BD.1.204ff. = Vin.3.120ff. 2. nissaggiya. Cf. BD.1.204ff. = Vin.3.120ff. 3. anupassampannaṁ kāyena kāyaṁ āmasati. Vina 860 says that he may touch a nun for amusement, instead of one not ordained. 4. This surely is an error for anāpatti, no offence. 5. sati karantiye = above, BD.2.381. Cf. sati paccaye at Vin.4.83, Vin.4.85ff.
... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of seventeen monks were sporting in the water of the river Aciravatī. Now at that time King Pasenadi, the Kosalan, came to be on the upper storey of the palace¹ together with Queen Mallikā. King Pasenadi, the Kosalan, saw the group of seventeen monks sporting in the water of the river Aciravatī; seeing them he spoke thus to Queen Mallikā:

“Mallikā, these who are sporting in the water are men perfected.”²

“Undoubtedly, sire, a rule of training has not been laid down by the lord, or these monks are not conversant³ (with it).”

Then it occurred to King Pasenadi, the Kosalan:

“Is there not some device by which I would not speak to the lord but (yet) the lord would know that these monks sported in the water?”

Then King Pasenadi, the Kosalan, having had the group of seventeen monks summoned, gave them a large sugar-ball,⁴ saying:

“Honoured sirs, give this sugar-ball to the lord.”

The group of seventeen monks, taking that sugar-ball, approached the lord, and having approached they spoke thus to the lord:

“Lord, King Pasenadi, the Kosalan, gives this sugar-ball to the lord.”

“But, monks, where did the King see you?”

“Sporting in the water of the river Aciravatī, lord.”

¹ uparipāsādavaraṇagalo hoti; cf. Vin 4.158, and on pāsāda, cf. above, BD 2.16, n. 5.
The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

“How can you, foolish men, sport in the water? It is not, foolish men, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“In playing in the water, there is an offence of expiation.”

---

Playing in the water means: if desiring, laughter he immerses (the part) above the ankle in the water, or draws it out or swims, there is an offence of expiation.

---

If he thinks that it is playing when it is playing in the water, there is an offence of expiation. If he is in doubt as to whether it is playing in the water ... If he thinks that it is not playing when it is playing in the water, there is an offence of expiation. If he sports in the water with (the part) below the ankle, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he sports with a boat, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he strikes the water with the hand or with the foot or with a stick or with a sherd, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he sports with water in a bowl, or with sour rice-gruel or with milk or with butter-milk or with dye-stuff or with urine or with mud, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it is playing when it is not playing in the water, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether it is not playing in the water, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it is not playing when it is not playing in the water, there is no offence.

---

There is no offence if, not desiring laughter, plunging into the water if there is something to be done, he immerses or draws out or swims; if, going to the other side, he immerses or draws out or

---

1 hāsadhamma, or, a thing of laughter. Vin-a 861 udakakīḷikā vuccati.
2 palavati, Vin-a 861 tarati, crosses, using either his hands or feet. See Dhp 334, Thag 399.
3 nāvāya; hauling it up on a bank or propelling it with rudder and oars, Vin-a 861.
4 Cf. AN i.124=Pp 30, Pp 36.
5 bhājanagata, cf. BD 1.77, BD 1.85, and notes.
6 pāraṁ.
The Third
Monks’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 54

... at Kosambī in Ghosita’s monastery. Now at that time the venerable Channa indulged in bad habits.¹ The monks said:

“Reverend Channa, do not do that, it is not allowable.” He did the same (things) out of disrespect.² Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying:

“How can the venerable Channa do a disrespectful thing?” ... “Is it true, as is said, that you, Channa, did a disrespectful thing?” “It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked him, saying:

“How can you, foolish man, do a disrespectful thing? It is not, foolish man, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“In disrespect there is an offence of expiation.”³

Disrespect means: there are two (kinds of) disrespect: disrespect for a man and disrespect for dhamma. Disrespect for a man means: if being spoken to by one who is ordained concerning what is laid down, thinking, “This one is suspended⁴ or disparaged⁵ or blame-worthy,⁶ his bidding will not come to be done,’ he does a disrespect-

¹ Cf. BD 1.309; Vin 4.35, Vin 4.141.² anādariyaṁ paṭicca karoti yeva. Cf. Vin 4.185, Vin 4.349. At Vin 2.220 the group of six monks behaved disrespectfully (anādariyaṁ paṭicca) to the theras. At Pp 20 = Ds 1325 = Vb 359 anādariyaṁ is one of the terms used to define dovacassatā, contumacy. Cf. AN v.146, where the word occurs with dovacassatā and pāpamittatā.³ At Vin 1.176 there are three cases of anādariye pācittiyaṁ connected with ill monks and the Pavāraṇā ceremony.⁴ ukkhittaka. Cf. Vin 1.197, Vin 1.121; Vin 2.61, Vin 2.173, Vin 2.213; Vin 4.137.⁵ vambliita.⁶ garahita. Cf. Dhp 30, Snp 313.
ful thing, there is an offence of expiation. Disrespect for dhamma means: if being spoken to by one who is ordained concerning what is laid down, (saying), ‘How may this be lost or destroyed or disappear? or, he does not wish to learn this,’¹ he does a disrespectful thing, there is an offence of expiation.

If he thinks that he is ordained when he is ordained (and) does a disrespectful thing, there is an offence of expiation. If he is in doubt as to whether he is ordained ... If he thinks that he is not ordained when he is ordained ... offence of expiation. If being spoken to by one who is ordained concerning what is not laid down,² thinking, “This does not conduce to expunging (evil)³ nor to punctiliousness nor to graciousness nor to decreasing (the obstructions) nor to putting forth energy,”⁴ he does a disrespectful thing, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If being spoken to by one who is not ordained concerning what is laid down or concerning what is not laid down, thinking, ‘This does not conduce to expunging (evil) ... nor to putting forth energy,’ he does a disrespectful thing, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that he is ordained when he is not ordained, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether he is not ordained, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that he is not ordained when he is not ordained, there is an offence of wrong-doing.⁵

There is no offence if he speaks, saying: “Thus the version⁶ of our teachers is an interrogation⁷; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

---

¹ I.e., according to Vin-a 861, “what is laid down.” ² Vin-a 861, what has not been handed down in the Suttas or Abhidhamma. ³ sallekhā. ⁴ See BD 1.37 (and notes), BD 1.296. ⁵ Doubtless should read anāpatti, no offence. ⁶ uggaha. See Vism 96, Vism 99, translated, PTS edition, ‘Version’ and ‘text.’ Vin-a 861 says, ‘in this matter the version of the teacher as to respect should not be adopted, but the version of the teacher that has come down as custom should be adopted.’ ⁷ paripucchā. Perhaps ‘questionable.’ Cf. above, BD 2.271, BD 2.275, BD 2.278.
MONKS’ EXPIATION (PĀCITTIYA) 54

The Fourth
... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks frightened¹ the group of seventeen monks. These, being frightened, cried out. Monks spoke thus:

“Why do you, your reverences, cry out?”

“Your reverences, this group of six monks frightened us.”

Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying:

“How can the group of six monks frighten a monk?” ... (see Bu-Pc 52.1) ... “... should be set forth:

“Whatever monk should frighten a monk, there is an offence of expiation.”

Whatever means: is monk to be understood in this case.

Monk means: another monk.

Should frighten means: if one who is ordained, desirous of frightening one who is ordained, arranges a form or a sound or a smell or a taste or a touch,² whether he is afraid or whether he is not afraid, there is an offence of expiation. If he points out the wilds of thieves, or the wilds of beasts of prey, or the wilds of goblins,³ whether he is afraid or whether he is not afraid, there is an offence of expiation.

¹ bhīṁsāpenti. ² Cf. BD 1.133f. (= Vin 3.77f.). Vin-a 862 says, “offering a form and so on is to be explained according to the meaning in manussaviggaha,” human form—i.e., in Commentary, on Bu-Pj 3. ³ pisācakantāra. At Ja 1.99 five kinds of kantāra are given, the first two as above and three others; each is defined. Four kinds at Cnd 630.
If he thinks that he is ordained when he is ordained (and) frightens (him), there is an offence of expiation.

If he is in doubt as to whether he is ordained ... If he thinks that he is not ordained when he is ordained (and) frightens (him), there is an offence of expiation. If he is desirous of frightening one who is not ordained (and) arranges a form ... a touch, whether he is afraid or whether he is not afraid, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he points out the wilds of thieves ... or whether he is not afraid, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that he is ordained when he is not ordained, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether he is not ordained, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that he is not ordained when he is not ordained, there is an offence of wrong-doing.¹

There is no offence if, not desirous of frightening, he arranges a form or a sound or a smell or a taste or a touch, or points out the wilds of thieves or the wilds of beasts of prey or the wilds of goblins; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

The Fifth

¹ Doubtless should read, as in Bu-Pc 54, anāpatti, no offence.
Monks’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 56

... was staying in the Bhagga country at Crocodile Hill in Bhesakala grove in the deer-park. Now at that time monks, kindling in the winter time a fire of large hollow logs, warmed themselves. And in that hollow a dark poisonous snake was scorched by the fire; issuing forth, he pursued the monks. The monks ran about here and there.

Those who were modest monks looked down upon, criticised, spread it about, saying:

“How can these monks, kindling a fire, warm themselves?” ...

“Is it true, as is said, that you, monks, kindling a fire, warmed yourselves?”

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

“How, monks, can these foolish men, kindling a fire, warm themselves? It is not, monks, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ...

And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk, desirous of warming himself, should kindle or should cause a fire to be kindled, there is an offence of expiation.”

And thus this rule of training for monks came to be laid down by

---

1 Suññumāragiri. Vin-a 862 says it is the name of a town. It was probably the capital. Here were formulated two other Vinaya rules: Vin 2.127, Vin 4.198; cf. Vin 5.145. Anumāna Sutta, MN i.95, Māratajāniya Sutta, MN i.332, Bodhirājakumāra Sutta, MN ii.91, uttered here. 2 Called after the yakkhini who presided there, SN-a ii.249. 3 visibbesuṁ, from visibbeti = visīveti, to thaw, to warm oneself; another visīveti means to sew. Cf. visībesuṁ at Vin 1.31–32, where the Jaṭilas “warmed themselves” at vessels of burning fire after emerging from the cold river. Cf. visīvetvā at Mil 47; and visīvetuṁ twice, at Ja 2.68 with variant readings, one being visiībituṁ. 4 kaṇhas-appa. Cf. Vin 3.20. 5 tahāṁ tahāṁ. Cf. Ja 1.384.
Now at that time monks became ill. Monks, inquiring after the ill ones, spoke thus to the ill monks: “We hope that your reverences are better, we hope that you are keeping going.”

“Formerly, your reverences, we, kindling a fire, used to warm ourselves; thus there came to be comfort for us. But now it is forbidden by the lord, (and) being scrupulous, we do not warm ourselves; thus there comes to be no comfort for us.”¹

They told this matter to the lord. He said:

“I allow you, monks, when a monk is ill, kindling or causing a fire to be kindled, to warm yourselves. And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk, not being ill, desirous of warming himself, should kindle or should cause a fire to be kindled, there is an offence of expiation.”

And thus this rule of training for monks came to be laid down by the lord.

Now at that time monks, being scrupulous, did not light a lamp in the fire-room² or in the bath-room.³ They told this matter to the lord. He said:

“I allow you, monks, to kindle or to cause a fire to be kindled when there is a sufficient reason for it.⁴ And thus ... should be set forth:

“Whatever monk, not being ill, desirous of warming himself, should kindle or should cause a fire to be kindled, unless there is sufficient reason for it, there is an offence of expiation.”

Whatever means: ... is monk to be understood in this case. Not being ill means: he for whom there comes to be comfort without a fire.

¹ Cf. above, BD 2.277, BD 2.342, below, BD 2.402. ² jotika, according to Vin-a 862, a fire for the purpose of sweating: pattapacanašedakammādisu jotikaraṇe. ³ See Vinaya Texts i.157, n. 2; Vinaya Texts iii.103. ⁴ Cf. above, BD 2.375.
Ill means: he for whom there does not come to be comfort without a fire.

Desirous of warming himself means: wishing to heat himself.¹

A fire² means: what is called a fire.³

Should kindle means: if he himself kindles, there is an offence of expiation.

Should cause to be kindled means: if he commands another, there is an offence of expiation. When once commanded, if he kindles much, there is an offence of expiation.

Unless there is a sufficient reason for it means: setting aside a sufficient reason for it.⁴

If he thinks that he is not ill when he is not ill, (and) desirous of warming himself, kindles or causes a fire to be kindled, unless there is a sufficient reason for it, there is an offence of expiation. If he is in doubt as to whether he is not ill ... If he thinks that he is ill when he is not ill ... offence of expiation. If he picks up a fallen fire-brand,⁵ there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that he is not ill when he is ill, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that he is ill when he is ill, there is no offence.

There is no offence if he is ill; if he warms himself at one made by another; if he warms himself over raked-out embers⁶, if at a lamp, in a fire-room, in a bath-room; if there is a sufficient reason for it; if there are dangers⁷; if he is mad; if he is the first wrong-doer.

The Sixth

¹ tappitukāma. ² joti. ³ aggi. ⁴ Vin-a 862 says, “setting aside lamps and so on, there is no offence in kindling (a fire) when there is another suitable reason for it.” ⁵ paṭilātaṁ ukkhipati. Vin-a 862 says ḍayhamānaṁ alaṭaṁ patitaṁ (variant reading patati taṁ) ukkhipati, if he picks up a glowing fire-brand that has fallen. ⁶ vitacchitaṅgāra. ⁷ Vin-a 862—i.e., from nasty beasts of prey and beings other than human.
Monks’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 57

... at Rājagaha in the Bamboo Grove at the squirrels’ feeding-place. Now at that time monks used to bathe in the Tapodā.¹ Now at that time King Seniya Bimbisāra of Magadha, thinking: “I will bathe (my) head,” having gone to the Tapodā, waited for (them) at a respectful distance, thinking: “(I will wait) as long as the masters bathe.” The monks bathed until the dark of the night. Then King Seniya Bimbisāra of Magadha, bathing (his) head at the wrong time, staying outside the town because the town gate was closed, when it was early morning² approached the lord, anointed,³ perfumed⁴; having approached, having greeted the lord, he sat down at a respectful distance. As he was sitting down at a respectful distance, the lord spoke thus to King Seniya Bimbisāra of Magadha:

“Why do you, sire, come in the early morning, anointed, perfumed?”

Then King Seniya Bimbisāra of Magadha told this matter to the lord. Then the lord roused ... delighted King Seniya Bimbisāra of Magadha with dhamma-talk. Then King Seniya Bimbisāra of Magadha, having been roused ... delighted by the lord with dhamma-talk, rising from his seat, greeting the lord, departed keeping his right side towards him. Then the lord on this occasion, in this connection, having had the Order of monks convened, questioned the monks, saying:

¹ A lake, and also a river; literally the hot waters. The lake was cool, but the river flowing from it was hot; see Vin 3.108 (BD 1.188), quoted at DN-a 1.35, Ud-a 110. ² Cf. above, BD 2.274. ³ asambhinnena. Pali-English Dictionary says that this at the above passage is the “name of a kind of ointment.” ⁴ vilepanena.
“Is it true, as is said, monks, that monks, though having seen the king, not knowing moderation, bathed?”

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

“How, monks, can these foolish men, though having seen the king, not knowing moderation, bathe? It is not, monks, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk should bathe (at intervals of) less than half a month, there is an offence of expiation.”

And thus this rule of training for monks came to be laid down by the lord.

Now at that time monks, being scrupulous, did not bathe in the hot weather, in the fever weather; they lay down¹ with limbs covered with sweat; robes and lodgings got soiled. They told this matter to the lord. He said:

“I allow you, monks, in the hot weather, in the fever weather, to bathe (at intervals of) less than half a month. And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk should bathe (at intervals of) less than half a month, except at a right time, there is an offence of expiation. This is a right time in this case: thinking, ‘a month and a half of the summer remains,’ (and) ‘the first month of the rains’—these are the two and a half months when there is hot weather, when there is fever weather. In this case this is a right time.”

And thus this rule of training for monks came to be laid down by the lord.

Now at that time monks became ill. Monks, inquiring after the ill ones, spoke thus to the ill monks: “We hope that your reverences are better, we hope that you are keeping going.”

Formerly, your reverences, we used to bathe (at intervals of) less than half a month; thus there came to be comfort for us. But now it is forbidden by the lord, (and) being scrupulous, we do not bathe; thus there comes to be no comfort for us.”¹

¹ sayanti, or, went to sleep.

They told this matter to the lord. He said:

“I allow you, monks, when a monk is ill, to bathe (at intervals of) less than half a month. And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatsoever monk should bathe (at intervals of) less than half a month, except at a right time, there is an offence of expiation. This is a right time in this case ... when there is fever weather, at a time of illness. In this case this is a right time.”

And thus this rule of training for monks came to be laid down by the lord.

Now at that time monks making repairs, being scrupulous, did not bathe; they lay down with limbs covered with sweat; robes and lodgings got soiled. They told this matter to the lord. He said:

“I allow you, monks, at a time of work,² to bathe (at intervals of) less than half a month. And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatsoever monk should bathe (at intervals of) less than half a month, except at a right time, there is an offence of expiation ...”

And thus this rule of training for monks came to be laid down by the lord.

Now at that time monks, having gone on a journey, being scrupulous, did not bathe; they lay down with limbs covered with sweat ... They told this matter to the lord. He said:

“I allow you, monks, at a time of going on a journey, to bathe (at intervals of) less than half a month. And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatsoever monk should bathe (at intervals of) less than half a

---

¹ Cf. above, BD 2.277, BD 2.342, BD 2.399. ² Or, of building, kammasamaya; see the Old Commentary’s definition below.
month, except at a right time, there is an offence of expiation. This is a right time in this case: ...

And thus this rule of training for monks came to be laid down by the lord.

Now at that time several monks, making robes in the open air, became assailed\(^1\) by a dusty wind, and the god was raining little by little.\(^2\) The monks, being scrupulous, did not-bathe; they lay down with damp limbs; robes and lodgings got soiled. They told this matter to the lord. He said:

“I allow you, monks, at a time of wind and rain,\(^3\) to bathe (at intervals of) less than half a month. And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk should bathe (at intervals of) less than half a month, except at a right time, there is an offence of expiation. In this case this is a right time: thinking, ‘a month and a half of the summer remains,’ (and) ‘the first month of the rains’—these are the two and a half months when there is hot weather, when there is fever weather; at a time of illness, at a time of work, at a time of going on a journey, at a time of wind and rain. This is a right time in this case.”

Whatever means: ... is monk to be understood in this case.
Less than half a month\(^4\) means: less than half a month.\(^5\)
Should bathe means: if he bashes with chunam or with clay,\(^6\) in each action there is an offence of wrong-doing; when the bathing is completed there is an offence of expiation.

Except at a right time means: setting a right time to one side.
Hot weather means: a month and a half of the summer remains.

\(^1\) okinñā. \(^2\) devo ca thokaṁ thokaṁ phusāyati. Cf. SN i.184, Ud 5, devo ekaṁ ekaṁ phusāyati. \(^3\) vātavuṭṭhi. Cf. AN iii.378; Snp-a 34. \(^4\) oren’ addhamāsaṁ. \(^5\) ānakaddhamāsaṁ. \(^6\) Cf. Vin 1.202, where monks with affections of the skin are allowed to use cuṇṇa, chunam, while those who are in health are permitted mattikā, clay. Cf. also Vin 1.47 = Vin 1.52, and see notes at Vinaya Texts i.157; Vin 2.120, Vin 2.220, Vin 2.224.
Fever weather means: the first month of the rains. Thinking, ‘these are the two and a half months when there is hot weather, when there is fever weather,’ there may be bathing.

Time of illness means: if there comes to be no comfort for one without bathing; thinking, ‘it is a time of illness,’ there may be bathing.

Time of work means: even a cell comes to be cleaned; thinking, ‘it is a time of work,’ there may be bathing.

Time of going on a journey means: saying, ‘we will go half a yojana,’ there may be bathing; there may be bathing when going, there may be bathing when gone.¹

Time of wind and rain means: if monks become assailed by a dusty wind, if two or three drops of rain come to be fallen on the body, thinking, ‘it is a time of wind and rain,’ there may be bathing.

If he thinks that it is less when it is less than half a month, (and) bathes, except at a right time, there is an offence of expiation. If he is in doubt as to whether it is less than half a month ... If he thinks that it is more when it is less than half a month ... offence of expiation. If he thinks that it is less when it is more than half a month, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether it is more than half a month, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it is more when it is more than half a month, there is no offence.

There is no offence if it is at a right time; if he bathes at (intervals of) the half-month; if he bathes (at intervals of) more than half a month; if he bathes going to the further bank²; if he is in nothing but bordering districts³; if there are accidents⁴; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

---

¹ Cf. above, BD 2.312. ² pāraṁ gacchanto nhāyati. Cf. above, BD 2.392. ³ sabbapaccantimesu janapadesu. Buddhaghosa gives no explanation. ⁴ Such as being pursued by bees, Vin-a 863.
... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time many monks and wanderers were going along the high-road from Sāket to Sāvatthī. On the way, thieves, having issued forth, robbed them. At Sāvatthī hirelings of the king,¹ having issued forth, having seized these thieves with the goods, sent a messenger to the monks, saying:

“Let the revered sirs come; let each, recognising his own robe, take it.”²

The monks did not recognise them. They³ looked down upon, criticised, spread it about, saying:

“How can the revered sirs not recognise their own robes?”⁴

Monks heard these people who ... spread it about. Then these monks told this matter to the lord. Then the lord on this occasion, in this connection, having had the Order of monks convened, having given reasoned talk on what is befitting, on what is suitable, addressed the monks, saying:

“On account of this, monks, I will lay down a rule of training for monks based on ten grounds: for the excellence of the Order, for the comfort of the Order ... for establishing what is verily dhamma, for following discipline.⁵ And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“When a monk obtains a new robe, any one mode of disfigurement of the three modes of disfigurement must be taken: either dark green or mud(-colour) or black. If a monk should make use of a new robe without taking any one mode of disfigurement of the three modes of disfigurement, there is an offence of expiation.

New means: it is called so if not made allowable.
Robe means: any one robe of the six (kinds of) robes.
Any one mode of disfigurement of the three modes of disfigurement must be taken means: even (as little as) with a blade of grass must be taken.
Dark green means: there are two (kinds of) dark green: the

1. dubbaṇṇakaraṇaṁ. Vin-a 863 says dubbaṇṇakaraṇaṁ ādātabban ti etaṁ kappabinduṁ sandhāya vuttaṁ. Pali-English Dictionary calls kappabindu a “small black dot or smudge imprinted on a new robe to make it lawful” (kappa). Huber, J. Bu-As., 1913, has (pācittiya 59): “si un bhikṣu reçoit un vetement neuf, il doit employer une des trois manières pour en détruire la belle couleur.” At Vin 1.255 the kathina-cloth is called “made (athhata) if it is made allowable (kappakata).” SN v.217, dubbaṇṇakaraṇi jare = KS v.192, “age that makes the colour fade.”
2. ādātabbaṁ, from ādiyati, to take up, take to oneself. Cf. Vin-a 684, ādātabbā ti gaheṭabbā. Vinaya Texts i.45, “he must choose.” Cf. Vin 1.150, na ekacco pacchāśamaṇo ādātabbo = Vinaya Texts i.163, “let him not take anyone else with him as his companion.”
3. Vinaya Texts i.45, “either (making part of it) dark blue, or (marking part of it with) mud, or (making part of it) black.”
4. The robe must be disfigured so as to be identifiable by the monk to whom it belongs. Cf. Bu-NP15, where portions of an old rug have to be added to a new rug “so as to disfigure it,” although not for purposes of identification.
5. akatakappa. The robe is made allowable by having a smudge made upon it, Vin-a 863. At Vin 1.215 fruit that is akatakappa is allowed to be eaten, even when there is no one there to make it allowable (kappiyakāraka, cf. Vin 1.211) for the monks by offering it to them. Cf. akappakata occurring below at Bu-Pc 58.2.3.
6. Cf. above, BD 2.404, BD 2.48. Here Vin-a 863 says, whatever he is able to put on, to dress in (using nivāsetuṁ and pārupituṁ, the verbs referring to the inner robe, and to the upper robe and outer cloak, cf. BD 2.32, n. 2, n. 3); the “least robe fit for assignment” is not meant. Cf. above, BD 2.287.
7. nīla, often translated as blue, dark blue. But Old Commentary lends support for green here. See Mrs. RHYS DAVIDS, Buddhist Psychological Ethics, 1924, p. 49, n.
dark green of bronze,¹ the dark green of foliage.²

Mud(-colour)³ means: it is called water.⁴

Black⁵ means: anything that is of black.⁶

If a monk ... without taking any one mode of disfigurement of the three modes of disfigurement means: if a monk makes use of a new robe without having taken any one mode of disfigurement of the three modes of disfigurement, even (as little as) with a blade of grass, there is an offence of expiation.

If he makes use of it, thinking that he has not taken when he has not taken, there is an offence of expiation. If he is in doubt as to whether he has not taken ... If he makes use of it, thinking that he has taken when he has not taken, there is an offence of expiation. If he thinks that he has not taken when he has taken, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether he has taken, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that he has taken when he has taken, there is no offence.

There is no offence if, having taken, he makes use of it; if what is allowable becomes destroyed⁹; if what made the appearance allow-

---

¹ kaṁsanīla; kaṁsa is bronze, or sometimes metal. Vin-a 863 explains by cammakārāṇila, the nila of a leather-worker, and says that according to Mahāpaccariya it is called ayomala (variant reading ayomaya) and lohamala, an iron-(or metal-) stain, a copper-(brass-or bronze-) stain. ² palāsanīla, explained at Vin-a 863. yo koci nilavaṃṇa pannaṃraro, whatever is a heap of leaves is nila colour. At Vv-a 158, harita, usually translated as “green,” is explained by nila. ³ kaddama.⁴ odaka. At Vin 2.262 monks and nuns sprinkled one another with kaddamodaka, muddy water (kaddama-udaka).⁵ kāḷasama. Both kāḷa and sāma can mean black, dark. At MN 1.246 the words mean, according to Pali-English Dictionary, black, brown, respectively; so translated at Further Dialogues of the Buddha 1.176. But Pali-English Dictionary also says (article for kāḷa) that “kāḷa-sāma at Vin 4.120 is to be taken as dark-grey,” while under article for sāma it says, “Vin 4.120 (kāḷasāma dark blue [?]).” Some words for colours may, in the Canon, have denoted more than one colour, or nothing very definite and fixed; or we may not yet know exactly to what colour some of the words for colours refer. ⁶ kāḷasāmaka, or blackish, darkish. ⁷ anāditāyitvā. ⁸ anādinna, presumably referring to a “disfigurement.” ⁹ kappo naṭṭho hoti, perhaps if the smudge (bindu) disappears in some way.
able becomes worn away \(^1\); if what was not made allowable \(^2\) becomes sewn together \(^3\) with what was made allowable \(^4\); if there is a patch \(^5\); if there is a braiding \(^6\); if there is a binding \(^7\); if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

The Eighth

\(^1\) kappatokāso jiṇño hoti. Again cf. Vin-a 863 and above, BD 2.407.

\(^2\) sanissibitaṁ hoti. Cf. Vism 1, Mil 102, Mil 148.

\(^3\) kappakatena, as Critical Pali Dictionary says, by kappabindu. Vin 4.286, samāṇacīvarānā nāma kappakataṁ vuccati, a recluse’s robe is called what is made allowable. At Vin 1.254, Vin 1.255, the expressions occur, na akappakatena athataṁ hoti kathinaṁ; kappakatena athataṁ hoti kathinaṁ, translated at Vinaya Texts ii.155, Vinaya Texts ii.156, “when the ceremony has (has not) fallen through,” BD 2.155, n. 2, saying, “akappakatenā ti anādina-kappabindhunā (Buddhaghosa), which we do not understand. Perhaps we should read bindunā.” See Vin-a 1111 for this definition, and where reading is bindunā. The sense is that the kathina-cloth is not properly made if it is not made allowable—i.e., through not taking a disfiguring smudge by which the owner can identify it.

\(^4\) aggaḷa. Vin-a 863, “putting these aggaḷa, and so on, on to a robe after it is made allowable is not a device for making it allowable (kappakaraṇakicca).” Aggaḷa, patch, strip of cloth, was used for strengthening robes. See Vin 1.290, where a monk’s inner robe was torn and he inserted a “strip of cloth” and was commended by the lord. Buddhaghosa says (see Vin-a 1128), aggaḷam accchādeyyan (text, acchupeyyan) ti chinnaṭṭhāne pilōti-khaṇḍaṁ laggāpeyyaṁ (variant reading ṭhapeyyaṁ): “(what now) if I should stick bits of cloth (or rags) into the torn places?” Vin-a 1129 gives, suttalūkhaṁ kāṭun ti sutten’ eva aggaḷam kāṭun ti attho, “to dam roughly with thread means to darn a patch with thread.”

\(^5\) paribhaṇḍa. Vinaya Texts ii.154, n. 1, anuvāṭa-karaṇa-mattenā ti piṭṭhi-anuvāṭa-āropana-mattenā, from which it appears that the anuvāṭa was put along the back of the robe. Anuvāṭa used in explained of kusi at Vin 1.287, see Vinaya Texts ii.208, n. 5. Vin-a 684 uses the word in explaining the rule for disfiguring a rug. Critical Pali Dictionary calls anuvāṭa “probably a collar or facing (on a monk’s cowl).”

\(^7\) paribhaṇḍa. Vinaya Texts ii.154, n. 2, paribhaṇḍa-karaṇa-mattenā ti kucchi-anuvāṭa-āropana-mattenā, put inside. Buddhaghosa on Vin 1.297 again explains anuvāṭa and paribhaṇḍa “by the words themselves,” see Vinaya Texts ii.231, n. 2. The two words occur again at Vin 1.254 as things to be used in making a kathina-cloth robe, and at Vin 2.116 as things to be put on to the edge (anto) of the kathina when it is worn thin; at Vin 2.177 they are among the “trifles” for which a disposer is to be appointed. On paribhaṇḍa as some kind of flooring, see Vin 2.113, Vin 2.172; Vinaya Texts iii.85, n. 3; Vin 3.213, n. 6.
... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, himself having assigned a robe\(^1\) to a monk who shared his brother’s cell,\(^2\) made use of it, (the robe) not having been taken away.\(^3\) Then that monk told this matter to the monks, saying:

“How your reverences, this venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, himself having assigned a robe to me, makes use of it, (the robe) not having been taken away.”

Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying:

“How can the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, himself having assigned a robe to a monk, make use of it, (the robe) not having been taken away?”

“Is it true, as is said, that you, Upananda, yourself having assigned ... not having been taken away?”

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked him, saying:

“How can you, foolish man, yourself having assigned ... not having been taken away? It is not, foolish man, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk, himself having assigned a robe to a monk or to a nun or to a female probationer or to a male novice or to a female novice, should make use of it, (the robe) not having been taken away, there is an offence of expiation.”\(^4\)

\(^{1}\) At Vin 1.297 monks were allowed to allot robes, but not to assign them.  \(^{2}\) Cf. above, BD 2.139.  \(^{3}\) \textit{apaccuddhāraka}. Cf. above, BD 2.22, n. 3.  \(^{4}\) Cf. Bu–Pc 81.
Whatever means: ... is monk to be understood in this case.

To a monk means: to another monk.

A nun means: one ordained by both Orders.¹

A female probationer means: one training in the six rules² for two years.

A male novice means: one conforming to the ten rules of training.³

A female novice means: one conforming to the ten rules of training.⁴

Himself⁵ means: himself⁶ having assigned.

A robe means: any one robe of the six (kinds of) robes, (including) the least one fit for assignment.⁷

Assignment means: there are two (kinds of) assignment, assignment in the presence and assignment in the absence. Assignment in the presence means that he says, ‘I assign this robe to you or to so and so.’ Assignment in the absence means that he says, ‘I will give-this robe to you for the sake of assigning (it).’⁸ He should say, ‘Who is your friend or intimate acquaintance?’ ‘So and so, and so and so,’ he says. He should say, ‘I will give to them; make use of what is due to them or give it away or do as you like (with it).’

(The robe) not having been taken away means: either if it is not given to him, or if not putting his trust in him, he makes use of it, there is an offence of expiation.

If he thinks that (the robe) is not taken away when it is not taken away, (and) makes use of it, there is an offence of expiation. If he is in doubt as to whether (the robe) is not taken away ... If he thinks that (the robe) is taken away when it is not taken away, (and) makes use of it, there is an offence of expiation. If he allots\textsuperscript{1} it or gives it away, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that (the robe) is not taken away when it is taken away, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether (the robe) is taken away, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that (the robe) is taken away when it is taken away, there is no offence.

¹ = above, BD 2.32, BD 2.40. ² chasu dharmesu sikkhatasikkhā. Cf. Vin 4.343. These rules are the five silas and one against eating at the wrong time. For this last cf. Bu-Pc 37. ³ dasasikkhāpadika. ⁴ dasasikkhāpadikā. Cf. Vin 4.343. ⁵ sāmaṁ ... sāmaṁ ... sayaṁ. ⁶ sāmaṁ ... sayaṁ. ⁷ Cf. above, BD 2.40, BD 2.48, BD 2.140. ⁸ Or, as at Vinaya Texts i.45, n. 3, ‘I give this robe to you for you to appoint (to someone else).’

There is no offence either if he gives it, or if putting his trust in him, he makes use of it; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

\textit{The Ninth}

\textsuperscript{1} \textit{adhiphateti}, see above, \textit{BD 2.7}, n. 1.
Monks’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 60

... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of seventeen monks did not store their requisites. The group of six monks hid a bowl and a robe belonging to the group of seventeen monks. The group of seventeen monks spoke thus to the group of six monks:

“Your reverences, give back the bowl and the robe to us.”

The group of six monks laughed; these cried out. Monks spoke thus:

“Why do you, your reverences, cry out?”

“Your reverences, this group of six monks are hiding a bowl and a robe belonging to us.”

Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying:

“How can the group of six monks hide a bowl and a robe belonging to monks?” ...

“Is it true, as is said, that you, monks, are hiding a bowl and a robe belonging to monks?”

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

“How can you, foolish men, hide a bowl and a robe belonging to monks? It is not, foolish men, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk should hide or should cause to hide a monk’s bowl or robe or (piece of cloth) to sit upon¹ or needle-case or girdle, even in fun, there is an offence of expiation.”

¹ nisīdana. Cf. Vin 1.295 and above, BD 2.34, BD 2.87, BD 2.414
Whatever means: ... is monk to be understood in this case.

A monk’s means: another monk’s.

Bowl means: there are two (kinds of) bowls, an iron bowl and a clay bowl.¹

Robe means: any one robe of the six (kinds of) robes, (including) the least one fit for assignment.²

(Piece of cloth) to sit upon means: it is so called if it has a border.³

Needle-case⁴ means: it is with a needle or it is without a needle.

Girdle means: there are two (kinds of) girdles, those made of strips of cloth⁵ and those ... ⁶

Should hide means: if he himself hides, there is an offence of expiation.

Or should came to hide means: if he commands another, there is an offence of expiation. When once commanded, if he hides much, there is an offence of expiation.

Even in fun means: desiring amusement.

If he thinks that he is ordained when he is ordained, (and) hides or causes (someone) to hide a bowl ... or a girdle, even in fun, there is an offence of expiation. If he is in doubt as to whether he is ordained ... If he thinks that he is not ordained when he is ordained ... offence of expiation. If he hides or causes (someone) to hide another requisite, even in fun, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he hides or causes (someone) to hide the bowl or robe or another requisite of one who is not ordained, even in fun, there is an offence of wrong-doing.⁷

If he thinks that he is ordained when he is not ordained, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether he is not ordained, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that he is not ordained when he is not ordained, there is an offence of wrong-doing.¹

¹ = above, BD 2.115 (where see n. 2), and Vin 4.243. Cf. also the three bowls mentioned at Vin 3.169 = BD 1.292, lohapatta, sāṭakapatta, sumbhakapatta. ² Cf. above, BD 2.40, BD 2.48. ³ sadasa. Cf. above, BD 2.87, and Vin 4.171. ⁴ Cf. Vin 1.301ff., and Bu-Pc 86. ⁵ paṭṭika. I follow translation at Vinaya Texts iii.143. ⁶ sūkarantaka. Vinaya Texts iii.143, n. 5, “we do not venture to translate the term.” See Buddhaghosa’s explanation at Vin 2.319. Both these kinds of girdles are allowed at Vin 2.136. ⁷ Indicating that members of other sects were not to be inconvenienced.

There is no offence if he is not desiring fun; if he puts in order what is badly arranged²; if he puts it in order, thinking, ‘I will give it back, having given dhamma-talk’; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

The Tenth

THIS IS ITS KEY
Fermented liquor, the finger, and water,³ and disrespect, frightening, Fire, bathing, disfigurement, himself (the robe) not having been taken away,
and about hiding.

The Sixth Division: that on drinking fermented liquor

¹ Another of these errors, noted before—should surely read anāpatti, no offence.
² dunnikkhitta, wrongly put down or set down. ³ toya.
TRANSLATOR’S INTRODUCTION

This volume of the Book of the Discipline concludes the translation of the Suttavibhaṅga of the Vinaya and covers vol.4 of Oldenberg’s edition of the Vinayapiṭakaṁ, p.124 to the end. It thus includes the last thirty-two Pācittiya for monks, Bu-Pc 61–Bu-Pc 92, the four Pāṭidesaniya or offences which ought to be confessed, the seventy-five Sekhiya or rules for training or of etiquette, and the seven Adhikaraṇasamathā dhammā or ways for settling legal questions. This ends the Mahāvibhaṅga portion of the Suttavibhaṅga, that portion devoted to the Pātimokkha rules of restraint and training for monks. The nuns’ portion, the Bhikkhunivibhaṅga, follows immediately, the rules being classified on the same lines as those for monks: Pārājika, Saṅghādisesa, Nissaggiya, Pācittiya, Pāṭidesaniya, Sekhiya, Adhikaraṇasamathā dhammā. There is, however, no Aniyata, or undetermined class of offence, for nuns.

THE MONKS’ PĀCITTIYA GROUP
(Bu-Pc.61–Bu-Pc.92)

Sāvatthī is given as the locus or provenance of twenty-eight of these thirty-two rules, Rājagaha of two, Kosambi and Kapilavatthu of one each. It is not uninstructive to look at these four rules in which the lord is recorded to have been elsewhere than in Sāvatthī. Bu-Pc 65, whose locus is given as Rājagaha, recounts the choice of young Upāli’s parents of a monk’s career for him, apparently mainly on the grounds that recluses are pleasant in their conduct and live in a certain amount of ease. The episode occurs again in the Mahāvagga (Vin 1.77), but there, because at the end it is stated that he who ordains a person who is under twenty years of age “must be dealt with according to the rule,” the existence of this Pācittiya is evidently presupposed.

Both accounts assert that Upāli and his young friends were in Rājagaha and also show the lord to have been here too.¹ They would appear to be some tradition associating the boy Upāli with this place.

Bu-Pc 81 has as its central figure Dabba the Mallian. In Bu-Ss 8 he is appointed distributor of lodgings and meals to the Order. In Bu-Pc 13 he is accused of showing favouritism in the discharge of his duties. These three contexts all lay the scene in Rājagaha, as does Bu-Ss 9, where this same monk is falsely charged with seducing Mettiyā. Although he was not born at Rājagaha, there is a consistent propensity to regard this as the scene of many of his activities.

Similarly, Channa is a monk traditionally connected with Kosambī. In Bu-Ss 12, Bu-Pc 54, and again in Bu-Pc 71, we hear of him indulging in bad habits, always when the lord is said to be at Kosambi. Also while he was here, Channa is reputed to have cut down a tree at a shrine (Bu-Ss 12) and to have damaged a brahmin’s barley field when building a dwelling-place given him by his supporter (Bu-Pc 19).

The introductory story of Bu-Pc 86 is developed on exactly the same lines as the first story in Bu-NP 22, the only differences being that (1) the Nissaggiya story ends in the formulation of a dukkaṭa offence, and the Pācittiya in the formulation of a sikkhāpada, a rule; and (2) the people who offer to supply the monks’ needs are potters in the Nissaggiya and ivory-workers in the Pācittiya. In both these stories the lord is said to have been residing at Kapilavatthu, his birthplace. I have already put forward various reasons to support my view that Bu-NP 22 represents some specially ancient fragment of the Pātimokkha.² Now the form in which Bu-Pc 86 exists would appear to support this probability. It looks like a mere copy of Bu-NP 22, and in narrating its story may be said to utilise material already at hand. For it cannot well be earlier than the Nissaggiya, since the articles in respect of which the offence was committed were needle-cases, whereas in the Nissaggiya they were bowls, requisites doubtless allowed to monks before they felt the lack of needle-cases. These latter were not essential in the daily round, merely an adjunct to it, a means of preserving the needles, themselves one of the eight necessities, and through them other necessities: robes, belts, shoulder-straps and so on. In taking over an older setting, older because the articles with which it deals were earlier accretions to the monks’ property, the story of Bu-Pc 50 imitates the one it copies so closely as to create the impression that it was borrowing this older setting because there existed no special story which could be used to introduce the formulation of its own rule.

¹ All the incidents in Vin 1.35–Vin 1.80 are imputed to a time when the lord was making a long stay in Rājagaha. ² BD 2, Introduction, p.xivff.

Some of the twenty-eight rules whose provenance is given as Sāvatthī, for example Bu-Pc 63, Bu-Pc 69, Bu-Pc 73, Bu-Pc 79, Bu-Pc 80, by dealing with the internal polity of a saṅgha, are portraying an organisation no longer in its infancy. For they presuppose a time when the saṅgha had been in existence long enough to have developed a working constitution of a certain complexity. They speak of such technical institutes as “formal acts” and their carrying out (Bu-Pc 63, Bu-Pc 79, Bu-Pc 80), of the giving of chanda, or an absentee member’s consent by proxy to a fellow monk to attend a business meeting of the Order on his behalf (Bu-Pc 79, Bu-Pc 80), and of “legal questions” together with a ban on reopening these once they had been settled “according to rule” (Bu-Pc 63). Thus, as Bu-Pc 63 shows, the attempt to safeguard the validity and finality of legal questions that had already been settled implies work still going forward in regard to legal questions, although perhaps the procedure which was gradually adopted was brought to its conclusion in this Pācittiya. Two Pācittiyas, Bu-Pc 79 and Bu-Pc 81 (locus: Rājagaha), also seek to prevent a monk from making criticisms, khīyadhamaṁ āpajjati, after he has taken part in some constitutional proceedings. He must abide by the decisions that were taken then and in his presence, just as by Bu-Pc 63 he must abide by whatever verdict had been given on a legal question.

Other Pācittiya in this volume also show signs of being relatively late. Bu-Pc 70 refers to the material of Bu-Pc 5, and Bu-Pc 77 to that of Bu-Pc 65, hence both must be later than the Pācittiya to which they refer. Bu-Pc 73 speaks of “a rule being handed down in a clause, contained in a clause,” dhammo suttagato suttāpiyāpanno, and due to be recited at every half-monthly recitation of the Pātimokkha rules, as though the rule referred to were to this extent fixed and stable. The sikkhāpada of this Pācittiya has a late ring about it, the language and thought depicting a time that had progressed some way beyond the archaic.

In my Introduction to Book of the Discipline vol.2 I took up the question\footnote{BD 2, Introduction, p.xxxiv.} raised by Oldenberg and Rhys Davids of the comparative age of those Pācittiya noticed by them as “formulated with the utmost brevity.” After an examination of these Pācittiya I came to the tentative conclusion that they may mark some relatively late stage in the growth of the disciplinary code. I remarked that Bu-Pc 72 and Bu-Pc 73 “conform to” this brief type. Now the internal evidence of these two Pācittiya suggests references to times when constitutionally the saṅgha was fairly well developed. Therefore such evidence may be regarded as contributing to the validity of the hypothesis that the Pācittiya which are briefly stated, as well as those which conform to this type, belong to a comparatively late date.

But yet I think it unsafe to attempt any correlation of rules which seem to be late with Gotama’s protracted residence at Sāvatthī towards the end of his life. For other rules which bear the stamp of earlier formulation are said to have been set forth when the lord was here, while still others which might appear to emanate from later days were promulgated when he is said to have been elsewhere.

This same feature, the great preponderance of sayings and discourses said to have been delivered at Sāvatthī by the lord, is to be found in the Saṁyutta.¹ In this Collection, the phrase Sāvatthī nidānam sometimes occurs as well as a “condensed opening formula”;² and it is this that has led to the suggestion of nidāna here referring “to the source of the deposited and transmitted record ... and not to the original scene of the original utterance.”³ Although the word nidāna does not occur in such a connection in the Vinaya, future historians will have to bear in mind the possibility of names of places, Sāvatthī as well as the others, referring to the centres where “repeaters” met when the canon was being established, instead of to the scene where the discourse was reputed to have been given or the rule laid down. Against this, however, we have to set the small villages, the hill-tops and mountain-sides spoken of throughout the Suttas as the places where the lord or his disciples were staying, but which were too small or remote ever to have reached eminence as centres of learning, repeating or codifying.

We may now consider various peculiarities manifest in some of the Pācittiyas already referred to as well as in others. Bu-Pc 72, for example, contains at least three further points which require some analysis. In the first place, in speaking of “mastering discipline under Upāli,” discipline, Vinaya, is incidentally shown to have acquired complexity and magnitude sufficient to attract expert study. Thus to understand it properly, in detail and in its various aspects and ramifications, the help of some competent person, such as Upāli, the great expert on discipline, was needed. According to the Vinaya tradition, this monk played a leading part at the first Council. There are also records showing him to have been with Gotama since relatively early days of his ministry.⁴ This will mean, in the first place, that Upāli will have had good opportunity to study the rules as they came into being and grew into a body; but that, in the second, had this body not attained an appreciable size, it could not have formed a worthy subject for any disciple’s study and mastery. Therefore the desire of the monks in Bu-Pc 72 to learn discipline under Upāli (because the lord, as they are recorded to say, in praising discipline praises Upāli again and again), may be ascribed to some indefinite time subsequent to the establishment of this monk’s reputation as the most eminent exponent of this branch of study.

Again, Bu-Pc 72 in referring to “the lesser and minor rules of training,” khuddānukkhudakāni sikkhāpadāni, does so in a way suggestive of some attempt at classification already made for these.¹ This was a matter, as Vin 2.287 asserts, on which those elders who attended the first Council were themselves at variance. The Old Commentary on Bu-Pc 72 is silent on the subject. It is very possible, as B.C. Law points out,² and in fact it is almost certain, that the rules themselves had existed in a classified form since the earliest times. It would therefore be fallacious to find in any mention of “the lesser and minor rules of discipline” a pointer to some particular epoch of early Buddhist monastic history. At the same time, such a reference cannot belong to a time before there were sufficient rules and sufficient types of rules to merit classification.

Besides the term khuddānukkhudakāni sikkhāpadāni, Bu-Pc 72 also contains the term abhidhamma. So, too, does Nuns’ Bi-Pc 95. The meaning of this term is debatable, since the term must have gone through several fluctuations before coming to stand as the title of the third Piṭaka. Thus the particular meaning ascribed to it in any one context must depend largely on the sense, linguistic style and terminology of that whole context, which should therefore be considered on its own merits. I think that, not counting parallel passages, the word abhidhamma does not appear more than ten times in the first two Piṭakas, three of these being in the Vinaya.³ I will here confine myself to the two occasions when the word occurs in Vin 4. These are at Vin 4.144 and Vin 4.344.

Now Oldenberg⁴ and Max Müller,⁵ by basing their arguments

---

¹ See below, BD 3.41, p. 1. ² History of Pali Literature, i.19. ³ Vin 1.64 = Vin 1.68, Vin 4.144, Vin 1.344. References in the admittedly later Parivāra—e.g., Vin 5.2, Vin 5.86—are not counted among the “ten times” that abhidhamma appears. ⁴ Vin 1, Introduction, p.xff. ⁵ Dhammapada (Sacred Books of the East X), 1st edition 1881, 2nd edition 1898, 1924, Introduction, p.xlff.
on the Vinaya accounts, have established that the Abhidhamma as a Piṭaka was not known by the time of the first Council. Thus the term abhidhamma when found in the Vinayapiṭaka and the Suttapiṭaka should not be taken to refer to the third Piṭaka, at least not to it in its finished closed form, unless the term can be regarded on such occasions as a later interpolation. Rather it should be taken as referring to some material or method in existence prior to the compilation of this Piṭaka, and out of which it was gradually elaborated and eventually formed.

The importance of the term cannot be appreciated unless the meaning be understood. This will to a large extent depend upon the meaning or meanings attributed to the great word dhamma. Since an investigation of this has been undertaken by others,¹ let us see dhamma as “doctrine,” as what had been and as what was being taught to disciples both by the lord and by his fellow workers, as religious views, precepts, sayings, which before being codified into an external body of doctrine were as yet appealing direct to the conscience, dhamma, in man, and to the deity, ātman and dhamma, which in the sixth century B.C. in India was held to be immanent in him.

Abhi-prefixed to a noun has in general an intensive meaning of higher, super, additional; and it can also mean “concerning,” “pertaining to.” Thus for the compound abhidhamma, we get some such phrase as “the higher doctrine,” “further, extra doctrine” or “what pertains to the doctrine”. It is possible that the cleavage between these two is not very great.

At both Vin 4.144 and Vin 4.344, abhidhamma is associated with Vinaya and also with suttanta, the words which gave the titles to the first and second Piṭakas. But in the former passage these three terms are also associated with gāthā, metric verses, songs, poems. This quartet is as unique in Pali canonical literature as is the perfect, unadulterated triad of vinaya suttanta abhidhamma at Vin 4.344. Yet the very presence of the word gāthā, is enough to preclude the term abhidhamma from standing for the literary exegesis of that name, for no reference to the third Piṭaka as such would have combined a reference to part of the material, verses, which one of the Piṭakas finally came to include. Moreover, with verses being made since very early days, there is no reason to suppose the reference to the word gāthā in Monks’ Bu-Pc 72 to stand for any completed collection or collections of verses, as Oldenberg suggests.¹

As already mentioned, Monks’ Bu-Pc 72 purports to refer to the time when Upāli was alive. But since he could not long have survived the first Council, in the Vinaya accounts of which there is no mention of the Abhidhamma, this as a Piṭaka could not well have been compiled and completed, until after his death. There is thus no justification for seeing here in abhidhamma the title of the third Piṭaka, in spite of its proximity to words which were used as the titles of the two earlier Piṭakas.

Although we can say fairly confidently what abhidhamma does not mean here, it is by no means so easy to assess what it does mean. A monk may say to another, “Master suttantas or verses (gāthā) or abhidhamma and afterwards you will master discipline.” To make this the chief aim is only suitable in a disciplinary compilation. It may be objected that, since for the purpose of mastering Vinaya, mastery of the suttantas is put forward as an alternative to mastery of abhidhamma, there might be some redundancy; for the suttantas are the repositories of dhamma. But if abhidhamma be taken to intensify the meaning of dhamma, or to refer to some method of teaching or learning it—by catechism, by analysis of terms, or by an almost lexicographical arrangement of synonyms—this difficulty would to a large extent fall away. Any one of these would imply something “extra” to dhamma, not in the sense of the addition of any fresh material, so much as of the contrivance of a new and systematised method of presenting some of the obscurer and more fundamental terms and concepts which it comprises.

If this be conceded, there would result for the monk who wants to master Vinaya a choice of two approaches to dhamma, which considering its immense importance to Gotama and his early followers is not out of proportion. Either, since the Vinaya itself contains no broad principles of ethics, he would study dhamma as handed down in the Suttas or as spoken in his hearing, in order to convince himself of the moral ground and the ideal which inspire the discipline and command adherence to its mass of particular rules. Or he would take the more austere way of approaching Vinaya through abhidhamma, an intellectual exercise perhaps, devoid of all extraneous matter, in which the meaning of dhamma terms and concepts is to be grasped through their grouping, through their classified relations of identity and dependence and so on, instead of through the more picturesque, personal and ortatory methods, often made intelligible by homely parable and simile, which is the Suttanta way of presenting dhamma.

¹ Vin.1, Introduction, p. xii, n. 2.

As in the mastery of dhamma, so in the mastery of gāthā, the disciple anxious to master Vinaya would find in them an inspiration to urge him, as the song-makers themselves had found elsewhere their own inspiration, to lead, to fulfil and to exult in brahmacariya, the godly life or faring. The gāthā, provide as it were a human approach, often a record of human experience, their value as spurs to mastering Vinaya lying in their appeal to the more emotional type of disciple, to the one who wants some personal example to emulate; whereas the mastery of abhidhamma would provide a field to attract the more intellectual type, while mastery of suttantas would stir the normally virtuous man of average mental equipment to act unremittingly in thought, word and deed from the dictates of an awakened conscience.

The abhidhamma passage in Nuns’ Bi-Pc 95 is stated by Oldenberg to be “the only passage in the Vinaya which really presupposes the existence of an Abhidhamma Pīṭaka,”¹ and in which “we can unhesitatingly assume” these “words” to be an interpolation. Which exact “words “he means is not quite clear, since he only italicises abhidhamma. But probably he means no more than abhidhamma vā (or). A nun, according to this Pācittiya, having obtained a monk’s permission to ask him about suttanta, commits an offence of expiation if she asks him instead about Vinaya or abhidhamma; and it is the same with the two variations on this theme.

¹ Vin.1, Introduction, p.xii, n. 2.

Although I think that Oldenberg is very likely indeed to be right, and there is no internal evidence to suggest that he is wrong, or indeed to suggest anything helpful at all, I cannot feel myself so entirely convinced as he appears to be that the Abhidhamma Piṭaka was in existence by the time of the formulation of this passage. The main reason why I think he may be right is that this triad, appearing once only in the canon, supplies the names of what at some time came to be constituted as the three Piṭakas. Where, as in other contexts, abhidhamma is associated with only one but not with both of the words Vinaya and suttanta, then it is far less likely to have this reference.

On the other hand, although it is true that in the Nuns’ Pācittiya group, Bi-Pc 95 is the last but one of the rules there formulated, we should not be too much swayed by this consideration. For the position of a rule in the class in which it is placed affords no sure guide to its comparative date. For example, in the Monks’ Pācittiya group, some of the rules towards the end have a much earlier aspect than some of those which precede them and which presume certain constitutional developments such as are capable of having arisen only when the Order had reached some degree of long-standing. In a word, since the rules cannot with certitude be said to survive in the order in which they were formulated, they can thus yield no reliable evidence for the historical sequence of their promulgation.

Another interesting Pācittiya among the thirty-two for monks contained in this volume is Bu-Pc 68. The chief person concerned is the “monk called Ariṭṭha.” He is not referred to as “the venerable Ariṭṭha,” āyasmā Ariṭṭho, in accordance with the usual narrative practice of the Vinaya. This indicates an atmosphere of disapproval surrounding him; and indeed he is a monk said to have held “pernicious views.” The whole Ariṭṭha episode occurs again at Vin 2.25–Vin 2.26, with the difference that here at the end, instead of a rule being set forth, the Order is enjoined to carry out an act of suspension against Ariṭṭha. The episode is also given at MN i.130–132. There is a comparable incident at SN iii.109, where to Yamaka, sometimes referred to as “monk,” sometimes as “the venerable,” is attributed a different set of “pernicious views,” and where monks, unable to dissuade him from these themselves, asked Sāriputta to go to him “out of compassion for him.”

Other Pācittiyas which contain material found in the Suttas are Bu-Pc 83, where the passage on the ten dangers of entering a king’s harem has its parallel at AN v.81ff.; and Bu-Pc 85, whose stock enumeration of the various kinds of “low,”¹ “worldly,”² “childish”³ or intellectually inferior talk, tiracchānakathā, occurs at several places in the Suttas.

In the Ariṭṭha Pācittiya there is a noteworthy absence of the stereotyped phrase that “the modest monks looked down upon, criticised, spread it about,” and that having thus complained they told the lord. Here “several monks” tried, so it is recorded, to dissuade Ariṭṭha from his pernicious views by repeating to him the ten similes of the sense-pleasures. It was only when they failed in their object that they told the lord. In accordance with his usual practice, as given in the Vinaya, the lord then asked the offender, here Ariṭṭha, if what the monks said was true. But Ariṭṭha, instead of giving a meek affirmative answer, defended his views, or rather reiterated them, so that the lord is reputed to have upbraided him in exactly the same terms as those used by the “several monks.” It is true that some passages in this Pācittiya, such as that including the similes of the sense-pleasures, portray a literary skill and a knowledge of other Pitākan contexts as only a relatively late “editing” could achieve. Yet the unusual development of the story, its omission of stereotyped phrases, may possibly indicate its derivation from some early source, in which was retained a tradition of an actual sequence of events strong enough to prevent the narrative, on the three occasions when it appears, from falling into the standardised and monotonously recurring Vibhaṅga mould.

¹ Dialogues of the Buddha i.13; Further Dialogues i.362 (“low and beastly”). ² Dialogues of the Buddha i.245; Vinaya Texts ii.20. ³ Dialogues of the Buddha iii.33; KS v.355.

The sikkhāpada of this Pācittiya, Bu-Pc 68, is not so much in accord with Pācittiya formulation as with wording found in the type of Śaṅghādisesa sikkhāpada, where the offender is to be admonished by his fellows up to the third time so as to give up his course. A Nuns’ Pācittiya, Bi-Pc 36, also incorporates into its sikkhāpada the kind of material more usually associated with Śaṅghādisesa formulation.
Such anomalies probably do not arise through pure chance or pure carelessness, for in fact the early “editors” left little to chance, and were not nearly so careless as is sometimes thought. So that we have to attempt to account for the existence of these peculiarities in other ways. And it may be that the offences to which they refer and which now stand in the Pācittiya groups, were at one time counted as Śaṅghādisesa offences¹; or that these offences only arose after the Śaṅghādisesa group had been closed, and it was thus not possible to include them in it; or that, because the sikkhāpadas decree that the admonition was to be made by “monks” and “nuns” respectively, tacitly meaning a saṅgha—i.e., five or more monks or nuns—and do not give the alternatives of its being made by a “group” or by “one person,” these Pācittiyas automatically assume a Śaṅghādisesa complexion.

Bu-Pc 76 recalls Bu-Ss 8, although in another way. For where in the latter there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order for defaming a monk with an unfounded charge of having committed an offence involving defeat, in Bu-Pc 76 it is an offence of expiation to defame a monk with an unfounded charge of having committed an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

We have also seen that in its story Bu-Pc 86 closely follows Bu-NP 22. Likewise Bu-Pc 82 recalls Bu-NP 30. In the former the offence is to appropriate for another person, puggala, benefits given to the Order, while in the latter it is to appropriate for oneself any such benefits. A great point in monastic life was communal ownership. The community should not be deprived for any individual, whoever he might be, of anything to which it had a rightful claim. But naturally, in the Pācittiya, the offending monk cannot as part of his penalty forfeit the article wrongfully appropriated by him, for presumably he had handed it over to another monk. I think it just as much this practical consideration as the fact that, of two evils, it is less bad to appropriate for another than for oneself, which was instrumental in determining the classification and hence the seriousness of these two comparable offences. To my mind the work of the early “editors” was so careful and rationally based that latter-day strictures such as S. Dutt’s, that “there is no reason why rule 82 of Pācittiya should be placed under that category while rule 30 of the Nissaggiyas (comes) under another category,”¹ must often with a fuller understanding of Vinaya outlook fall to the ground.

¹ See BD 1.xxxiiff.

The last of the Monks’ Pācittiyas, Bu-Pc 92, is noticeable for containing the word sugata, often translated “well-farer.” As an epithet it is usually assigned to Gotama, but occasionally also to his disciples.² Its appearance in the Vibhaṅgas is very rare.³ This Pācittiya also suggests the growth of a legend already springing up round the Founder, for in it it seems as though his robe, called sugata-cīvara, was of a special size, rather larger than that permitted to the disciples.

The use of sugata in such a compound is all the more remarkable, for the context itself rules out the meaning of “standard “or “accepted,” which is what sugata appears to mean in the compounds sugataṅgula (Vin 1.297, Vin 4.168), standard finger-breadth, and sugatavidatthi, standard span, a word which occurs at Vin 3.149 and also in the rule of Bu-Pc 92 itself, in explanation of the correct measurement of a sugatacīvara. The Founder, who reckoned himself a man amongst men, had at one time, as other records show, been content with robe-material picked piecemeal from the rag-heap. Moreover, it is recorded that “he exchanged robes with Mahā-Kassapa. Of the two sets of robes brought by Pukkusa, one was given to Ānanda, and one was reserved for the Buddha himself; and no one can read the account in the Mahāparinibbāna Sutta without feeling that both are supposed to be of the same size.”¹ It is also recorded that the brahmin Piṅgiyānin, having been presented with five hundred robes by the Licchavis, handed these on to the lord.²

¹ Early Buddhist Monachism, p. 97. ² AN i.217ff.; SN iv.252f. ³ Vin 3.1, Vin 3.9

Although the narrative part of this Pācittiya appears to refer to the lifetime of the Founder, it is not easy to believe in view of these records that before his death, by which time moreover, as the Mahāparinibbāna-suttanta shows, he was lonely and deserted, his disciples would have signified their admiration of him by ascribing to him a physical superiority. And for the purpose of this Pācittiya there was no need to do this. For had the Vinaya compilers wished to say that a robe in excess of a proper measure was not to be worn by monks, they could have found other means to do so more in line with their usual ways of expressing themselves.

On the other hand, if it were not giving utterance to some growing legend in which physical size was looked upon as a fitting accompaniment to mental strength, Bu-Pc 92 may possibly be looking back to the theory of the thirty-two marks of the Great Man,³ which as Rhys Davids says is pre-Buddhist.⁴ But in this, the noble proportions by which the Great Man was marked were deemed to be perfect rather than specially large. This Pācittiya therefore remains something of a mystery and something of a misfit, while showing some unmistakable signs of late “editing.”

The last seven Pācittiyas form a group in which the penalty of expiation is combined with some other form of penalty. As in the class of offences of expiation involving forfeiture, Nissaggiyāṁ Pācittiyaṁ, we have here “offences of expiation involving cutting down,” chedanakaṁ pācittiyaṁ (Bu-Pc 87, Bu-Pc 89–Bu-Pc 92, and also Nuns’ Bi-Pc 22); “involving breaking up,” bhedanakaṁ pācittiyaṁ (Bu-Pc 86); “involving tearing off,” uddālanakaṁ pācittiyaṁ (Bu-Pc 88).

These Pācittiyas are concerned with prescribing the right measurements, and to a lesser degree the right materials, for some of the articles allowable to monks and used by them. They therefore do not belong to the earliest days of the Order’s history, but to a time subsequent to the “allowance” of those articles for whose proper measurement and so on they prescribe. I cannot agree with S. Dutt that “rules Bu-Pc 86–Bu-Pc 92 (except one) hang together,”¹ in view of the fact that rules Bu-Pc 86–Bu-Pc 92 form a special class entailing an extra penalty, and into which rules Bu-Pc 83 and Bu-Pc 24 no more fit than does rule Bu-Pc 85, the one to which he takes exception.

¹ Vinaya Texts i.54, n. 3. ² AN iii.239. ³ DN ii.16; MN i.136, MN i.137. ⁴ Dialogues of the Buddha i.110, n. 2.

It may be noted that the Old Commentary does not define sūcighara in Bu-Pc 86, although it does so in Bu-Pc 60. This omission cannot be definitely ascribed to any feeling that the word did not need to be explained again. For the Old Commentary on several occasions defines the same words—for example, “robe,” “householder,” “he knows,” “nun,” in exactly the same terms; or, guided by circumstances, it defines the same words—for example, “sleeping-place” and, again, “householder,” in different terms. Its omissions must be due either to carelessness or to some studied purpose or presupposition to which we have not as yet the clue. In Book of the Discipline vol.2, I have drawn attention to some of these commentarial omissions.² In this volume the Old Commentary fails to define udāka, water, in Bu-Pc 62; nihata, settled, in Bu-Pc 63; puggala, person, individual, in Bu-Pc 65; ekaddhānamagga, the same high-road, in Bu-Pc 66, Bu-Pc 67; chandaṁ datvā, having given leave of absence, in Bu-Pc 79; and chandaṁ datvā and also vattamānāya, being engaged in, in Bu-Pc 80. Neither does the Old Commentary attempt any explanation of words contained in some sikkhāpadas but said to have been spoken by the offending monks, as for example in Bu-Pc 68, Bu-Pc 70, Bu-Pc 72, Bu-Pc 73, Bu-Pc 77, Bu-Pc 78. But the reason for this is understandable: these sentences are clear enough for all ordinary purposes, nor are they attributed to the lord. They therefore do not merit the meticulous care and attention usually bestowed on words said to have been used by him in formulating the rules, and which the Old Commentary generally aims at rendering as lucid as possible by synonyms or by some more reasoned form of interpretation.

¹ Early Buddhist Monachism, p. 97. ² BD 2, Introduction, p. xxvf.
Because these thirty-two Pācittiyas deal with the corporate as well as with the individual behaviour of monks, it is not surprising to find in them no more than three records of lay people’s complaints of monks’ behaviour; while on the other hand “modest monks” are recorded to have complained as many as twenty-four times, monks who were elders once (Bu-Pc 92) and “several monks” twice (Bu-Pc 68, Bu-Pc 70). Yet on many occasions, as the narratives show, this large conventual source of criticism might, if taken by itself, give a somewhat misleading notion of the amount of association between the monks and lay people which these same Pācittiyas portray. That such association was easy and unrestricted needs no labouring at this stage in Pali studies. Examples of it may be found in Bu-Pc 66, Bu-Pc 67, Bu-Pc 83–Bu-Pc 86, Bu-Pc 88.

In addition, twice Gotama is reputed to formulate a rule as the result of some piece of direct evidence observed by him and not because someone had grumbled. Thus, in Bu-Pc 87, it is recorded how the lord, having come to Upananda’s abide, himself takes exception to this disciple’s body which evidently was too high. Again, the lord is recorded, in Bu-Pc 65, to hear the noise made by boys who had been ordained before they were twenty years old, and himself to raise objections to ordaining a person, puggala, into the Order before he was of an age to stand the physical hardships of monastic life.

It is a little curious that this is put as high as twenty, but it was doubtless to allow an entrant to develop sufficient stamina to render improbable his return to the “low life of a layman,” for any such withdrawal from the Order was a blur on its reputation. In other connections, notably in the Jātaka, the “age of discretion” is said to be reached when a boy becomes sixteen. Nuns’ Bi-Pc 74 makes it an offence for a nun to ordain a girl, a maiden, kumāribhūta, which the Old Commentary explains by sāmaṇerī, a novice, who was less than twenty. This therefore seems a kind of recognised age at which or over which to receive the upasampadā ordination. For pabbajjā, going forth into the Order, although not into full membership, clearly is not meant. Monks’ Bu-Pc 65 uses the word upasampādeti, and Nuns’ Bi-
thebookofthediscipline

Pc 61–Bu-Pc 83 vuttaṭēti, which the Old Commentary consistently explains by upasampādeti as though these two words mean the same thing.

In Monks’ Bu-Pc 65 the boy Upāli and his young friends are recorded to have obtained the consent of their parents to “go forth.” It was necessary for a boy, putta, to obtain this sanction¹ for a measure which the Vinaya states must not be accorded a youth, dāraka, if he were less than fifteen years of age.² The mistake of the monks, in Bu-Pc 65, seems to have been to let these youths go forth and simultaneously to confer the upasampadā on them, pabbājesuṁ upasampādesuṁ, while they were still under twenty years old. It was the latter step which was here made to entail an offence of expiation, not for the ordinand but for the ordaining monks; elsewhere it is stated that a monk incurs an offence of wrong-doing if he allows a youth under fifteen to go forth.³ It would therefore seem as if the six boys of whom the Theragāthā and its Commentary speak as each one having gone forth, with his parent’s consent, at the age of seven,⁴ must antedate the Vinaya ruling, unless some other hypothesis to explain this discrepancy be found. It is tenable to suppose that in the early days of the Order a person might be admitted to its ranks by being ordained at the same time as he was allowed to go forth. The splitting of this early double process into two parts—allowing to go forth and ordination, as well as the minimum age clauses governing the legality of carrying out either process—was doubtless a later introduction into the growing monastic machinery.

In the sikkhāpadas of Monks’ Bu-Pc 65 and Nuns’ Bi-Pc 71–Bi-Pc 73, the two words puggala and kumāribhūtā, respectively used to designate the kind of person not to be ordained if he or she were not yet twenty, are striking enough to arrest attention. Puggala is most unfortunately not noticed by the Old Commentary on Monks’ Bu-Pc 65. But I suspect it here to have a monastic intention, as it has when it occurs as the third member of the triad saṅgha, gaṇa, puggala, Order, group, individual (monk). Another form of this triad is saṅgha, sambahulā bhikkhū, eka bhikkhu, where eka bhikkhu balances puggala and sambahulā bhikkhū balances gaṇa. The feminine equivalent of this triad supplies additional evidence for the merging of puggala and bhikkhu. For those parts of the legislative apparatus affecting nuns provide no exact counterpart to puggala, since the one word, ekabhikkhuni, one nun, does duty in the nuns’ triad for the two words, puggala and eka bhikkhu, of the monks’ triads. Moreover, Nissaggiya regulations for forfeiture make it clear that the use of these two words, puggala and eka bhikkhu, is derived more from some convention than from any desire to discriminate between the meaning, status or functions of the subject denoted by either.

¹ Vin1.83. ² Vin1.79. ³ Vin1.79. ⁴ Psalms of the Brethren 37f., 60f., 73, 220, 231f., 233f.

Although the term puggala thus to some extent acquired the technical sense of “monk” in monastic terminology, it continued to be in vogue among the laity and also to be widely used by monks in talking of them. In addition lay life had the words purisa, man, male, and kumāra, boy. Monks also made use of these words, but perhaps more for the purpose of addressing or referring to men and boys (or girls, kumāriyo), still “in the world”¹ than for addressing or referring to members of the Order. Purisa and kumāraka are defined respectively at Vin 4.334 as having attained and as not having attained to twenty years of age. But at Vin 4.269, Vin 4.316 purisa is defined as “a human man (or male person manussapurisa), not a yakkha, not a peta, not an animal.”

If a purisa or kumāra went forth he was no longer distinguished by these appellations, which savoured of the world; he became known as a bhikkhu, a monk, and as such might be further differentiated, for example as an elder, a teacher, a preceptor, a pupil, a novice, or a puggala. Regarded as puggala in its technical sense of individual (monk), a monk called puggala for any special purpose or reason would have certain rights and duties in the monastic structure, even before he received the upasampadā, ordination. After this had been conferred on him, and he had entered on to the different rights and ¹ Cf. AN i.136f., where Hatthaka of Āḷavī is addressed by the lord as kumāra; and AN iii.37 where the lord addresses girls newly joining their husbands’ families as kumāriyo.

duties of a full member of the Order, he yet remained liable to be designated as either bhikkhu or puggala.

With the absence from the monks’ terminology of the word ku-māra as a description applicable to a monk while under twenty,¹ and therefore before he was ripe for full ordination, it is odd to find kumāribhūtā, a feminine form, of kumāra, applied to maidens under twenty, but who, because they are represented as having the upasam-padā conferred on them, must already have gone forth and so be in some way members of the Order: probably, novices, sāmaṇerī, as the Old Commentary states, or probationers.

That the admissibility of using puggala, monkish man, instead of bhikkhu, monk, was not unknown to the Aṅguttara compilers, is apparent from AN iii.269, where their fellows in the godly life, sabrahmacārī, might engage in criticism, a Vinaya expression,² if they “lived in communion,” also a Vinaya expression, with such men puggalehi, as are cemetery-like. Here the word puggala, from its association with sabrahmācarī, is at once marked as having a monastic reference. Similarly at AN iii.270 the dangers of becoming devoted to one person, puggala, show that person to be conceived of as a monk. And at AN i.33 the word puggala turns out to be used of Makkhali Gosāla, the leader of a rival sect, but still a recluse who has renounced the world, not a householder.

Conversely both the Devadūta Sutta and Vagga³ show Yama, the lord of death, addressing ekacco, “a certain one,” as purisa in a context which clearly indicates ekacco to be not a monk but a person in the world. Again, AN iii.171–172, in speaking of a “good man,” a donor, meaning a man “in the world,” calls him sap-purisa; and examples could be multiplied.

Now to suggest that the Vinaya and sometimes other parts of the canon use puggala to designate a man who is a monk, is not to say that the term, as applying to male persons in general, vanished from either the monastic or the lay vocabularies. The Aṅguttara alone provides plenty of evidence to the contrary, with its mantra

¹ Cf. definition of kumāra at Vin.4.334.    ² See Vin.4.152, Vin.4.154, Vin.4.331.
³ MN 130 and AN i.138. occurring thirteen times: “There are in the world three sorts of) men,” and thirty-six times “four (sorts of) men,”¹ puggala. Nor can it be said that the use of purisa as referring either to man as homo or as “man in he world” (as against in the houseless state), entailed to complete lapse from the monks’ vocabulary as a arm applying to monks. At the same time it may be marked that when so used there is a tendency for it to appear in a compound with another word affixed to it.

For example, mahā-purisa occurs as an honorific title ascribed to Gotama, the great recluse; and a monk endowed with certain factors² or engaged on certain high mental work³ is called uttama-purisa, the highest man. At Vin ⁴.⁶³, Vin ⁴.⁶⁵ nuns are recorded to address monks obliquely as agga-purisa, the chief, topmost men. Yet although people, human kind, are often denoted by the term manussa, it is not unreasonable to see purisa in these two Vinaya passages as equivalent to homosapiens, man and woman. For the nuns, I think, were not saying that the monks were the chief of all males, but only of the present company; and that consisted of monks and nuns.

There is also the interesting compound purisa-puggala, “male person,”⁴ which in various Vinaya passages seems to be useful when reference is intended at one and the same time to men of the world and men of the cloister. In Nuns’ Pārājika Bi-Pj ⁵, Bi-Pj ⁸ and Bi-Ss ⁵, purisapuggala is defined in the same way as is purisa in their Bi-Pc ¹¹, Bi-Pc ¹² and Bi-Pc ⁶⁰. The first word in this definition is manussa-purisa, a human male. This will embrace monks and non-monks. For however much nuns may be shown on these six occasions to have behaved unsuitably with men in the world, called purisapuggala and purisa, the legislation on such behaviour was extended to cover the conduct of nuns towards monks in similar circumstances. I think it highly probable that in Nuns’ Bi-Pj ⁵, Bi-Pj ⁸ and Bi-Ss ⁵, the monkish puggala was added to the worldly purisa, and that in Bi-Pc ¹¹, Bi-Pc ¹², and Bi-Pc 60 the worldly purisa was defined as manussapurisa, human male, so as to leave the nuns no grounds for arguing that these rules did not apply to their behaviour equally with monks as with men leading the household life. Thus the word purisapuggala was used to place beyond all doubt the need for nuns to refrain from acting undesirably either with men in the world or with monks and recluses. But when this word was not used, the same sense was achieved by the Old Commentary’s definition of purisa as manussa-purisa. For both this and purisapuggala express the male of the human species under the double aspect of householder and monk.

¹ See gs ii, Introduction, p.xi. ² AN v.16; SN iii.61. ³ SN ii.278. ⁴ So translated, gs iii.156, and see also gs iii.274 n. See Mrs. RHYS DAVIDS, “Vanished Sakyan Window,” Wayfarer’s Words, ii.622, for further references.

The same line of argument could doubtless be applied to the eight purisapuggala mentioned at AN iii.212. Here the Order is not called the Order of monks, bhikkusaṅgha, but the Order of disciples, sāvakasaṅgha, which at once enlarges the scope of saṅgha to include lay as well as monastic disciples. For by the eight purisapuggala are meant those on the four ways and those who have attained the fruits of the ways, achievements, as many records testify, not confined to monks alone, but won too by lay disciples. Very likely the force of purisapuggala is here to include potentially both male lay disciples and monks; but to exclude women, both female lay disciples and nuns, not necessarily through a desire to depreciate them, for many are recorded to have gained the ways and the fruits, but merely because the sight of the “white-frocked householder,” Anāthapiṇḍika, inspired the lord to address Sāriputta with his mind focussed on men.

My conclusion, however tentative it may be, is that for Vinaya interpretation, the question of whether man became “lessened in worth as man, as homo, by the word puggala, male, being used for purisa, the older form”¹ is beside the point, for with Vinaya we are in the region of technicalities. Whatever the intrinsic meaning of these two words, whatever their age, their worth, both were needed in the monastic scheme and idiom, the one, puggala, acquiring a special and technical meaning equivalent to “monk”; and the other, purisa, being used both as a term of honour among monks and also as carrying particular reference to men who were not monks.

¹ gs ii, Introduction, p.xi; Cf. gs iii.247, n.

The Sekhiyas

The rules for training, sekhiyā dhammā, numbering seventy-five, are the same for monks and nuns. Several interesting points arise. In the first place, the provenance for all except Bu-Sk 51, Bu-Sk 55, Bu-Sk 56 is given as Sāvatthī. Secondly, the principal actors in the stories leading up to each “training to be observed” are invariably said to be the group of six monks, and then in the Nuns’ Sekhiyas, the group of six nuns. Thirdly, an offence of wrong-doing is incurred by any monk or nun who, out of disrespect, yo(yā)anādariyaṁ paṭicca, flies in the face of the training promulgated. These two items: “out of disrespect” and offence of wrong-doing, are common to all the trainings to be observed. Fourthly, the trainings fall into three groups:

1. Bu-Sk 1–Bu-Sk 56 are concerned with such etiquette and decent, polite behaviour as is to be shown by a monk or nun when visiting houses for almsfood;
2. Bu-Sk 57–Bu-Sk 72 are concerned with a regard to be accorded dhamma, for they rule that it should not be taught to people who, because of this circumstance or that, would be shutting the door to both a respectful giving and a respectful hearing of dhamma,
3. Bu-Sk 73–Bu-Sk 75 are concerned with unsuitable ways of obeying the calls of nature and of spitting.

These matters would no doubt have lost some of their first importance once Buddhism became triumphantly established, although their force as a guide to good manners has been in no way diminished by the passage of time. But when in its infancy early Buddhism was groping its way, seeking to attract adherents in a very critical world which had a big choice of teachings and opinions before it, when it was in fact competing with other sects, it was necessary for it to do all in its power to make itself acceptable and to arrange its external features in such a way as not to jeopardise any chances of a fair hearing for its message.

According to the early Buddhist way of thinking, no attempt should be made to kindle faith in this message unless people showed they were ready to listen in humility to what would be taught. A very interesting example occurs in the Samyutta.¹ A monk, Udayin,² is shown refusing to speak dhamma to a brahmin lady so long as she sat down on a high seat,³ put on her sandals,⁴ and muffled up (veiled) her head.⁵ We here get a monk scrupulously keeping three of the “rules for training.” He is shown as willing to speak dhamma to a woman, but not until she learns of the respect due to it, and which her pupil eventually tells her about. And when at last he is portrayed as teaching dhamma to this woman, even then, in compliance with Bu-Pc 7, he does not use more than six sentences⁶: arahants point out pleasure-pain when there is eye, when there is tongue, when there is mind, but do not point it out when there is not eye, tongue or mind. No doubt Udayin regarded the brahmin lady’s pupil as the “learned man” whose presence was required by the rule of Bu-Pc 7 when a monk was teaching dhamma to a woman.⁷

A striking parallel to the Sekhiya rules for training in manners is to be found in Clement of Alexandria’s Paedagogus (Instructor).⁸ Clement was apparently beset by the same kind of preoccupations and faced by the same kind of bad manners as were those who drew up the Sekhiyas. His own code of polite, civilised behaviour which he vigorously hoped his fellow Christians would adopt has been put in a nutshell by T.R. Glover,⁹ whom I cannot do better than quote. He says: “Clement of Alexandria has much to say to Christians about the minutiae of manners; they must not scratch themselves or spit in public; they should not guffaw, nor twitch, nor crack their fingers, nor fidget; they must not eat or drink in uncouth styles. Very trifling?

¹ SN iv.121ff. ² There were three of this name, see KS iv.77, n. 2. ³ Bu-Sk 69. ⁴ Bu-Sk 61, Bu-Sk 62. ⁵ Bu-Sk 67. ⁶ SN iv.123. ⁷ BD 2.206. ⁸ Translated in Ante-Nicene Christian Library, vol.iv; CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA, vol.i., Edinburgh, 1871. ⁹ The Disciple, Cambridge, 1941, p. 33.
No, not at all trifling; for these little things annoy the people to whom you have to appeal, to whom Christ has sent you with a message which it is important for them to hear.” Thus India in the sixth and fifth centuries before Christ, and Egypt in the second century after, had the acumen to perceive the value of decorum and good manners in facilitating the growth of friendly interest, even faith, in the new religious ventures experienced by each of these two richly endowed countries.

Nuns’ Pātimokkha Rules

The whole of the Bhikkhunivibhaṅga, the framework together with the statement of the Pātimokkha rules for nuns, falls within this volume. The rules themselves, the sikkhāpada, although in isolation from their framework, have been translated by B.C. Law in two of his works. The list of rules which he gives, telescoping here and there those which have the same tendency, is as useful as a swift guide to the discipline for nuns as is Rhys Davids’s and Oldenberg’s corresponding treatment of the discipline for monks. Waldschmidt has made a comparison of the Pali text of the nuns’ rules with the Sanskrit, Chinese and Tibetan texts obtaining among various of the schools. This study naturally necessitated a translation of each rule (into German), although a complete translation of the whole of the nuns’ Vibhaṅga, that is of the introductory stories, the Old Commentarial material as well as of the rules themselves, would have been beside the point for his purpose. Such a translation occurs, I believe, for the first time in the present volume of the Book of the Discipline.

Both in regard to its grouping and its arrangement of the material surrounding each rule, the Nuns’ Vibhaṅga is planned on exactly the same lines as the Monks’. There is thus a Pārājika group, a Saṅghādis-

---

1. Women in Buddhist Literature, p. 80ff., and History of Pali Literature, i.72ff., which corrects the omission of a “not” in the former, in item (10).
2. Sacred Books of the East XII.
esa, a Nissaggiya Pācittiya, a Pācittiya, a Pāṭidesaniya, a Sekhiya and an Adhikaraṇasamathā dhammā group. The contents of these last two appear to be exact copies, substituting “nun” for “monk,” of the corresponding groups for monks. The nuns have no Aniyatās or undetermined offences.

The Pali Bhikkhuni-vibhaṅga, as it has come down to us, is somewhat misleading in appearance. For the four Pārājikas, the ten Saṅghādisesas, the twelve Nissaggiyas, the ninety-six Pācittiyas and the eight Pāṭidesaniyas there set forth for nuns do not represent, except in the last case, the total number of rules which, according to the Vibhaṅga’s reckoning, fall into these various classes. They represent only those which have to be observed solely by nuns, and which are therefore not included in the discipline laid down for monks. The introductory sentence and the concluding paragraph attached to each class of rules in the Bhikkhuni-vibhaṅga refer respectively to eight Pārājika, seventeen Saṅghādisesa, thirty Nissaggiya, a hundred and sixty-six Pācittiya and eight Pāṭidesaniya rules for nuns, and state that all of these come up for recitation. In effect, therefore, the nuns have not fewer but as many as eighty-four more rules to keep than have the monks. Traditionally those which do not appear in the Nuns’ Vibhaṅga are held to be comprised in the Monks’ Vibhaṅga; and they are also held to be as binding on nuns as they are on monks in spite of their being recorded in the Monks’ Vibhaṅga only.

We may therefore regard the Nuns’ Vibhaṅga in its present form as an abridged version of some more complete Vibhaṅga for nuns. This hypothesis is to some extent strengthened by a surviving fragment of a few lines belonging to the Tibetan Bhikṣunī Prātimokṣa. This fragment has been published by Finot.¹ It contains only the end of one article and the beginning of another, but these can be easily identified as Saṅghādisesas for nuns corresponding to Monks’ Bu-Ss 8 and Bu-Ss 9. The survival of this fragment tempts us to presume as not impossible a time when a Nuns’ Pātimokkha existed in full, and when it was not cut down, as it now is in the Pali Vibhaṅga, to include no more than those rules held to be incumbent only on nuns, and to exclude those others which, while being preserved only in the Vibhaṅga for monks, which naturally shows that monks should observe them, are also traditionally held to form part of the authorised discipline for nuns.

The rules which the Nuns’ Vibhaṅga assumes to exist and to be binding on nuns, but which are not now to be found in that Vibhaṅga, have been identified by Buddhaghosa with various rules in the Monks’ Vibhaṅga. And, in various parts of his Vinaya Commentary,¹ he has named such rules as he holds to be observable by both sides of the Order. With the exception of Finot’s fragment, this great commentator is our sole authority for those rules for nuns which are supposed to be included in the Monks’ Vibhaṅga, and which, although they are not incorporated in the existing form of the Pali Bhikkhunivibhaṅga, are traditionally held to be operative not only for monks but for nuns as well.

If we accept Buddhaghosa’s opinions, the nuns’ eight Pārājikas appear to consist of those four laid down in the Nuns’ Pārājika class in addition to those four laid down in the Monks’ Pārājika class. While therefore the nuns have four Pārājika rules peculiar to themselves, and hence four in excess of the number laid down for monks, there are on the other hand no Pārājikas peculiar to monks, since their complete set of four is also regarded as binding on nuns.

This is farther borne out by the occurrence of the word pi (too, also), in the sikkhāpada not only of the last three but also of the first of the Nuns’ Pārājikas: ayam pi pārājikā hoti, “she too becomes one who is defeated,” which means, according to the Old Commentary, that “she is so called in reference to the former (or preceding).” The presence of the word pi in the text of the “rule” of Nuns’ Bi-Pj 5 is significant. The Reference which it implies is to all foregoing Pārājikas. Among the total of eight Pārājikas, pi is absent only from Monks’ Bu-Pj 1, where the corresponding phrase merely runs pārājiko hoti. Thus each of ¹ Vin-a 906, Vin-a 915, Vin-a 947, Vin-a 948. Failure to appreciate this important point invalidates most of Miss D.N. BHAGVAT’s argument in her Early Buddhist Jurisprudence, p.164ff.

the remaining seven rules is held to concur, through its use of pi, in connecting itself with whatever may be the number, one to seven, of Pārājika rules which has preceded it. Had pi been absent from Nuns’ Bi-Pj 5, then where it occurs in their Bi-Pj 6–Bi-Pj 8, it would no doubt normally have been taken to refer to their Bi-Pj 5 only, as the beginning of a series. But its occurrence in Bi-Pj 5 itself pushes this beginning further back still: to the Monks’ Pārājika class.

The Nuns’ Pārājika rules further exhibit a curious and unparalleled feature, in that each rule is, in the “rule” itself, named after the woman who does the action giving rise to the particular offence which the rules severally aim at checking. This name is not commented upon by the Old Commentary because, as Buddhaghosa says (Vin-a 90), “It is only the name of the one who is defeated.” She may be one who touched (a man) above his knees (Bi-Pj 5); one who conceals a fault (Bi-Pj 6); one who imitates a monk who has been suspended (by the Order) (Bi-Pj 7); or one who does eight things (Bi-Pj 8), that is, indulges in the eight kinds of dealings with men enumerated in the “rule” of Bi-Pj 8. These are the offences against which the Nuns’ Pārājikas legislate.

It should be noticed that, just as part of the Old Commentary’s definition of a monk who is defeated is that he is not a son of the Sakyans, asakyaputtiya, so part of its definition of a nun who is defeated is that she is not a daughter of the Sakyans, asakyadhītā. This latter appellation occurs again in Nuns’ Bi-Ss 10, but in the positive, sakyadhītā.

In their Saṅghādisesa class the nuns are said to have seventeen rules of this type, although only ten are there set forth. The monks have thirteen. According to Buddhaghosa, six out of these thirteen rules are applicable to monks only, the remaining seven being observable by nuns as well. He indicates these latter to be Monks’ Bu-Ss 5, Bu-Ss 8, Bu-Ss 9, all of which become offences at once (paṭhamāpatti-ka), and Monks’ Bu-Ss 10–Bu-Ss 13, which constitute the whole of the subdivision where offences become so on the third admonition of a monk or nun by other monks or nuns respectively (yāvatatiyaka).
The wording of the Monks’ Saṅghādisesa “rules” offers an interesting contrast to that of the Nuns’ Saṅghādisesa “rules.” For each of the monks’ rules names the penalty incurred in the briefest possible way, simply by using the one word saṅghādiseso, “there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.” This holds good of the two groups into which the Saṅghādisesa offences are divided: those where the offences are so at once, and those where they are so on the third (and unsuccessful) admonition. The monks’ rules do not explicitly mention these two groups by name, but their existence is recognised by the internal evidence of the “rules” themselves, especially in the case of the second group, that comprising Monks’ Bu-Ss10–Bu-Ss13; and also by the paragraph which, in concluding the Monks’ Saṅghādisesa Section, places nine of these offences under group (1) and four under group (2). In the Nuns’ Saṅghādisesa “rules” the nature of the offence is stated more explicitly and therefore at greater length than in the monks’. In fact, not one word, but a sentence is used: ayam pi bhikkhunī paṭhamāpattikaṁ (yāvatatiyakaṁ) dhammaṁ āpannā nissāraṇiyaṁ saṅghādisesaṁ, that nun also has fallen into a matter that is an offence at once (on the third admonition), entailing a formal meeting of the Order involving being sent away.

Now this sentence contains several interesting points. In the first place, the pi, although occurring unfailingly in Bi-Ss2–Bi-Ss13, does not occur in the “rule” of Bi-Ss1, so that this cannot be held to pay any reference to preceding, that is, on the analogy of the Pārājikas, to the Monks’ Saṅghādisesas, or in particular to those seven of them which Buddhaghosa asseverates to be operative for both sides of the Order: Monks’ Bu-Ss5, Bu-Ss8–Bu-Ss13. The absence of pi from this context raises the question whether, when the Saṅghādisesa standing first in the nuns’ class was drawn up, those others now found only in the monks’ class, but said to be observable also by nuns, were in actual fact not already framed, and hence incapable of forming a point of reference for Nuns’ Bi-Ss1. We have no conclusive evidence one way or the other on which to base an answer to this question. All that can be said is that there is nothing inherent in Nuns’ Bi-Ss 1 to lead us to assign its formulation to a date, posterior to the formulation of those seven which are posited by Buddhaghosa as common to both sides of the Order. In fact, had it not been that Monks’ Bu-Ss 12 were included in this list, there would have been certain grounds for regarding Nuns’ Bi-Ss 1 as belonging to a date earlier than any of these others, with the possible exception of one of them, and therefore as a matter of history unable to refer to them. For Monks’ Bu-Ss 8 and Bu-Ss 9 speak of a “legal question,” Bu-Ss 10 and Bu-Ss 11 of a schism, both of which, in order to come into being, needed a certain amount of time to elapse after the inception of the Order. Bu-Ss 13, without our looking further than the length at which its “rule” is stated, suggests comparative lateness in formulation. Bu-Ss 5, that against being a go-between, is alone of these rules non-committal as to its possible date.

We thus get one rule (Bu-Ss 5) from which nothing can be gleaned as to its comparative age, one which suggests comparative earliness (Bu-Ss 12), and five which suggest comparative lateness (Bu-Ss 8–Bu-Ss 11, Bu-Ss 13). Yet this evidence, which is in any case no more than tentative, is in addition neither sufficiently sound nor consistent to warrant our definitely ascribing to these Saṅghādisesas a date later in time than that of Nuns’ Bi-Ss 1, that penalising a nun for speaking in envy of householders or recluses. Thus the absence of pi here must remain something of a mystery, unless we care to subscribe to the hypothesis which I have just advanced.

In the second place, each rule of the Saṅghādisesas set forth in the nuns’ class states precisely the type to which belongs the Saṅghādisesa offence into which the nun has fallen, whether it is that where an offence becomes one at once or after the third admonition. It is not uninteresting to note in passing, although it is not important, that the word for offence, āpatti, is comprised in the name of the first type of Saṅghādisesa offence, called paṭhamāpattika, but not in the second, called yāvatatiyaka, where therefore it has to be understood.

¹ See BD 1, Introduction, p. xv for this Saṅghādisesa, possibly representing some specially ancient fragment of the Pātimokkha.
In the third place, the Saṅghādisesa offence, because it is grammatically constructed as that into which a nun has fallen, takes the accusative case, as against the nominative in the Monks’ class. Moreover it is associated with the word nissāraṇīya, also in the accusative. The phrase nissāraṇīyaṁ saṅghādisesaṁ, meaning “(an offence) entailing a formal meeting of the Order involving being sent away,” should be compared with the similar construction: Nissaggiyaṁ Pācittiyaṁ, “(an offence) of expiation involving forfeiture.” In the Monks’ Saṅghādisesa there is no mention of nissāraṇīyaṁ. Waldschmidt translates the last sentence of the Nuns’ Saṅghādisesa rules as¹: “diese Nonne wird schuldig des 3-Vergehens muss auf/gegeben (werden) (nissāraṇīyam) saṅghāvaśeṣa.” This does not say what it is that “must be caused to be sent away.” But Buddhaghosa (Vin-a 908) states that it is the nun who must be caused to be sent away from the Order (ablative) and not the offence. Oldenberg’s suggestion that the correct reading at Old Commentary on Bi-Ss 12 (where the offence is attributed to nuns, plural) is nissāriyanti, is therefore doubtless right, and the Mahīśāsaka version, quoted by WALDSCHMIDT²: “diese Nonne 3 Ermahnungs-Vergehen, saṅghāavašesa, muss remütig bekannt werden,” wrong.

The phrase “involving being sent away” does not at all imply that the offending nun is to be sent away from the Order for good, nor did the Order let go of its erring members so lightly. It would seem to mean that she would be sent away for the time being probably because admonition, although it had been tried, had failed, and that during this time she would cease to be regarded as a full member of the Order. As the Old Commentary explains: “The Order imposes the mānatta discipline for her offence, it sends her back to the beginning (of her probationary course as nun, not as probationer) and (then) it rehabilitates her.” This definition of Saṅghādisesa is identical with that of this same word in the Monks’ Saṅghādisesa section. Lapse in full membership is of a temporary nature and lasting only a fortnight\(^1\) while the offender is undergoing the mānatta discipline before, in the case of a nun, both Orders, as part of her penalty for having committed an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order. Nissāraṇīya, involving being sent away, adds nothing new to the penalty. It is not something extra to the Saṅghādisesa penalty incurred by a nun, and hence marks no difference in the penalty imposed on monks and nuns for having committed such an offence. Only the word, as found in each “rule” of the Nuns’ Saṅghādisesas, is extra.

¹ E. WALDSCHMIDT, Bruchstücke des Bhikṣunī-pratimokṣa der Sarvāstivādins, p. 91.
² Bruchstücke des Bhikṣunī-pratimokṣa der Sarvāstivādins, p. 91.

Wrong and right kinds of nissāraṇā, “the causing to be sent away,” are expounded at Vin 1.321, with an implied opposition to osāraṇā, “the causing to be restored,” at Vin 1.322. Vin-a 1147 concerns itself with two kinds of nissāraṇā, the one appearing to be by an act of banishment, and the other by an act imposing certain disabilities.

In the Bhikkhuni-vibhaṅga, there are twice stated to be thirty Nissaggiya rules for nuns (the same number as for monks) although only twelve are there recorded. For these twelve are peculiar to nuns and are not regarded as operating for monks. From Buddhaghosa we learn that eighteen Nissaggiya rules pertained to both Orders; therefore there are also twelve peculiar to the monks. Buddhaghosa arrives at the eighteen common to both sides of the Order by a process of exclusion. They are as follows: bhikkhu Bu-NP 1–Bu-NP 3, Bu-NP 6–Bu-NP 10, Bu-NP 18–Bu-NP 20, Bu-NP 22, Bu-NP 23, Bu-NP 25–Bu-NP 27, Bu-NP 30. At the same time he explains the composition of the Vaggas (divisions of the rules usually into groups of ten each) in the Nissaggiya Section for nuns. These, comprising the twelve rules peculiar to nuns and the eighteen to be observed by nuns as well as by monks, although these latter are stated only in the Monks’ Vibhaṅga, work out as follows:

- Bhikkhuni Nissaggiya, Vagga 1 = Bu-NP 1, Bu-NP 2, Bu-NP 3, Bu-NP 6, Bu-NP 7, Bu-NP 8, Bu-NP 9, Bu-NP 10 (8) + Bi-NP 2, Bi-NP 3 (2).

\(^{1}\) Vin 4.242; see below, BD 3.3.212.
• Bhikkhunī Nissaggiya, Vagga 2 = Bu-NP 18, Bu-NP 19, Bu-NP 20 (3) + Bi-NP 4, Bi-NP 5, Bi-NP 6, Bi-NP 7, Bi-NP 8, Bi-NP 9, Bi-NP 10 (7).

• Bhikkhunī Nissaggiya, Vagga 3 = Bu-NP 22, Bu-NP 23, Bu-NP 25, Bu-NP 26, Bu-NP 27, Bu-NP 28, Bu-NP 30 (7) + Bi-NP 1, Bi-NP 11, Bi-NP 12 (3).

Of the hundred and sixty-six Pācittiyas which tradition computes for the nuns, ninety-six are set forth in their section. These ninety-six with the ninety-two set forth for monks together amount to a hundred and eighty-eight. Buddhaghosa works out that twenty-two Pācittiya rules, which he enumerates, are incumbent on monks only. The remaining seventy therefore, which are applicable to members of both Orders, bring the nuns’ given total of ninety-six up to their actual total of a hundred and sixty-six.

In the nuns’ Pāṭidesaniya section, eight rules are stated, and since eight is given as the total number, not one is here suppressed. Thus monks and nuns share no Pāṭidesaniya rules, the nuns having these eight and the monks their four.

A comparison of the monks’ rules and those for nuns will show these together to contain:

1. Rules which owing to their subject matter could apply to one side of the Order only and not to both, as for example Monks’ Bu-Ss 1; and also Bu-Ss 6, Bu-Ss 7 and Bu-NP 29 which, doubtless because nuns were not supposed to dwell alone or go about singly (Bi-Ss 3), could not be taken to apply to them. For this same reason their Bi-Ss 3 would have no point as a rule incumbent on monks;

2. Monks’ rules which could apply to nuns but which do not, for example Bu-NP 11–Bu-NP 15, Bu-NP 16, Bu-NP 24;

3. Nuns’ rules which could apply to monks but which do not, for example Bi-Ss 10–Bi-Ss 13, and all of their Nissaggiyas.

Moreover, the position is even more intricate than it might appear. For example, Nuns’ Bi-NP1 has an affinity with Monks’ Bu-NP21 (not held in common); Bi-NP3 is similar to Monks’ Bu-NP25 (held in common); and Bi-NP6 and Bi-NP8 resemble Monks’ Bu-NP30 (held in common). Further, Nuns’ Bi-Ss11 may be compared with Monks’ Bu-Pc63 and Bu.Pc.79, for although they are not exactly similar, all three concur in their mention of some dissatisfaction evinced by a monk or nun after the settlement of a legal question or after the carrying out of a formal act by the Order. Again, there is a very marked correspondence between Nuns’ Bi-Ss12 and Monks’ Bu-Pc64, with both of which Nuns’ Bi-Pj6 may also be compared. Why the monks should incur a lesser penalty than the nuns for a similar kind of offence is a problem not yet solved, but it is an occurrence of some frequency, of which an instance is noticed by Buddhaghosa at Vin-a 902.

The reduction of the rules to the three categories mentioned above seems to me to strengthen the view that rules were not promulgated in advance of the commission of offences, but as a result, their formulation thus in the main depending upon conduct which had actually taken place. This hypothesis would account for the inclusion of identical rules entailing identical penalties in the Pātimokkha of both Orders; for the resemblance, but without actual identity, of rules found in one Pātimokkha to those found in the other; for the not negligible degree of overlapping where similar or comparable offences entail dissimilar penalties in the case of each Order; and for the non-appearance in one Pātimokkha or the other of rules which, from the point of view of their subject matter, might suitably have found a place in it. To ascribe the inclusion or exclusion of such rules to pure chance is no explanation. Had the rules been drafted in advance of the commission of offences, it would have been a comparatively simple matter for the early “editors” to have kept apart all of those, and not merely a selection of them, which could have only a one-sided application, and to have set forth all the remainder as observable by members of both branches, of the Order. But because the drafting of rule and penalty follows a less simple, and less obvious course, we may justifiably consider the composition of the Pātimokkhas to have been determined by the compelling hand of historical event and happening.

The critics, whose complaints of the nuns’ behaviour is shown to result in the formulation of rules for nuns, are for the most part the “modest nuns.” Seventy-four times they are recorded to be vexed and annoyed. “People” are recorded to have made criticisms thirty-two times. To these must be added the complaints of a man, of a Licchavi, of the keeper of a field, of prostitutes, of parents and husband, of a family, once each; of a brahmin and of a guild, twice each; of nuns, three times; and of monks, four times. Only once, in Bi-Pc 21, are no criticisms recorded, the nuns concerned telling other nuns, these the monks, and these the lord.

The locus of the introductory stories to all the rules in the Bhik-khuni-vibhaṅga is, with seven exceptions only, given as Sāvatthī. Four stories, Bi-Pc 10, Bi-Pc 39, Bi-Pc 40, Bi-Pc 81, are set in Rājagaha, two, Bi-Pc 5 and Bi-Pc 58, in Kapilavatthu, and one, Bi-Pc 52, in Vesālī.
Without attempting to draw any inference as to why such a huge majority are attached to Sāvatthī, it may not be uninteresting to look at those stories and their rules which are said to emanate from other places.

Bi-Pc 10, which opens in the same way as Monks’ Bu-Pc 37, had to be set in Rājagaha because of its need to refer to a festival which used to be held on a mountain top nearby. This was made the occasion in the Monks’ Pācittiya for the prohibition of eating at the wrong time; while in the Nuns’ Pācittiya it gave rise to the ban on their seeing (dassana, also able to mean “perceiving, noticing”) dancing, singing and music.¹

Bi-Pc 39 and Bi-Pc 40 are concerned with nuns’ conduct during and after the rains. Similar events, connected with monks, are recorded in the Mahāvagga² when again the lord is said to have been

¹ Possibly in Ancient India, as in old Malabar, singing and music took on the character of miming and acting. If so, “seeing” would be as apt a term as “hearing.”
² Vin 1.79, Vin 1.137, Vin 1.138.
in Rājagaha. This town therefore, besides its other claims to fame, may be regarded as a source of rules for the rains.

In Bi-Pc 81, Thullanandā, although herself not particularly connected with Rājagaha, is shown in association with the schismatic monks headed by Devadatta. Now these, in Monks’ Bu-Ss 10, Bu-Pc 11 and Bu-Pc 29 for example, are the leading personages in narratives which purport to refer to times when the lord was staying in Rājagaha, and thus themselves seem to have frequented this place. Because this Pācittiya needed to make use of them, a good reason is forthcoming to account for its locus being given as Rājagaha.

Nuns’ Bi-Pc 58 appears to be complementary to Monks’ Bu-Pc 23, the one rebuking nuns for not going to monks for exhortation, and the other rebuking monks for going to a nunnery to exhort nuns. Since Monks’ Bu-Pc 23 is for some reason set in Kapilavatthu, although the other exhortation rules belong to Sāvatthī, it is consistent to set the complementary rule for nuns also in Kapilavatthu. It may in fact have been the source of these two rules, for the legislation on exhortation went through several vicissitudes before being finally settled.

The motive ascribing Bi-Pc 5 to a time when the lord was likewise said to be staying at his birthplace, although less obvious, is more interesting. For here we may be up against a rule the need of which began to be felt at a comparatively early date. Mahāpajāpati, one of the very few nuns shown to have direct access to the lord, is present, as recorded, and in converse with him. Yet, since she was his aunt, she could not have been much with him towards the end of his life when he came to reside more and more at Sāvatthī. Moreover, this Pācittiya is very unusual in leading up to a rule through an “allowance.” Perhaps in early days it may have been guidance enough to prescribe allowances, but later a number of causes led to their abuse and hence to the need for a stricter type of regulation, framed in rules and penalties. At all events allowances not seldom appear in contexts which may reasonably be considered to show the influence of some older tradition. I think, too, Indians loving personal cleanliness as they do, the question of the nuns washing themselves—the subject of this Pācittiya—would have required legislation reasonably soon after the inception of the female Order.

The rather elaborate introduction in Bi-Pc 52, whose locus is given as Vesālī, has no counterpart anywhere in the canon, nor is there any tradition specially connecting the group of six nuns with this place. In regard to the two monks mentioned, Kappitaka and Upāli, it is true that the Petavatthu associates Kappitaka with Vesālī, or more exactly with Kapinaccanā, a locality probably nearby, even perhaps the cemetery where according to Bi-Pc 52 this monk was staying. But with no other canonical reference to Kappitaka, it seems very likely that the Petavatthu and its Commentary¹ placed him in Vesālī on the authority of this Vinaya story; and that this placed him here because it veritably was the place where the enraged nuns tried to murder him. He is rather a shadowy monk who fades from the picture, attention being diverted instead to Upāli, whom the nuns are recorded to have abused. Neither the Pācittiya nor its Commentary elucidates the identity of this Upāli, but the Dictionary of Pali Proper Names takes him to be the Vinaya expert. The offence for which the rule legislates is abuse of a monk by a nun. Had the rule been concerned with attempted murder, it would have appeared in the Pārājika section, and Kappitaka might then have been more to the fore as the peg on which to hang the rule.

The group of six nuns, more frequently heard of when the lord is not recorded to have been in Vesālī, are often present on occasions when he is said to have been in Sāvatthī.² Thus there is no particular reason to expect Vesālī to be the scene when the activities of these nuns are being recounted, any more than there is when the therā Upāli’s name is mentioned. His journeyings must have been as extensive as any of the great disciples’.

The group of six nuns formed a useful body to which to fasten misdemeanours. The Dictionary of Pali Proper Names is of the opinion that the group of six monks was so named because of its six leaders, and that these had nuns also in their following: those referred to as the group of six. Certainly in Bi-Pc 58 (cf. Monks’ Bu-Pc 23) the two groups are depicted in connection with one another.

¹ Pv 49; Pv-a 230. ² Vin 2.262, Vin 2.266, Vin 2.269, Vin 2.271, Vin 2.276; Nuns’ Bi-NP 1, Bi-Pc 2, Bi-Pc 22.

Whether these nuns numbered six, or were the followers of six leaders, or were so called because six was not reckoned among the “lucky” numbers, there are some cases where offences clearly could not have been perpetrated by nuns acting singly but only in concert; for example, when they went to see play-acting (Bi-Pc 10), when they went to see a picture gallery (Bi-Pc 41), when they travelled in a vehicle (Bi-Pc 85), and when they bathed naked at a public ford (Bi-Pc 2, Bi-Pc 21). For nuns were not allowed to go about alone (Bi-Ss 3); therefore such offences had to be attributed to a group acting together. But other offences for which they are made responsible could have been committed as easily within the monastery precincts as in the world outside, and as easily by one nun as by several. In such conventual seclusion as existed, a nun would not have needed associates in order to spin yarn (Bi-Pc 43); to learn worldly knowledge (Bi-Pc 49), although if she wanted to teach it (Bi-Pc 50) she would require other nuns as pupils; to wear women’s ornaments (Bi-Pc 87); to use perfume and paint (Bi-Pc 88); to bathe with scented ground sesamum (Bi-Pc 89); or to make a hoard of bowls (Bi-NP 1).

The group of six monks is also recorded to have made, a hoard of bowls (Monks’ Bu-NP 21), so that a certain balance is visible here, although the resulting rule is differently stated in the ease of the two Orders.

I think it as valid to contend that one group did in fact copy the other in this acquisitive behaviour, or even unwittingly behaved in the same way, as it is to hold that the story leading up to the framing of the nuns’ rule was copied, by the recensionists, from that of the monks’. For I think that had the group of six nuns been merely fictitious as a group, the “editors” would not have ascribed to them both various offences which could have been as easily attached to “a certain nun” without prejudicing the resulting rule, as well as various offences which had to be shown capable of perpetration only by a number of nuns acting together. That this course was not adopted appears to me to go to attest the historical reality of a group of nuns, for some reason numbered as six, and their position as the veritable authors of the offences imputed to them.

Ordination.—Two whole divisions, one consisting of ten and the other of thirteen Pācittiyas, Bi-Pc 61–Bi-Pc 70, Bi-Pc 71–Bi-Pc 83, are devoted to the topic of ordination. No other subject in the Bhikkhuni-vibhaṅga receives a comparable degree of attention. Hence ordination appears to be of outstanding interest and importance. The ceremony itself is not discussed. Of the twenty-four disqualifications precluding the admission of a woman into full membership of the Order, as laid down at Vin 2.271, only two, her age and training, are considered in the Pācittiyas. Together with these two points, the Pācittiyas on ordination are, among other matters, concerned with legislating for or against the admission of women in special circumstances: expectant and nursing mothers, married girls, maidens and probationers; with laying down the kind of treatment to be accorded newly ordained women; with insisting on the necessity to obtain the Order’s “agreement” to train and the “agreement” to receive ordination, and also the “agreement” to confer it; with emphasising the necessity to keep one’s promise to ordain; and with regulating the number of times that each nun might ordain annually, and also the number of candidates whom she might ordain. The whole treatment is very thorough.

The word used throughout these Pācittiyas for “to ordain” is vuṭṭhāpeti, meaning literally “to raise up,” but always explained by the relevant parts of the Old Commentary as upasampādeti, to confer the upasampadā ordination. The first step in joining the Order, pabbajjā, going forth (from home into homelessness), is not discussed, its occurrence being assumed already to have taken place.

But a complication as to the meaning of vuṭṭhāpeti arises through the use of this word in the rule of Nuns’ Bi-Ss 2. This, an ad hoc rule, makes it an offence for a nun to vuṭṭhāpeti a female thief who merits death if she has not obtained permission to do so, on the worldly side, from either a rajah, a guild or a company (ṣeni); or on the religious side, from either an Order or a group, unless the woman seeking admission to the Order is one who is “allowable.” The Old Commentary explains that there are two ways in which a woman is “allowable”: either because she has gone forth among other sects or because she has gone forth among other nuns. These latter presumably mean those already attached to Gotama’s Order, but belonging to some residence or boundary other than that to which the woman may be subsequently seeking admission.

Although the Old Commentary on Bi-Ss 2 fails to explain vuṭṭhāpeti,¹ in the “rule” of this Saṅghādisesa it would appear to mean neither upasampādeti nor pabbajati, to go forth. This latter word and its causative form, pabbājeti, to let go forth, although used throughout the introduction to this rule, are dropped by the rule itself. In their place it employs the term vuṭṭhāpeti, a word which, however, does not occur in the introductory story. There are other occasions when the word used in a rule is more precise, more restricted or more inclusive in its scope than that used in the introduction to the rule. This too is a case where the word of the rule is more precise for its purposes, more technically correct than the word of the story.

For here vuṭṭhāpeti is meant to be synonymous neither with upasampādeti nor with pabbājeti. For whatever vuṭṭhāpeti may mean in the Pācittiya, and the phrase upasampadāṁ yāci, she asked for the upasampadā ordination (to be conferred on her), occurring in Bi-Pc 77 and Bi-Pc 78, strongly supports the Old Commentary’s regular and undeviating Pācittiya interpretation of it by upasampādeti, the internal evidence of Bi-Ss 2 suggests nothing to imply that vuṭṭhāpeti stands there for receiving or conferring the upasampadā ordination. The woman thief, who eventually asked Thullanandā to let her go forth, had just run away from her husband and hoped to find sanctuary from his wrath among the nuns. But she had not reached a stage in the monastic career when she might be ordained as a full member. She is represented as asking for no more than to be allowed to go forth; and it was only in the very early stages of the monastic venture that those who wanted to adopt the religious life asked, and it was always the lord himself whom they are shown as asking, to go forth and to be ordained at one and the same time.

¹ Cf. BD 2, Introduction, p.xxxv, for some other examples of the Old Commentary’s omissions, and above, BD 3.xx.

Moreover, in Bi-Ss 2 it seems as if vuṭṭhāpeti cannot mean the same as pabbājeti, to let go forth. It is used in connection with a woman thief in circumstances where, if an entrant were going forth for the first time, pabbājeti would be expected. A trace of the other meaning of vuṭṭhāpeti may therefore linger here, “to raise up” to a higher level of morality and spirituality, to admit a woman to conditions where she might come to see the error of her former ways.

But the usage of vuṭṭhāpeti here is also likely to depend I think on the exception which the rule makes legal: that of “receiving” (vuṭṭhāpeti) and without having to get permission to do so from either the world or the cloister, a woman-thief who had already gone forth. It is I think because of this, because the woman whom the exception has in mind is envisaged as one already gone forth, some person or some Order having already allowed her to do so, pabbājeti, that were this word, pabbājeti, used in the rule a technical difficulty would arise. For a word having a technical sense would then be used not precisely in that sense. No one could go forth twice, unless in the meantime he had returned to the household life¹; but the point of the exception to the rule is that such an action has not taken place. Hence in order to show that a nun was not allowing a woman-thief to go forth, as it were for the first time, a word which did not technically imply this had to be chosen. Thus the vuṭṭhāpeti of the rule is used in place of the pabbājeti of the introductory story.

We must further conclude that there is a difference in the technical significance of vuṭṭhāpeti as used in Bi-Ss 2 and as used in the Pācittiyas. In the former it has, because providing for the possibility that someone has already “gone forth,” of necessity to bear some meaning that is different from this admittedly technical term. To “receive” or to “accept” into an Order is perhaps the nearest rendering for which there is any justification, especially if we take it to cover receiving or accepting a woman of doubtful character, with a view to her spiritual regeneration. This interpretation might be compared with the meaning the verb ullumpati apparently bears at Vin 1.57–Vin 1.95. Here it is said that a man asking the monks for ordination should say, “may the Order, out of compassion for me, raise me up,” ullumpatu. The Commentary, Vin-a 984, explains this as, “having made me arise from, what is bad may they (i.e., the Order) establish me in what is good; or, having raised me from the status of a novice may they establish me in the status of a monk.”

¹ See Vin 2.279; if a woman has left the Order she is not a nun, and if she has joined other sects, and then comes back again and asks for the upasampadā to be conferred on her, she may not receive it. Cf. Vin 1.69, where a similar ruling is made in regard to men who were formerly members of other sects.

In the Pācittiyas, on the other hand, vuṭṭhāpeti appears to be closely connected with the business of ordaining, on the part of the nuns, a woman who had served her term as a probationer in an Order into full membership of that same Order. A fairly frequent definition of “nun” in Vin 4 is “one ordained by both Orders.” First, a woman had to be “ordained” by the nuns; then she had to pass a similar examination before the monks so as to complete her full ordination. Therefore two words were needed to distinguish these two parts of a woman’s ordination ceremony. The nuns raised her up, vuṭṭhāpeti; the monks ordained her fully, upasaṃpādeti, finishing what the nuns had begun. But the actual process of ordination was the same for the candidate, and the same questions were put to her, whether she was being examined by a body of nuns or by a body of monks.

Besides the word vuṭṭhāpeti, which is a key-word in Bi-Pc 61–Bi-Pc 83, several other terms of interest come to the fore in the course of these regulations for ordination, a few of which may now be considered.

In the first place, there is the word sikkhāmanā. This, as meaning probationer, refers only to members of the female sex. It is a technical term for a female entrant of a certain standing and with certain duties to fulfil, and has no masculine counterpart. In this it differs from “novice.” For sāmaṇera and sāmañeri both figure in their respective sides of the Order.

Technically a sāmaṇera is different in status from a bhikkhu, and a sāmaṇeri from both a sikkhāmanā and a bhikkhuni. For these sometimes appear together as the five classes of people among whom it is legitimate to effect certain transactions,¹ for example giving or accepting robes in exchange (Monks’ Bu-NP 5, Bu-Pc 25. Further, the five are differently defined.² That is to say, the definition of “nun “balances and resembles that of “monk”; the definition of “female novice” balances and resembles that of “male novice,”³ “probationer” alone having no opposite number. Again, “male wanderer” is defined by excluding monk and male novice; “female wanderer” by excluding nun, probationer and female novice.⁴ There is too the women’s testimony, in Bi-Pc 64, that having been ordained, they are not probationers but nuns, and therefore are not to be ordered about by other nuns.

I should say that these five classes of persons represent a fundamental classification of the monastic personnel, and as such will be to some extent inclusive of other and differently divided classes, which may then be regarded as so many subdivisions: a monk (or nun) who is a junior, nava, one of middle standing, an elder; a teacher, pupil, preceptor one who shares a cell, and so forth.

In the second place, two other words of interest which occur in the ordination groups of rules are gihigatā, married girl, and kumāribhūtā, maiden. Gihigatā, meaning literally “one going (or gone) to a householder.” and thus meaning a married girl or woman, or one who has intercourse with a man, is defined in the Old Commentary on Bi-Pc 65 as purisantaragatā, “one gone (or going) among men.” Kumāribhūtā, “being a girl,” must I think, as standing in antithesis to gihigatā, mean an unmarried woman, a maiden, or virgin. Kumāribhūtā is rather confusingly defined by the Old Commentary as sāmaṇeri, a woman novice. For although, as I have said, in the Vinaya

¹ See, e.g., Vin 1.139, Vin 1.140, Vin 1.145. ² See Vin 4.122, Vin 4.343, and definitions of “monk” and “nun” in the Old Commentary—e.g., on the Pārājikas, and of “nun” constantly in Vin 3 and Vin 4 as “one ordained by both Orders.” ³ Vin 4.122. ⁴ Vin 4.92, Vin 4.285; cf. Vin 4.224.
“female novice” is differently defined from “probationer,” yet in Bi-Pc72 and Bi-Pc73 it is clear that the “maiden” is thought of in terms more appropriate to a probationer than to a novice.

Bi-Pc65 makes it an offence for a nun to ordain “a gihagatā under twelve.” But the question is, what exactly does this phrase mean? Does it mean a married girl less than twelve years old, or a girl who has been married for less than twelve years? Waldschmidt adopts the latter view,¹ apparently taking his stand on a phrase given by Bendall: strī dvādaśavarsagṛhayuktā. If a girl were married at eight, which is still customary in parts of India, betrothal having taken place earlier, but if she were under twenty when she sought ordination, then she would not have been married for as many as twelve years, and this would seem to be her age as considered from the point of view of the legislation laid down in Bi-Pc65–Bi-Pc67.

Certainly a passage in Bi-Pc65, which describes the hardships young people were not able to endure, is used also in Monks’ Bi-Pc65 to show why persons under twenty, not under twelve, should not be ordained. Again when the age for ordaining “maidens” is being considered (Bi-Pc71), twenty years is given as the minimum. I bring forward this internal evidence in support of Waldschmidt’s view, which I think merits serious consideration. Against it may be set Buddhaghosa’s remarks at Vin-a941 that, having given the “agreement as to ordination” to a married girl of ten, the upasampadā may be conferred when she has completed twelve years of age. This shows that Buddhaghosa at least was puzzled by the word gihigatā.

A main point concerning the ordination of a probationer, a married girl and a maiden is the illegality of conferring the upasampadā on her unless she has trained, under a nun, for two years in six rules: the first five sīlas and abstention from eating at the wrong time.

Three Pācittiyas govern the ordination of a married girl and three that of a maiden: neither must be ordained (1) if she has not attained the minimum age prescribed (2) even if she is old enough but has not trained for two years in the six rules; and (3) even if she is old enough and has done the required training, but has not been agreed upon by the Order (as a suitable person to be ordained). The second and third clauses of each of these two groups have parallels in Bi-Pc 63, Bi-Pc 64 which, although omitting any reference to age, prohibit the ordination of a probationer, first, if she has not trained for two years in the six rules, and secondly if, even although she has trained, she is not agreed upon by the Order. Beyond the clause in Bi-Pc 80 prohibiting ordination if she has not the consent of her parents or husband, only these two rules, as against the three each for the married woman and the maiden, concern themselves with a probationer’s eligibility for ordination.

¹ Bruchstücke des Bhikṣunī-Prātimokṣa der Sarvāstivādins, p.138.

A reason for omitting to lay down a maximum age at which a probationer would be entitled to receive the upasampadā, is that this might be conferred on her, as on a married woman, however old she might be, there being no limit at the top end of the scale. But at the lower end, neither a maiden nor, or so it would appear, a married girl might be ordained while still under twenty. Now a probationer must be either married or not married. A widow, not being specially catered for in the ordination regulations, was perhaps regarded as ranking as a married woman for legislation purposes. And any woman, whether married or single, when she entered on the training (which is of course different from entering the Order) became technically a probationer. The deduction may therefore be made that a probationer must not be ordained if she were less than twenty, this assumption being tacitly conveyed by the legislation on the minimum age at which married and unmarried girls might receive the ordination. It is the same as the minimum age at which a boy might be ordained. And at Vin 2.271 it is said that she on whom the upasampadā is being conferred, without however specifying more fully what is to be understood by “she,” must be asked if she has completed twenty years of age.

In all cases, whether a woman was specifically called a probationer, married woman or maiden, before she began the two years’ training in the six rules she had to obtain the Order’s consent to enter upon this training (Bi-Pc 63, Bi-Pc 66, Bi-Pc 72), which was carried out under the guidance of some nun. This consent is called the “agreement as to training,” sikkhāsammuti. At the end of her training when the probationer, married woman or maiden wanted to be ordained, she had to obtain from the Order a further agreement sanctioning this step, called the “agreement as to ordination,” vuṭṭhānasammuti. If a woman was ordained before she had fully trained, there was an offence for the nun who ordained her. To guard against such a contingency, that part of the Order to which the ordaining nun belonged was made responsible for weighing the candidate’s claims; it was the Order, and not a group or one nun, whom the candidate must ask for the agreement as to ordination. But if this were refused, and she were not agreed upon by the Order, saṅghena asammatā, even though she were of the right age and had trained properly, and a nun were to ordain her, that nun incurred an offence of expiation.

Another interesting word is ānadvādasavassā, appearing to mean “one who is under twelve.” She may not ordain (Bi-Pc 74). But I do not think that “being under twelve” refers to her actual age, any more than I think that the same condition refers to the married girl’s actual age. Since the minimum age for ordination has been laid down for married girls and for maidens, and since these together form a comprehensive class embracing every kind of probationer, for had widows been separately considered they would have been separately legislated for, to specify as twelve the minimum actual age at which a woman or girl, though described as neither probationer, married nor unmarried, might ordain, would betray such a gross inconsistency with those rules which speak of ordination age as being twenty as to reduce the legislation on these matters to an absurdity.

And I think that it was neither absurd nor careless enough to throw us back on the old argument of its composition being patchwork because it seems to entail contradictory statements, an easy line to take when we are baffled, but unfair to the work of the early compilers. This I am convinced was more often subtle, delicate and reasonable than we sometimes give it credit for. Here, for example, before we condemn their work as invalid because of its seeming inconsistencies, it is necessary, in order to comprehend the gist and implications of Bi-Pc 74, to study it both in conjunction with those Pācittiyas which legislate for the age at which a candidate might be ordained, and which appear to concur in their view of this being twenty, and also in conjunction with the next Pācittiya, Bi-Pc 75.

Two words used here (Bi-Pc 75) provide a useful clue to support the conjecture that ānadvādasavassā does not mean a girl under twelve years of age, but a nun who has not been ordained for as many as twelve years. These two words are bhikkunī and vuṭṭhāpanasammuti. The first is used in connection with paripuṇṇadvādasavassā, and clearly means a nun who has completed twelve years (as an ordained nun). This apposition of bhikkunī and paripuṇṇadvādasavassā is very revealing, the more so since we do not find probationer, married girl or maiden described by the term bhikkunī.

The second clue word is vuṭṭhāpanasammuti. This is an agreement which a nun who has, technically speaking, completed twelve years has to ask for from the Order if she wishes to carry out a monastic function for which, in regard to her standing in the Order, she is eligible. She does not have to ask, as do the probationer, married girl and maiden, for the vuṭṭhānasammuti, the agreement as to ordination, that is to be ordained. She has to ask instead for the vuṭṭhāpanasammuti, the “agreement to ordain.” For vuṭṭhāpana, causative, with sammuti, means the agreement to cause ordination in others, to confer ordination on them, to ordain them before an Order of nuns. This Pācittiya shows this to be a privilege of a nun, but one which it is not legally valid to exercise if the nun who wishes to ordain has not herself completed twelve years as an ordained nun. It is interesting to find at Vin 1.59 a ruling which makes it an offence of wrong-doing for a monk to ordain if he is of less than ten years’ standing, which means the lapse of less than ten years since his own ordination, combined with an “allowance” for a monk to ordain if he is of ten years’ standing or more. This difference of two years, ten since ordination for a monk, twelve for a nun, not only indicates the detailed care lavished upon the ordination regulations. It also suggests the greater length of time that nuns were, at the time of the compilation of the Vinaya, supposed to need in order to qualify themselves for the office of ordaining other nuns.

The next Pācittiya, Bi-Pc 76, suggests that the agreement to ordain must be asked for by a nun each time she wishes to ordain a probationer. Caṇḍakāli is recorded to ask for this agreement, but to be refused it. She is called, as in her case is usual, “the nun Caṇḍakāli,” although in Bi-Pc 79 she is, exceptionally, referred to as a probationer. One can only suppose this latter Pācittiya to refer to a time previous to that referred to by Bi-Pc 76 and the other passages where Caṇḍakāli is called a “nun.”

In addition, there is no clause connected with the ūnadvādasa-vassā corresponding to that for the probationer, married girl and maiden, stressing the need for her to have trained for two years in the six rules. This indicates that this, for the “one under twelve years,” will have been a thing of the past, carried out by her before her own ordination, and for which she will have had to obtain from the Order first the agreement to train and then the agreement to be ordained, vuṭṭhānasammuti.

It would thus appear that on the two occasions when the word ūnadvādasa-vassā is used in the Bhikkhunivibhaṅga, it does not refer to the woman’s actual age, but to the number of years she had followed a certain calling: either that of a married woman or that of an ordained nun. To prohibit a nun, on pain of a penalty, to ordain others unless she herself had attained to twelve years’ standing as a nun, is to give time to test her integrity, her sense of responsibility and her value to the Order. To prohibit the ordination of a married girl unless she had completed twelve years of married life is to preserve and not to destroy domestic life; it calls to mind the four stages in a brahmin’s career and the due regard paid there to his stage as a householder.

While a woman was still a probationer it would not appear compulsory for her to sever her ties with the world. Caṇḍakāli is recorded to have kept company with men and boys while she was a probationer. The disapprobation which was felt for her, although she herself was not censured, was transferred to the nun who ordained her, and it was made an offence for a nun to ordain a probationer who had behaved in this fashion (Bi-Pc 79). Nuns it would therefore seem had no power sufficient to shut off intending nuns from the world; and neither should they in respect of these disregard it entirely.

In spite of Pasenadi’s dictum¹ that once a woman had (so much as) gone forth, there was nothing (for those in the world) to do in regard to her, there was nevertheless the offence of ordaining a probationer if she had not the consent of her parents or husband. Since probationers could be ordained however old, so long as they were over twenty, this clause would appear to have young probationers in mind, and may perhaps be regarded as pointing to the practice of child-marriage.² In any case it provides one more instance of the care taken by the Order not lightly to ordain anyone still having duties to the world, which is also shown by the questions put to women, and to men too, at the time of their ordination in respect of their freedom from debt and their employment in a king’s service.³

Besides the two divisions comprising the twenty-three rules for ordination, there are other occasions where the nuns’ rules in treating of a similar kind of subject-matter are for the most part placed in proximity to one another.

There are, for example, the seven Nissaggiyas, Bi-NP 4–Bi-NP 10, formulated to deter nuns from getting in exchange something which they fancied more than the commodity specified and earmarked by the donors as gifts now for an Order, now for a group, or now for one nun. Two rules, Bi-Pc 39 and Bi-Pc 40, legislate for almstouring during and after the rains; while two more concerned with the rains, Bi-Pc 56, Bi-Pc 57, cut into a small group of rules (Bi-Pc 56–Bi-Pc 59) where, for the official carrying out of various transactions, such as the exhortation and the Pavāraṇā, nuns are shown to be dependent on monks. These four rules are the same as four of the eight garudhammā,¹ the chief, cardinal or important rules for nuns, so that the infringement of any of these four garudhammā is here shown to entail a penalty of expiation. A fifth “important rule” is repeated at Bi-Pc 52, which makes it an offence of expiation for a nun to abuse or revile a monk.

¹ Vin 4.226. Cf. Vin 1.75, where this same view (in regard to men who have gone forth) is put into Bimbisāra’s mouth. ² See my Women under Primitive Buddhism, p. 27ff. ³ Vin 2.271.

In assessing the significance of this rule, it must be remembered that monks incurred offences if they insulted or slandered other monks (Monks’ Bu-Pc 2, Bu-Pc 3), while for nuns there was a rule against cursing themselves or others, “others” being defined by the Old Commentary as “ordained” (Bi-Pc 19), and also a rule against abusing a group (Bi-Pc 53). Thus two rules against “abusing” stand together (Bi-Pc 52, Bi-Pc 53). Monks had also to be restrained from striking one another or using a threatening gesture (Monks’ Bu-Pc 74, Bu-Pc 75). Clearly violence of speech or gesture was not exclusively a feminine trait.

If Bi-Pc 52 is connected on the one hand with Bi-Pc 53 through the word “abuse,” it is connected no less on the other with Bi-Pc 51 through the word “monk.” This rule recounts nuns’ difficulties in entering a monastery not knowing whether monks were in it or gone out, their object apparently being to sweep the monastery and to put ready for the monks’ use water for washing and drinking. The offence here was in entering a monastery without having obtained permission to do so. It was not in rendering these services to monks, which apparently, unlike washing a monk’s robe for him (Monks’ Bu-NP 4) or standing close to him with drinking water and a fan while he was eating (Nuns’ Bi-Pc 6), remained permissible. It is noticeable in Bi-Pc 6 that the rule is not formulated on the lines of the complaints made by the modest nuns—that a nun struck a monk with a fan, but on the lines of the situation postulated—that she was standing near him with a fan and drinking water while he was eating. This was made into the offence.

Bi-Pc 94 and Bi-Pc 95 make a kind of pair. The former prohibits a

¹ Given at Vin 2.255, Vin 4.52 (see BD 2.268).
nun from sitting down in front of a monk without having asked for permission, the latter from asking him a question without having asked for permission. “Question” is taken by the Old Commentary to mean a question on the Suttantas, Vinaya or Abhidhamma. The difficulty arising from this last term has been discussed above.¹

Other rules for nuns which may be classified together are the four against standing and talking with a man (Bi-Pc 11–Bi-Pc 14); the three against impolite behaviour when visiting at lay-people’s houses (Bi-Pc 15–Bi-Pc 17); the one against bathing naked followed by the one prescribing the right measurement for bathing-cloths (Bi-Pc 21, Bi-Pc 22); the eight dealing with various points connected with robes (Bi-Pc 23–Bi-Pc 30); the two about sharing a couch and a cover-and-cloak with another nun (Bi-Pc 31, Bi-Pc 32); the three covering ordinary decent behaviour towards other nuns (Bi-Pc 33–Bi-Pc 35); the two against walking for alms in a dangerous district without a weapon (Bi-Pc 37, Bi-Pc 38); the four against indulging in various practices which were not censurable in laywomen: amusing oneself by visiting picture galleries, reposing in comfort, spinning yarn, doing domestic tasks² (Bi-Pc 41–Bi-Pc 44); the two restraining greed over food (Bi-Pc 54, Bi-Pc 55); and another group of ten rules also against doing things, chiefly for comfort and adornment, like women in the world (Bi-Pc 84–Bi-Pc 93).

In view of these groupings, it would seem as if little support from the Bhikkhunivibhaṅga itself were forthcoming for Miss Bhagvat’s statement that this treatise is patchwork, “a work done in a hurry, and signs of carelessness are obvious.”³ To take only one point: the grouping of offences of a related character is as thorough, if not more so, than is the case in the Monks’ Vibhaṅga. I have attempted to show how thorough it is, although it is true that sometimes offences “which would naturally come together are found scattered in quite different parts of the same class.”⁴ This, however, is comparatively rare. A fairly good example is supplied by the last Pācittiya, Bi-Pc 96, which is a rule against a nun’s going to a village without wearing a bodice, saṅkacchika, and which more naturally belongs to the group of rules on robes than to the isolated position which it occupies. Many of the rules which appear in isolation do so however because there are no others to which they are related in character.

¹ BD 3.xf. ² There are other occasions where nuns are rebuked for behaving like women still leading a household life. ³ Early Buddhist Jurisprudence, p.164. ⁴ Vinaya Texts i.Introduction xiv (referring to Monks’ Vibhaṅga).

The eight Pāṭidesaniyas form a complete group of related offences, being word for word the same as one another, except for the particular commodity which each names: ghee, oil, honey, molasses, fish, meat, milk, curds. If a nun who was not ill asked for any of these and ate them, there resulted an offence to be confessed by her. The offence did not He in having these things or in eating them, but in asking for them so as to eat them. The same notion is apparent in Nuns’ Bi-Pc 7. “Asking for” would probably mean obtaining the articles of diet without waiting for them to be offered, and it was a greedy thing to do. There is no Pāṭidesaniya offence for Thullanandā in Bi-NP 4 where the lay follower, as recorded, offers her something and she chooses ghee; or for this same nun in Bi-NP 5 when she decides to have oil for the kahāpana which a lay follower says he will deposit in a shop for her to get what she likes with it. For on neither of these occasions is she recorded to “ask for” anything, but merely to choose something in response to an offer freely made.

I.B. Horner
Manchester, 1942.
Monks’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 61

... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at one time the venerable Udāyin¹ was an archer,² and crows were unpleasant to him. He, having shot crows, having cut off their heads, put them in a row on a stake. Monks spoke thus:

“By whom, your reverence, were these crows deprived of life?’”

“By me, your reverences; crows are unpleasant to me.” Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying:

“How can the venerable Udāyin intentionally deprive a living thing of life?” ...

“Is it true, as is said, that you, Udāyin, intentionally deprived a living thing of life?”

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked him, saying:

“How can you, foolish man, intentionally deprive a living thing of life? It is not, foolish man, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk should intentionally deprive a living thing of life, there is an offence of expiation.”

Whatever means: ... monk is to be understood in this case.

Intentionally means: a transgression committed knowingly, consciously, deliberately.³

¹ Perhaps the same Udāyin as is mentioned at Vin 3.110, Vin 3.119, Vin 3.127, Vin 3.130, Vin 3.135, Vin 3.187, Vin 3.190 (see BD.1), and Vin 4.20, Vin 4.61, Vin 4.68 (see BD.2.).
² issāsa. Cf. MN iii.1 (issattha); AN iv.423. Vin-a 864 says when he was a householder he taught archers. ³ = Vin 3.73. See BD 1.126 and n. 3.
Living thing means: it is called a living thing that is an animal.¹

Should deprive of life means: if he cuts off the faculty of life, destroys it, harms its duration,² there is an offence of expiation.

If he thinks that it is a living thing when it is a living thing, (and) deprives it of life, there is an offence of expiation. If he is in doubt as to whether it is a living thing, (and) deprives it of life, there is an offence of wrong-doing.³ If he thinks that it is not a living thing when it is a living thing, there is no offence. If he thinks that it is a living thing when it is not a living thing, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether it is not a living thing, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it is not a living thing when it is not a living thing, there is no offence.

There is no offence if it is unintentional; if (he is) not thinking; if he does not know; if he is not meaning death⁴; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

The First

---

¹ Depriving human beings of life is dealt with in Bu-Pj 3.
² = Vin 3.73 (BD 1.126).
³ Variant reading āpatti pācittiyassa. See Vin 4.361.
⁴ Cf. Vin 3.78 (BD 1.136); BD 2.225, BD 2.229, BD 2.262.
Monks’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 62

... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks knowingly made use of water that contained living things. Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying:

“How can this group of six monks knowingly make use of water that contains living things?” ...

“Is it true, as is said, that you, monks, knowingly made use of water that contained living things?”

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

“How can you, foolish men, knowingly make use of water that contains living things? It is not, foolish men, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk should knowingly make use of water that contains living things, there is an offence of expiation.”

Whatever means: ... monk is to be understood in this case.
He knows means: he knows by himself or others tell him.
That contains living things means: if, knowing (this), he makes use of it knowing that “they will die from (this) use,” there is an offence of expiation.

1. paribhuñjati. Vinaya Texts i.46 renders by “drink.” Buddhaghosa at Vin-a 865 mentions this, and also other uses of water, for washing (bowls e.g.), for bathing, and for sprinkling. Cf. Bu-Pc 20. See rules for filtering drinking water at Vin 2.118, and Introductory story to 31st Jātaka.

If he thinks that it contains living things when it contains living things (and) makes use of it, there is an offence of expiation. If he is in doubt as to whether it contains living things (and) makes use of it, there is an offence of wrong-doing.¹ If he thinks that it does not contain living things when it contains living things (and) makes use of it, there is no offence. If he thinks that it contains living things when it does not contain living things, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether it does not contain living things, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it does not contain living things when it does not contain living things, there is no offence.

There is no offence if he makes use of it not knowing that it contains living things, knowing that it does not contain living things, knowing that they will not die from this use; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

The Second

¹ Variant reading āpatti pācittiyassa, offence of expiation. See Vin 4.361.
at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks knowingly opened up¹ for a further (formal) act² a legal question³ settled⁴ according to rule, saying:

“The (formal) act is not carried out,⁵ the (formal) act is badly carried out, the (formal) act should be carried out again, it is not settled, it is badly settled, it should be settled again.”

Those who were modest monks … spread it about, saying: “How can this group of six monks knowingly open up … ‘… it should be settled again’?” …

“Is it true, as is said, that you, monks, knowingly opened up … ‘… it should be settled again’?”

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

“How can you, foolish men, knowingly open up … ‘… it should be settled again’?” It is not, foolish men, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased … And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“What ever monk should knowingly open up for a further (formal) act a legal question (that was) settled according to rule, there is an offence of expiation.”

¹ ukkoṭeti. Cf. Vin 2.94, which refers to this Pācittiya; also Vin 4.151. ² punakam-māya, or action, proceedings, adjustment. Cf. same expression at Vin 2.303. For “formal acts” and wrong and right ways of carrying them out, see Vin 1.315ff. ³ ad-hikaraṇa. Cf. Vin 3.164 = BD 1.282 and n. 5. See Vin 3.168 = BD 1.290, and S. Dutt, Early Buddhist Monachism, 153ff. ⁴ nihata. ⁵ akata.
Whatever means: ... monk is to be understood in this case.
He knows means: either he knows by himself, or others tell him, or (someone) tells him.¹
According to rule means: carried out according to rule, according to discipline, according to the teacher’s instruction, ² this means according to rule.
Legal question means: there are four (kinds of) legal questions: legal questions arising out of disputes legal questions arising out of censure, legal questions arising out of transgressions, legal questions arising out of obligations.³
Should open up for a further (formal) act means: if he opens it up, thinking: ‘The (formal) act was not carried out, the (formal) act was badly carried out, the (formal) act should be carried out again, it was not settled, it was badly settled, it should be settled again,’ there is an offence of expiation.

If he thinks that it is a legally valid act when it is a legally valid act, (and) opens it up, there is an offence of expiation. If he is in doubt as to whether it is a legally valid act, (and) opens it up, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it is not a legally valid act when it is a legally valid act, there is no offence.⁴ If he thinks that it is a legally valid act when it is not a legally valid act, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether it is not a legally valid act, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it is not a legally valid act when it is not a legally valid act, there is no offence.⁵

There is no offence if he opens it up knowingly, thinking: ‘The (formal) act was carried out according to what is not the rule, or by an incomplete congregation, or against one who is not suitable for a (formal) act; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

¹ Cf. Vin 3.265; Vin 4.49, Vin 4.67. ² Cf. Vin 2.95; Vin 4.152; also DN ii.124ff.

The Third

---

... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, having fallen into the offence of intentional emission of semen,¹ said to his brother, the monk who shared his cell:

“I, your reverence, have fallen into the offence of intentional emission of semen; do not tell anyone else.”

Now at that time a certain monk, having fallen into the offence of intentional emission of semen, asked the Order for probation² on account of this offence. The Order granted him probation on account of this offence. He, being under probation, having seen that monk, spoke thus:

“I, your reverence, having fallen into the offence of intentional emission of semen, asked the Order for probation on account of this offence. The Order granted me probation on account of this offence of his,³ so I am under probation. I, your reverence, am experiencing a feeling, let the venerable one conceal me, saying: ‘He is experiencing a feeling.’”

“But, your reverence, does another who falls into this offence also act likewise?”

“Yes, your reverence.”

“Your reverence, this venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, having fallen into the offence of intentional emission of semen, said

¹ Forma Meeting, 1. See Vin 3.112 = BD 1.196. Cf. also Bu-Pc 9. ² parivāsa. See BD 1.196, n. 3 for Vinaya references to “probation,” and S. Dutt, Early Buddhist Monachism, p.168. ³ tassa me saṅgho tassā āpattiyā ... ⁴ vediyām’ aham āvuso vediyati ti maṁ āyasmā dhāretu.
to me: ‘Do not tell anyone.’”

“But are you, then, your reverence, not concealing¹ (him)?”

“Yes, your reverence.”

Then that monk told this matter to the monks. Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying:

“How can this monk knowingly conceal a monk’s very bad offence?”²

...

“Is it true, as is said, that you, monk, knowingly concealed a monk’s very bad offence?”

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked him, saying:

“How can you, foolish man, knowingly conceal a monk’s very bad offence? It is not, foolish man, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk should knowingly conceal a monk’s very bad offence, there is an offence of expiation.”

________

Whatever means: ... monk is to be understood in this case.

A monk’s means: another monk’s.

He knows means: either he knows by himself or others tell him or (someone) tells him.³

Very bad offence means: both the four involving defeat and the thirteen entailing a formal meeting of the Order.⁴

Should conceal means: if he thinks, ‘Knowing this they will reprove him, they will remind him, they will jeer at him, they will scoff at him, they will shame him,' I will not tell,' in the mere fact that responsibility is thrown off,⁵ there is an offence of expiation.

________

If he thinks that it is a very bad offence when it is a very bad offence (and) conceals it, there is an offence of expiation. If he is in doubt as to whether it is a very bad offence (and) conceals it, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it is not a very bad offence when it is a very bad offence (and) conceals it, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he conceals an offence that is not a very bad one, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he conceals a transgression¹ that is very bad or that is not very bad of one who is not ordained,² there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it is a very bad offence when it is not a very bad offence, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether it is not a very bad offence, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it is not a very bad offence when it is not a very bad offence, there is an offence of wrong-doing.³

There is no offence if he does not tell, thinking: “There will come to be quarrel or dispute or strife or contention for the Order”; if he does not tell, thinking: “There will come to be a schism in the Order or dissension in the Order”⁴; if he does not tell, thinking: “This one, harsh, rough, will be an obstacle to life or to the Brahma-life”⁵; if he does not tell, not seeing other suitable monks; if he does not tell (though) not desiring to hide⁶ (him); if he does not tell, thinking: “It will be evident from his own action”; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.⁷

The Fourth

¹ ajjhācāra. Cf. Vin 3.121 = BD 1.202, where see n. 3. Also cf. Vin 4.32. ² Vin-a 866 says that the very bad ones are the above, while the not very bad ones are in the remaining five classes of offence. ³ anāpatti, variant reading at Vin 4.361. But cf. Vin 4.32 (BD 2.222), which also see for the whole passage. ⁴ = Vin 4.37, Vin 4.153, Vin 4.217. Saṅghabhedā and saṅgharājī discussed at Vin 2.203, Vin 2.204, referred to at Vb-a 428. See S. Dutt, Early Buddhist Monachism, p. 193ff. ⁵ These are the last two of the ten dangers mentioned at Vin 1.112–Vin 1.113, Vin 1.169. ⁶ na châde-tukāma —i.e., the offence. ⁷ With this paragraph, cf. Vin 4.217, where, in their Bu-Pj 2, similar exceptions are made for the nuns.
... at Rājagaha in the Bamboo Grove at the squirrels’ feeding-place.
Now at that time in Rājagaha¹ a group of seventeen boys were friends; of these the youth Upāli² was the chief. Then it occurred to Upāli’s parents: “By what means could Upāli, after our demise, live at ease and not be in want?” Then it occurred to Upāli’s parents: “If Upāli should learn writing,³ so would Upāli, after our demise, live at ease and not be in want.” Then it occurred to Upāli’s parents: “But if Upāli learns writing, his fingers will become painful. If Upāli should learn calculation,⁴ so would Upāli, after our demise, live at ease and not be in want.” Then it occurred to Upāli’s parents: “But if Upāli learns calculation, his breast will become painful. If Upāli should learn money-changing,⁶ so would Upāli, after our demise, live at ease and not be in want.” Then it occurred to Upāli’s parents: “But if Upāli learns money-changing, his eyes will become painful. Now there are these recluses, sons of the Sakyans, pleasant in habit,⁷ pleasant in conduct; having eaten good meals they lie down on beds sheltered from the wind.¹ Now if Upāli should go forth among the recluses, the sons of the Sakyans, so would Upāli, after our demise, live at ease and not be in want.”

¹ From here to BD 3.12 below, “pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased” = Vin 1.77–78, which in the phrase yathādhammam kāretabbo refers to this Bu-Pc. rule. ² Vinaya Texts i.201, n. 1, “different from the famous Upāli who belonged to the chief disciples of Buddha; the latter came not from Rājagaha, but from the Sakya country.” ³ lekhaṁ sikkheyya. Vin-a 867 says: ‘his fingers will become painful with writing (likhantassa) syllables (akkharāni).’ On writing, in Vinaya, see Vinaya Texts i.xxxiiff.; BD 1.131, n. 1. ⁴ gaṇanā. Cf. Vin 4.7 (=BD 2.176). ⁵ Vin-a 867: there must be much thought for learning calculation. ⁶ rūpaṁ sikkheyya. Vin-a 867 says: ‘for learning rūpasutta, kahāpanas must be looked at turning them over and over.’ Therefore rūpa here seemed connected with the usual medium of exchange; I follow Vinaya Texts i.201 in adopting this translation in preference to ‘drawing’ or ‘painting,’ or other possible meanings given in Pali-English Dictionary under article rūpa. ⁷ sukhasilā.

The boy Upāli heard this conversation of (his) parents. Then the boy Upāli approached those boys, and having approached he spoke thus to those boys: “Come, masters,² we will go forth among the recluses, sons of the Sakyans.”

“If you, master, will go forth, we likewise will also go forth.”

Then these boys, having each approached (his) parents, spoke thus:

“Consent that I may go forth from home into homelessness.”

Then the parents of those boys consented, thinking: “All these boys desire the same thing, they are bent on what is good.” These, having approached monks, asked for the going forth. The monks let them go forth, they conferred the upasampadā ordination on them. Getting up in the night towards dawn, these cried out:

“Give conjey, give rice,³ give solid food.”

The monks spoke thus: “Wait, your reverences, until it turns light.”⁴ Should there be conjey, you shall drink it; should there be rice, you shall partake of it; should there be solid food, you shall eat it. But should there not be conjey or rice or solid food, having walked for alms, you shall eat.”

But those monks, being spoken to thus by the monks, cried out just the same⁵: “Give conjey, give rice, give solid food,” and they soiled the bedding and made it wet.⁶

The lord, getting up in the night towards the dawn, heard the noise of the boys, and hearing (it) he addressed the venerable Ānanda, saying:

“Why ever, Ānanda, is there this noise of boys?”

Then the venerable Ānanda told this matter to the lord. Then the lord, on this occasion, in this connection, having had the Order of monks convened, questioned the monks, saying:

“Is it true, as is said, monks, that monks knowingly conferred the upasampadā ordination on an individual\(^1\) under twenty years of age?”

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying: “Monks, how can these foolish men knowingly confer the upasampadā ordination on an individual under twenty years of age? Monks, an individual under twenty years of age is not able to endure cold, heat, hunger, thirst, contact with gadflies, mosquitoes, wind and sun, creeping things, abusive hurtful language; he is not the kind (of person) who endures bodily feelings which, arising, are painful, acute, sharp, shooting, disagreeable, miserable, deadly.\(^2\) But, monks, an individual of twenty years of age is able to endure cold, heat ... miserable, deadly. Monks, this is not for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ...\(^3\) And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk should knowingly confer the upasampadā ordination on an individual under twenty years of age, both that individual is not ordained and these monks are blameworthy; this is for him\(^4\) an offence of expiation.”

\(^1\) puggala, individual; unfortunately not defined in Old Commentary. Probably wrong to render “a man” here, for there is the word purisa, defined at Vin 4.334 as “attained to twenty years of age.” See Introduction xxii.ff.

\(^2\) = Vin 4.321 = MN i.10 = AN ii.117 = AN ii.143 = AN iii.163 = AN v.132. Last clause only at Vin 1.302, Vin 1.303; AN iii.143. \(^3\) To here from beginning = Vin 1.77–78.

\(^4\) idaṁ tasmiṁ—i.e., probably the preceptor. See Old Commentary below, end of 2, 1. \(^5\) Cf. BD 2.161. \(^6\) Cf. below, BD 3.381.
looks about for a group\(^1\) or for a teacher\(^2\) or for a bowl\(^3\) or for a robe, or if he determines a boundary,\(^4\) there is an offence of wrong-doing. As a result of the motion\(^5\) there is an offence of wrong-doing; as a result of two proclamations\(^6\) there are offences of wrong-doing. At the end of the proclamations,\(^7\) there is an offence of expiation for the preceptor,\(^8\) an offence of wrong-doing for the group and for the teacher.

---

\(^1\) \textit{gāṇa}, two to four monks, as opposed to both saṅgha, five or more monks, and \textit{puggala}, one individual (monk). Cf. \textsc{bd} 3.184, \textsc{bd} 3.361f. below with this passage.

\(^2\) \textit{ācariya}. Allowed at \textsc{Vin} 1.60, where relationship of \textit{ācariya} to antevāsika, pupil, is set forth.

\(^3\) Symbols of entry into the Order. A person had to be in possession of a bowl and robe before receiving the \textit{upasampadā} ordination; \textit{cf. Vin} 1.90.

\(^4\) A new boundary, according to \textsc{Vin} -a 867. See \textsc{Vin} 1.106, where the right way to determine a boundary is given.

\(^5\) \textit{ñatti}. See S. Dutt, \textit{Early Buddhist Monachism}, p.178, for view that \textit{upasampadā} is the third stage in evolution of ordination. At \textsc{Vin} 1.56 it is allowed to confer the \textit{upasampada} by a \textit{ñatticatuttha kamma}, a formal act at which the motion is put and then followed by three proclamations.

\(^6\) \textit{kammavācā}.

\(^7\) Cf. \textsc{Vin} 3.174, \textsc{Vin} 3.176, \textsc{Vin} 3.179 (= \textsc{bd} 1.302, \textsc{bd} 1.307, \textsc{bd} 1.312).

\(^8\) \textit{upajjhāya}. See \textit{Vinaya Texts} i.178, n. 2 for discussion of distinction between this and \textit{ācariya}, teacher. The editors, referring to \textsc{Vin} 1.56, \textsc{Vin} 1.57 and above passage, say that \textit{upajjhāya} “was considered as the more important of the two,” and had a more prominent part in the \textit{upasampadā} service. See also S. Dutt, \textit{Early Buddhist Monachism}, p.181.

\(^9\) \textsc{Vin} -a 867, one who has completed twenty years from (the time of) taking on re-instatement (\textit{paṭisandhi}), that is from the time of conception.
completed twenty years of age when he has completed twenty years of age, there is no offence.¹

There is no offence if he confers the upasampadā ordination on one under twenty years of age thinking that he has completed twenty years of age²; if he confers the upasampadā ordination on one who has completed twenty years of age thinking that they are completed; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.³

The Fifth

¹ Cf. below, BD 3.370.
² This exception to the rule is given also in preceding paragraph.
³ Cf. below, BD 3.370.
... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time a certain caravan was desirous of going from Rājagaha to the south.¹ A certain monk spoke thus to these people: “I will go together with the venerable ones.”²

“But we, honoured sir, shall evade the tax.”³

“Do you understand (how to do so), sirs?” Then the overseers⁴ heard: “A caravan will evade the tax.” They infested the way.⁵ Then these overseers, having seized and ransacked that caravan, spoke thus to that monk:

“How is it that you, honoured sir, knowingly go together with a caravan (set on) theft⁶?” (and) having detained him they set him free.⁷ Then that monk, having arrived at Sāvatthī, told this matter to the monks. Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying:

“How can a monk, having arranged together with a caravan (set on) theft, knowingly go along the same highroad?” ...

“Is it true, as is said, that you, monk, ... knowingly went along the same high road?”

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked him, saying:

¹ = Vin 4.79 (BD 2.322). Vin-a 868 says paṭiyālōkan ti suriyālōkassa paṭimukhaṁ pacchimadisān atthe: it means facing the light of the sun, the western quarter. Dictionary of Pali Proper Names, on the contrary; calls it “a place near Rājagaha.” ² āyasman-tehi. Rare for a monk to address lay people in this way. ³ suṅkaṁ pariharati. Cf. Vin 3.52 (= BD 1.87) where this is a dukkaṭa offence for a monk. ⁴ kammikā, which at Vin-a 868 is explained as suṅkaṭṭhāne kammikā, overseers, superintendents at the customs place. ⁵ Cf. Atthasālinī 366. ⁶ theyyasattha. ⁷ palibuddhitvā municiṁsu.

Monks’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 66
“How can you, foolish man, having arranged together with a caravan (set on) theft, knowingly go along the same high road? It is not, foolish man, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“How can you, foolish man, having arranged together with a caravan (set on) theft, knowinggally go along the same high road? It is not, foolish man, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk, having arranged together with a caravan (set on) theft, should knowingly go along the same high road, even among villages, there is an offence of expiation.”¹

______________

Whatever means: ... monk is to be understood in this case.
He knows means: either he knows by himself, or others tell him, or (someone) tells him.²
Caravan (set on) theft means: they are thieves who have done the deed or who have not done the deed³; or they go for the robbing of kings or they evade the tax.
Together with means: together.⁴
Having arranged means: if one arranges, saying, “We are going, reverend sir, we are going, honoured sir, we are going, honoured sir, we are going, reverend sir, we are going either today or tomorrow or the next day,” there is an offence of wrong-doing.

Even among villages means: in a village close enough for a cock (to walk), among every (such) village, there is an offence of expiation. For every half yojana in what is not a village, in the jungle, there is an offence of expiation.

______________

If he thinks that a caravan is (set on) theft when the caravan is (set on) theft, and having arranged, goes along the same high road, even among villages, there is an offence of expiation. If he is in doubt as to whether a caravan is (set on) theft ... offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that a caravan is not (set on) theft when the caravan is ¹ Cf. Bu-Pc 27; BD 2.289. ² Cf. above, BD 3.5, BD 3.8. ³ corā katākammatā vā honti akatākammatā vā—i.e., thieves who have or who have not committed a theft. Cf. MN i.448; AN iii.102; Vism 180; Ja 3.34 (māṇava = cora, MN-a 3.164; AN-a 3.271). ⁴ sadhhi ti ekato. Cf. Vin 3.121, Vin 3.188, Vin 3.192 (= BD 1.202, BD 1.332, BD 1.337). From here to end of Bu-Pc 66.2.1 cf. Vin 4.63 (BD 2.290).

(set on) theft ... no offence. If monks arrange (and) the people do not arrange, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that the caravan is (set on) theft when the caravan is not (set on) theft, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether the caravan is not (set on) theft, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that the caravan is not (set on) theft when the caravan is not (set on) theft, there is no offence.

--------------

There is no offence if they go not having arranged; if the people arrange (and) monks do not arrange; if they go without (making) a rendezvous; if there are accidents; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.¹

The Sixth

¹ Cf. Bu-Pc 27, Bu-Pc 28 (BD 2.291, BD 2.294), and below, BD 3.20.
... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time a certain monk, going to Sāvatthī through the Kosalan districts, passed by a certain village-gate. A certain woman, having quarrelled with her husband, having departed from the village, having seen that monk, spoke thus: “Where, honoured sir, will the master go?”

“I, sister, will go to Sāvatthī.”

“I will go together with the master.”

“If you wish to,¹ sister,” he said.

Then that woman’s husband, having departed from the village, asked people: “Have the masters seen such and such a woman?”²

“She, master, is going along with one who has gone forth.” Then that man, having followed after, having seized that monk, having thrashed him, set him free. Then that monk, incensed,³ sat down at the foot of a certain tree. Then that woman spoke thus to that man:

“Master, that monk did not make me come out⁴; but it is I myself who am going along together with this monk. This monk is innocent⁵; go along, apologise to him.” Then that man apologised to that monk. Then that monk, having arrived at Sāvatthī, told this matter to the monks. Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying:

“Can a monk, having arranged together with a woman, go

¹ eyyāsi. ² evarūpaṁ itthiṁ. Cf. Vin 1.76, evarūpaṁ dārakaṁ. ³ padhūpento; padhūpāti usually meaning ‘to blow forth smoke or flames,’ and padhūpita, ‘reeking, smoked out.’ Cf. padhūpāsi, Vin 4.109. Vin-a 869 says: pajjhāyanto attānāṁ yeva paribhāṣanto nisidi, downcast, he sat down reviling just himself. ⁴ nippātesi = nikkhāmesi, Vin-a 869. ⁵ akāraka, one who has done nothing, therefore no wrong, thus innocent, blameless.
along the same high road?” ...

“Is it true, as is said, that you, monk, having arranged together with a woman, went along the same high road?”

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked him, saying:

“How can you, foolish man, having arranged together with a woman, go along the same high road? It is not, foolish man, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk, having arranged together with a woman, should go along the same high road, even among villages, there is an offence of expiation.”¹

______________

Whatever means: ... monk is to be understood in this case.

Woman means: a human woman, not a female yakṣa, not a female departed one, not a female animal; she is intelligent, competent to know good speech, bad speech, what is lewd, what is not lewd.²

Together with means: together.³

Having arranged means: if one arranges, saying, ‘We are going, sister, we are going, master, we are going, master, we are going, sister, we are going either today or ... (see Bu-Pc 27.1; Bu-Pc 66.2.1).

______________

If he thinks that it is a woman when it is a woman, (and) having arranged, goes along the same high road, even among villages, there is an offence of expiation. If he is in doubt as to whether it is a woman ... If he thinks that it is not a woman when it is a woman ... offence of expiation. If the monk arranges (and) the woman does not arrange, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If, having arranged, he goes along the same high road together with a female yakṣa or a female departed one or with a eunuch or with an animal in the form of a human woman,⁴ even among villages, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it is a woman when it is not a woman, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether it is not a woman, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it is not a woman when it is not a woman there is no offence.

¹ Cf. Bu-Pc 27, Bu-Pc 28, Bu-Pc 66.
⁴ Cf. Vin 3.76 = BD 1.132, and see there n. 2; cf. Vin 4.22–23.

There is no offence if he goes not having arranged; if the woman arranges (and) the monk does not arrange; if he goes without (making) a rendezvous; if there are accidents; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.¹

The Seventh

¹ Cf. Vin 4.64, Vin 4.66, and above, BD 3.17.
Monks’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 68

... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time¹ a pernicious view had arisen to² a monk named Ariṭṭha³ who had formerly been a vulture-trainer,⁴ like this:

“In so far as I understand dhamma taught by the lord, it is that in following those things called stumbling-blocks⁵ by the lord, there is no stumbling-block at all.”⁶

Several⁷ monks heard: “A pernicious view has arisen to the monk named Ariṭṭha, who was formerly a vulture-trainer, like this: ‘In so far as I understand ... there is no stumbling-block at all.’”

Then these monks approached the monk Ariṭṭha, who had formerly been a vulture-trainer, and having approached they spoke thus to the monk Ariṭṭha, who had formerly been a vulture-trainer:

“Is it true, as is said, reverend Ariṭṭha, that a pernicious view has

---

¹ Ariṭṭha episode occurs at Vin 2.25–Vin 2.26; MN i.130–MN i.132. At the former, instead of a rule being set forth, the Order is enjoined to carry out an ukkhepaniyakamma (act of suspension) against Ariṭṭha. ² pāpakāṁ diṭṭhigataṁ upannaṁ hoti. Cf. other pernicious views at MN i.256, MN i.326; AN v.194. ³ Mentioned in Bu-Pc 69; at Vin 4.218 where Thullanandā imitated him; and at SN v.314. Note that he is not referred to as āyasmā, but as bhikkhu. An upāsaka Ariṭṭha occurs at AN iv.351. ⁴ gaddhabādhhiputta. Vin-a 869 says it is meant that “he was born in a family gijjhaghātaka.” Discussion of the term and occupation given at Vinaya Texts ii.377, n. 1. Chalmers, Further Dialogues of the Buddha 1.90ff. has “vulture-catcher.” Dictionary of Pali Proper Names refers to Ariṭṭha as gaṅ bādhaputta. ⁵ (This footnote proved troublesome to typeset due to its length, so it has been moved to an appendix with other long notes on page 2981.) ⁶ nālaṁ antarāyāya; Vinaya Texts ii.378 adding “(to prevent his acquiring spiritual gifts),” and Further Dialogues of the Buddha 1.90 “to him who indulges in them.” These same views condemned in Bu-Pc 70, and the novice Kaṇḍaka expelled. Cf. the ten other antarāyas at Vin 1.112 = Vin 1.169. ⁷ sambahulā.
arisen to you, like this: ‘In so far as I understand ... no stumbling-block at all?’

“Undoubtedly,¹ your reverences, as I understand dhamma taught by the lord, it is that in following those things called stumbling-blocks by the lord, there is no stumbling-block at all.”

“Do not speak thus, reverend Ariṭṭha; do not misrepresent² the lord, misrepresentation of the lord is not at all seemly, and the lord certainly would not speak thus. Reverend Ariṭṭha, in many a figure are things that are stumbling-blocks called stumbling-blocks by the lord, and in following these, there is a veritable³ stumbling-block. Sense-pleasures⁴ are declared by the lord to be (things) affording little satisfaction,⁵ of much pain, of much tribulation, wherein is more danger. Sense-pleasures are declared by the lord (to be) like a skeleton,⁶ of much pain, of much tribulation, wherein is more danger. Sense-pleasures are declared by the lord (to be) like a lump of meat,⁷ of much pain, of much tribulation, wherein is more danger. Sense-pleasure are declared by the lord (to be) like a fire-brand of dry-grass,⁸ ... Sense-pleasures are declared by the lord (to be) like a pit of glowing embers.⁹ ... Sense-pleasures are declared by the lord (to be) like a dream, ... Sense-pleasures are declared by the lord (to be) like something borrowed,¹⁰ ... Sense-pleasures are declared by the lord (to be) like the fruits of a tree, ... Sense-pleasures are declared by the

¹ evaṁ byā kho=evāṁ viya kho, Vin-a 870. Vinaya Texts ii. 378, n. 2: “Byā is only known to us as an intensive particle occurring in passages like the present one.”
² abbhācikkhati, to accuse, slander, calumniate. Phrase occurs also at MN i.256; MN iii.207; AN iii.291. ³ alaṁ. I follow translation at Further Dialogues of the Buddha 1.91. ⁴ This simile paragraph = AN iii.97. The ten similes also mentioned at Ja 5.210; Thig.487–Thig.491. See “expanded” rendering at Psalms of the Sisters, p.171. First seven explained in full at MN i.364ff. ⁵ Dhp 186; Snp 71 (?). Cf. Ja 4.118. ⁶ atṭhikaṅkala; AN iii.97 reading atṭhisāṅkhala, with v.l. Cf. SN ii.185=It 17. See Morris, Journal of the Pali Text Society 1885, p.75. MN-a 3.42, if a rib, a bone of the spine, or the skull is without flesh it is called kaṅkala. ⁷ See Journal of the Pali Text Society 1907, p.122. Cf. MN i.145. Vin-a 870=MN-a 2.103 explains by bahusādhāraṇaṭṭhaṇa, “shared in by many,” for which cf. Mil 280. Referred to at Vism 341. ⁸ tiṇukkā. Cf. SN ii.152. ⁹ Cf. SN iv.188; AN iv.224, AN v.175; Snp 396; Ja 1.231, Ja 1.232; DN iii.283. ¹⁰ Commentaries say for the time being.
lord (to be) like a slaughterhouse,¹ … Sense-pleasures are declared by the lord (to be) like an impaling-stake,² … Sense-pleasures are declared by the lord (to be) like a snake’s head,³ of much pain, of much tribulation, wherein is more danger.”

Yet the monk Arittha, who had formerly been a vulture-trainer, being spoken to thus by these monks, expressed that pernicious view as before, obstinately holding to it, adhering to it:

“Undoubtedly, your reverences, as I understand dhamma taught by the lord, it is that in following those things called stumbling-blocks by the lord, there is no stumbling-block at all.”

And since those monks were unable to dissuade the monk Ariṭṭha, who had formerly been a vulture-trainer, from that pernicious view, then those monks approached the lord, and having approached they told this matter to the lord.⁴ Then the lord, on this occasion, in this connection, having had the Order of monks convened, questioned the monk Arittha, who had formerly been a vulture-trainer, saying:

“Is it true, as is said, that to you, Ariṭṭha, a pernicious view arose like this: ‘In so far as I understand dhamma ... no stumbling-block at all?’”

“Undoubtedly, lord, as I understand dhamma ... no stumbling-block at all.”

“To whom then” do you, foolish man, understand that dhamma was taught thus by me? Are not, foolish man, things that are stumbling-blocks called stumbling-blocks by me in many a figure, and in following these is there not a veritable stumbling-block? Sense-pleasures are declared by me (to be things) affording little pleasure, of much pain, of much tribulation, wherein is more danger ... Sense-pleasures are declared by me (to be) like a snake’s head, of much pain, of much tribulation, wherein is more danger. And yet you, foolish man, not only misrepresent me because of your own wrong grasp,¹ but you also injure yourself² and give rise to much demerit which for a long time will be for you, foolish man, of woe and sorrow.³ It is not, foolish man, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ...⁴ And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

¹ asisūṇā. Cf. MN i.144. ² sattisūla, sword-stake. See SN i.128 = Thig.58 = Thig.141; Vism 341. ³ sappasira. Cf. Snp 768. ⁴ Here MN i.131 puts in a little extra matter, to the effect that the lord sends a monk to fetch Ariṭṭha to him, while it omits the convening of the Order. ⁵ kassa nu kho. MN-a 2.104 “to (or for) a noble, or a brahmin, or a merchant, or a low-caste person, or a householder, or one gone forth, or a deva, or a man?”

“Whatever monk should speak thus⁵: ‘In so far as I understand dhamma taught by the lord, it is that in following those things called stumbling-blocks by the lord, there is no stumbling-block at all’; that monk should be spoken to by the monks thus: ‘Do not, venerable one, speak thus, do not misrepresent the lord, misrepresentation of the lord is not at all seemly, and the lord certainly would not speak thus; in many a figure, your reverence, are things that are stumbling-blocks called stumbling-blocks by the lord, and in following these there is a veritable stumbling-block.’ And if that monk,⁶ when he has been spoken to thus by the monks, should persist as before, that monk should be admonished by the monks up to the third time for giving up that (course). If, being admonished up to the third time, he should give it up, that is good. But if he should not give it up, there is an offence of expiation.”⁷

Whatever means: ... monk is to be understood in this case.
Should speak thus means: ‘In so far as I understand dhamma taught by the lord ... no stumbling-block at all.’
That monk means: the monk who speaks thus.
By the monks means: by other monks, who see, who hear⁸; he should be told by these: “Do not, venerable one, speak thus ... a veritable stumbling-block.” And a second time he should be told ... And a third time he should be told ... If he gives it up, that is good. If he does not give it up, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If, having heard, they do not speak, there is an offence of wrong-doing. That monk, having been pulled to the midst of the Order, should be told: “Do not, venerable one, speak thus ... a veritable stumbling-block.” And a second time he should be told ... And a third time he should be told. ... If he gives it up, that is good; if he does not give it up, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

That monk should be admonished. And thus, monks, should he be admonished: the Order should be informed by an experienced, competent monk, saying: ‘Honoured sirs, let the Order listen to me. A pernicious view has arisen to the monk so and so, like this: “In so far as I understand ... no stumbling-block at all.”’ He does not give up that view. If it seems right to the Order, let the Order admonish the monk so and so that he may give up this view. This is the motion. Honoured sirs, let the Order listen to me: A pernicious view has arisen to the monk so and so ... He does not give up this view. The Order admonishes the monk so and so that he may give up this view. If the admonishing of the monk so and so that he may give up this view is pleasing to the venerable ones, let them be silent; if it is not pleasing, then you should speak. And a second time I speak forth this matter ... And a third time I speak forth this matter. Honoured sirs, let the Order listen to me ... then you should speak. The monk so and so has been admonished by the Order for giving up this view. If it is pleasing to the Order, let them be silent ... thus do I understand this.’

As a result of the motion there is an offence of wrong-doing; as a result of two proclamations there are offences of wrong-doing; at the end of the proclamations there is an offence of expiation.

If he thinks that it is a legally valid act when it is a legally valid act (and) does not give it up, there is an offence of expiation. If he is in doubt as to whether it is a legally valid act ... If he thinks that it is not a legally valid act when it is a legally valid act (and) does not give it up, there is an offence of expiation. If he thinks that it is a legally valid act when it is not a legally valid act, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether it is not a legally valid act, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it is not a legally valid act when it is not a legally valid act, there is no offence.¹

There is no offence if he is not admonished; if he gives it up; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

The Eighth

... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks knowingly used to eat together with and be in communion with¹ and lie down in a sleeping place with Ariṭṭha, the monk who talked thus,² who had not acted according to the rule,³ who had got given up that view. Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying:

“How can the group of six monks knowingly eat together with and be in communion with and lie down in a sleeping place with Ariṭṭha ... who has not given up that view?” ...

“Is it true, as is said, that you, monks, knowingly eat together with and are in communion with and lie down in a sleeping place with Ariṭṭha ... who has not given up that view?”

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

“How can you, foolish men, knowingly eat together with and be in communion with and lie down in a sleeping place with Ariṭṭha ... who has not given up that view? It is not, foolish men, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk should knowingly eat together with or be in communion with or lie down in a sleeping place with a monk

¹ saṁvāsati. See Old Commentary’s explanation below. Saṁvāsa at end of each Pārājika rule translated in BD.1 by “communion.” ² tathāvādin—i.e., as in Bu-Pc 68. Cf. tathāvādin at Snp 430; It 122. ³ akaṭānudhamma-i.e., he had not given up his wrong views after the admonition suggested in the sikkhāpada of Bu-Pc 68. Critical Pali Dictionary misses the point in translating as “who had not been dealt with according to the rule.”
who talks thus, who has not acted according to the rule, who has not given up that view, there is an offence of expiation.”

Whatever means: ... monk is to be understood in this case.
He knows means: either he knows by himself or others tell him or (someone) tells him.¹
Talks thus means: talks so,² saying: ‘In so far as I understand dhamma taught by the lord, it is that in following those things called stumbling-blocks by the lord there is no stumbling-block at all.’³
Has not acted according to the rule means: he is suspended, not restored.⁴
Together with (to monk) who has not given up that⁵ view means: together with (a monk) who has not given up this⁶ view.
Or should eat with means: there are two (kinds of) eating, eating food and eating dhamma. Eating food⁷ means, if he gives or accepts food, there is an offence of expiation. Eating dhamma means, he recites or causes to recite. If he recites or causes a line to be recited, for every line there is an offence of expiation; if he recites or causes a syllable to be recited, for every syllable there is an offence of expiation.⁸
Or should be in communion with means: if he performs the Observance day (ceremony) or the Invitation ceremony or a (formal) act of the Order⁹ together with one who is suspended, there is an offence of expiation.

Or should lie down in a sleeping place with means: if one who is suspended is lying down and a monk lies down in a sleeping place under the same roof,¹⁰ there is an offence of expiation. If a monk is lying down and one who is suspended lies down, there is an offence of expiation.

³ As in Bu-Pc 68. ⁴ (This footnote proved troublesome to typeset due to its length, so it has been moved to an appendix with other long notes on page 2982.) ⁵ taṁ.
expiation. Or, if both are lying down, there is an offence of expiation. If, getting up, they lie down again and again, there is an offence of expiation.¹

If he thinks that one is suspended when he is suspended, (and) eats together with or is in communion with or lies down in a sleeping place with (him), there is an offence of expiation. If he is in doubt as to whether one is suspended ... offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that one is not suspended when he is suspended ... no offence. If he thinks that one is suspended when he is not suspended, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether one is not suspended, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that one is not suspended when he is not suspended, there is no offence.

There is no offence if he knows, “He is not suspended”; if he knows, “He was suspended, he is restored”; if he knows, “He has given up that view”; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

The Ninth

¹ Cf. Vin 4.17, Vin 4.19, and below, BD 3.34.
Monks’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 70

... at Śāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time a pernicious view had arisen to the novice¹ Kaṇḍaka,² like this: “In so far as I understand dhamma taught by the lord, it is that in following those things called stumbling-blocks by the lord, there is no stumbling-block at all.”³

Several monks heard: “A pernicious view has arisen to the novice Kaṇḍaka ...” (See Bu-Pc 68.1. Instead of the monk Ariṭṭha, who was formerly a vulture-trainer, read the novice Kaṇḍaka; instead of Ariṭṭha, Kaṇḍaka; in his reply to the monks read honoured sir instead of your reverence.) ... “... It is not, foolish man, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... and it causes wavering in some.”

Having rebuked him, having given reasoned talk, he addressed the monks, saying:

“Because of this, monks, let the Order expel⁴ the novice Kaṇḍaka. And thus, monks, should he be expelled: ‘From today forth, reverend Kaṇḍaka, the lord can neither be referred to as your teacher, nor can that be yours of which other novices have the chance,⁵ namely the lying down to sleep for two or three nights with monks.⁶ Get away⁷

¹ samanuddesa, explained in Old Commentary as sāmanera. Samanuddesa = one marked as a recluse; cf. DN i.151 (Siha); MN ii.244 (Cunda); MN iii.128 (Aciravata); AN ii.78 (āramikasam*); AN iii.109, AN iii.343; Divyāvadāna 160. ² Another (?) Kaṇḍaka was one of Upananda’s two novices, Vin 1.79; seduced a nun, Vin 1.85. Vin-a 874 calls him and Ariṭṭha and the Vajjiputtakas of Vesāli, enemies of the Buddha’s teaching. ³ See Bu-Pc 68. ⁴ nāsetu. Cf. above, BD 3.28, n. 4. ⁵ labhanti. ⁶ See Bu-Pc 5. ⁷ carā ti gaccha, Vin-a 871.
with you,¹ depart.’”²

Then the Order expelled the novice Kaṇḍaka. Now at that time the group of six monks knowingly encouraged³ and supported⁴ and ate with and lay down in a sleeping-place with the novice Kaṇḍaka, thus expelled. Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying:

“How can the group of six monks knowingly encourage and support and eat with and lie down in a sleeping-place with the novice Kaṇḍaka, thus expelled?” ... “Is it true, as is said, that you, monks, knowingly encourage and support and eat with and lie down in a sleeping-place with the novice Kaṇḍaka, thus expelled?”

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

“How can you, foolish men, knowingly encourage ... thus expelled? It is not, foolish men, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“If even a novice should speak thus⁵: ‘In so far as I understand dhamma taught by the lord, it is that in following those things called stumbling-blocks by the lord, there is no stumbling-block at all,’ that novice should be spoken to thus by the monks: ‘Do not speak thus, reverend novice; do not misrepresent the lord, misrepresentation of the lord is not at all seemly, and the lord certainly would not speak thus. Reverend novice, in many a figure...”

---

¹ pire. Vinaya Texts i.49, n. 3, says: “In text read cara pi re, that is cara api re, instead of cara pare.” Pali-English Dictionary says that pi and re both act “as parts of exclamation. The Commentary explains by ‘pire (vocative?) = para amâmaka’ is an artificial construction.” Critical Pali Dictionary, quoting this passage, calls pi re an “expression of contempt; cf. je.” ² vinassā ti nassa, Vin-a 871, which adds “go away where we do not see you.” ³ upalāpeti, to cajole, flatter. ⁴ upaṭṭhāpeti. Vinaya Texts i. 49, n. 5 says that “no doubt upaṭṭhāpeti is used in the sense of showing such personal attentions to another, as the upaṭṭhākā did to the Buddha; and such services would very, rightly come under this rule.” Cf. upaṭṭhāpetabbā and upaṭṭhāpeyya at Vin 1.79; not necessary to take it here in sense of ordaining as at Vinaya Texts i.205. It has rather sense of supporting, waiting on, ministering to. See Old Commentary, below. ⁵ Cf. Bu-Pc 68.1.
are things that are stumbling-blocks called stumbling-blocks by the lord, and in following these, there is a veritable stumbling-block.’ And if that novice, when he has been spoken to thus by the monks, should persist as before, that novice should be spoken to thus by the monks: ‘From today forth, reverend novice, the lord can neither be referred to as your teacher, nor can that be yours of which other novices get the chance, namely, the lying down to sleep for two or three nights with monks. Get away with you, depart.’ Whatever monk should knowingly encourage or should support or should eat with or should lie down in a sleeping-place with a novice thus expelled, there is an offence of expiation.”

Novice\(^1\) means: he is called a novice.\(^2\)
Should speak thus means: he says: ‘In so far as I understand dhamma taught by the lord … no stumbling-block at all.’\(^3\)
That novice means: the novice who speaks thus.
By the monks means: by other monks, who see, who hear. He should be told by these: ‘Do not, reverend novice, speak thus … no stumbling-block at all.’ And a second time he should be told … And a third time he should be told … If he gives it up, that is good. If he does not give it up,\(^4\) that monk should be spoken to thus by the monies: ‘From today forth reverend novice … depart.’
Whatever means: … monk is to be understood in this case.
He knows means: either he knows by himself, or others tell him, or (someone) tells him.\(^5\)
Thus expelled means: so expelled.
Novice\(^6\) means: he is called a novice.\(^7\)
Should encourage means: if he encourages\(^8\) him, saying: ‘I will give him a bowl or a robe or a recitation or an interrogation,’ there is an offence of expiation.

---

\(^1\) samaṇuddesa. \(^2\) sāmaṇera. \(^3\) Cf. above, \(\text{BD 3.24}\). \(^4\) Cf. above, \(\text{BD 3.25}\). \(^5\) Cf. above, \(\text{BD 3.5}\). \(^6\) samaṇuddesa. \(^7\) sāmaṇera. \(^8\) Vinaya Texts i.49, n. 4: “flatters him (talks him-over, \(\text{tassa upalāpeti}\)) …” I do not think, however, that \(\text{tassa}\) goes with upalāpeti, but with \(\text{dassāmi: tassa pattaṅ vā cīvaram vā … dassāmi ti upalāpeti;}\) in 2,2 upalāpeti is not preceded by \(\text{tassa}\).
Or should support means: if he agrees\(^1\) to chunam or clay or a tooth-cleaner or water for the face\(^2\) for him, there is an offence of expiation.

Or should eat with means: there are two kinds of eating: eating food and eating dhamma ... for every syllable there is an offence of expiation.\(^3\)

Or should lie down in a sleeping-place with means: if a novice who is expelled is lying down and a monk lies down under one roof, there is an offence of expiation. If a monk is lying down and the novice who is expelled lies down, there is an offence of expiation. Or if both lie down, there is an offence of expiation. If, getting up, they lie down again and again, there is an offence of expiation.\(^4\)

If he thinks that he is expelled when he is expelled, and encourages or supports (him) or eats with or lies down in a sleeping-place with him, there is an offence of expiation. If he is in doubt as to whether he is expelled ... an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that he is not expelled when he is expelled ... no offence. If he thinks that he is expelled when he is not expelled, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether he is not expelled, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that he is not expelled when he is not expelled, there is no offence.

There is no offence if he knows, “He is not expelled”; if he knows, “He has given up that view”; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

The Tenth

THIS IS ITS KEY

Intentional slaughter, with living things (in it), opening up, concealment of what is very bad,

\(^1\) sādiyati. Vinaya Texts i. 49, p. 5: “by providing him with chunam ...” \(^2\) On these articles see Vin 1.46 (= Vin 2.223), Vin 2.51, Vin 2.52, Vin 2.61; and on tooth-cleaners, dantakaṭṭha, Vin 2.137. \(^3\) = above, BD 3.29. \(^4\) Cf. above, BD 3.29, and BD 2.196, BD 2.202.
MONKS’ EXPIATION (PĀCITTĪYA) 70

Under twenty, and a caravan, an arrangement, about Ariṭṭha, Suspended, and Kaṇḍaka: just these ten rules of training.

The seventh Division: on what contains life.

Vin 4.141

---

1 Vinaya Texts i.49, n. 6 points out that “this title is taken from the second, not, as in all other cases, from the first rule in the section.” But in the ninth Division, the Ratanavagga, again the second rule gives its title to the Division.
... at Kosambi in Ghosita’s monastery. Now at that time the venerable Channa indulged in bad habits. Monks spoke thus: “Reverend Channa, do not do that, it is not allowable.” He spoke thus:

“Your reverences, I will not train myself in this rule of training until I have inquired about it of another monk, experienced, expert in discipline.”

Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying: “How can the venerable Channa, being spoken to by monks regarding a rule, speak thus: ‘Your reverences, I will not train myself ... expert in discipline’?”

“Is it true, as is said, that you, Channa, being spoken to by monks regarding a rule, spoke thus: ‘Your reverences, I will not train myself ... expert in discipline’?”

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked him, saying:

“How can you, foolish man, being spoken to by monks regarding a rule, speak thus: ‘Your reverences, I will not train myself ... expert in discipline’? It is not, foolish man, for pleasing those who are not ¹ = Vin 3.177 = Vin 4.113. At Vin 2.9ff. = Vin 3.179ff. the act of banishment was to be carried out against monks who indulged in the long list of bad habits specified there. In view of this penalty it must be presumed that such bad habits were “not allowable.” ² vinayadhara. At AN i.25 Upāli is said to be chief of those monks who are vinayadhara, proficient, skilled in discipline, who know it by heart; see BD 1.60, n. 4. To be a vinayadhara is one of the ten qualities which make a monk altogether charming and complete in every attribute, AN v.10ff., while the qualities for making one a vinayadhara are given at AN iv.140ff. ³ sahadhammikāṇī; cf. BD 1.310, where translation should have been as above.

(yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk, being spoken to by monks regarding a rule, should speak thus: ‘Your reverences, I will not train myself in this rule of training until I have inquired about it from another monk, experienced, expert in discipline,’ there is an offence of expiation. Monks,¹ it should be learnt,² it should be inquired into, it should be investigated³ by a monk who is training.⁴ This is the proper course here.”

Whatever means: ... monk is to be understood in this case.

By monks means: by other monks.

Regarding a rule means: whatever is a rule of training laid down by the lord, this is called regarding a rule.⁵

Being spoken to ... should speak⁶ thus⁷: ‘Your reverences, I will not train myself until I have inquired⁸ ... expert in discipline’ means: if he says, “I am inquiring about it of a wise, experienced, clever, learned speaker on the rules,”⁹ there is an offence of expiation.

If he thinks that he is ordained when he is ordained (and) speaks thus, there is an offence of expiation. If he is in doubt as to whether he is ordained ... If he thinks that he is not ordained when he is ordained (and) speaks thus, there is an offence of expiation. If, being spoken to about what is not laid down, he speaks thus, “This does not conduce to expunging (evil), nor to punctiliousness, nor to graciousness, nor to decreasing (the obstructions), nor to putting forth energy,”¹ (and) says: “Your reverences, I will not train myself in this rule of training until I have inquired about it of another monk, experienced, expert in discipline, one who is a wise, experienced, clever, learned speaker on the rules,”² there is an offence of wrong-doing. If being spoken to by one who is not ordained about what is laid down or about what is not laid down, he speaks thus: “This does not conduce to expunging (evil) ... nor to putting forth energy,” (and) says, “Your reverences, I will not train myself in this rule of training until I have inquired about it of another monk, experienced, expert in discipline, one who is a wise, experienced, clever, learned speaker on the rules,” there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that he is ordained when he is not ordained, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether he is not ordained, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that he is not ordained when he is not ordained, there is an offence of wrong-doing.³

¹ bhikkhave. Cf. Nissaggīya pācittiya 10, where this form of address also occurs in the sikkhāpada, rule. ² aññātabbaṁ, or should come to be known. Cf. aññātāVindriya. See my Early Buddhist Theory of Man Perfected, p.162ff. ³ paripañhitabbaṁ. See Old Commentary’s definition below. Vin-a 871 substitutes upaparikkhitabbaṁ. Vinaya Texts i.50 has “settle in his own mind.” Cf. AN v.16 for inquire+investigate. ⁴ This is the present participle medium, as also at DN ii.241. More frequently occurring as a feminine noun, sikkhāmanā, meaning a probationer, a woman undergoing at a two years’ training; see below, Vin 4.319f., Vin 4.332ff. ⁵ = Vin 3.178 (BD 1.311). ⁶ Text and Siamese edition, vadeti; Sinhalese edition, vadeyya. ⁷ Sinhalese edition adds ti, “means”. ⁸ Omitted by Oldenberg and Siamese edition, but present in Sinhalese edition ⁹ dhammakathika. Here dhamma most probably in its Vinaya meaning of a “rule” or rules. There would be no point if, wanting to find out about the vinaya, the discipline, he were to ask someone who was an expert in dhamma in its Suttanta meaning of doctrine.

---

¹ Standing dhamma-talk. See BD 1.37, n. 6 for references. ² Following the Sinhalese and Siamese editions, I omit Oldenberg’s text’s ti after byattiṁ vinayadharaṁ, “experienced, proficient in discipline.” The verb paripucchāmi, inquire, occurs once only in this sentence, at the end, thus governing the whole of it. As we have seen above in Bu-Pc 71.2.1 the second clause, “a wise, experienced ...” is given as the definition of the first, “experienced, proficient in discipline,” and hence should not be treated as a separate sentence spoken by the offending monk. ³ No variant reading given. Probably should read anāpatti, no offence, although the next seven Pācittiyas in parallel passages read anupasampampanne anupasampannasaññī, āpatti dukkaṭassa, as above. ⁴ jānitabbaṁ. ⁵ attha, or “use.” ⁶ Text inserts vā, or, after imassa, of this, but Sinhalese and Siamese editions omit.
should be examined.¹

This is the proper course here means: this is the appropriate course here.

There is no offence if he says, “I will know (about it and) I will train”; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

The First

¹ tulayitabbāṁ, literally “should be weighed.”
... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapindika’s monastery. Now at that time the lord in many a figure talked a talk on discipline\(^1\) to the monks, he spoke in praise of discipline, he spoke in praise of accomplishment in discipline, he spoke in praise of the venerable Upāli,\(^2\) referring (to him) again and again.\(^3\) Monks said: “The lord in many a figure talked a talk on discipline ... he spoke in praise of the venerable Upāli, referring (to him) again and again. Come, your reverences, let us master discipline under the venerable Upāli,” and they, many monks, elders and newly ordained and those of middle standing, mastered discipline under the venerable Upāli. Then it occurred to the group of six monks:

“At present, your reverences, many monks, elders and ... are mastering discipline under the venerable Upāli. If these become properly versed\(^4\) in discipline they will win us to (them), they will win us round\(^5\) how they like, when they like, for as long as they like.\(^6\) Come, your reverences, let us disparage\(^7\) discipline.”

Then the group of six monks, having approached the monks, spoke thus: “On account of what are these lesser and minor rules... of training recited? They only tend to remorse, to vexation, to perplexity.”

Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying: “How can this group of six monks disparage discipline’ ...

“Is it true, as is said, that you, monks, disparaged discipline?”

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

“How can you, foolish men, disparage discipline? It is not, foolish men, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk should speak thus when the Pātimokkha is being recited: ‘On account of what are these lesser and minor rules of training recited? They only tend to remorse, to vexation, to perplexity,’ in disparaging a rule of training, there is an offence of expiation.”

whatever means: ... monk is to be understood in this case.

when the pātimokkha is being recited means: when reciting it or when causing (another) to recite it or when studying it.

should speak thus means: he says: ‘On account of what are these lesser and minor rules of training recited? ... to perplexity.’ If he disparages discipline to one who is ordained, saying: ‘For those who master this there comes to be remorse, there comes to be vexation, there comes to be perplexity; for those who do not master this there does not come to be remorse, there does not come to be vexation, there does not come to be perplexity; this boon is not recited, this boon is not learnt, this boon is not mastered, this boon is not borne in mind,¹ or let discipline disappear or let these monks become not properly versed,² there is an offence of expiation.

1 khuddānukhuddaka sikkhāpada. Vin 2.287 gives the views of various elders as to what these comprise. See DN ii.154 (and Dialogues of the Buddha 2.171, n. 2); Mil 142ff.; AN i.231f.; B.C. Law, History of Pali Literature, i.19ff.; Przyluski, Le Concile de Rājagṛha, p.52, p.154, p.217. ² yāvad eva. Cf. Neumann, Reden, p.16 “nur”; Further Dialogues of the Buddha 1.6, Further Dialogues of the Buddha 1.7 “only.” ³ vihesā. Cf. vihesaka at Vin 4.36 (BD 2.231f.), and vihesikā at Vin 4.239 (below, BD 3.207). At the former passage it means to keep silence when being examined for an offence; at the latter to protest against a formal act. ⁴ vilekha. ⁵uddissamāne. Vin-a 876, by a teacher to a pupil. ⁶ Cf. Vin 4.15, sajjhāyaṁ karonto. ⁷ vara.

If he thinks that he is ordained when he is ordained, (and) disparages discipline, there is an offence of expiation. If he is in doubt as to whether he is ordained ... If he thinks that he is not ordained when he is ordained ... offence of expiation. If he disparages another rule,³ there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he disparages discipline or another rule to one who is not ordained, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that he is ordained when he is not ordained, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether he is not ordained, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that he is not ordained when he is not ordained, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

There is no offence if, not desiring to disparage, he speaks, saying: “Look here, do you master suttantas or verses or what is extra to dhamma⁴ and afterwards you will master discipline;” if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

The Second

¹ adhārita, not held. ² apakataññuno; also occurs at Vin 4.112. ³ dhamma, or here perhaps “matter,” since dhamma is in opposition to Vinaya, the whole of the discipline. Moreover, since there is Pācittiya in disparaging the lesser and minor rules, it would seem as if disparaging any more important rule would incur a heavier penalty than dukkaṭa.⁵ abhidhammaṁ. Cf. Vin 4.344, Vin 5.86, where abhidhamma occurs with suttanta and Vinaya. See BD 3, Introduction, p.xff. Other Sutta references to abhidhamma are at Vin 1.64, Vin 1.68; MN i.472, MN ii.239, MN ii.240; DN iii.267; AN v.24, AN v.27, AN v.90, AN v.201, AN v.339; and see MN-a 3.185, MN-a 4.29; DN-a 18, DN-a 1047.
... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks, thinking: “Let them understand[1] that having indulged in bad habits, we are fallen through ignorance,”[2] while the Pātimokkha was being recited, spoke thus: “Only now[3] do we understand that this rule[4] is, as is said, handed down in a clause,[5] contained in a clause, (and) comes up for recitation every half-month.”

Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying: “How can this group of six monks speak thus while the Pātimokkha is being recited ... ‘... every half-month’?” ...

“Is it true, as is said, monks, that you spoke thus while the Pātimokkha was being recited ... ’... every half-month’?”

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

“How can you, foolish men, speak thus while the Pātimokkha is being recited: ‘... every half-month’? It is not, foolish men, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this

---

1 jānantu, may these people understand, think that we have done this without knowledge. 2 aaññānakena āpannā, attained by the ignorant, by the man who does not know the rule. 3 idān’ eva kho. Vinaya Texts i.50, “Now for the first time”; E. HUBER, J.Bu-As. Nov–Dec, 1913, Bu-Pc.83, “C’est maintenant seulement que je me rends compte.” 4 dhamma. 5 suttāgata; cf. āgatāgama at, e.g. BD 3.71 below. Vinaya Texts i.50, Vinaya Texts ii.434 (= Vin 2.68, where this whole speech also occurs) translate suttāgato suttapariyāpanno as “is handed down in the suttas, is contained in the suttas.” But cf. Vinaya Texts i.xxviiif. and BD 1.X for Vinaya use of sutta as rule, clause or article. No rule of discipline was formally handed down in the Suttas—which in any case ought perhaps more properly to be called Suttantas.
rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk, while the Pātimokkha is being recited every half-month, should speak thus: ‘Only now do I understand that this rule is, as is said, handed down in a clause, contained in a clause, (and) comes up for recitation every half-month’; if other monks should know concerning this monk that this monk has sat down two or three times before,¹ not to say oftener,² while the Pātimokkha was being recited, there is not only no freedom³ for that monk on account of (his) ignorance, but he ought to be dealt with according to the rule for the offence into which he has fallen there, and further confusion should be put on⁴ him, saying: ‘Your reverence, this is bad for you, this is badly gotten by you, that you, while the Pātimokkha is being recited, do not attend applying yourself properly.’⁵ This for him on whom the confusion is put⁶ is an offence of expiation.”

¹ Seats had to be arranged in the uposatha-hall, Vin 1.118; cf. Vin 1.125; and the rules stating that the Pātimokkha must not be recited in a seated assembly, niśinnaparisā, Vin 1.135. ² ko pana vādo bhiyyo. I follow translation at Vinaya Texts i.50. HUBER, J. Bu-As. Nov, “et pas davantage.” ³ mutti, from the offence, Vin-a 877. ⁴ moha āropetabbo. It has to be established that he committed the offence in confusion, in ignorance. ⁵ nā sādhukaṁ aṭṭhikatvā manasikarosi. Vinaya Texts i.51, “You fail to take it to your heart, and attend to it with care.” ⁶ idaṁ tasmiṁ mohana ke pācittiyantī. The act of confusing, of establishing the fact that a monk had spoken or acted in ignorance, is mohanaKE. It also means cheating, deceiving, pretending. ⁷ anvaddhamāsan ti anuposathikaṁ = Vin 4.315. ⁸ Cf. above, BD 3.41.
Monks should know (concerning this monk) that he has sat down ... and further confusion should be put on him. And thus, monks, should it be put on him: the Order should be informed by an experienced, competent monk, saying: ‘Honoured sirs, let the Order listen to me. This monk so and so, while the Pātimokkhā was being recited, did not attend applying himself properly. If it seems right to the Order, the Order should put confusion on the monk so and so. This is the motion. Honoured sirs, let the Order listen to me. This monk ... did not attend applying himself properly. The Order is putting confusion on the monk so and so. If the putting of confusion on¹ the monk so and so is pleasing to the venerable ones, let them be silent; if it is not pleasing, you should speak. Confusion is put on the monk so and so by the Order, and it is right ... So do I understand this.’

If he confuses when confusion is not put on him,² there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he confuses when confusion is put on him,³ there is an offence of expiation.

If he thinks that it is a legally valid act⁴ when it is a legally valid act (and) confuses him, there is an offence of expiation. If he is in doubt as to whether it is a legally valid act ... If he thinks that it is not a legally valid act when it is a legally valid act (and) confuses him, there is an offence of expiation. If he thinks that it is a legally valid act when it is not a legally valid act (and) confuses him, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether it is not a legally valid act (and) confuses him, there is an offence of wrong-

¹ mohassa āropanā. ² This I think can only mean that if he is convicted of being confused not by the Order but by an individual, there is a dukkāta for that individual. But if he is convicted of being confused by the Order and then some individual tries to confuse him, there is pācittiya for that individual. ³ This I think can only mean that if he is convicted of being confused not by the Order but by an individual, there is a dukkāta for that individual. But if he is convicted of being confused by the Order and then some individual tries to confuse him, there is pācittiya for that individual. ⁴ Vin-a 877 “amongst these, the (formal) act of ‘putting confusion on (a monk)’ is meant.”

931
doing. If he thinks that it is not a legally valid act when it is not a legally valid act, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

There is no offence if he is not heard in detail; if he is heard in detail (but) less than two or three times; if he does not desire to confuse; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

The Third
Monks’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 74

... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks, angry, displeased, gave the group of seventeen monks¹ a blow; these cried out. Monks spoke thus: “Why do you, your reverences, cry out?”

“Your reverences, this group of six monks, angry, displeased, gave us a blow.” Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying: “How can this group of six monks, angry, displeased, give monks a blow?” ... “Is it true, as is said, that you, monks, angry, displeased, gave monks a blow?”

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

“How can you, foolish men, angry, displeased, give monks a blow? It is not, foolish men, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk, angry, displeased, should give a monk a blow, there is an offence of expiation.”

Whatever means: ... monk is to be understood in this case.

A monk means: another monk.

Angry, displeased means: dissatisfied, the mind worsened, stubborn.²

Should give a blow means: if he gives a blow with the body or ¹ Cf. Bu-Pc 52, Bu-Pc 55, Bu-Pc 60, Bu-Pc 75.

² = Vin 3.255 = Vin 4.236, Vin 4.238.
Cf. Vin 3.163 where these five words are used to explain duṭṭho doso, “malignant, malicious”; see BD 1.281 and cf. DN iii.238; MN i.101.
with something attached to the body or with something that may be cast,¹ and even with a lotus-leaf,² there is an offence of expiation.³

Bu-Pc 74.2.2

If he thinks that one is ordained when he is ordained, (and) angry, displeased, gives a blow, there is an offence of expiation. If he is in doubt as to whether one is ordained ... If he thinks that one is not ordained when he is ordained, (and) angry, displeased ... offence of expiation. If angry, displeased, he gives a blow to one who is not ordained, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that one is ordained when he is not ordained, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether one is not ordained, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that one is not ordained when he is not ordained, there is an offence of wrong-doing.⁴

Bu-Pc 74.2.3

There is no offence if, being in some difficulty, he gives a blow desiring freedom⁵; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

The Fourth

¹ Cf. Vin 3.74 = BD 1.129. Cf. BD 1.207, BD 1.218, where commentarial explanations of kāyapatiṭibaddha, “something attached to the body,” are cited. ² uppalapatta. Cf. next Pācittiya and Bi-Pc 3, Bi-Pc 4. ³ Referred to at Dhp-a 3.48. ⁴ Surely should read anāpatti, no offence. ⁵ kenaci viheṭhiyamāno mokkhādhippāyo. Vin-a 877 says if it is on account of a man or an animal, it is no offence to strike a blow with the body, with something attached to it, or with something that may be cast.
Monks’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 75

... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks, angry, displeased, raised the palm of the hand¹ against the group of seventeen monks. ² These, frightened of a blow,³ cried out. Monks spoke thus: “Why do you, your reverences, cry out?”

“Your reverences, this group of six monks, angry, displeased, raised the palm of the hand against us.” Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying: “How can this group of six monks, angry, displeased, raise the palm of the hand against the group of seventeen monks?” ...

“Is it true, as is said, that you, monks, angry, displeased, raised the palm of the hand against the group of seventeen monks?”

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

“How can you, foolish men, angry, displeased, raise the palm of the hand against the group of seventeen monks? It is not, foolish men, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

¹ talasattikaṁ uggiranti. Vinaya Texts i.51 has “shall make use of any threatening gesture,” a rendering governed by the Old Commentary’s explanation, q.v. ² Cf. Bu-Pc 52, Bu-Pc 55, Bu-Pc 60, Bu-Pc 74. ³ Text reads pahārasamucitā. Variant readings: te pahāraṁ pamuccitā; te pahāraraṁmucitā; te pahārasamuccitā. Pali-English Dictionary says of samucita “(saṁ+ucita, pp. of uc to be pleased), suitable, Vin 4.147 (must mean something else here, perhaps ‘hurt’ or ‘frightened’).” Vin-a 878 says that these monks were familiar with blows, having received them before, and that they were frightened. The variant readings suggest that the monks were suitable objects for a blow, but that they escaped a blow which was threatened, not given.
“Whatever monk, angry, displeased, should raise the palm of the hand against a monk, there is an offence of expiation.”

Whatever means: ... monk is to be understood in this case. Against a monk means: against another monk. Angry, displeased means: ... stubborn. Should raise the palm of the hand means: if he lifts up the body or something attached to the body, and even at most a lotus-leaf, there is an offence of expiation.

If he thinks that one is ordained when he is ordained, (and) angry, displeased, raises the palm of the hand ... (see Bu-Pc74.2) ... There is no offence if, being in some difficulty, he raises the palm of the hand desiring freedom; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

The Fifth

---

¹ Referred to at Dhp-a 3.50. ² = above, BD 3.47. ³ uccāreti. ⁴ Cf. above, BD 3.48.
... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks defamed a monk with an unfounded charge of an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order. Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying: “How can the group of six monks defame ... formal meeting of the Order?” ...

“Is it true, as is said, that you, monks, defamed a monk with an unfounded charge of an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order?” “It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying: “How can you, foolish men, defame ... formal meeting of the Order? It is not, foolish men, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk should defame a monk with an unfounded charge of an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order, there is an offence of expiation.”¹

__________

Whatever means: ... monk is to be understood in this case. Monk² means: another monk. Unfounded means: unseen, unheard, unsuspected.³ Offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order means: any one of the thirteen (offences entailing this penalty).

¹ Cf. Vin 3.163, Vin 3.167–168 = BD 1.281, where there is a saṅghādisesa offence in unfoundedly charging a monk with an offence involving defeat; and cf. BD 1.289. This Pācittiya and Bu-Ss 8 are referred to at Vin 1.173. ² Accusative. ³ = Vin 3.163 (= BD 1.282).
Should defame means: if he reprimands him or causes (another) to reprimand him, there is an offence of expiation.

If he thinks that one is ordained when he is ordained, and defames (him) with an unfounded charge of an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order, there is an offence of expiation. If he is in doubt as to whether one is ordained... If he thinks that one is not ordained when he is ordained... offence of expiation. If he defames (him) in respect of a falling away from right habits or a falling away from right views,¹ there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he defames one who is not ordained, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that one is ordained when he is not ordained, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether one is not ordained, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that one is not ordained when he is not ordained, there is an offence of wrong-doing.²

There is no offence if, thinking what is true, he reprimands him or causes (another) to reprimand him; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.³

---

¹ अचारविपत्तियाः वा दिश्विपत्तियाः वाः. At Vin 1.171–172 these two, preceded by सिलविपत्ति, are translated at Vinaya Texts i.343: “moral transgression, transgression against the rules of conduct, heresy.” This passage states the kind of offence covered by each of these three groups. These three vipattiyo referred to at Ne 126.

² doubtless should read अनापत्ति. ³ = Vin 3.170 = BD 1.295.
... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks intentionally aroused\(^1\) remorse in the group of seventeen monks,\(^2\) saying:

“Your reverences, a rule of training laid down by the lord says that a person under twenty years of age is not to be ordained\(^3\); and you, (though) under twenty years of age, are ordained. Then perhaps you are not really ordained.” These cried out. Monks spoke thus: “Why do you, your reverences, cry out?”

“Your reverences, this group of six monks intentionally aroused remorse in us.”

Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying: “How can this group of six monks intentionally arouse remorse in monks?”

... “Is it true, as is said, that you, monks, intentionally aroused remorse in monks?”

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying: “How can you, foolish men, intentionally arouse remorse in monks? It is not, foolish men, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk should intentionally arouse remorse in a monk, thinking, “There will be no comfort for him even for a moment,” if having done it for just this object, not for another,\(^4\) there is an offence of expiation.”

---

\(^1\) upadahantī ti uppādentī, Vin-a 878. Cf. vippaṭisāraṁ upadahati at DN ii.135.
\(^2\) Cf. Bu-Pc 52, Bu-Pc 55, Bu-Pc 60, Bu-Pc 74, Bu-Pc 75 for these two groups.
\(^3\) Cf. Bu-Pc 65.
\(^4\) = BD 2.248, BD 2.352; below, BD 3.55.
Whatever means: ... monk is to be understood in this case.

In a monk means: in another monk.

Intentionally means: a transgression committed knowingly, consciously, deliberately.¹

Should arouse remorse means: if he arouses remorse saying: ‘Surely you, (though) under twenty years of age,² are ordained, surely you eat at the wrong time,³ surely you drink strong drink,⁴ surely you sit in a private place together with a woman,’⁵ there is an offence of expiation.⁶

Having done it for just this object, not for another means: there comes to be no other object whatever (for which) to arouse remorse.⁷

If he thinks that one is ordained when he is ordained, (and) intentionally arouses remorse, there is an offence of expiation. If he is in doubt as to whether one is ordained... If he thinks that one is not ordained when he is ordained ... offence of expiation. If he intentionally arouses remorse in one who is not ordained,⁸ there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that one is ordained when he is not ordained, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether one is not ordained, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that one is not ordained when he is not ordained, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

There is no offence if, not desiring to arouse remorse, he speaks, saying: ‘Surely you, (though) under twenty years of age, are ordained ... surely you sit in a private place together with a woman; come now, find out (about it), do not let there come to be remorse for you afterwards;’ if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

¹ = Vin 3.73, Vin 3.112 (= BD 1.126, BD 1.196) = Vin 4.124 = Vin 4.290. ² Bu-Pc 65. ³ Bu-Pc 37. ⁴ Bu-Pc 51. ⁵ Bu-Ay 1, Bu-Ay 2; Bu-Pc 44. ⁶ Vin-a 878, “for each sentence.” ⁷ Cf. BD 2.248, BD 2.352; below, BD 3.56. ⁸ Vin-a 878 calls such a one a sāmaṇera.
MONKS’ EXPIATION (PĀCITTIYA) 77

The Seventh
Monks’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 78

... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks quarrelled together with well behaved monks.¹ The well behaved monks spoke thus: “Your reverences, this group of six monks are shameless; it is not possible to quarrel together with them.”

The group of six monks spoke thus: “Why do you, your reverences, bring us into disgrace² by speaking (of us) as shameless?”

“But how could you, your reverences, hear?”

“We stood overhearing³ the venerable ones.” Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying: “How can this group of six monks stand overhearing monks when they are quarrelling, disputing, engaged in contention?” ...

“Is it true, as is said, that you, monks, stood ... engaged in contention?”

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

“How could you, foolish men, stand ... engaged in contention? It is not, foolish men, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk should stand overhearing monks when they are quarrelling, disputing, engaged in contention, saying, ‘I will hear what they say,’ if having done it for just this object, not for another,⁴ there is an offence of expiation.”

Whatever means: ... monk is to be understood in this case.
When monks means: when other monks.
Are quarrelling, disputing, engaged in contention means: (when they are engaged) with legal questions.¹

Should stand overhearing means: if hearing these, he goes away, thinking: ‘I will reprove (him), I will remind (him), I will reprimand (him), I will make (him) remorseful,² I will make him ashamed,’ there is an offence of wrong-doing. If standing where he hears, there is an offence of expiation. If, going behind, he goes quickly, thinking: ‘I will hear,’ there is an offence of wrong-doing. If standing where he hears, there is an offence of expiation. If, going in front, he stays behind,³ thinking, ‘I will hear,’ there is an offence of wrong-doing. If standing where he hears, there is an offence of expiation. Having come to a place where a monk is resting or to a place where he is sitting down or to a place where he is lying down,⁴ taking counsel⁵ he should cough, he should let him know. Should he not cough or should he not let him know, there is an offence of expiation.

Having done it for just this object, not for another means: there comes to be no other object whatever (for which) to stand over-hearing.

If he thinks that one is ordained when he is ordained, (and) stands over-hearing, there is an offence of expiation. If he is in doubt as to whether one is ordained ... If he thinks that one is not ordained when he is ordained ... offence of expiation. If he stands over-hearing one who is not ordained, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that one is ordained when he is not ordained, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether one is not ordained, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that one is not ordained when he is not ordained, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

There is no offence if having heard these he goes away, thinking: ‘I will desist,¹ I will refrain, I will be calm,² I will set myself free³; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

The Eighth

² vūpasamissāmi. Vin-a 879, ‘I will not make a quarrel.’³ parimocessāmi; “telling of my innocence I will free myself,” Vin-a 879.
... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks, having indulged in bad habits, protested when a (formal) act¹ was being carried out² against each one. Now at that time the Order came to be convened on some business or other. The group of six monks, making robes, gave (their) consent³ to one. Then the Order, saying:

“Your reverences, this monk of the sixfold group is come alone; come, let us carry out a (formal) act against him,” carried out a (formal) act against him. Then that monk approached the group of six monks. The group of six monks spoke thus to that monk: “What did the Order do, your reverence?”

“The Order carried out a (formal) act against me, your reverences.”

“Your reverence, we did not give the consent for this, that it would carry out a (formal) act against you. If we had known that it would carry out a (formal) act against you, we should not have given the consent.”

Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying: “How can the group of six monks, having given (their) consent for legiti-mate (formal) acts, afterwards engage in criticism?”

“Is it true, as is said, that you, monks, having given (your) consent for legitimate (formal) acts, afterwards engage in criticism?”

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

“How can you, foolish men, having given (your) consent ... afterwards engage in criticism? It is not, foolish men, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk, having given (his) consent for legitimate (formal) acts, should afterwards engage in criticism, there is an offence of expiation.”

Whatever means: ... monk is to be understood in this case.

Legitimate (formal) act means: a (formal) act for which leave ought to be asked, a (formal) act at which a motion is put, a (formal) act at which a motion is put and followed by one proclamation, a (formal) act at which a motion is put and is followed by three proclamations; carried out according to rule, according to discipline,

---

1 dhammadharmacita, Explained in Old Commentary below. Cf. dharmamakamma at e.g. Vin 3.174, Vin 3.177, Vin 3.179. Khidayadharmam apajjati, literally attained the point of humiliation, devaluation. Cf. same expression at Bu-Pc 81, Bi-Pc 76; AN iii.269, AN iv.374. At Bu-Pc 13 it is an offence if a monk criticises, khiyati, and this offence is called khayanaka, see Vin 4.38. In Bu-Pc 79 khidayadharmam apajjati may have a quite technical meaning of “falling into the rule against criticism”—dhamma in Vinaya often meaning a rule, apajjati being the word used for falling into an offence, and khuya being devaluation, falling away from, deterioration, and hence criticism. But I think that it means “incline to criticism” or engage in it, for in Vinaya an offence does not usually arise from committing another offence: offences lead to penalties, not to other offences.

2 Referred to at Vin 2.94ff. Apalokana-kamma. See commentarial exegesis on Vin 2.89 at Vinaya Texts iii.37. Nattikamma. On this and the next two terms see Vinaya Texts i.169, n. 2. Nattidutiyakamma. Cases where this is carried out not according to the rule given at Vin 1.137. Natticatutthakamma. See Vin 1.317. At Vin 2.89 these four acts comprise legal questions arising out of obligations, kiccaddhikaraṇa. Cf. MN-a 4.43. See also Vin 2.90, Vin 2.91ff., Vin 5.116, Vin 5.167, Vin 5.220. Vin-a 879 refers to these as four saṅghakammas, (formal) acts of the Order.
according to the teacher’s instruction,¹ this is called a legitimate (formal) act.

Having given (his) consent, if he criticises,² there is an offence of expiation.³

If he thinks that it is a legally valid act⁴ when it is a legally valid act (and), having given (his) consent, criticises, there is an offence of expiation. If he is in doubt as to whether it is a legally valid act ... offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it is not a legally valid act when it is a legally valid act ... no offence. If he thinks that it is a legally valid act when it is not a legally valid act, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether it is not a legally valid act, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it is not a legally valid act when it is not a legally valid act, there is no offence.

There is no offence if he criticises, knowing, “The (formal) act was carried out according to what is not the rule or by an incomplete assembly or against one not suitable for a (formal) act”; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

The Ninth

---

¹ At Vin 4.126 these last three phrases occur as definition of yathādhammaṁ, according to the rule. See DN ii.124ff.; AN ii.168. ² khīyali. Cf. Vin 2.94, Vin 4.38. ³ Vin-a 879, “for each sentence.” ⁴ dhammakama. ⁵ Cf. Vin 4.37, Vin 4.126, and below, BD 3.63.
... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the Order came to be convened on some business or other. The group of six monks, making robes, gave (their) consent to one.¹ Then the Order, thinking, “We will carry out that (formal) act for the sake of which we were convened,” set aside the motion. Then that monk, thinking, “Even thus do they carry out a (formal) act against each one; against whom do you carry out the (formal) act?” not having given the consent, rising up from his seat, departed. Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying:

“How can this monk, when the Order is engaged in decisive talk,² not having given the consent, rising up from his seat, depart?” ... “Is it true, as is said, that you, monk, when the Order was engaged in decisive talk, not having given the consent, rising up from your seat, departed?” “It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked him, saying: “How can you, foolish man, when the Order is engaged in decisive talk, not having given the consent, rising up from your seat, depart? It is not, foolish man, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk, when the Order is engaged in decisive talk, not having given the consent, rising up from his seat, should depart, there is an offence of expiation.”

¹ Cf. Bu-Pc79. ² Vinicchayakathā. See Old Commentary below, and cf. Vism16, translated Path of Purity, i.20 “deciding discourse.” Translated at Vinaya Texts i.52 “(formal) enquiry.”
Whatever means: ... monk is to be understood in this case.

When the Order is engaged in decisive talk means: a matter is announced (but) not decided, or a motion is set aside, or a resolution is unfinished.¹

Not having given the consent, rising up from his seat, should depart means: if he goes away, thinking, “Why should it not carry out this (formal) act (although) it may be quashed,² (although) it may be incomplete?”³ there is an offence of wrong-doing. In leaving (the space of) a reach of the hand⁴ from the assembly, there is an offence of wrong-doing. When he has left, there is an offence of expiation.⁵

If he thinks that it is a legally valid act when it is a legally valid act⁶ (and) not having given the consent, rising up from his seat, departs, there is an offence of expiation. If he is in doubt as to whether it is a legally valid act ... offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it is not a legally valid act when it is a legally valid act ... no offence. If he thinks that it is a legally valid act when it is not a legally valid act, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether it is not a legally valid act, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it is not a legally valid act when it is not a legally valid act, there is no offence.

There is no offence if he goes away, thinking: “There will come to be quarrel or dispute or strife or contention for the Order”; if he goes away, thinking: “There will come to be schism in the Order or dissension in the Order”; if he goes away, thinking: “He will carry out the (formal) act according to what is not rule, or by an incomplete congregation, or against one not suitable for a (formal) act”⁷; if, being ill, he goes away; if he goes away because there is something to be done for one who is ill; if he goes away to relieve himself;* if anxious not to find fault with the (formal) act,¹ he goes away, thinking: “I will come back again”; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

The Tenth

¹ na kammaṁ kopetukāmo.
... at Rājagaha in the Bamboo Grove at the squirrels’ feeding-place.
Now at that time the venerable Dabba the Mallian assigned lodgings to the Order and distributed meals.¹ And the venerable one’s robe became worn thin. Now at that time one robe accrued to the Order.
Then the Order gave this robe to the venerable Dabba the Mallian. The group of six monks looked down upon, criticised, spread it about, saying: “The monks are appropriating a benefit belonging to the Order² according to acquaintanceship.”³

Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying: “How can this group of six monks, having given away a robe by means of a complete Order,⁴ afterwards engage in criticism?”⁵ ...

“Is it true, as is said, that you, monks, having given away a robe ... afterwards engaged in criticism?”
“Is it true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:
“How can you, foolish men, having given away a robe ... afterwards engage in criticism? It is not, foolish men, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

¹ Cf. Bu-Ss 8, Vin 3.158 (BD 1.271–272), and Bu-Pc 13, Vin 4.37 (BD 2.235).
² Cf. Vin 3.265. ³ yathāsantataṁ, Variant reading -saṇhatam, explained below in Old Commentary, as yathāmittatā... Cf. Bu-Pc 13 where Dabba is accused of acting out of favouritism. ⁴ samaggena saṅghena. All members of any particular Order—i.e. that part of the Order staying in a certain residence, āvāsa, or within a certain boundary, sīmā, had to be present for the proper carrying out of all official proceedings. See Old Commentary below. Cf. Bu-Pc 21, especially Vin 4.52. ⁵ Cf. Bu-Pc 79.
“Whatever monk, having given away a robe by means of a complete Order, should afterwards engage in criticism, saying: “The monks are appropriating a benefit belonging to the Order according to acquaintanceship,” there is an offence of expiation.”

Whatever means: ... monk is to be understood in this case.
Complete Order means: belonging to the same communion, staying within the same boundary.
A robe means: any one robe of the six (kinds of) robes (including) the least one fit for assignment.
According to acquaintanceship means: according to friendship, according to comradeship, according to intimacy, according as one has the same preceptor, according as one has the same teacher.
Belonging to the Order means: it comes to be given to the Order, handed over to (it).
A benefit means: the requisites of robes, almsfood, lodgings, medicines for the sick, and even a lump of chunam and a toothpick and unwoven thread.
Should afterwards engage in criticism means: if he criticises when a robe is given to one who is ordained (and) agreed upon by the Order as assigner of lodgings or as distributor of meals or as apportioner of conjev or as apportioner of fruit or as apportioner of solid food or as disposer of trifles, there is an offence of expiation.

If he thinks that it is a legally valid act when it is a legally valid act, (and) criticises when a robe is given, there is an offence of expiation.

---

1 samānasārvāśaka. Cf. definition of sarvāśa, communion, in each Defeat, BD.1.
2 samānasāṁyānaṁ ṭhito. These two expressions occur in same definition at BD 3.170, BD 3.193 below, and Vin 3.173, also at Vin 1.321. See note at Vinaya Texts ii.209, Vinaya Texts ii.271. That the two terms are not necessarily coincident is shown at Vin 1.340. See also S. DUTT, Early Buddhist Monachism, p.132.
3 = BD 2.7, BD 2.40, BD 2.48, BD 2.140.
4 yathāmīttatā. 5 yathāsandiṭṭhatā. Sandiṭṭha is a friend, one seen together with (you).
6 Yathāsambhattatā. Cf. DN ii.98.
7 Cf. Vin 4.178.
8 = Vin 3.266.
10 Cf. Vin 4.38 (= BD 2.236) and note for references.
If he is in doubt as to whether it is a legally valid act ... If he thinks that it is not a legally valid act when it is a legally valid act ... offence of expiation. If he criticises when another requisite is given, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he criticises when a robe or another requisite is given to one ordained, (but) not agreed upon by the Order as assigner of lodgings ... as disposer of trifles, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he criticises when a robe or another requisite is given to one who is not ordained, (whether) agreed upon or not agreed upon by the Order as assigner of lodgings ... as disposer of trifles, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it is a legally valid act when it is not a legally valid act, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether it is not a legally valid act, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it is not a legally valid act when it is not a legally valid act, there is no offence.

There is no offence if he criticises, saying: ‘What is the use of giving to one acting by nature from desire, from hatred, from confusion, from fear? For having received it, he will ruin it, he will not look after it properly if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

_The Eleventh_
... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery.¹ Now at that time at Sāvatthī food with robe-material was prepared for the Order by a certain guild, saying: “Having offered food, we will present them with robe-material.” Then the group of six monks approached that guild, and having approached, they said to that guild: “Sirs, give these robes to these monks.”

“Honoured sirs, we will not give; almsfood with robes are made ready by us every year for the Order.”

“Sirs, many are the Order’s benefactors, many are the Order’s devotees. These (monks) are here depending on you, looking to you, but if you will not give to them, then who is there who will give to them? Sirs, give these robes to these monks.”

Then that guild, being pressed by the group of six monks, giving the group of six monks as much robe-material as was prepared, served the Order with a meal. Those monks who knew that robe-material with a meal² was prepared for the Order and did not know that it was given to the group of six monks, spoke thus:

“Sirs, dedicate robe-material to the Order.”

“Honoured sirs, there is none; the masters, the group of six monks appropriated to the masters, the group of six monks, as much robe-material as was prepared.”

Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying:

“How can the group of six monks knowingly appropriate to an individual an apportioned benefit belonging to the Order?” ...
“Is it true, as is said, that you, monks, knowingly appropriated to an individual an apportioned benefit belonging to the Order?”

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

“How can you, foolish men, knowingly appropriate to an individual an apportioned benefit belonging to the Order? It is not, foolish men, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk should knowingly appropriate to an individual an apportioned benefit belonging to the Order, there is an offence of expiation.”

__________

Whatever means: ... monk is to be understood in this case.

He knows means: either he knows by himself or others tell him or (someone) tells him.

Belonging to the Order means: it comes to be given to the Order, handed over to it.

A benefit means: the requisites of robes, almsfood, lodgings, medicines for the sick, and even a lump of chunam and a toothpick and unwoven thread.

Apportioned means: if it has been expressly said: “We will give, we will make,” (and) he appropriates it to an individual, there is an offence of expiation.

__________

If¹ he thinks that it is apportioned when it is apportioned (and) appropriates it to an individual, there is an offence of expiation. If he is in doubt as to whether it is apportioned (and) appropriates it to an individual, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it is not apportioned when it is apportioned (and) appropriates it to an individual, there is no offence. If he appropriates what is apportioned to the Order for another (part of the) Order or for a shrine, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he appropriates what is apportioned to a shrine for another shrine or for the Order or for an individual, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he appropriates what is apportioned to an individual for another individual or for an Order or for a shrine, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it is apportioned when it is not apportioned, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether it is not apportioned, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it is not apportioned when it is not apportioned, there is no offence.

¹ Just before this passage Bu-NP 30 has the usual directions as to forfeiture, omitted of necessity here.

There is no offence if he himself being asked, ‘Where do we give?’ says, ‘Give wherever your gift could be used or could be mended or should be for a long time or when for you the mind is peaceful;’ if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

The Twelfth

THIS IS ITS KEY
Regarding a rule, and disparagement, causing confusion, striking a blow,¹ The palm of the hand, and unfounded, intentionally, and overhearing, And preventing and consent,² and on Dabba, appropriating.

The Eighth Division: that on regarding a rule

¹ pahārakaṁ. ² paṭibāhanachandañ ca. Paṭibāhana does not occur in Bu-Pc 79 or Bu-Pc 80. But in Bu-Pc 79 it may be inferred that the group of six monks would have prevented one of their number from going to the Order, had they known that it was going to carry out a formal act against him; and in Bu-Pc 80 a monk prevented a formal act from being carried out by withholding his consent. It is necessary for the compound, paṭibāhana-chanda, to refer to two rules, in order to bring the headings in the “key” up to twelve, which is the number contained in this Division.
... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Then King Pasenadi of Kosala enjoined the keeper of the pleasure ground, saying: “Good sir,¹ go along, clear the pleasure ground, we will go to the pleasure ground.”

“Very well, sire,” and the keeper of the pleasure ground, having answered King Pasenadi of Kosala, clearing the pleasure ground, saw the lord sitting at the foot of a certain tree, and seeing him, he approached King Pasenadi of Kosala, and having approached he spoke thus to King Pasenadi of Kosala:

“Sire, the pleasure ground is cleared, but the lord is sitting there.”

“Good sir, let him be, we will pay homage to the lord.”² Then King Pasenadi of Kosala, having gone to the pleasure ground, approached the lord. Now at that time a certain lay follower was sitting down paying homage to the lord. King Pasenadi of Kosala saw that lay follower sitting down paying homage to the lord; seeing him he stood, afraid. Then it occurred to King Pasenadi of Kosala: “This man cannot be depraved,³ inasmuch as he is paying homage to the lord,” (and) he approached the lord; having approached, having greeted the lord, he sat down at a respectful distance. Then that lay follower, out of respect for the lord, neither greeted nor stood up for King Pasenadi of Kosala. Then King Pasenadi of Kosala became displeased, saying:

957
“How can this man, when I come neither greet (me) nor stand up?”

Then the lord, knowing that King Pasenadi of Kosala was displeased, spoke thus to King Pasenadi of Kosala: “Sire, this lay follower is very learned, he is one to whom the tradition has been handed down,¹ he is devoid of passion in respect of sense-pleasures.”

Then it occurred to King Pasenadi of Kosala: “This lay follower cannot be inferior, for the lord speaks praise of him,” and he said to this lay follower: “You may say, lay follower, what will be of use.”²

“Very well, sire.”

Then the lord ... delighted King Pasenadi of Kosala with talk on dhamma. Then King Pasenadi of Kosala having been ... delighted by the lord with talk on dhamma, rising up from his seat, having greeted the lord, departed keeping his right side towards him. Now at that time King Pasenadi of Kosala came to be on the upper storey of the palace.³ Then King Pasenadi of Kosala saw this lay follower going along the road, a sunshade in his hand; seeing him, having had him summoned, he spoke thus: “They say that you, lay follower, are very learned, one to whom the tradition has been handed down; it would be well, lay follower, that you should teach dhamma in our women’s apartments.”⁴

“Sire, what I know is owing to the masters,⁵ only the masters shall teach dhamma in the women’s apartments of the king.”

¹ ágatāgama. Cf. Vin 1.119 (translated Vinaya Texts i.272, “who has studied the āgamas (i.e., the collections of suttas)”; Vin 1.127; Vin 2.8 (translated Vinaya Texts ii.345 “a man to whom the Nikāyas had been handed down”); AN i.117 (GS 1.101 “versed in the Sayings”); AN ii.147 (translated GS 2.151–GS 2.152 “versed in the doctrines,” with note that the āgama, what one goes by, is canonical ‘scripture,’ and that in Ceylon the word is used today for the ‘Buddhist religion’); AN iii.179 (GS 3.134 “to whom the traditional lore has come down”); cf. āgama at Vin 2.249. See E.J. THOMAS, History of Buddhist Thought, p. 157, p. 266. That the Nikāyas came to be called (and in Sanskrit) āgamas (see WINTERNITZ, History of Indian Literature 2.234) seems indisputable; but in Vinaya, āgama may not have stood for the Nikāyas themselves, so much as for the material out of which they later came to be compiled. ² yena attho. Same expression at Vin 3.132 = BD 1.222, and Vin 3.210 = BD 2.43. ³ uparipāsādavaranagato hoti; cf. Vin 4.112. ⁴ = Vin 1.72. Here the-word is itthāgāra; at Vin 3.250 it is antepura. ⁵ ayyānaṁ vāhasā.
Then King Pasenadi of Kosala, thinking: “What the lay follower says is true,” approached the lord; having approached, having greeted the lord, he sat down at a respectful distance. As he was sitting down at a respectful distance, King Pasenadi of Kosala spoke thus to the lord:

“It were well, lord, if the lord were to enjoin one monk who should teach dhamma in our women’s apartments.”

Then the lord ... delighted King Pasenadi of Kosala with talk on dhamma ... he departed keeping his right side towards him. Then the lord addressed the venerable Ānanda, saying: “Well now, Ānanda, do teach dhamma in the King’s women’s apartments.”

“Very well, lord,” and the venerable Ānanda having answered the lord, having gone in from time to time, spoke dhamma in the King’s women’s apartments. Then the venerable Ānanda, dressing in the morning, taking his bowl and robe, approached the dwelling of King Pasenadi of Kosala. Now at that time King Pasenadi of Kosala was in bed with Queen Mallikā. Queen Mallikā saw the venerable Ānanda approaching from afar, and seeing him she got up hastily; her garments, burnished cloth of gold, slipped down. Then the venerable Ānanda, having turned back again from there, having gone to the monastery, told this matter to the monks. Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying:

“How can the venerable Ānanda, not announced beforehand, enter the King’s women’s apartments?” ...

“Is it true, as is said, that you, Ānanda, not announced beforehand, entered the King’s women’s apartments?”

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked him, saying:

“How can you, Ānanda, not announced beforehand, enter the King’s women’s apartments? It is not, Ānanda, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ...” and having rebuked him, having given reasoned talk, he addressed the monks, saying:

\footnote{\textit{pubbe appaṭisaṁvidita; cf. Vin.4.182; SN ii.54; AN iii.59.}} “Monks, there are these ten dangers of entering a king’s women’s quarters.¹ What are the ten?

1. “Here, monks, the king is seated together with the chief consort; a monk enters there; either the chief consort, having seen the monk, smiles, or the monk, having seen the chief consort, smiles; then it occurs to the king: ‘Surely it is done by these, or they will do it.’² This, monks, is the first danger of entering a king’s women’s quarters.

2. “And again, monks, a king is very busy, with much to be done; having gone to a certain woman, he does not remember; she on account of this, conceives (a child); then it occurs to the king: ‘No one enters here except one who has gone forth; now can this be the deed of one who has gone forth?’ This, monks, is the second danger of entering a king’s women’s quarters.

3. “And again, monks, some jewel disappears in a king’s women’s quarters. Then it occurs to the king; ‘No one else enters here except one who has gone forth; now can this be the deed of one who has gone forth?’ This, monks, is the third danger ...

4. “And again, monks, the secret plans within a king’s women’s quarters by being divulged abroad are spoiled.³ Then it occurs to the king: ‘No one else enters here except one who has gone forth; now can this be the deed of one who has gone forth?’ This, monks, is the fourth danger ...

5. “And again, monks, in a king’s women’s apartments either a son asks for⁴ (his) father, or a father asks for (his) son; it occurs to these: ‘No one else enters here except one who has gone forth; now can this be the deed of one who has gone forth?’ This, monks, is the fifth danger ...

¹ Here the word is antepura. This passage = AN v.81ff. ² GS 5.57: “Surely these two are guilty or will be guilty.” ³ antepure abbhantarā guyhamantā bahiddhā sanibhedam gachanti. I follow Woodward at GS 5.58, p. 5, with his note. ⁴ pattheti. Vin-a 880 says antaraṁ passitvā ghātetaṁ icchati, (looking) inside he wants to kill him, while AN-a on AN v.81 has māretuṁ icchati (longs to kill). Woodward, GS 5.58, n. 3, suggests that this refers ‘to the uncertainty of parentage in a royal harem,’ the one gone forth being ‘suspected of causing the confusion.’
6. “And again, monks, a king establishes in a high place one having a lowly position; it occurs to those to whom this is unpleasing: ‘The king is associating with one who has gone forth; now can this be the deed of one who has gone forth?’ This, monks, is the sixth danger ...

7. “And again, monks, a king establishes in a lowly place one having a high position; it occurs to those ... This, monks, is the seventh danger ...

8. “And again, monks, the king sends out the army at the wrong time. It occurs to those ... This, monks, is the eighth danger ...

9. “And again, monks, a king, having sent out the army at the right time, makes it turn back from the highroad; it occurs to those ... This, monks, is the ninth danger ...

10. “And again, monks, when a king’s women’s quarters are crowded with elephants, crowded with horses, crowded with chariots, there are forms, sounds, scents, tastes, tangible objects for causing delight, which are not suitable for one who has gone forth. This, monks, is the tenth danger of entering a king’s women’s quarters.

   Monks, these are the ten dangers of entering a king’s women’s quarters.”

   Thus the lord, in many a figure having rebuked the venerable Ānanda on his difficulty in maintaining himself ... “... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

   “Whatever monk, not announced beforehand, should cross the threshold of an anointed king of noble class from which the king

---

1 sammadda. AN V.83 reads sammada, drowsiness. As Woodward points out, it should be sammadda, which occurs in the variant readings. Cf. sammaddanta at Vin 1.137.

2 rañño khattiyassa muddhāvasittassa. Cf. khattiyo muddāvasitto at DN i.69 (translated Dialogues of the Buddha 1.79, “a sovereign, duly crowned”); DN iii.60ff., DN iii.69; AN i.106, AN ii.207ff. (rājā vā hoti khattiyo muddhāvasitto brāhmaṇo vā mahāsālo); AN iii.151 (gs 3.116 “a warrior rajah, anointed of head”); AN iii.299; MN i.82, MN i.231, MN i.343, MN ii.152, MN ii.183, MN iii.123, MN iii.172. Rulers, chieftains were of the khattiya class. Rājās are called khattiyas at Dhp 294.
has not departed, from which the queen has not withdrawn,¹ there is an offence of expiation.”

---

Whatever means: ... monk is to be understood in this case.

Noble class means: of pure birth on both the mother’s side and the father’s side back through seven generations, not open to criticism,² unblemished in point of birth.³

Anointed means: he becomes anointed in accordance with the consecration of a noble.⁴

From which the king has not departed means: the king has not departed from the sleeping-room.⁵

From which the queen has not withdrawn means: the chief consort has not departed from the sleeping-room; or neither has departed.

Not announced beforehand means: without having announced oneself beforehand.⁶

Threshold⁷ means: it is called the threshold⁸ of the sleeping-room.

Sleeping-room⁹ means: there wherever the king’s bed is made ready, even if it is only surrounded by a screen-wall.¹⁰

Should cross the threshold means: if he makes the first foot cross the threshold, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he makes the second foot cross, there is an offence of expiation.¹¹

---

¹ anikkhantarājake aniggataratanake. See Critical Pali Dictionary under these headings, and Vinaya Texts i.52, note.; Vin-a 881 says ratanāṁ vuccati mahesi, the chief consort is called a jewel. ² akkhitta. ³ =AN iii.151; cf., e.g., DN i.113; Snp p.115; AN iii.223, AN iii.228 (often said of a brahmin). ⁴ muddhāvasitto nāma khattiyābhisekena abhisitto hoti. Cf. AN i.107, referring to a khattiya; AN ii.87, MN-a 3.12. ⁵ sayanighara. Cf. BD 2.354 = Vin 4.94. ⁶ anāmantetvā. Cf. Ja 6.475: anāmantā pavisati pubbe appaṭivedito. ⁷ indakhīla. Cf. Vin 3.46 = BD 1.74. ⁸ ummāra. Cf. Vin 4.100. ⁹ n.b.—Either this word should have appeared in the Sikkhāpada, or the commentator is here defining a word used in the definition of ‘threshold.’ ¹⁰ sānipākāraramparikkhita. ¹¹ = Vin 4.100.
is in doubt as to whether he is not announced ... If he thinks that he is announced when he is not announced ... offence of expiation. If he thinks that he is not announced when he is announced, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether he is announced, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that he is announced when he is announced, there is no offence.

Vin 4.161
Bu-Pc 83.2.3

There is no offence if he is announced; if he is not of noble class; if he is not anointed in accordance with the consecration of a noble; if the king has departed from the sleeping-room, if the chief consort has departed from the sleeping-room, or if both have departed;¹ if it is not in the sleeping-room; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

The First

¹ = Vin 4.95.
... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time a certain monk was bathing in the river Aciravatī. And a certain brahmin, having put down a purse of five hundred (pieces) on the dry ground, having forgotten it while bathing in the river Aciravatī, went away. Then that monk, thinking, “Do not let this purse of that brahmin be lost,” took hold of it. Then that brahmin, having remembered, having run back quickly, spoke thus to that monk: “Good sir, did you not see my purse?” Saying, “Here (it is), brahmin,” he gave it back (to him).

Then it occurred to that brahmin: “Now by what device can I not give\(^1\) an ample reward\(^2\) to this monk?” Saying, “Good sir, I did not have five hundred (pieces), I had a thousand (pieces),” having obstructed him, he set him free.\(^3\) Then that monk, having gone to the monastery, told this matter to the monks. Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying:

“How can this monk pick up treasure?”\(^4\) ... “Is it true, as is said, that you, monk, picked up treasure?”

“It is true, lord,” he said.

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked him, saying:

“How can you, foolish man, pick up treasure? It is not, foolish man, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk should pick up or should cause (another) to pick

---

1 Cf. Vin 4.112.
2 puṇṇapatta, literally a full bowl; cf. Ja 3.535.
3 Cf. Vin 4.131.
4 ratana.
up treasure or what is considered as\textsuperscript{1} treasure, there is an offence of expiation.\textsuperscript{2}

And thus this rule of training for monks came to be laid down by the lord.

Now at that time there came to be a festival in Sāvatthī. People, having adorned themselves with ornaments,\textsuperscript{3} went to the pleasure ground. Visākhā, Migārā’s mother, thinking: “Having adorned myself with ornaments, I will go to the pleasure ground,” having departed from the village, thinking: “Having gone to the pleasure ground, what shall I do? What now if I should pay homage\textsuperscript{4} to the lord?” having taken off the jewelry, having tied it up into a bundle with an upper robe,\textsuperscript{5} she gave it to a slave-woman, saying: “Come along, take this bundle.” Then Visākhā, Migārā’s mother, approached the lord; having approached, having greeted the lord, she sat down at a respectful distance. As she was sitting down at a respectful distance, the lord gladdened ... delighted Visākhā, Migārā’s mother, with talk on \textit{dhamma}. Then Visākhā, Migārā’s mother, gladdened ... delighted by the lord with talk on \textit{dhamma}, rising up from her seat, having greeted the lord, departed keeping her right side towards him. Then the slave-woman, having forgotten that bundle, went away. A monk, having seen it, told this matter to the lord. He said:

“Well then, monk, having picked it up, lay it aside.” Then the lord, on this occasion, in this connection, having given reasoned talk, addressed the monks, saying: “I allow you, monks, having picked up or having caused (someone) to pick up treasure or what is considered as treasure that is within a monastery, to lay it aside, thinking, ’It will be for him who will take it.’\textsuperscript{6} And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

\textsuperscript{1} \textit{ratanasammata}. \textit{Sammata} is the word used for “agreed upon” by the monks. \textsuperscript{2} The monk seems to have been hoodwinked by the brahmin into believing that he took some of the contents of the purse. He only took up the purse temporarily and with no intention of stealing it, and it is not said that he looked at the contents; none of these aspects is considered here. \textsuperscript{3} Cf. \textit{Vin 4.18}. \textsuperscript{4} Cf. \textit{Vin 4.98, Vin 4.157}. \textsuperscript{5} Cf. \textit{Vin 3.208}. \textsuperscript{6} = \textit{Vin 3.239}.

\textbf{MONKS’ EXPIATION (PĀCITTĪYA) 84}
“Whatever monk should pick up or should cause (someone) to pick up treasure or what is considered as treasure, except within a monastery, there is an offence of expiation.”

And thus this rule of training for monks came to be laid down by the lord.

Now at that time in the Kāsi country there came to be a village in which there was business for the householder, Anāthapiṇḍika, so that an inmate came to be enjoined by the householder, saying: “If the revered sirs come, you should make a meal (for them).” Now at that time several monks, walking on alms-tour in the Kāsi country, came up to the village in which there was business for the householder, Anāthapiṇḍika. That man saw these monks coming from afar, and seeing them, he approached these monks; having approached, having greeted these monks, he spoke thus:

“Honoured sirs, let the masters consent to the householder’s meal for tomorrow.” The monks consented by becoming silent. Then that man, at the end of that night, having had sumptuous solid foods and soft foods prepared, having had the time announced, having taken off a finger-ring, having served these monies with the meal, said: “Having eaten, let the masters go away, and I will go back to business,” and having forgotten the finger-ring, he went away. The monks, having seen it, saying: “If we go away, this finger-ring will be lost,” sat still just there. Then that man, returning from business, having seen these monks, spoke thus:

“Honoured sirs, why are the masters sitting still just there?” Then these monks, having told this matter to that man, having arrived at Sāvatthī, told this matter to the monks. The monks told this matter to the lord. Then the lord, on this occasion, in this connection, having given reasoned talk, addressed the monks, saying:

“I allow you, monks, having picked up or having caused (someone) to pick up treasure or what is considered as treasure, that is within a monastery or within a house, to lay it aside, thinking, ‘It will be for him who will take it.’ And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

¹ kammantagāma. ² antevāsin. Vin-a 881 says paricārako, an attendant, servant. ³ Cf. Vin 2.106.

“Whatever monk should pick up or should cause (someone) to pick up treasure or what is considered as treasure, except within a monastery or within a house, there is an offence of expiation. But if a monk, having picked up or caused (someone) to pick up treasure or what is considered as treasure, that is within a monastery or within a house, it should be laid aside, thinking, ‘It will be for him who will take it.’ This is the proper course here.”

———

Whatever means: ... monk is to be understood in this case.
Treasure means: pearl, crystal, lapis lazuli, mother-of-pearl, quartz, coral, gold, silver, ruby, cat’s-eye.¹

What is considered as treasure means: that which is of profit, of use² to people, this is called what is considered as treasure.

Except within a monastery or within a house means: setting aside within a monastery, within a house. Within a monastery means: inside a monastery when the monastery is fenced in; the precincts when it is not fenced in.³ Within a house means: inside the house when a house is fenced in; the precincts when it is not fenced in.

Should pick up means: if he himself picks it up, there is an offence of expiation.

Should cause (someone) to pick up means: if he makes another pick it up, there is an offence of expiation.

But if a monk, having picked up or having caused (someone) to pick up treasure ... it should be laid aside means: having made a mark\(^1\) by a form\(^2\) or by a sign,\(^3\) having laid it aside, it should be pointed out,\(^4\) saying: 'Let him come whose goods are lost.' If he comes there, it should be said to him, ‘Sir, what are your goods like?’ If he succeeds in obtaining\(^5\) them by the form or by the sign, they should be given (to him). If he does not succeed in obtaining them, it should be said (to him), ‘Examine them, sir.’ In setting out from that residence he may set out, having deposited them in the hand(s) of those who there are suitable monks. But if the monks are not suitable, he may set out,\(^6\) having deposited them in the hands of those who there are suitable householders.

¹ Same list occurs at Vin 2.238. Cf. also list of jewels at Mil 267, and for notes see Buddhist Suttas, Sacred Books of the East XI, 2nd edition, p. 249; also on veluriya, perhaps cat’s-eye or beryl, see Vinaya Texts ii.82, n. 1.
² upabhogaparibhoga.
³ = below, BD 3.81

This is the proper course here means: this is the appropriate course here.

---

There is no offence if, having picked up or having caused (someone) to pick up treasure or what is considered as treasure that is within a monastery or within a house, he lays it aside thinking: ‘It will be for him who will take it’; if he takes on trust what is considered as a jewel; if he takes it for the time being; if he thinks it is rag-robes; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

The Second

\(^1\) saññāṇaṁ katvā, or perhaps “having made it recognisable”; cf. cīvaraṁ sañjānitvā, at Vin 4.120.
\(^2\) rūpena. Vin-a 882 says: “Having freed the goods, having computed them, thinking, ‘There are so many kahāpaṇas or there is gold and silver,’ he should examine them.” Cf. rūpaṁ sikkhati at Vin 1.77, Vin 4.129, perhaps some form of money-changing.
\(^3\) nimitta. Vin-a 882, in explaining this, uses the word lañchana, stamp, impress, seal; the goods are stamped or sealed with clay or with lac.
\(^4\) I.e., to the owner if he comes, but if he (the monk) does not see the owner, he should do what is suitable; so Vin-a 882.
\(^5\) sampādeti. Word occurs at Vin 1.217, Vin 2.214.
\(^6\) The idea seems to be that he should set out in search of the owner, having left the goods with some reliable persons.
Monks’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 85

... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks having entered a village at the wrong time,¹ having sat down in a hall,² talked a variety of worldly talk,³ that is to say talk of kings, talk of thieves, talk of great ministers, talk of armies, talk of fears, talk of battles, talk of food, talk of drink, talk of clothes, talk of beds, talk of garlands, talk of scents, talk of relations, talk of vehicles, talk of villages, talk of little towns, talk of towns, talk of the country, talk of women,⁴ talk of strong drink,⁵ talk of streets,⁶ talk of wells, talk of those departed before,⁷ talk of ¹ vikāle, out of the (right) time—i.e., not in the hours when the alms-round was permissible. Cf. Bu-Pc 37. ² sabhāya. Cf. Vin 3.200. ³ tiracchānakathā, literally animal talk, that is worldly, low, childish talk, gossip. Cf. Vin 1.188; DN i.7, DN i.178, DN iii.36; MN i.513, MN ii.1, MN ii.23; SN v.419; AN v.128; and KS v.355; Dialogues of the Buddha 3.33; GS 5.86. There is a tendency at DN-a 89 to couple gehasitakathā, talk of worldly life, with tiracchānakathā. ⁴ On insertion of purisakathāṁ after itthikathāṁ in some of the manuscripts, see Dialogues of the Buddha 3.34, n. 1. ⁵ surākathāṁ here. Vin 1.188; DN i.8, D.1.179, DN iii.36; MN i.513, MN ii.1, MN ii.23 read sūrakathāṁ, talk of heroes, valiant men; DN-a 90 = MN-a 3.223 saying that Nandimitta, a warrior, was called a hero. Vin-a 882 says nothing. SN-a iii.295 explains that there are two readings, sūrak° and sūrak°; by the latter is meant conducing to pleasure by drinking strong drinks. ⁶ visikhākathāṁ. Buddhaghosa at DN-a 90 takes this as talk about streets, whether they are well or badly situated, whether they contain brave people (sūrā), poor people, and so forth. Certainly “gossip at (or from) street corners” (Dialogues of the Buddha 1.13, Dialogues of the Buddha 3.34) could not be meant here. See KS v.355, n. 7. ⁷ pubbapetakathāṁ. Dialogues of the Buddha 1.14, Dialogues of the Buddha 3.34 read “ghost-stories”; Further Dialogues of the Buddha 1.363 “kinsfolk departed” (following DN-a, MN-a and SN-a, “talk on those who were formerly relations”).

diversity,¹ speculation about the world,² speculation about the sea, talk on becoming and not becoming thus or thus.³ People looked down upon, criticised, spread it about, saying:

“How can these recluses, sons of the Sakyans, having entered a village at the wrong time, having sat down in a hall, talk a variety of worldly talk, that is to say, talk of kings ... talk on becoming and not becoming thus or thus? It is like householders who enjoy pleasures of the senses.”

Monks heard these people who ... spread it about. Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying: “How can this group of six monks, having entered a village at the wrong time, ... talk a variety of worldly talk, that is to say ... talk of becoming and not becoming thus or thus?” ... “Is it true, as is said, that you, monks, having entered a village at the wrong time ... talked a variety of worldly talk, that is to say ... talk of becoming and not becoming thus or thus?”

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

“How can you, foolish men, having entered a village at the wrong time, ... talk a variety of worldly talk, that is to say ... talk of becoming and not becoming thus or thus? It is not, foolish men, for pleasing

---

¹ nānattakathāṁ. Translated at Dialogues of the Buddha 1.14, Dialogues of the Buddha 3.34; GS 5.87; KS v.356 “desultory talk”; Further Dialogues of the Buddha 1.363, “and all the rest of it; Vinaya Texts ii.20 “various tales. ” See Dialogues of the Buddha 1.14, n. 2. (sn-a iii.295 calls it nīratharakathā, useless, profitless talk, but also seems to think that it is talk on opposites: first, last; freed, something remaining. ² lokakkhāyikaṁ samuddakkāyikaṁ. See Dialogues of the Buddha 1.14, n. 3. The Commentaries refer to the lokāyatas (a school of theorisers; see Vinaya Texts iii.151, n. 2). Further Dialogues of the Buddha 1.363 has “chatter about world and ocean”; gs 5.87 “fables about (the origin of) land and sea”; ks v.356. “fabulous talk about (the origin of) land and sea”; Dialogues of the Buddha 3.34 “speculative talk on the world and the sea.” Word occurs at Mil 316, translated Questions of King Milinda, ii.187, “the physicists.” ³ itibhavābhavatāḥ iti vā. DN-a 91 says that bhava is growth (vuddhi), abhava loss or waste (hāni). SN-a iii.295 and MN-a 3.223 make a sixfold division: bhava is eternal, sassata; abhava is annihilation or breaking up, ucceda; bhava is growth, abhava is loss; bhava is happiness arising from sense-pleasures, abhava is exhaustion of self. Itibhavābhavatā occurs at Vin 2.184; Snp 6.
those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk should enter a village at the wrong time, there is an offence of expiation.”

And thus this rule of training for monks came to be laid down by the lord.

Now at that time several monks,¹ going to Sāvatthī through the Kosalan country, arrived at a certain village in the evening. People, having seen these monks, spoke thus: “Enter, honoured sirs.” Then these monks, thinking, “It is forbidden by the lord to enter a village at the wrong time,” being scrupulous, did not enter. Thieves robbed these monks. Then these monks, having arrived in Sāvatthī, told this matter to the monks. The monks told this matter to the lord. Then the lord, on this occasion, in this connection, having given reasoned talk, addressed the monks, saying:

“I allow you, monks, having asked (for permission),² to enter a village at the wrong time. And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk, not having asked (for permission), should enter a village at the wrong time, there is an offence of expiation.”

And thus this rule of training for monks came to be laid down by the lord.

Now at that time a certain monk, going to Sāvatthī through the Kosalan country, arrived at a certain village in the evening. People, having seen that monk, spoke thus: “Enter, honoured sir.” Then that monk, thinking, “It is forbidden by the lord to enter a village at the wrong time, not having asked (for permission),” being scrupulous, did not enter. Thieves robbed that monk. Then that monk, having arrived in Sāvatthī, told this matter to the monks. The monks told this matter to the lord. Then the lord, on this occasion, in this connection, having given reasoned talk, addressed, the monks, saying:

“I allow you, monks, having asked (for permission) if a monk be there, to enter a village at the wrong time. And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatsoever monk, not having asked (for permission) if a monk be there, should enter a village at the wrong time, there is an offence of expiation.”

And thus this rule of training for monks came to be laid down by the lord.

Now at that time a certain monk came to be bitten by a snake. A certain monk, thinking: “I will bring fire,” went to a village. Then that monk, thinking, “It is forbidden by the lord, not having asked (for permission) if a monk be there, to enter a village at the wrong time,” being scrupulous, did not enter. They told this matter to the lord. Then the lord, on this occasion, in this connection, having given reasoned talk, addressed the monks, saying:

“I allow you, monks, if there is some kind of urgent thing to be done,¹ not having asked (for permission) if a monk be there, to enter a village at the wrong time. And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatsoever monk, not having asked (for permission) if a monk be there, should enter a village at the wrong time, unless there is some kind of urgent thing to be done, there is an offence of expiation.”

Whatever means: monk is to be understood in this case.
If a monk be there means: he becomes able to enter having asked (for permission).²
If a monk be not there means: he does not become able to enter having asked (for permission).³
The wrong time means: after noon has passed until sunrise.⁴

Should enter a village means: if he passes beyond the enclosure of a village that is fenced in, there is an offence of expiation; if he enters¹ the precincts of a village that is not fenced in, there is an offence of expiation.²

Unless there is some kind of urgent thing to be done means: setting to one side some kind of urgent thing to be done.

---

If he thinks that it is the wrong time when it is the wrong time (and) not having asked (for permission) if a monk be there, enters a village unless there is some kind of urgent thing to be done, there is an offence of expiation. If he is in doubt as to whether it is the wrong time ... If he thinks that it is the right time when it is the wrong time ... offence of expiation. If he thinks that it is the wrong time when it is the right time, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether it is the right time, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it is the right time when it is the right time, there is no offence.

---

There is no offence if there is some kind of urgent thing to be done; if a monk be there he enters having asked (for permission); if no monk being there he enters not having asked (for permission); if he is going into a village³; if he is going to the nuns’ quarters; if he is going to the sleeping-place of adherents of other sects; if he is going on his way back; if the way is through a village; if there are accidents; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.⁴

The Third
... among the Sakyans at Kapilavatthu in the Banyan monastery. Now at that time monks were invited by a certain ivory-worker, saying: “If the masters want a needle case,¹ I (can supply them) with a needle-case.”² Then the monks asked for many needle-cases; they asked for large needle-cases for those who had small needle-cases, they asked for small needle-cases for those who had large needle-cases. Then that ivory-worker, making many needle-cases for the monks, was not able to make other goods for sale, and he did not keep himself going and his wife and children suffered. People ... spread it about, saying: “How can these recluses, sons of the Sakyans, not knowing moderation,³ ask for many needle-cases? This (man), making many needle-cases for these (monks), is not able to make other goods for sale ... and his wife and children suffer.” Monks heard these people who ... spread it about. Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying: “How can these monks, not knowing moderation, ask for many needle-cases? ... “Is it true, as is said, monks, that monks, not knowing moderation, asked for many needle-cases?” “It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

“How can you, monks, not knowing moderation, ask for many needle-cases? It is not, foolish men, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

¹ sūcighara. Cf. Vin 4.123, where this is one of the articles that monks are forbidden to hide, even in fun. ² For the rest of this paragraph, cf. Bu-NP 22, and where a potter, also of Kapilavatthu, used this expression in inviting monks to let him supply them with bowls. ³ Omitted above, probably owing to some scribe’s error.

“Whatever monk should have a needle-case made that is made of bone or made of ivory or made of horn, there is an offence of expiation involving breaking up.”¹

______________

Whatever means: ... monk is to be understood in this case.

Bone means: whatever is bone.

Ivory means: it is called elephant-ivory.²

Horn means: whatever is horn.

Should have made means: if he makes it or causes it to be made, in the action there is an offence of wrong-doing: having broken it up on acquisition, an offence of expiation is to be confessed.

If what was incompletely executed by himself he has finished by himself, there is an offence of expiation. If he makes others finish what was incompletely executed by himself, there is an offence of expiation. If what was incompletely executed by others he has finished by himself, there is an offence of expiation. If he makes others finish what was incompletely executed by others, there is an offence of expiation. If he makes it or causes it to be made for another, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If, having acquired what was made for another, he makes use of it, there is an offence of wrong-doing.³

______________

There is no offence if it is a block,⁴ fire-wood,⁵ a buckle,⁶ a box

¹ bhedanakaṁ pācittiyaṁ. Cf. nissaggiyaṁ pācittiyaṁ. The remainder of the Pācittiyas involve some other form of punishment, chedanaka and uddālanaka, in addition to confession or expiation, pācittiya. ² hatthidanta, or elephant’s tusBu-Sk. ³ Cf. Vin 3.225. ⁴ gaṇthikā. Allowed at Vin 2.136 to prevent a robe from being blown up by the wind. Word occurs again at Vin 1.46, Vin 2.215; Ja 1.150. ⁵ araṇika. Vin-a 883, araṇike ti araṇidhanuke. Critical Pali Dictionary calls araṇika “a part of the fire-tool,” and refers to araṇī, “either of the two pieces of wood for making a fire.” Araṇidhanuka it calls a “bow for keeping the twirling-stick going.” ⁶ vidha. Vin-a 883 reads vīṭhe. Pali-English Dictionary suggests “a little box” tentatively. Commentary does not help. Allowed at Vin 2.136; translated at Vinaya Texts iii.143 “buckle.” with note that “the word occurs also, and apparently in the same sense, in the Old Commentary on the 86th Pācittiya.” for ointment, a stick to put the ointment on with, the handle of an adze, a towel; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

The Fourth

---

¹ añjani. Allowed at Vin 1.203, but to be made of prescribed materials, and again at Vin 2.135. Word occurs at mn ii.65; Thag 773. mn-a 3.303 reads anjañi ti añjananālikā, a tube (or box) for ointment; cf. Thig-a 267. ² añjanisalāka. Allowed at Vin 1.203, to be made of prescribed materials, and again at Vin 2.135. ³ vāsijaṭa. Also at an iv.127; sn iii.154. ⁴ udakapuñchanī. Allowed at Vin 2.122.
... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, was lying down on a high couch. Then the lord, as he was touring the lodgings together with several monks, came up to the dwelling-place of the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans. The venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, saw the lord coming from afar, and seeing him, he spoke thus to the lord: “Lord, let the lord come, let him lie down on my bed.”

Then the lord, having turned back from there, addressed the monks, saying: “Monks, the foolish man should be spoken to about his abode.”

Then the lord, having in many a figure rebuked the venerable Upananda, the son of the Sakyans, for his difficulty in maintaining himself ... “... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“When a new couch or chair is being made for a monk,¹ the legs should be made eight finger-breadths² (high) according to the accepted finger-breadth,³ except for the knotted ends below.⁴ In exceeding this (measure), there is an offence of expiation involving cutting down.”⁵

¹ Cf. Bu-NP 13; Vin 3.226. ² aṅgula. ³ sugataṅgula, sugata here meaning “standard,” recognised, accepted, right. Cf. sugata-vidatthi, a span of the accepted measure, at Vin 3.149 (= BD 1.253f.); but also cf. sugata-cīvara at Vin 4.173 below. ⁴ heṭṭhimāya aṭanīyā. Vinaya Texts i.53 translates “exclusive of the lowermost piece of the bed-frame.” But at Vin-a 773f., on Bu-Pc 14, the word aṭanī occurs in description of the various kinds of couches and chairs, and seems to mean “knotched end.” Cf. Vinaya Texts iii.164. ⁵ chedanakaṁ pācittiyaṁ.
New means: it is so called with reference to the making.\textsuperscript{1}

Couch\textsuperscript{2} means: there are four (kinds of) couch: a long one, one with slats, one with curved legs, one with removable legs.

Chair\textsuperscript{3} means: there are four (kinds of) chair: a long one, one with slats, one with curved legs, one with removable legs.

Is being made means: making or causing to be made.\textsuperscript{4}

The legs should be made eight finger-breathths (high) ... except for the knotched ends below means: setting aside the knotched ends below. If he makes it or causes it to be made exceeding this (measure), in the business there is an offence of wrong-doing; having cut it down on acquisition, an offence of expiation is to be confessed.

If what was incompletely executed by himself he has finished by himself ... (see Bu-Pc 86.2.1) ... If he makes others finish what was incompletely executed by others, there is an offence of expiation.\textsuperscript{5} If he makes it or causes it to be made for another, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If, having acquired what was made for another, he makes use of it, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

There is no offence if he makes it to the (proper) measure; if he makes it less than the (proper) measure; if, having acquired what was made for another, (but) exceeding the (proper) measure, having cut it down, he makes use of it\textsuperscript{6}; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

\textit{The Fifth}

\begin{align*}
\textsuperscript{1} & = \text{Vin 3.226 (BD 2.77); Vin 4.279.} \\
\textsuperscript{2} & = \text{Vin 4.40 (BD 2.240, and see notes).} \\
\textsuperscript{3} & = \text{Vin 4.40 (BD 2.240, and see notes).} \\
\textsuperscript{4} & = \text{Vin 3.226 (BD 2.77); Vin 4.279.} \\
\textsuperscript{5} & \text{Cf. Bu-NP 11–15.} \\
\textsuperscript{6} & = \text{below, BD 3.96.} \end{align*}
... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks had a couch and a chair made covered with\(^1\) cotton.\(^2\) People, having seen (this) as they were touring the dwelling-places, looked down upon, criticised, spread it about, saying:

“How can the recluses, sons of the Sakyans, have a couch and a chair made covered with cotton, like householders who enjoy pleasures of the senses?” Monks heard these people who ... spread it about. Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying:

“How can this group of six monks have a couch and a chair made covered with cotton?” ... “Is it true, as is said, that you, monks, had ... covered with cotton?” “It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

“How can you, foolish men, have a couch and a chair made covered with cotton? It is not, foolish men, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“What ever monk should have a couch or a chair made covered with cotton, there is an offence of expiation involving tearing off.”\(^3\)

---

\(^1\) onaddha, or stuffed with, as at Vinaya Texts i.54. At Vin 2.150 onaddhamañca and onaddhapiṭha allowed. Vinaya Texts iii.168 translates “chairs and bedsteads covered (and upholstered with, cushions to fit them).” See also Vin 2.270; Dhp 146.
\(^2\) tūla.
\(^3\) uddālanaka, tearing off or out.
Whatever means: ... monk is to be understood in this case.

Couch\(^1\) means: there are four (kinds of) couch ...

Chair\(^2\) means: there are four (kinds of) chair ... one with removable legs.

Cotton means: there are three (kinds of) cotton: cotton from trees, cotton from creepers, cotton from grass.\(^3\)

Should have made means: if he makes (it) or causes it to be made, in the business there is an offence of wrong-doing; having torn it off on acquisition, an offence of expiation is to be confessed.

If what was incompletely executed by himself he has finished by himself ... If he makes others finish what was incompletely finished by others, there is an offence of expiation. If he makes it or causes it to be made for another, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If, having acquired what was made for another, he makes use of it, there is an offence of wrong-doing.\(^4\)

There is no offence if it is for a binding, for a girdle, for a shoulder-strap, for a bag for carrying the bowl in, for a water-strainer; if he is making a squatting-mat; if, having acquired what was made for another, having torn it off, he makes use of it; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

The Sixth

\(^1\) Cf. Vin 4.40, Vin 4.168.  \(^2\) Cf. Vin 4.40, Vin 4.168.  \(^3\) These three kinds of cotton are allowed at Vin 2.150 for making bimbohana, squatting-mats. The last, potakī-tūla (at Vin 2.150 poṭaki-) is not “tūlāṁ from a young fowl,” as at Vinaya Texts i.54, n. 1. Poṭaki is “in tūla a kind of cotton, ‘grass-tuft,’ thistledown (?)”, so Pali-English Dictionary Cf. Vinaya Texts iii.167, “cotton produced from Poṭaki-grass.”  \(^4\) Cf. above, BD 3.88.  \(^5\) These five articles mentioned as not causing an offence at Vin 3.257; see BD 3.144.  \(^6\) The three kinds of cotton are allowed to be used in making a bimbohana (Vin 2.150).
... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time a piece of cloth to sit upon was allowed to monks by the lord.² The group of six monks, thinking: “A piece of cloth to sit upon is allowed by the lord,” used pieces of cloth to sit upon that were not of a (proper) measure; they made (these) hang down in front of and at the back of a couch and a chair. Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying: “How can this group of six monks use pieces of cloth to sit upon that are not of a (proper) measure?” ...

“Is it true, as is said, that you, monks, use pieces of cloth to sit upon that are not of a (proper) measure?”

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

“How can you, foolish men, use pieces of cloth to sit upon that are not of a (proper) measure? It is not, foolish men, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“When a piece of cloth to sit upon is being made for a monk, it must be made to a (proper) measure. This is the (proper) measure here: in length two spans according to the accepted span, in breadth one and a half spans. In exceeding this (measure), there is an offence of expiation involving cutting down.”

And thus this rule of training for monks came to be laid down by 1 nīsīdana. See BD 2.87, n. 2. ² At Vin 1.295, referred to by Vin-a 884. Cf. Bu-NP 15. At Vin 1.297 nīsīdana are allowed to be kept for oneself and not assigned to another. ³ appamāṇa. They were evidently too big, and the right measure is laid down in the resulting sikkhāpada. ⁴ vidatthi. ⁵ sugata-vidatthi. Cf. Bu-NP 15, and BD 1.253.

the lord.

Now at that time the venerable Udāyin became very fat.¹ He, having made ready a piece of cloth to sit upon before the lord, pulling it out² all round, sat down. Then the lord spoke thus to the venerable Udāyin:

“Why do you, Udāyin, pull out the piece of cloth to sit upon, just as if it were an old skin?”³

“It is because, lord, the piece of cloth to sit upon allowed by the lord is very small.”

Then the lord, on this occasion, in this connection, having given reasoned talk, addressed the monks, saying:

“I allow you, monks, a border⁴ of a span for a piece of cloth to sit upon. And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“When a piece of cloth to sit upon is being made for a monk, it must be made to a (proper) measure. This is the (proper) measure here: in length two spans according to the accepted span, in breadth one and a half spans, the border a span. In exceeding this (measure), there is an offence of expiation involving cutting down.”

A piece of cloth to sit upon means: it is so-called if it has a border.⁵

Is being made means: making or causing to be made.

It must be made to a (proper) measure. This is the (proper) measure here: in length ... the border a span means: if he makes ¹ mahākāya, literally a “great body.” ² samañcamāno. Pali-English Dictionary gives “to bend together.” ³ purāṇāsikoṭṭha. Pali-English Dictionary gives “sheath” for asi-koṭṭha, and would therefore presumably read this passage, “Why do you bend together this piece of cloth, like an old sheath?” I take the commentarial explanation by cammakāra to refer to leather-worker; Vin-a 884 says that “as the-leather-worker says, ‘I will make this hide wide,’ and pulls it out (samañchati, with variant reading samañchaticchavin, a skin), tugs it out (kaḍḍhati) from here and there, so he (does) to that piece of cloth to sit upon.” The meaning is confused because asi-camma means “sword and shield” (Vin 2.192; An iii.93), and kaḍḍhati with khagga means “to draw the sword,” as at Ja 1.273. ⁴ dasā, border or fringe. ⁵ = Vin 3.232, Vin 4.123. See BD 2.87, BD 2.415.

it or causes it to be made having exceeded this (measure), in the business there is an offence of wrong-doing; having cut it down on acquisition, an offence of expiation is to be confessed.\textsuperscript{1}

If what was incompletely executed by himself he has finished by himself\textsuperscript{2} ... If he makes others finish what was incompletely executed by others, there is an offence of expiation. If he makes it or causes it to be made for another, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If having acquired what was made for another, he makes use of it, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

\textbf{The Seventh}

\begin{footnotesize}
\textsuperscript{1} = above, \textit{BD 3.91.} \quad \textsuperscript{2} See \textit{Bu-Pc 86.2.1, Bu-Pc 87.2.1, Bu-Pc 88.2.1; Bi-Pc 22.} \textsuperscript{3} = above, \textit{BD 3.91.} \quad \textsuperscript{4} Cf. \textit{Vin 3.225, Vin 3.227, Vin 3.229, Vin 3.233; Vin 4.171, and Vin 4.279}, which = this paragraph.
\end{footnotesize}
Monks’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 90

... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time an itch-cloth¹ was allowed to the monks by the lord. The group of six monks, thinking: “An itch-cloth is allowed by the lord,” used itch-cloths that were not of a (proper) measure; they went about trailing (these) along² in front as well as behind.³ Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying: “How can this group of six monks use itch-cloths that are not of a (proper) measure” ...

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

“How can you, foolish men, use itch-cloths that are not of a (proper) measure? It is not, foolish men, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“When an itch-cloth is being made for a monk, it must be made to a (proper) measure. This is the (proper) measure here: in length four spans of the accepted span, in breadth two spans. In exceeding this (measure), there is an offence of expiation involving cutting down.”

----------------------

Itch-cloth means: it is for covering him who has itch⁴ or a small boil⁵ or a running sore⁶ or a thick scab disease⁷ from below the navel to above the knee.

¹ kaṇḍupāṭicchādi. Allowed at Vin 1.296, referred to at Vin-a 884. ² ākaḍḍhantā. Cf. ākaḍḍhanā at Vin 3.121, ākaḍḍhiyamānā at Vin 4.225, and kaḍḍhati, above, BD 3.95, n. 2. ³ Cf. below, BD 3.99, BD 3.235. ⁴ kaṇḍū ti kacchu, Vin-a 884. Kacchu is a skin disease, itch, scab. ⁵ piḷakā ti lohilutanṭikā sukhumapiḷakā, Vin-a 884. ⁶ assāva. ⁷ thullakacchu vā ābādio ti mahāpiḷakābadho vuccati, Vin-a 884; or a bad outbreak of large boils.
Monks’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 90

Is being made means: ... (see Bu-Pc 89.3) ...

it should be made to a (proper) measure ... in breadth two spans (Bu-Pc 89.3) ...

... if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

The Eighth
... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time a cloth for the rains¹ was allowed to monks by the lord.² The group of six monks, thinking: “A cloth for the rains is allowed by the lord,” wore cloths for the rains that were not of a (proper) measure; they went about trailing (these) along in front as well as behind.³ Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying: (see Bu-Pc 90.1) ... “... should be set forth:

“When a cloth for the rains is being made for a monk, it must be made to a (proper) measure. This is the (proper) measure here: in length six spans of the accepted span, in breadth two and a half spans.⁴ In exceeding this (measure), there is an offence of expiation involving cutting down.”

________________________

Cloth for the rains means: it is for the four months of the rainy season.

Is being made means: ... it must be made to a (proper) measure ... if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

The Ninth

² Vin 1.294.
³ Cf. above, BD 3.97.
⁴ See Vinaya Texts ii.225, note.
... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the venerable Nanda,¹ the son of the lord’s aunt, was beautiful, good to look upon, charming, four finger-breadths less (in height²) than the lord. He wore a robe the measure of a well-farer’s robe.³ Monks who were elders saw the venerable Nanda coming from afar; seeing him, saying: “The lord is coming,” they rose from their seats. These, recognising him when he had come, looked down upon, criticised, spread it about, saying: “How can the venerable Nanda wear a robe the measure of a well-farer’s robe?” They told this matter to the lord. Then the lord questioned the venerable Nanda, saying:

“How can the venerable Nanda wear a robe the measure of a well-farer’s robe?” They told this matter to the lord. Then the lord questioned the venerable Nanda, saying:

“How can the venerable Nanda wear a robe the measure of a well-farer’s robe?”

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked him, saying:

¹ Chief of the disciples who guard the doors of the faculties, AN i.25. At SN ii.281 he put on robes that had been dressed (or pressed) on both sides, anointed his eyes, and taking a bright bowl, went up to Gotama. According to the Commentary he did this so as to evoke some comment from his cousin—either approval or censure. Dictionary of Pali Proper Names ii.11, n. 6 suggests that perhaps above Vinaya story is another version of the Sañyutta story. See also KS ii.191, n. 1. ² caturaṅgulomaka. Vin-a 885 says catuhi aṅgulehi ūnakappamāṇo, less as to measure (height) than four finger-breadths. ³ sugata-cīvara-ppamāṇa. Here sugata cannot mean, as it does in sugata-vidatthi, prescribed, accepted or standard span, or there would have been no offence in wearing such a robe. See Vinaya Texts i.54, n. 3 for view that Gotama’s robe was not specially large. But here Nanda is mistaken for Gotama, but perhaps only because he was nearly the same height. Buddhaghosa is silent. See BD 3, Introduction, p. xviii.
“How can you, Nanda, wear a robe the measure of a well-farer's robe? It is not, Nanda, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ...
And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk should have a robe made the measure of a well-farer’s robe, or more, there is an offence of expiation involving cutting down. This is the (proper) measure here of a well-farer’s robe for a well-farer: in length nine spans of the accepted span, in breadth six spans; this is the (proper) measure of a well-farer’s robe for a well-farer.”

____________________

Whatever means: ... monk is to be understood in this case.

Well-farer’s robe means: in length it is nine spans of the accepted span, in breadth six spans.

Should have made means: if he makes it or causes it to be made, in the business ... (see Bu-Pc 89) ... If, having acquired what was made for another, he makes use of it, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

____________________

There is no offence if he makes it less; if having acquired what was made for another, having cut it clown, he makes use of it; if he makes a canopy ... or a squatting-mat; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.¹

The Tenth rule of training: that on Nanda

*The Ninth Division: that on treasure*²

*Concluded is the Minor (Class)*³

THIS IS ITS KEY

And of a king, treasure, if he be there,

a needle, and a couch, on cotton,

And a piece of cloth to sit upon,

and the itch, for the rains, and on a well-farer.

____________________

¹ Cf. BD 3.96 above. ² Like the seventh Division, the title here is taken not from the first but from the second rule in the Division. ³ khuddakaṁ samattaṁ, a minor or lesser class of rules; cf. khuddakaṁ niṭṭhitāṁ at end of Nuns’ Pācittiya.
Venerable ones, recited are the ninety-two rules for offences of expiation. Concerning them, I ask the venerable ones: I hope that you are quite pure in this matter? And a second time I ask: I hope that you are quite pure in this matter? And a third time I ask: I hope that you are quite pure in this matter? The venerable ones are quite pure in this matter, therefore they are silent, thus do I understand this.

Vin 4.175
At that time the enlightened one, the lord, was staying at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time a certain nun, having walked for alms in Sāvatthī, having seen a certain monk at the time of going back, spoke thus: “Come, master, accept alms.”

“Very well, sister,” and he took everything. She, at the approach of (meal)-time, was not able to walk for alms;² she became famished.² Then that nun on the second day … on the third day, having walked for alms in Sāvatthī, having seen that monk at the time of going back, spoke thus: “Come, master, accept alms “… she became famished. Then that nun on the fourth day went trembling along a carriage road. A householder who was a merchant, coming along in a chariot the opposite way, spoke thus to the nun:

“Get out of the way, lady.” She, turning aside, fell down just there. The householder who was a merchant apologised to that nun, saying: “Forgive me, lady, that I was the cause of your fall.”³ “I, householder, did not fall because of you, but I am simply very weak.”

“But why, lady, are you very weak?” Then this nun told this matter to the householder who was a merchant. The householder who was a merchant, having taken this nun to his house, looked down upon, criticised, spread it about, saying:

“How can these revered sirs accept food from the hand of a nun? Women obtain things with difficulty.”⁴ Monks heard this house-

---

¹ She could not go for alms again. ² Cf. Vin 4.70, Vin 4.93. ³ māyāsi pātitā, literally, that you were brought to fall by me. ⁴ Cf. Vin 3.208.
holder who was a merchant who ... spread it about. Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying: “How can this monk accept food from the hand of a nun?”

“Is it true, as is said, that you, monk, accepted food from the hand of a nun?”

“It is true, lord.”

“Was she a relation of yours, monk, or not a relation?”

“She was not a relation, lord.”

“Foolish man, one who is not a relation does not know what is suitable or what is unsuitable, or what is right or what is wrong for a woman who is not a relation. How can you, foolish man, accept food from the hand of a nun who is not a relation? It is not, foolish man, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever monk should eat or partake of solid food or soft food, having accepted it with his own hand from the hand of a nun who is not a relation (and) who has entered among the houses,¹ it should be confessed² by that monk, saying: ‘I have fallen, your reverences, into a blameworthy matter,³ inappropriate, which ought to be confessed⁴; I confess it.’”

Whatever means: ... monk is to be understood in this case.

(Nun) who is not a relation means: one who is not related on the mother’s side or on the father’s side back through seven generations.

Nun means: one ordained by both Orders.

Among the houses means: a carriage road,⁵ a cul-de-sac,⁶ cross-roads,⁷ a house.

¹ antaragharaṁ. ² paṭidgesettabbaṁ. ³ dhamma, thing, state, often rule in Vinaya.; here probably offence. ⁴ pāṭidesaniya. Cf. AN ii.243 (pāṭidesanīyaka dhamma).
⁵ The first three of these occur again at Vin 4.270f. Rathiyā, carriage-road, there defined, and also at Vin-a 886, as racchā, a word which occurs at Vin 3.151. ⁶ byūhaṁ. Vin 4.271 says “they depart by that (way) by which they entered.” ⁷ siṅghāṭakaṁ. Vin 4.271 defines by caccaraṁ, cross-road, while Vin-a 886 says “three corners or four corners, the place where roads meet.” Caccara occurs at Vin 3.151.
Solid food means: setting aside the five (kinds of) meals, and (food that may be eaten) during a watch of the night, during seven days, during life, the rest means solid food.

Soft food means: the five (kinds of) meals: cooked rice, food made with flour, barley-meal, fish, meat.

If he says, “I will eat, I will partake of,” (and) accepts, there is an offence of wrong-doing; for every mouthful there is an offence which ought to be confessed.

If he thinks that she is not a relation when she is not a relation, (and) having accepted with his own hand solid food or soft food from the hand of her who has entered among the houses, if he eats it or partakes of it, there is an offence which ought to be confessed. If he is in doubt as to whether she is not a relation... If he thinks that she is a relation when she is not a relation... offence which ought to be confessed. If he accepts for the sake of nutriment (food that may be eaten) during a watch of the night, during seven days, during life, there is an offence of wrong-doing. For every mouthful there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he accepts solid food or soft food from the hand of one ordained by one (Order only), thinking, “I will eat, I will partake of,” there is an offence of wrong-doing. For every mouthful there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that she is not a relation when she is a relation, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether she is a relation, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that she is a relation when, she is a relation, there is no offence.

There is no offence if she is a relation; if she makes (another) give but does not (herself) give; if having put it down nearby, she gives; if it is within a monastery; if it is in the nuns’ quarters; if it

---

4. Vin-a 886, someone who is not a relation.
5. Vin-a 886, if having put it on the ground, she says, ‘I will give this to you, master.’
6. antarārāma, not ajjhārāma as at Vin 4.161.
is at the sleeping-place of members of other sects\(^1\); if it is on the way back\(^2\); if, having taken it back\(^3\) from the village, she gives; if, when there is a reason, she gives (food that may be eaten) during a watch of the night, during seven days, during life\(^4\) and he makes use of it; if it is from a female probationer, a female novice; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

The First
Monks’ Confession (Pāṭidesaniya) 2

... at Rājagaha in the Bamboo Grove at the squirrel’s feeding-place. Now at that time monks ate, invited by families. The group of six nuns came to be standing, giving directions for the group of six monks, saying: “Here give curry, give cooked rice here.” The group of six monks ate as much as they pleased, other monks did not eat as much as expected. Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying:

“How can this group of six monks, when the nuns are giving directions, not restrain¹ (them)?” ...

“Is it true, as is said, that you, monks, when nuns were giving directions, did not restrain (them)?”

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying: “How can you, foolish men ... not restrain (them)? It is not, foolish men, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Now, monks eat, invited by families. If a nun comes to be standing as though giving directions,² saying: ‘Here give curry, give cooked rice here,’ that nun should be rebuked by those monks, saying: ‘Stand aside,’³ sister, while the monks eat.’ But if it should not occur to a single monk to dismiss that nun, saying: ‘Stand aside, sister, while the monks eat,’ it should be confessed by those monks, saying: ‘We have fallen, your reverences, into a blame-worthy matter, inappropriate, which ought to be confessed; we confess it.”

¹ nivāreti, to hold back, warn. ² vosāsamānārupā. ³ apasakka.

Now monks eat, invited by families means: a family means there are four (kinds of) family: noble family, brahmin family, merchant family, low-class family.¹

Eat, invited, means: they eat, invited to any one meal of the five (kinds of) meals.

Nun means: one ordained by both Orders.

Giving directions² means: if according to friendship, according to comradeship, according to intimacy, according as one has the same preceptor, according as one has the same teacher,³ she says: ‘Here give curry, give cooked rice here,’ this means giving directions.

By those monks means: by the monks who are eating.

That nun means: the nun who is giving directions.

That nun should be dismissed by those monks, saying: ‘Stand aside, sister, while the monks eat.’ But if she is not dismissed by a single monk (and) he accepts (food), saying: ‘I will eat, I will partake of,’ there is an offence of wrong-doing. For every mouthful there is an offence which ought to be confessed.

If he thinks that she is ordained when she is ordained (and) does not restrain her when she is giving directions, there is an offence which ought to be confessed. If he is in doubt as to whether she is ordained ... If he thinks that she is not ordained when she is ordained ... offence which ought to be confessed. If he does not restrain one ordained by one (Order only) who is giving directions, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that she is ordained when she is not ordained, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether she is not ordained, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that she is not ordained when she is not ordained, there is no offence.

There is no offence if she makes (another) give her own meal, (but) does not (herself) give; if she gives a meal to others (but) does not make (them) give; if she makes (another) give what was not given; if she makes (another) give where it was not given; if she makes (another) give the same to everybody; if a female probationer gives directions; if a female novice gives directions; setting aside the five (kinds of) meals, there is no offence in (eating) any others\(^1\); if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

The Second

\(^1\) = Vin 4.68, Vin 4.71, Vin 4.75, Vin 4.78.
Monks’ Confession (Pāṭidesaniya) 3

...at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time there was in Sāvatthī a certain family which on both sides came to be pleased,¹ it grew in faith, it decreased in wealth; whatever solid food or soft food accrued to that family before a meal, having given it all away to monks, sometimes they went without food.² People ... spread it about, saying:

“How can the recluses, sons of the Sakyans, not knowing moderation, accept? These (people), having given to these (monks), sometimes go without food.” Monks heard these people who ... spread it about. Then these monks told this matter to the lord. Then the lord on this occasion, in this connection, having given reasoned talk, addressed the monks, saying:

“I allow you, monks, when a family is growing in faith, is decreasing in wealth, to give such a family an agreement as to learners³ by a (formal) act at which the motion is followed by one proclamation.⁴ And thus, monks, should it be given: The Order should be informed by an experienced, competent monk, saying: ‘Honoured sirs, let the Order listen to me. Such and such a family is growing in faith, is decreasing in wealth. If it seems right to the Order, let the Order give the agreement as to learners to such and such a family. This is the motion. Honoured sirs, let the Order listen to me. Such and such a family ... in wealth. The Order gives the agreement as to learners to such and such a family. If the giving of the agreement as to learners to such and such a family is pleasing to the venerable ones, let them be silent; if it is not pleasing, they should speak. The agreement as to learners is given by the Order to such and such a family, and it is right ... So do I understand this.’ And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

¹ ubhotapasanna—i.e., pleased with the Sakyan teaching, “converted” to it. Vin-a 887 says that the layman and the laywoman follower were both pleased, and both are said to have been stream-attainers. ² anasītā acchanti. ³ sekhasammuti. Sekha is one who is under training, as opposed to asekha, the adept. An agreement, made by monks for lay-people, is as remarkable as it is unusual. ⁴ āntidutiya kamma.

“Whatever are those families that are agreed upon as learners, whatever monk having accepted among such families as are agreed upon as learners solid food or soft food with his own hand, should eat it or partake of it, it should be confessed by that monk, saying: ‘I have fallen, your reverences, into a blameworthy matter, inappropriate, which ought to be confessed; I confess it.’”

And thus this rule of training for monks came to be laid down by the lord.

Now at that time there came to be a festival at Sāvatthī. People, having invited monks, offered them food. The monks, being scrupulous, did not consent, thinking: “It is forbidden by the lord, having accepted among families that are agreed upon as learners solid food or soft food with one’s own hand, to eat it, to partake of it.” These looked down upon, criticised, spread it about, saying: “But how is it that because of our way of living, the masters do not accept from us?” Monks heard these people who ... spread it about. Then these monks told this matter to the lord. Then the lord, on this occasion, in this connection, having given reasoned talk, addressed the monks, saying:

“I allow you, monks, when invited, having accepted among families agreed upon as learners solid food or soft food with your own hand, to eat it, to partake of it. And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatsoever are those families that are agreed upon as learners, whatever monk if he is not invited beforehand, having accepted among such families as are agreed upon as learners solid food or soft food with his own hand, should eat it or partake of it, it should be confessed by that monk, saying: ‘I have fallen, your reverences, into a blameworthy matter, inappropriate, which ought to be confessed; I confess it.’”

And thus this rule of training for monks came to be laid down by the lord.

Now at that time a certain monk came to frequent that family. Then that monk, having dressed in the morning, taking his bowl and robe, approached that family, and having approached he sat down on the appointed seat. At that time this monk came to be ill. Then these people spoke thus to this monk: “Eat, honoured sir.” Then that monk, thinking: “It is forbidden by the lord, not being invited, having accepted among families agreed upon as learners solid food or soft food with one’s own hand, to eat it, to partake of it,” and being scrupulous, he did not accept; he was not able to walk for alms, he became famished. Then that monk, having gone to the monastery, told this matter to the monks. The monks told this matter to the lord. Then the lord, on this occasion, in this connection, having given reasoned talk, addressed the monks, saying:

“I allow you, monks, when a monk is ill, having accepted among families agreed upon as learners solid food or soft food with his own hand, to eat it, to partake of it. And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever are those families that are agreed upon as learners, whatever monk, if he is not invited beforehand (and) not ill, having accepted among such families as are agreed upon as learners solid food or soft food with his own hand, should eat it or partake of it, it should be confessed by that monk, saying: ‘Your reverences, I have fallen into a blameworthy matter, inappropriate, which ought to be confessed; I confess it.’”

Whatever are those families that are agreed upon as learners means: a family agreed upon as learners is called that family which is growing in faith, decreasing in wealth; for such a family an agreement as to learners comes to be given by a (formal) act at which the motion is followed by one proclamation.

Whatever means: ... monk is to be understood in this case.

Among such families as are agreed, upon as learners means:
among families like these agreed upon as learners.

Not invited means: not invited for today or tomorrow. If he invites him as he is entering the precincts of the house, this means not invited. Invited means: invited for today or tomorrow. If he invites him not as he is entering the precincts of the house, this means invited.

Not ill means: he is able to walk for alms. Ill means: he is not able to walk for alms.

Solid food means: setting aside the five (kinds of) meals, (food that may be eaten) during a watch of the night, during seven days, during life, the rest means solid food.¹

Soft food means: the five kinds of meals: cooked rice, food made with flour, barley-meal, fish, meat.²

If he is not invited, not ill, (and) accepts, thinking: “I will eat, I will partake of,” there is an offence of wrong-doing. For every mouthful there is an offence which ought to be confessed.

If he thinks that they are agreed upon as learners when they are agreed upon as learners, (and) not invited, not ill, having accepted with his own hand solid food or soft food, eats it or partakes of it, there is an offence which ought to be confessed. If he is in doubt as to whether they are agreed upon as learners ... If he thinks that they are not agreed upon as learners when they are agreed upon as learners ... offence which ought to be confessed. If he accepts for the sake of nutriment (food that may be eaten) during a watch of the night, during seven days, during life, there is an offence of wrong-doing.³
For every mouthful there is an offence of wrong-doing.⁴ If he thinks that they are agreed upon as learners when they are not agreed upon as learners, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether they are not agreed upon as learners, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that they are not agreed upon as learners when they are not agreed upon as learners, there is no offence.

There is no offence if he is invited; if he is ill; if he eats the remainder (of a meal) of one who was invited, or one who is ill; if there come to be alms there prepared for others; if having taken it out from the house, they give¹; if he is a regular diner; if it is (food allowed) by ticket; if it is food (given on) a day of the waxing or waning of the moon, on an Observance day, on the day after an Observance day²; if, when there is a reason, he gives (food that may be eaten) during a watch of the night, during seven days, during life,³ and he makes use of it;⁴ if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

The Third

Monks’ Confession (Pāṭidesaniya) 4

... among the Sakyans at Kapilavatthu in the Banyan monastery. Now at that time the slaves of the Sakyans came to be out of hand.¹ Sakyan women wanted to make a meal in jungle lodgings. The slaves of the Sakyans heard that Sakyan women were desirous of making a meal in jungle lodgings. They infested² the way. Sakyan women, taking sumptuous solid food, soft food, went off to a jungle lodging. The slaves of the Sakyans, having issued forth, robbed the Sakyan women and violated them. The Sakyans, having issued forth, having seized these thieves together with the goods, looked down upon, criticised, spread it about, saying:

“How can these revered sirs not announce that thieves are living in the monastery?” Monks heard the Sakyans who ... spread it about ... Then these monks told this matter to the lord. Then the lord on this occasion, in this connection, having given reasoned talk, addressed the monks, saying:

On account of this, monks, I will lay down a rule of training founded on ten reasons: for the excellence of the Order ... for following the rules of restraint.³ And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatever are those jungle lodgings that are held to be dangerous, frightening,⁴ whatever monk in such lodgings, not announced beforehand,⁵ having accepted solid food or soft food within a monastery with his own hand, should eat it or partake of it, it should be confessed by that monk, saying: ‘I have fallen, your reverences, into a blameworthy matter, inappropriate, which ought to be confessed; I confess it.’”

¹ avaraṭṭhā. Vin-a 887, paraphrases by paṭiviriṭṭhā. ² pāriyutṭhiṁsu. ³ Cf. BD 1.37. ⁴ Cf. Bu-NP 29; Vin 3.263. ⁵ pubbe appaṭṭasamīvidita. Editors of Vinaya Texts i.57 take this to mean “the danger incurred by people that enter that forest.” Cf. Vin 4.159.

And thus this rule of training for monks came to be laid down by the lord.

Now at that time a certain monk came to be ill in a jungle lodging. People, taking solid food or soft food set out for the jungle lodging. Then these people spoke thus to this monk: “Eat, honoured sir.” Then that monk, thinking: “It is forbidden by the lord, having accepted in a jungle lodging solid food or soft food with one’s own hand, to eat it, to partake of it,” being scrupulous, did not accept it; he was unable to enter\(^1\) for almsfood, he became famished. Then this monk told this matter to the monks. The monks told this matter to the lord. Then the lord, on this occasion, in this connection, having given reasoned talk, addressed the monks, saying:

“I allow, monks, an ill monk, having accepted in a jungle lodging solid food or soft food with his own hand, to eat it, to partake of it. And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“Whatsoever are those jungle lodgings that are held to be dangerous, frightening, whatever monk in such lodgings, not announced beforehand, having accepted solid food or soft food within a monastery with his own hand, should eat it or partake of it if he is not ill, it should be confessed by that monk, saying: ‘I have fallen, your reverences, into a blameworthy matter, inappropriate, which ought to be confessed; I confess it.’”

Those jungle lodgings means: the last lodging called “jungle” is five hundred dhanus measures (away from the village).\(^2\)

Dangerous means: if, in a monastery, in the precincts of a monastery, a place where thieves are halting is seen, a place where they are eating is seen,\(^3\) a place where they are resting is seen, a place where

---

1. pavisitūṁ; variant reading caritūṁ, to walk.
2. Vin 3.263 (see BD 2.157).
3. Omitted at Vin 3.263, but not at Vin 4.63.
they are sitting down is seen, a place where they are lying down is seen.¹

Frightening means: if, in a monastery, in the precincts of a monastery, people injured by thieves are seen, (people) plundered are seen, (people) beaten down are seen.²

Whatever means: monk is to be understood in this case.

In such lodgings as those means: in lodgings like those.

Not announced means: there is “announced” in five (ways but) this means not announced. Setting aside a monastery, the precincts of a monastery (as) announced, this is called not announced.

Announced means: whatever woman or man having come to a monastery, to the precincts of a monastery, declares: ‘Honoured sirs, they will convey solid food, soft food for so and so,’ if it becomes dangerous it should be pointed out that it is dangerous, if it becomes frightening it should be pointed out that it is frightening. If he speaks, saying: ‘Let him be, honoured sir, he will convey it,’ the thieves should be told: ‘People are serving here, go away.’

If it is announced in regard to conjey that the ingredients³ may be conveyed for that, this is called announced. If it is announced in regard to a meal that the ingredients may be conveyed for that, this is called announced. If it is announced in regard to solid food that the ingredients may be conveyed for that, this is called announced. If it is announced in regard to a family, the person who of that family conveys solid food or soft food, this is called announced. If it is announced in regard to a meal, the person who in that family conveys solid food or soft food, this is called announced. If it is announced in regard to a family, the person who in that meal conveys solid food or soft food, this is called announced. If it is announced in regard to a meal, the person who in that meal conveys solid food or soft food, this is called announced.

Solid food means: ... soft food means: ... meat.

Within a monastery means: when a monastery is fenced in, inside a monastery; the precincts when it is not fenced in.⁴

---

¹ Vin 3.263 (see BD 2.157) = Vin 4.63 (BD 2.290). ² Vin-a 887 says “setting aside a monastery that is a jungle lodging and its precincts, seeing a monk on the way issuing from the precincts or coming to a village, announced is done, but this comes to be not announced.”³ Parivāra. ⁴ = Bu-Pc 84; Vin 4.163.
Not ill means: he is able to walk for almsfood.
Ill means: he is not able to walk for almsfood.

If it is not announced, if he is not ill (and) accepts it, thinking: “I will eat, I will partake of,” there is an offence of wrong-doing. For every mouthful there is an offence which ought to be confessed.

If he thinks that it is not announced when it is not announced (and) having accepted solid food or soft food with his own hand within the monastery when he is not ill, eats it or partakes of it, there is an offence which ought to be confessed. If he is in doubt as to whether it is not announced ... If he thinks that it is announced when it is not announced ... ought to be confessed. If he accepts for the sake of nutriment (food to be eaten) during a watch of the night, during seven days, during life, there is an offence of wrong-doing. For every mouthful there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it is not announced when it is announced, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he is in doubt as to whether it is announced, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he thinks that it is announced when it is announced, there is no offence.

There is no offence if it is announced, if he is ill; if he eats the remainder of (a meal) if it was announced or of one who was ill; if having accepted it outside the monastery he makes use of it inside the monastery; if he makes use of a root or bark, or a leaf or a flower or a fruit growing there; if when there is a reason he makes use of (food to be eaten) during a watch of the night, during seven days, during life¹; if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

The Fourth

Venerable ones, recited are the four rules for offences which ought to be confessed. Concerning them, I ask the venerable ones: I hope that you are quite pure in this matter? And a second time I ask: I hope that you are quite pure in this matter? And a third time I ask: I hope that you are quite pure in this matter? The venerable ones are quite pure in this matter, therefore they are silent; thus do I understand this.

¹ Vin 4.83, Vin 4.85, Vin 4.86.

_Told are the offences which ought to be confessed._
Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 1

These rules for training,¹ venerable ones, come up for recitation.

At that time the enlightened one, the lord was staying at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapinḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks dressed with the inner robe² hanging down in front and behind. People ... spread it about, saying:

“How can these recluses, sons of the Sakyans, dress with the inner robe hanging down in front and behind, just like householders who enjoy the pleasures of the senses?”

Monks heard these people who ... spread it about. Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying:

“How can this group of six monks dress with the inner robe hanging down in front and behind?” Then these monks told this matter to the lord. Then the lord on this occasion in this connection, [having given reasoned talk³], having had the Order of monks convened, questioned the group of six monks, saying:

“Is it true, as is said, that you, monks, dressed with the inner robe hanging down in front and behind?”

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

“How can you, foolish men, dress with the inner robe hanging down in front and behind? It is not, foolish men, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training

¹ sekhiyā dhammā; rules for good behaviour, etiquette; “the rules regarding matters connected with discipline,” Vinaya Texts i.59. ² nivāsenti. This verb refers to dressing in the inner robe. Pārupati, see next Sekhiya, to putting on the upper robe and outer cloak. ³ Square brackets in text.
should be set forth:

“I will dress with the inner robe all round (me),”¹ is a training to be observed.”²

The inner robe should be dressed in (going) all round one for covering the circle of the navel, the circles of the knees.³ Whoever out of disrespect dresses with an inner robe hanging down in front or behind, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

There is no offence if it is unintentional, if he is not thinking, if he does not know,⁴ if he is ill, if there are accidents, if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 2

... in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks put on the upper robe⁵ hanging down in front and behind ... “... “I will put on the upper robe all round me,’ is a training to be observed.”

The upper robe should be put on all round one having made both edges level.⁶ Whoever out of disrespect puts on an upper robe hanging down in front or behind, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

There is no offence⁷ ... if he is the first wrong-doer.

Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 3 & 4

... in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of ¹ parimaṇḍalaṁ nivāssessāmi. Cf. Vin 1.46, Vin 2.213. Many of the Sekhiyas are repeated at Vin 2.213f. ² sikkhā karaṇiyā. ³ These are the three circles, timaṇḍala. ⁴ = Vin 4.125. ⁵ pārupanti, possibly here refers only to the upper robe, not to the outer cloak. ⁶ ubho kaṇṇe samaṁ katvā, so that neither end hangs higher or lower than the other. ⁷ As in Bu-Sk 1.

six monks, having uncovered their bodies, went amidst the houses¹ (instead of went read, in Bu-Sk 4, sat down.)

“Properly clad will I go (sit down) amidst the houses,’ is a training to be observed.”

One should go (sit down) amidst the houses properly clad. Whoever out of disrespect, having uncovered the body, goes (sits down) amidst the houses, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

There is no offence if it is unintentional, if he is not thinking, if he does not know, if he is ill (in Bu-Sk 4 it is added here: if he has gone into residence for the rains, if there are accidents, if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.)

Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 5 & 6

... in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks, making play with hand and foot, went amidst the houses (instead of went read, in Bu-Sk 6, sat down) ... “...

“Well-controlled will I go (sit down) amidst the houses,’ is a training to be observed.”

One should go (sit down) amidst the houses well-controlled. Whoever out of disrespect, making play with hand or foot, goes (sits down) amidst the houses, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

There is no offence if it is unintentional, if he is not thinking, if he does not know, if he is ill, if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 7 & 8

... in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks looking about here and there went (sat down) amidst the houses ... “...

¹ antaraghare. See Vinaya Texts i.59, n. 2; Vin 3.286, n. 2.
"With the eyes cast down will I go (sit down) amidst the houses,’ is a training to be observed."

One should go (sit down) amidst the houses with the eyes cast down looking only a plough’s (distance ahead).¹ Whoever out of disrespect, looking about here and there, goes (sits down) amidst the houses, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

There is no offence if it is unintentional, if he is not thinking, if he does not know, if he is ill, if there are accidents, if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

---

Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 9 & 10

... in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks lifting up (their robes²) went (sat down) amidst the houses …

"Not lifting up (the robes) will I go (sit down) amidst the houses,’ is a training to be observed."

One should not go (sit down) among the houses with (the robes) lifted up. Whoever out of disrespect having lifted up (the robe) on one side or on both, goes (sits down) amidst the houses, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

There is no offence if it is unintentional, if he is not thinking, if he does not know, if he is ill (in Bu-Sk 10 it is added here: if he has gone into residence for the rains, if there are accidents, if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.)

The First Division: that on all round

---

¹ Cf. Snp 410, Snp 411; Mil 398; Vism 19. ² ukkhittakāya. Vin-a 891 says, ekato vā ubhato vā ukkhittacīvaro hutvā ti aṭṭho; the meaning is, a robe having become raised (lifted up, pulled up) at one or both (sides).
Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 11 & 12

... in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks, laughing a great laugh,¹ went (sat down) amidst the houses ... “...

“‘Not with loud laughter² will I go (sit down) amidst the houses,’ is a training to be observed.”

One should not go (sit down) amidst the houses with loud laughter. Whoever out of disrespect, laughing a great laugh, goes (sits down) amidst the houses, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

There is no offence if it is unintentional, if he is not thinking, if he does not know, if he is ill, if he only smiles when the matter is one for laughter, if there are accidents, if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 13 & 14

... in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks, making a loud noise, a great noise, went (sat down) amidst the houses ... “...

“‘(With) little noise³ will I go (sit down) amidst the houses,’ is a training to be observed.”

One should go (sit down) amidst the houses with little noise.⁴ Whoever out of disrespect, making a loud noise, a great noise, goes (sits down) amidst the houses, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

There is no offence if it is unintentional, if he is not thinking, if he does not know, if he is ill, if there are accidents, if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

¹ mahāhasitaṁ hasantā. ² ujjhaggikāya. ³ appasaddo ... appasaddena. ⁴ appasaddo ... appasaddena.

Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 15 & 16

... in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks, their bodies swaying, went (sat down) amidst the houses, bending their bodies ... “...

“Not swaying the body will I go (sit down) amidst the houses,’ is a training to be observed.”

One should not go (sit down) amidst the houses swaying the body. One should go (sit down) holding the body straight. Whoever out of disrespect, the body swaying, goes (sits down) amidst the houses bending the body, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

There is no offence if it is unintentional, if he is not thinking, if he does not know, if he is ill (in Bu-Sk 16 it is added here: if he has gone into residence for the rains, if there are accidents, if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.)

Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 17 & 18

... in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks, their arms swaying, went (sat down) amidst the houses, bending their arms ... “...

“Not swaying the arms will I go (sit down) amidst the houses,’ is a training to be observed.”

One should not go (sit down) amidst the houses swaying the arms. One should go (sit down) holding the arms straight. Whoever out of disrespect, the arms swaying, goes (sits down) amidst the houses bending the arms, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

There is no offence ... (as in Bu-Sk 15, Bu-Sk 16) ... if he is the first wrong-doer.

Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 19 & 20

... in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks, their heads swaying, went (sat down) amidst the houses, bending their heads ... “...“Not swaying the head will I go (sit down) amidst the houses,’ is a training to be observed. ... (see Bu-Sk 17, Bu-Sk 18) ... if he is the first wrong-doer.

The Second Division: that on loud laughter

---

Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 21 & 22

... in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks, their arms akimbo,¹ went (sat down) amidst the houses ... “...“Not with arms akimbo will I go (sit down) amidst the houses,’ is a training to be observed.”

One should not go (sit down) amidst the houses with the arms akimbo. Whoever out of disrespect, having placed the arms akimbo on one side or on both, goes (sits down) amidst the houses, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

There is no offence ... (as in Bu-Sk 15, Bu-Sk 16) ... if he is the first wrong-doer.

---

¹ khambhakata. Vin-a 891 says that this is placing the hand on the hip.
Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 23 & 24

... in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks, having dressed themselves, including their heads, in the upper robes,¹ went (sat down) amidst the houses ... “... “Not muffled up² will I go (sit down) amidst the houses,’ is a training to be observed.”

One should not go (sit down) muffled up amidst the houses. Whoever out of disrespect goes (sits down) amidst the houses, having dressed himself, including his head, in the upper robe, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

There is no offence ... (as in Bu-Sk 15, Bu-Sk 16) ... if he is the first wrong-doer.

Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 25

... in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks, crouching down on their heels,³ went amidst the houses ... “... “Not crouching down on the heels will I go amidst the houses,’ is a training to be observed.”

One should not go amidst the houses crouching down on the heels. Whoever out of disrespect goes amidst the houses crouching down on the heels.

¹ sasāṁ pārūpītvā. ² oguṇṭhito. Cf. Bu-Sk 67 below; and Vin 2.207, where it is clearly a sign of disrespect for an incoming monk to enter a monastery with his head muffled up. ³ ukkuṭika, an ascetic practice; see Vin 1.45, DN i.167, AN i.296, Dhp 141. Pali-English Dictionary gives a description of this “special manner of squatting”; see also Dialogues of the Buddha 1.231, n. 4, and cf. Vin-a 891 and DN-a 357.

1014
down on the heels, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

There is no offence if it is unintentional ... if he is the first wrong-doer.

Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 26

... in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks sat down amidst the houses lolling ... “...

“Not lolling will I sit down amidst the houses,’ is a training to be observed.”

One should not sit down amidst the houses lolling. Whoever out of disrespect sits down amidst the houses lolling, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

There is no offence if it is unintentional, if he is not thinking, if he does not know, if he is ill, if he has gone into residence for the rains, if there are accidents, if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 27

... in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks accepted almsfood inattentively,¹ as though desirous of throwing it away ... “...

“‘Attentively will I accept almsfood,’ is a training to be observed.”

One should accept almsfood attentively. Whoever out of disrespect accepts almsfood inattentively, as though desirous of throwing it away, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

There is no offence if it is unintentional ... if he is the first wrong-doer.

¹ asakkacca, carelessly. Vinaya Texts iii.288 has for sakkacca “with the mind alert”; Vin-a 891, “having raised up mindfulness.”
... in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks accepted almsfood looking about here and there; they did not know that they¹ were piled up and overflowing² ... “...

“Thinking of the bowl will I accept almsfood,’ is a training to be observed.”

One should accept almsfood thinking of the bowl. Whoever out of disrespect accepts almsfood, looking about here and there, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

There is no offence if it is unintentional ... if he is the first wrong-doer.

Curry means: there are two kinds of curry, bean curry, kidney-bean curry,⁴ that may be conveyed by hand. Almsfood with equal curry should be accepted. Whoever out of disrespect accepts also much curry, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

There is no offence if it is unintentional, if he is not thinking, if he does not know, if he is ill, if it is of another flavour,¹ if it belongs to relations, if it is offered, if it is for another, if it is by means of his own property, if there are accidents, if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 30

... in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks accepted heaped-up² almsfood ... “...
“‘I will accept almsfood at an even level,’³ is a training to be observed.”

One should accept almsfood at an even level. Whoever out of disrespect accepts heaped-up almsfood, there is an offence of wrongdoing.

There is no offence if it is unintentional, if he is not thinking, if he does not know, if there are accidents, if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

The Third Division: that on arms akimbo

Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 31

... in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks ate almsfood inattentively,⁴ as though desirous not to eat
... “...

¹ presumably the bowls. ² ākirante pi atikkante pi. Cf. Bu-Sk 32 below. ³ Cf.
Vin 1.45. Curry to be in measure one fourth of the rice, so Vin-a 892. ⁴ Curries made of vetch and so on, Vin-a 892. ¹ rasarase. Vin-a 892 says that having set aside the two bean-curries, rasarasa means that those remaining have the flavour of fish, the flavour of meat, and so on. ² thūpikata. ³ samatitthika. See Buddhist Suttas, p. 178, n. Sinhalese edition reads samatitthika; also Vin-a 892, which explains by samapuṇṇa, samabharita, filled evenly, heaped up evenly. ⁴ Cf. Bu-Sk 27 above.
Bu-Sk 31–Bu-Sk 55 repeated at Vin 2.214.
“‘Attentively will I eat almsfood,’ is a training to be observed.”

One should eat almsfood attentively. Whoever out of disrespect eats almsfood inattentively, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

There is no offence if it is unintentional, if he is not thinking, if he does not know, if he is ill, if there are accidents, if he is mad, if he is the first-wrong-doer.

Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 32

... in Anāthapindika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks ate almsfood looking about here and there¹; they did not know that they were piled up and overflowing ... “...

“‘Thinking of the bowl will I eat almsfood,’ is a training to be observed.”

One should eat almsfood thinking of the bowl. Whoever out of disrespect eats almsfood looking about here and there, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

There is no offence if it is unintentional ... if he is the first wrong-doer.

Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 33

... in Anāthapindika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks, having chosen² here and there, ate almsfood ... “...

“‘On continuous alms-tour³ will I eat almsfood,’ is a training to be observed.”

¹ Cf. Bu-Sk 28 above. ² omadditvā. From the context this seems to mean that the monks omitted to call at some houses, picking and choosing between them. Dictionary meanings of omaddati are to rub, to crush, oppress. In a sense ‘oppressed’ might be meant here, for the laity if unable to give the gifts of faith would be oppressed, pressed down. See below, Bu-Sk 35, note. ³ sapadānaṁ. Vin-a 893 says “not having made a distinction (odhiṁ akatvā) here and there, successively.”
One should eat almsfood on continuous alms-tour. Whoever out of disrespect eats almsfood, having chosen, here and there, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

There is no offence if it is unintentional, if he is not thinking, if he does not know, if he is ill, if giving to others he is impatient, \(^1\) if piling up (food) into another’s vessel he is impatient, if there are dainties, \(^2\) if there are accidents, if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 34

... in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks, eating almsfood, ate also much curry \(^3\) ... “...

“I will eat almsfood with equal curry,’ is a training to be observed.”

Curry means: there are two (kinds of) curry: bean curry, kidney-bean curry, that may be conveyed by hand. Almsfood with equal curry should be eaten. Whoever out of disrespect eats also much curry, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

There is no offence if it is unintentional, if he is not thinking, if he does not know, if he is ill, if it is of another flavour, if it belongs to relations, if it is offered, if it is by means of his own properties, if there are accidents, if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 35

... in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of \(^1\) omasati = ava + √mṛṣ. A monk on continuous alms-tour may become impatient if the donors keep him waiting his turn for alms, if he waits too long he may miss the right time for eating.

\(^2\) uttaribhaṅge, also at Bu-Sk 39, Bu-Sk 45 below. See BD 1.275 for further references.

\(^3\) Cf. Bu-Sk 29 above.
six monks having chosen¹ from the top,² ate almsfood ... “...

“Not having chosen from the top will I eat almsfood,’ is a training to be observed.”

One should eat almsfood not having chosen from the top. Whoever out of disrespect eats almsfood having chosen from the top, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

There is no offence if it is unintentional, if he is not thinking, if he does not know, if he is ill; if among an insignificant remainder he eats, having selected,³ having chosen from one side; if there are accidents, if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 36

Bu-Sk 36.1.1

... in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks covered up the curry and the condiment with conjey, desiring something: more ...”...

“‘I will not cover up the curry and the condiment with conjey, desiring something more,’ is a training to be observed.”

One should not cover up the curry or the condiment with conjey, desiring something more. Whoever out of disrespect covers up the curry or the condiment with conjey, desiring something more, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

There is no offence if it is unintentional, if he is not thinking, if he does not know; if the owners give, having covered it up; if he is not desiring something more; if there are accidents, if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 37

... in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks, having asked for curry and coney for themselves, ate it.¹ People looked down upon, criticised, spread it about, saying: “How can this group of six monks, having asked for curry and coney for themselves, eat it? Who does not like well-cooked things? Who does not like sweet things?”² Monks heard these people who ... spread it about. Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying:

“How can this group of six monks, having asked for curry and coney for themselves, eat it?” ...

“Is it true, as is said, that you, monks, having asked for curry and coney for yourselves, ate it?”

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

“How can you, foolish men ... eat it? It is not, foolish men, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

‘I will not eat curry or coney, having asked for it for myself,’ is a training to be observed.”

And thus this rule of training for monks came to be laid down by the lord.

Now at that time monks came to be ill. Monks, asking after the ill ones, spoke thus to the ill monks: “We hope that your reverences are better, we hope that you are keeping going.”

“Formerly we, your reverences, having asked for curry or coney for ourselves, ate it; thus there came to be comfort for us. But now it is forbidden by the lord, and being scrupulous, we do not ask; thus there comes to be no comfort for us.”¹ They told this matter to the lord. He said:

¹ omadditvā. Something of the same sense as in Bu-Sk 33 above of picking and choosing, here among the food put into the bowl Vinaya Texts i.63 has “pressing down.” ² thūpa, explained by Vin-a 893 as matthaka vemaṭṭha, the top, the middle ³ saṁkaṭṭhāṭhi, to collect; cf. Bu-Sk 53. ¹ Cf. Vin 1.45. ² Cf. Vin 2.196.

“I allow you, monks, when a monk is ill, having asked for curry or conjee for himself, to eat it. And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“I will not eat curry or conjee, having asked for it for myself, if not ill, is a training to be observed.”

One should not eat curry or conjee, having asked for it for oneself, unless one is ill. Whoever out of disrespect, having asked for curry or conjee for oneself, if not ill, eats it, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

There is no offence if it is unintentional, if he is not thinking, if he does not know, if he is ill, if it belongs to relations, if it is offered, if it is by means of his own property, if there are accidents, if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

---

Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 38

... in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks looked at others’ bowls captious-mindedly² ... “... “Not captious-mindedly will I look at others’ bowls,’ is a training to be observed.”

One should not look at others’ bowls captious-mindedly. Whoever out of disrespect looks at others’ bowls captious-mindedly, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

There is no offence if it is unintentional, if he is not thinking, if he does not know, if he looks thinking, ‘I will give or I will make (another) give,’ if he is not captious-minded, if there are accidents, if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

---

Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 39

... in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks made up large mouthfuls¹ ... “...

“I will not make up too large a mouthful, ’ is a training to be observed.”

One should not make up too large a mouthful. Whoever out of disrespect makes up too large a mouthful, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

There is no offence if it is unintentional, if he is not thinking, if he does not know, if he is ill, if they are solid victuals,² all sorts of fruits,³ dainties,⁴ if there are accidents, if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 40

... in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks made up long pieces (of food)⁵ ... ” ... “I will make up the pieces (of food) into a round,’ is a training to be observed.”

One should make up a piece (of food) into a round. Whoever out of disrespect makes up a long piece (of food), there is an offence of wrong-doing.

¹ kabaḷa. In India food is made up into balls with the fingers and eaten with the fingers. To make a large ball, that is a large mouthful, is bad manners. Vin-a 893 says that a “peacock’s egg is very (or too) large, a hen’s egg very small, an in-between size” must be made up. Chickens’ eggs in the East are smaller than English bantams’ eggs ² khajjaka. Vin-a 893 “here all solid foods (made of) roots.” Cf. Ja 1.186, and Bu-Sk 40, Bu-Sk 44, Bu-Sk 45 below. ³ phalāphala. Cf. Ja 1.416, etc., and Bu-Sk 40, Bu-Sk 44, Bu-Sk 45 below. ⁴ Cf. Bu-Sk 33, Bu-Sk 40, Bu-Sk 45. ⁵ ālopa, morsel, bit of food, here a mouthful.

There is no offence if it is unintentional, if he is not thinking, if he does not know, if he is ill, if they are solid victuals, all sorts of fruits, dainties,¹ if there are accidents, if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

The Fourth Division: that on attentively

Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 41

... in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks opened the door of the face² when the mouthful³ was not brought close ... “...

“I will not open the door of the face when the mouthful is not brought close,’ is a training to be observed.”

One should not open the door of the face when the mouthful is not brought close. Whoever out of disrespect opens the door of the face when the mouthful is not brought close, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

There is no offence if it is unintentional, if he is not thinking ... if he is the first wrong-doer.

Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 42

... in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks, while eating, put the whole hand into the mouth ... “...

“I will not put the whole hand into the mouth while eating,’ is a training to be observed.”

One should not put the whole hand into the mouth while eating.

¹ Cf. above, Bu-Sk 39. ² mukhadvāra. ³ kabaḷa, see above Bu-Sk 39.
Whoever out of disrespect puts the whole hand into the mouth while eating, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

There is no offence if it is unintentional ... if he is the first wrong-doer.

Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 43

... in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks talked with a mouthful in the mouth ... “... ‘I will not talk with a mouthful in the mouth,’ is a training to be observed.”

One should not talk with a mouthful in the mouth. Whoever out of disrespect talks with a mouthful in the mouth, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

There is no offence if it is unintentional ... if he is the first wrong-doer.

Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 44

... in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks ate tossing up balls (of food)¹ ... “... ‘I will not eat tossing up balls (of food),’ is a training to be observed.”

One should not eat tossing up balls (of food). Whoever out of disrespect eats tossing up balls (of food), there is an offence of wrong-doing.

There is no offence if it is unintentional, if he is not thinking, if he does not know, if he is ill, if they are solid victuals,² all sorts of fruits,³

¹ piṇḍukkhepakāṁ = piṇḍaṁ ukkhipitvā ukkhipitvā, tossing up the halls (the lumps of almsfood) again and again, Vin-a 893.
² Cf. Bu-Sk 39, Bu-Sk 40, Bu-Sk 45.
³ Cf. Bu-Sk 39, Bu-Sk 40, Bu-Sk 45, Bu-Sk 46.
if there are accidents, if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 45

... in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks ate, breaking up the mouthfuls¹ ... “...

“I will not eat breaking up the mouthfuls,’ is a training to be observed.”

One should not eat breaking up the mouthfuls. Whoever out of disrespect eats breaking up the mouthfuls, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

There is no offence if it is unintentional, if he is not thinking, if he does not know, if he is ill, if they are solid victuals,² all sorts of fruits,³ dainties,⁴ if there are accidents, if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 46

... in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks ate stuffing the cheeks⁵ ... “...

“I will not eat stuffing the cheeks,’ is a training to be observed.”

One should not eat stuffing the cheeks. Whoever out of disrespect eats, having stuffed the cheek on one side or on both, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

There is no offence if it is unintentional, if he is not thinking, if he does not know, if he is ill, if they are all sorts of fruits,⁶ if there are accidents, if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 47

... in Anāthapindika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks ate shaking the hands about.¹ “... “I will not eat shaking the hands about,’ is a training to be observed.”

One should not eat shaking the hands about. Whoever out of disrespect eats shaking the hands about, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

There is no offence if it is unintentional, if he is not thinking, if he does not know, if he is ill, if he shakes the hands about getting rid of the crumbs,² if there are accidents, if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 48

... in Anāthapindika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks ate scattering lumps of boiled rice ... “... “I will not eat scattering lumps of boiled rice,’ is a training to be observed.”

One should not eat scattering lumps of boiled rice. Whoever out of disrespect eats scattering lumps of boiled rice, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

There is no offence if it is unintentional, if he is not thinking, if he does not know, if he is ill, if, getting rid of the crumbs, a lump of boiled rice is got rid of, if there are accidents, if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

¹ hatthaniddhunakam. ² kacavaran chaḍḍento.
Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 49

... in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks ate putting out their tongues ... “... ‘I will not eat putting out the tongue,’ is a training to be observed.”

One should not eat putting out the tongue ... offence of wrongdoing.

There is no offence if it is unintentional ... if he is the first wrong-doer.

Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 50

... in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks ate smacking the lips¹ ... “... ‘I will not eat smacking the lips,’ is a training to be observed.”

One should not eat smacking the lips ... if he is the first wrong-doer.

The Fifth Division: that on the mouthful

Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 51

At one time the enlightened one, the lord, was staying at Kosambi in Ghosita’s monastery. Now at that time a milk drink² had been prepared for the Order by a certain brahmin. The monks drank the milk\(^1\) making a hissing sound.\(^2\) A certain monk who had formerly been an actor spoke thus: “It seems that this whole Order is cooled.”\(^3\)

¹ capucapukāraka. Vin—a 893, making the sound capu-capu. ² payopāna.

Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying: “How can this monk make a joke about the Order?” ...

“Is it true, as is said, that you, monk, made a joke about the Order?”

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked him, saying:

“How can you, foolish man, make a joke about the Order? It is not, foolish man, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ...” ... and having rebuked him, having given reasoned talk, he addressed the monks, saying:

“Monks, a joke should not be made about the enlightened one or dhamma or the Order. Whoever should make (one), there is an offence of wrong-doing.”

Then the lord, having rebuked that monk in many a figure for his difficulty in maintaining himself ... “... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“I will not eat making a hissing sound,’ is a training to be observed.”

One should not eat making a hissing sound ... if he is the first wrong-doer.

Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 52

... in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks ate licking the fingers ...

“I will not eat licking the fingers,’ is a training to be observed.”

One should not eat licking the fingers ... if he is the first wrong-doer.

---

\(\text{¹} \) khīraṁ pivanti. \(\text{²} \) surusurukāraka. Vin-a 893, making the sound suru-suru. \(\text{³} \) sītikata.
Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 53

... in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks ate licking the bowl ... “...
“I will not eat licking the bowl,’ is a training to be observed.”
One should not eat licking the bowl ...
There is no offence if it is unintentional ... if he is ill, if from an insignificant remainder he eats having collected,¹ having licked at one side, if there are accidents, if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 54

... in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery ... (see Bu-Sk 52. Instead of licking the fingers read licking the lips) ...
“I will not eat licking the lips,’ is a training to be observed.”
One should not eat licking the lips ...

Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 55

Now at that time the enlightened one, the lord, was staying among the Bhaggā on Suṁsumāra Hill in the Bhesakaḷā Grove in the deer-park. Now at that time the monks in the Kokanada palace² accepted a drinking cup, their hands (soiled) with food. People ... spread it about, saying: “How can these recluses, sons of the Sakyans, accept a drinking cup, their hands (soiled) with food, like householders who enjoy pleasures of the senses?” Monks heard these people who ... spread it about. Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying: “How can these monks accept a drinking cup, their hands (soiled) with food?” ...

¹ Cf. Bu-Sk 35. ² See Vin 2.127, MN ii.91. Vin-a 894 says that it was lotus-shaped, padumakasāṇṭhāna; MN-a 3.321 that it was made resembling a hanging lotus, paduma. Kokanada is the red lotus, AN iii.239.

“Is it true, as is said, that you, monks, accepted a drinking cup, your hands (soiled) with food?”

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

“How can you, foolish men, accept a drinking cup, your hands (soiled) with food? It is not, foolish men, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“I will not accept a drinking cup, my hands (soiled) with food,’ is a training to be observed.”

One should not accept a drinking cup, the hands (soiled) with food. Whoever out of disrespect accepts a drinking cup, the hands (soiled) with food, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

There is no offence if it is unintentional, if he is not thinking, if he does not know, if he is ill, if he accepts it, thinking, ‘I will wash’ or ‘I will get (someone) to wash (my hand),’ if there are accidents, if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 56

At that time the enlightened one, the lord was staying among the Bhaggā on Sureṣumāra Hill in the Bhesakaḷā Grove in the deer-park. Now at that time monks in the Kokanada palace threw out amidst the houses⁴ rinsings of the bowls with lumps of boiled rice. People ...

¹ Vinaya Texts i.65, n. 2 says that antaraghare “here means the space, or small open square in the middle of the house.”
spread it about, saying:

“How can these recluses, sons of the Sakyans, throw out amidst the houses rinsings of the bowls with lumps of boiled rice, like householders who enjoy pleasures of the senses?”

Monks heard ... (as in Bu-Sk 55) ... “... should be set forth:

“I will not throw out amidst the houses rinsings of the bowl with lumps of boiled rice, is a training to be observed.”

One should not throw out amidst the houses rinsings of the bowl with lumps of boiled rice. Whoever out of disrespect throws out amidst the houses rinsings of the bowl with lumps of boiled rice, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

There is no offence if it is unintentional, if he is not thinking, if he does not know, if he is ill, if he throws them out having removed¹ or broken up² or covered up³ or taken out⁴ if there are accidents, if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 57

... in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks taught dhamma to (someone) with a sunshade in his hand. Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying: “How can this group of six monks teach dhamma to (someone) with a sunshade in his hand?” ...

“Is it true, as is said, that you, monks, taught dhamma to (someone) with a sunshade in his hand?”

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying: “How can

¹ uddharitvā. Vin-a 894 says, “if having removed the lumps of boiled rice from the water, having made them into a heap in one place, he throws out the water.”

² bhinditvā. Vin-a 894 says, “if having broken up the lumps of boiled rice, having put them in the water, he throws it out.”

³ paṭiggahetvā. Vin-a 894, reading paṭiggaha va, says “if he throws out what he has accepted, covering it up with a receptacle.”

⁴ niharitvā. Vin-a 894, “if he throws it out outside.”
you, foolish men, teach dhamma to (someone) with a sunshade in his hand? It is not, foolish men, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

‘I will not teach dhamma to (someone) with a sunshade in his hand,’ is a training to be observed.”

And thus this rule of training for monks came to be laid down by the lord.

At that time monks were (too) scrupulous to teach dhamma to (someone) who was ill (and) had a sunshade in his hand. People ... spread it about, saying: “How can these recluses, sons of the Sakyans, not teach dhamma to (someone) who is ill (and) has a sunshade in his hand?”

Monks heard these people who ... spread it about. Then these monks told this matter to the lord. Then the lord, on this occasion, in this connection, having given reasoned talk, addressed the monks, saying:

“I allow you, monks, to teach dhamma to (someone) who is ill (and) has a sunshade in his hand. And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“‘I will not teach dhamma to (someone) who is not ill (and) who has a sunshade in his hand,’ is a training to be observed.”

Sunshade¹ means: there are three (kinds of) sunshade: white sunshade,² sunshade of matting, sunshade of leaves; fastened at the middle, fastened to the rim.³

Dhamma means: spoken by the enlightened one, spoken by disciples, spoken by seers, spoken by devatas, connected with the goal, connected with dhamma.⁴

Should teach means: if he teaches by line, for every line there is an offence of wrong-doing. If he teaches by syllable, for every syllable there is an offence of wrong-doing.⁵

Dhamma should not be taught to (someone) who has a sunshade

---

¹ = Vin 4.338. ² setacchatta, emblem of royalty. Cf. DN ii.15, DN ii.19; AN i.145. ³ salakabaddha; -bandha at Vin 4.338. See Vinaya Texts iii.133 note for these two ways of fastening the handle to the sunshade. ⁴ = Vin 4.15, Vin 4.22. ⁵ Cf. Vin 4.15, Vin 4.22.
in his hand (and) who is not ill. Whoever out of disrespect teaches dhamma to (someone) who has a sunshade in his hand (and) who is not ill, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

There is no offence if it is unintentional, if he is not thinking, if he does not know, if he is ill, if there are accidents, if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

---

Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 58

... in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks taught dhamma to (someone) with a staff in his hand ...

“... ‘I will not teach dhamma to (someone) who is not ill (and) who has a staff in his hand,’ is a training to be observed.”

Staff means: (the size of) four hands\(^1\) of a man of average height. Bigger than that it is not a staff, smaller it is not a staff.\(^2\)

Dhamma should not be taught to (someone) who has a staff in his hand (and) who is not ill. Whoever out of disrespect teaches dhamma to (someone) who has a staff in his hand (and) who is not ill, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

There is no offence if it is unintentional ... if he is the first wrong-doer.

---

Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 59

... in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks taught dhamma to (someone) with a knife in his hand ...

“... ‘I will not teach dhamma to (someone) who has a knife in his hand,’ is a training to be observed.”

---

\(^1\) On hattha, “hand”—i.e., hand and forearm—see \textit{BD} 2.li.
\(^2\) adaṇḍa; cf. apatta at \textit{Vin} 3.243. The above use of adaṇḍa has not been noticed by the \textit{Critical Pali Dictionary}.

---

1034
hand (and) who is not ill,’ is a training to be observed.”

Knife means: a weapon,¹ single-edged, double-edged.² Dhamma should not be taught to (someone) who has a knife in his hand (and) who is not ill ... if he is the first wrong-doer.

Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 60

... in Anāthapinḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks taught dhamma to (someone) with a weapon³ in his hand ... “...

“I will not teach dhamma to (someone) who has a weapon in his hand (and) who is not ill,’ is a training to be observed.”

Weapon means: a long-bow, a cross-bow.⁴ Dhamma should not be taught to (someone) who has a weapon in his hand (and) who is not ill ... if he is the first wrong-doer.

The Sixth Division: that on hissing

Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 61

... in Anāthapinḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks taught dhamma to (someone) wearing shoes ... “...

“I will not teach dhamma to (someone) wearing shoes (and) who is not ill,’ is a training to be observed.”

Dhamma should not be taught to (someone) wearing shoes (and) who is not ill. Whoever out of disrespect teaches dhamma to (someone) mounted on (shoes) or (with shoes) fastened on or (with shoes) unfastened⁵ (and) who is not ill, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

¹ paharaṇi. Oldenberg queries, and suggests “paharaṇi?”. ² Cf. MN i.281. ³ āvudha. ⁴ Cf. MN i.429. ⁵ Only at the heels, according to Vin-a 895.
There is no offence if it is unintentional ... if he if the first wrong-doer.

Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 62

... in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery ... (see Bu-Sk 61. Instead of wearing shoes read wearing sandals¹) ...
“I will not teach dhamma to (someone) wearing sandals (and) who is not ill,’ is a training to be observed.”

Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 63

... in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks taught dhamma to (someone) in a vehicle ... “...
“I will not teach dhamma to (someone) in a vehicle (and) who is not ill,’ is a training to be observed.”

Vehicle² means: a cart,³ a carriage,⁴ a waggon, a chariot, a palanquin,⁵ a sedan-chair.⁶ Dhamma should not be taught to (someone) in a vehicle (and) who is not ill. Whoever out of disrespect teaches dhamma to (some-

---

¹ upāhana. Regulations for monks wearing these given at Vin 1.185ff.; at Vin 2.207ff. it is said that in-coming monks should take off their sandals on entering a monastery—as a sign of respect.
² = Vin 4.339; cf. Vin 3.49 which omits the last two, and DN-a 82 which omits the last but one.
³ wayha, translated as “litter” at BD 1.81. But at Vin 1.191, Vin 2.276 an (ill) monk and nun were respectively made uncomfortable by the jolting of a yāna (vehicle), and two other means of transport were allowed: a palanquin and a sedan-chair. These are not included in the Old Commentary’s definition of yāna at Vin 3.49, although they are above and at Vin 4.339. It looks therefore as if the first four items under yāna were the original ones, and further, as if they were conveyances drawn by animals and liable to jolt. It thus seems best to correct “litter” to “cart.”
⁴ See an iv.191 for various parts of a horse-drawn ratha.
⁵ Allowed to be used by (ill) monks at Vin 1.192, by (ill) nuns at Vin 2.277.
⁶ Allowed to be used by (ill) monks at Vin 1.192, by (ill) nuns at Vin 2.277.
one) in a vehicle (and) who is not ill, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

There is no offence if it is unintentional ... if he is the first wrong-doer.

Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 64

... in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks taught dhamma to (someone) on a bed … “…

“I will not teach dhamma to (someone) on a bed and who is not ill,’ is a training to be observed.”

Dhamma should not be taught to (someone) on a bed (and) who is not ill. Whoever out of disrespect teaches dhamma to (someone) on a bed and even lying on the ground (and) who is not ill, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

There is no offence if it is unintentional ... if he is the first wrong-doer.

Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 65

... in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks taught dhamma to (someone) who was sitting down, lolling¹ ... “…

“I will not teach dhamma to (someone) who is sitting down, lolling (and) who is not ill,’ is a training to be observed.”

Dhamma should not be taught to (someone) sitting down, lolling, (and) who is not ill. Whoever out of disrespect teaches dhamma to (someone) who is sitting down, lolling on his hands or lolling on his robes (and) who is not ill, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

There is no offence if it is unintentional ... if he is the first wrongdoer.

Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 66

... in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks taught dhamma to (someone) with a turban on his head ...

“... ‘I will not teach dhamma to (someone) with a turban on his head (and) who is not ill,’ is a training to be observed.”

Turban on the head means: it is a turban when it does not let the ends of the hair be seen.

Dhamma should not be taught to (someone) with a turban on his head (and) who is not ill. Whoever out of disrespect teaches dhamma to (someone) with a turban on his head (and) who is not ill, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

There is no offence if it is unintentional, if he is not thinking, if he does not know, if he is ill, if he shows the ends of the hair having caused them to be uncovered, if there are accidents, if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 67

... in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks taught dhamma to (someone) with his head muffled up¹ ...

“... ‘I will not teach dhamma to (someone) with his head muffled up (and) who is not ill,’ is a training to be observed.”

Head muffled up means: it is so called if he is dressed, including his head, in his upper robe.

Dhamma should not be taught to (someone) with his head muffled up.

¹ Cf. Bu-Sk 23.
up (and) who is not ill. Whoever out of disrespect should teach dhamma to (someone) with his head muffled up (and) who is not ill, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

There is no offence if it is unintentional, if he is not thinking, if he does not know, if he is ill, if he shows the head having caused it to be uncovered, if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 68

... in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks, having sat down on the ground, taught dhamma to (someone) sitting on a seat ... “... ‘Having sat down on the ground, I will not teach dhamma to (someone) sitting on a seat (and) who is not ill,’ is a training to be observed.”

Having sat down on the ground, dhamma should not be taught to (someone) sitting on a seat (and) who is not ill. Whoever out of disrespect, having sat down on the ground, teaches dhamma to (someone) sitting on a seat (and) who is not ill, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 69

... in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks, having sat down on a low seat, taught dhamma to (someone) sitting on a high seat.¹ Those who were modest monks ... spread it about, saying: “How can this group of six monks ... teach dhamma to (someone) sitting on a high seat?” ...

“Is it true, as is said, that you, monks, ... taught dhamma to (some-

¹ Ja no.309 (=Ja 3.27.) is based on this story, and should be compared with it, especially for variant readings.
one) sitting on a high seat?"
   "It is true, lord."

   The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:
   How can you, foolish men, ... teach dhamma to (someone) sitting on a high seat? It is not, foolish men, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ..." And having rebuked them, having given reasoned talk, he addressed the monks, saying:
   "Formerly, monks, in Benares, the wife of a certain low class man¹ came to be pregnant. Then, monks, this low class woman spoke thus to this low class man: ‘Sir,² I am pregnant; I want to eat a mango.’
   ‘There are no mangoes, it is not the mango season,’ he said.

   Now at that time the king had a mango tree with a perpetual crop of fruit. Then, monks, that low class man approached that mango tree; having approached, having climbed up that mango tree, he remained hidden. Then, monks, the king together with the brahmin priest, approached that mango tree; having approached, having sat down on a high seat, he learnt a mantra. Then, monks, it occurred to that low class man:
   ‘How unrighteous³ is this king, inasmuch as he learns a mantra, having sat down on a high seat. This brahmin also is unrighteous, inasmuch as he, having sat down on a low seat, teaches a mantra to (someone) sitting on a high seat. I too am unrighteous, I who for the sake of a woman, steal the king’s mangoes. But all this is quite gone,’⁴
   (and) he fell down just there.

   Neither knows the goal,⁵

¹ chapaka. Vin-a 896 explains by caṇḍāla, which is the word used in the Jātaka.
² ayyaputta. At Vin 3.17, the monk Sudinna’s former wife addresses him as ayyaputta. ³ adhammika. ⁴ parigata. Reading seems confused. Vinaya Texts iv.364 gives variant reading camarikatan ti (ṭṇatan ti B); Vin-a 896, variant reading carimakatan ti; Ja 3.28 carimavataṁ, with variant readings carivamataṁ, carimaṁ kataṁ. “Done long ago”—i.e., carimaṁ kataṁ, makes sense for the Jātaka version.
⁵ attha. Vin-a 896 says, “These two people do not know the meaning (attha) of the text (pāli).”
neither sees dhamma,
Neither he who teaches the mantra, nor he who learns according to what is not the rule.”

“My food is pure conjey of rice flavoured with meat,
I do not therefore fare on dhamma, dhamma praised by the noble.”

“Brahmin, shame on that gain of wealth,
(that) gain of fame;
That conduct (leads) to falling away or to walking by what is not the rule.

“Go forth, great brahmin,
for other creatures boil,
Do not you, following what is not the rule, from that break like a pot.”

At that time, monks, to teach a mantra, having sat down on a low seat, to (someone) sitting on a high seat, was not liked by me. So, however could it now be not liked to teach dhamma, having sat down on a low seat, to (someone) sitting on a high seat? It is not,

---

1 Vin-a 896 says, “they do not see the text”; Ja 3.29, “the two people do not see that the rule of old (porañakadhamma) is worthy of respect,” and adds the verse: “First the rule came to appear, afterwards what is not the rule arose, in the world.” Or dhamma may here be in its wider sense, to balance “goal,” and not in its more specialised Vinaya sense of “rule.” ² adhammena. The “rule” against which these two, had they been monks, would be transgressing, is the one laid down in this Sekhiya. ³ bhutta. According to Ja 3.29 and Vin-a 896 the brahmin says this verse.

4 For this line, cf. also Ja 3.144, Ja 4.371. ⁵ Or “the rule.” ⁶ This verse, also found at Ja 2.422, Ja 3.32, is here, according to Vin-a 896, spoken by the low-class man.

⁷ Vinipāta, often combined with apāya and duggati, sometimes plus niraya, as one of the ways of woeful rebirth—e.g., Vin 1.227; DN i.82, DN i.162; MN i.73, AN i.29, AN i.48. ⁸ adhhammacaraṇena; or unrighteousness, what is not dhamma. ⁹ I.e., into homelessness. ¹⁰ pacanti, cook or boil, here in one of the hells. ¹¹ asmā kumbhāṁ iva bhida. ¹² According to Ja 3.30, the bodhisattva was the low-class man.

¹³ Cf. Vin 4.6. ¹⁴ vāceti. ¹⁵ na amanāpa; at Vin 4.6, manāpa, liked. ¹⁶ deseti.
monks, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

“I will not teach dhamma, having sat down on a low seat, to (someone) sitting on a high seat (and) who is not ill,’ is a training to be observed.’

Dhamma should not be taught, having sat down on a low seat, to (someone) sitting on a high seat (and) who is not ill. Whoever out of disrespect, having sat down on a low seat, teaches dhamma to someone sitting on a high seat (and) who is not ill, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

There is no offence if it is unintentional ... if he is the first wrong-doer.

Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 70

... in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks, standing, taught dhamma to (someone) who was sitting down ... “...

“I will not teach dhamma, standing, to (someone) who is sitting down (and) who is not ill,’ is a training to be observed.”

Dhamma should not be taught, standing, to (someone) who is sitting down (and) who is not ill ... (see Bu-Sk 70) ... if he is the first wrong-doer.

Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 71

... in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks, going behind, taught dhamma to (someone) going in front ... “...

“I will not teach dhamma, going behind, to (someone) going in front (and) who is, not ill,’ is a training to be observed.”
Dhamma should not be taught, going behind ... if he is the first wrong-doer.

Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 72

... in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks, going at the side of a path, taught dhamma to (someone) going along the path ... “...

“I will not teach dhamma, going at the side of a path, to (someone) going along the path (and) who is not ill,’ is a training to be observed.”

Dhamma should not be taught, going at the side of a path ... if he is the first wrong-doer.

Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 73

... in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks eased themselves standing

“I will not ease myself standing if not ill,’ is a training to be observed.”

One must not ease oneself standing if not ill. Whoever out of disrespect eases himself standing if not ill, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

There is no offence if it is unintentional, ... if he is the first wrong-doer.

Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 74

... in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of ¹ uppatha.

six monks eased themselves and spat on green corn¹ ... “...

“‘I will not ease myself or spit, if not ill, on green corn,’ is a training to be observed.”

One should not ease oneself or spit, if not ill, on green corn. Whoever out of disrespect eases himself or spits, if not ill, on green corn, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

There is no offence if it is unintentional, if he is not thinking, if he does not know, if he is ill, if done where there is no green corn² he spreads³ green corn over it, if there are accidents, if he is mad, if he is the first wrong-doer.

Monks’ Training (Sekhiya) 75

... in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six monks eased themselves and spat in the water. People spread it about, saying: “How can these recluses, sons of the Sakyans, ease themselves and spit in the water, like householders who enjoy pleasures of the senses?” Monks heard these people who spread it about. Those who were modest monks spread it about, saying:

“How can this group of six monks ... in the water?” ...

“How can you, foolish men, ... in the water? It is not, foolish men, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

‘I will not ease myself or spit in the water,’ is a training to be observed.”

And thus this rule of training for monks came to be laid down by ¹ harita, fresh—i.e., green wheat or cereals; vegetables, grass. ² appaharita, little or no green corn. Vin-a 897 reads na harite. Cf. Bu-Pc 19. ³ ottharati, to spread, to cover up. See also BD 1.137, n. 4, and next Sekhiya, where ottharati seems to mean to pour or to sprinkle.

the lord.

Now at that time ill monks were (too) scrupulous to ease themselves and spit in the water. They told this matter to the lord. Then the lord, on this occasion, in this connection, having given reasoned talk, addressed the monks, saying:

“I allow, monks, a monk if he is ill, to ease himself and spit in the water. And thus, monks, this rule of training should be set forth:

‘I will not ease myself or spit in the water, if not ill,’ is a training to be observed.”

If one is not ill he should not ease himself or spit in the water. Whoever out of disrespect, if not ill, ... offence of wrong-doing.

There is no offence if it is unintentional, if he is not thinking, if he does not know, if he is ill, if done on dry land and he pours¹ water over it, if there are accidents, if he is mad, unhinged, in pain, if he is the first wrong-doer.

The Seventh Division: that on shoes

Recited, venerable ones, are the rules of training. Concerning them, I ask the venerable ones: I hope that you are quite pure in this matter? And a second time I ask: I hope that you are quite pure in this matter? And a third time I ask: I hope that you are quite pure in this matter? The venerable ones are quite pure in this matter, therefore they are silent; thus do I understand this.

Told are the Rules for Training

¹ ottharati. See previous note above.
Monks’ Deciding of Legal Questions
(Adhikaraṇasamathā)

BD 1.153

These seven rules, venerable ones, for the deciding of legal questions¹ come up for recitation. For the deciding, for the settlement of legal questions arising from time to time:

Bu-As 1

1. A verdict in the presence of² may be given.

Bu-As 2

2. A verdict of innocence³ may be given.

Bu-As 3

3. A verdict of past insanity⁴ may be given.

¹ adhikaraṇa. This passage = Vin 4.351, and cf. DN iii.254, AN iv.144. The four kinds of adhikaraṇa are explained at Vin 2.88ff., and the ways of settling them at Vin 2.99ff. The four are stated merely, in definition of adhikaraṇa, at Vin 3.164 (= BD 1.282), Vin 4.126 (= above, BD 3.6), Vin 4.238 (= below, BD 3.206). See also Vin 3.168, Vin 3.173.

At AN i.99 (= GS 1.85) a list of monastic duties is given, ending with these seven ways of settling legal questions. For a full exposition of their working and significance, see S. Dutt, Early Buddhist Monachism, 156ff.

² sammukhāvinaya. Vin 2.93 says there must be the presence of the Order, of dhamma, of discipline, and of the persons (disputing). Each of these is then defined. See also Vin 2.96, Vin 2.97; MN ii.247.

³ sativinaya. See Vin 1.325, Vin 2.99; MN ii.247. Vinaya Texts i.68, Vinaya Texts iii.58 translate by “consciously innocent.” Such persons have been “mindful” (sati) in their behaviour, they do not remember (sarati) having fallen into any offence, therefore they are innocent of the charges brought against them. See also GS i.85, n. 7.

⁴ amūḷhavinaya. See Vin 2.82, where this decision was made specially for the mad monk Gagga, and cf. Vin 1.123. Afterwards (Vin 2.100) it was formed into a “general rule for every similar case” (Vinaya Texts iii.18, n. 2). See also MN ii.248.
4. It may be carried out on (his) acknowledgement.¹
5. (There is) the decision of the majority.²
6. The decision for specific depravity.³
7. The covering up (as) with grass.⁴

Recited, venerable ones, are the seven rules for the deciding of legal questions. Concerning them, I ask the venerable ones: I hope that you are quite pure in this matter? And a second time I ask: I hope that you are quite pure in this matter? And a third time I ask: I hope that you are quite pure in this matter? The venerable ones are quite pure in this matter, therefore they are silent. Thus do I understand this.

¹ paṭiññāya kāretabbāṁ. See Vin 1.325, where it is said that to carry out this form of settling legal questions without the accused monk’s acknowledgement of his offence is not a legally valid act; and Vin 2.83, where various official acts, if carried out against a monk without his acknowledgement, are said to give rise to a dukkāta offence. See MN ii.248, for the way in which a monk should confess (paṭideseti) the offence into which he had fallen (āpatti āpanno). ² yebhuyyasikā, or “of a greater number.” It is explained at considerable length at Vin 2.93ff., and in less detail at MN ii.247, that if monks dwelling in one āvāsa are unable to settle legal questions themselves, they may take them to the monks dwelling in another āvāsa. At Vin 2.84, however, this method is apparently not contemplated, for here it is said that if monks are unable to settle a legal question, they are allowed to agree upon an assigner of (voting) tickets, salākagāhāpaka (cf. pattagāhāpaka at Vin 3.246 = BD 2.122, n. 5. n. 1), and then to vote; but nothing is here said about consulting monks living in another āvāsa. At Vin 2.85 ten ways are given for an invalid, and ten for a valid taking of votes, while at Vin 2.98f., three methods of taking votes are described.⁵ tassapāpiyyasikā, or the “obstinately wrong” (Vinaya Texts iii.28 q.v., n. 3). This method of settling a legal question is to be employed when a monk “having denied (an offence) acknowledged it, having acknowledged it denied it, shelved the question by asking others, told a conscious lie,” Vin 2.85, and cf. Vin 4.1, where Hatthaka is said to have behaved in this way. The right way of carrying out this method of settling a legal question is given at Vin 2.85, Vin 2.86, and, rather differently, at MN ii.249. An iv.347 states the proper practice in regard to a monk against whom these proceedings have been taken. ⁶ tinavatthāraka. The kinds of disputes to be settled by this method and the right procedure for carrying it out, are given at Vin 2.86f., and cf. MN ii.250.
Monks’ Conclusion

Recited, venerable ones, is the occasion, recited are the four rules for offences involving defeat, recited are the thirteen rules for offences entailing a formal meeting of the Order, recited are the thirty rules for offences of expiation involving forfeiture, recited are the ninety-two rules for offences of expiation, recited are the four rules for offences which ought to be confessed, recited are the rules for training, recited are the seven rules for the deciding of legal questions. So much (of the sayings) of the lord, handed down in clauses,¹ contained in clauses, comes up for recitation every half month. All should train therein in harmony, on friendly terms, without contention.

Told is the Great Analysis

¹ sutta, here, as elsewhere in Vinaya, meaning a clause, article, rule. See BD 1, Introduction, p.x, and above, BD 3.43, n. 5.
Volume II

The Analysis of Nuns’ Rules
(Bhikkhunīvibhaṅga)
Contents of Volume II

Nuns’ Defeat (Pārājika) 5 1059
Nuns’ Defeat (Pārājika) 6 1067
Nuns’ Defeat (Pārājika) 7 1071
Nuns’ Defeat (Pārājika) 8 1075
Nuns’ Formal Meeting (Saṅghādisesa) 1 1079
Nuns’ Formal Meeting (Saṅghādisesa) 2 1083
Nuns’ Formal Meeting (Saṅghādisesa) 3 1087
Nuns’ Formal Meeting (Saṅghādisesa) 4 1092
Nuns’ Formal Meeting (Saṅghādisesa) 5 1096
Nuns’ Formal Meeting (Saṅghādisesa) 6 1099
Nuns’ Formal Meeting (Saṅghādisesa) 10 1102
Nuns’ Formal Meeting (Saṅghādisesa) 11 1106
Nuns’ Formal Meeting (Saṅghādisesa) 12 1108
Nuns’ Formal Meeting (Saṅghādisesa) 13 1111
Nuns’ Forfeiture (Nissaggiya) 1 1114
Nuns’ Forfeiture (Nissaggiya) 2 1118
Nuns’ Forfeiture (Nissaggiya) 3 1121
Nuns’ Forfeiture (Nissaggiya) 4 1124
Nuns’ Forfeiture (Nissaggiya) 5 1127
Nuns’ Forfeiture (Nissaggiya) 6 1129
Nuns’ Forfeiture (Nissaggiya) 7 1132
Nuns’ Forfeiture (Nissaggiya) 8 1134
Nuns’ Forfeiture (Nissaggiya) 9 1136
Nuns’ Forfeiture (Nissaggiya) 10 1137
Nuns’ Forfeiture (Nissaggiya) 11 1139
Nuns’ Forfeiture (Nissaggiya) 12 1142
Nuns’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 1 1144
Nuns’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 2 1147
Nuns’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 3 1149
Nuns’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 4 1151
Nuns’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 5 1153
| Nuns' Expiation (Pācittiya) 6 | 1155 |
| Nuns' Expiation (Pācittiya) 7 | 1157 |
| Nuns' Expiation (Pācittiya) 8 | 1159 |
| Nuns' Expiation (Pācittiya) 9 | 1161 |
| Nuns' Expiation (Pācittiya) 10 | 1163 |
| Nuns' Expiation (Pācittiya) 11 | 1165 |
| Nuns' Expiation (Pācittiya) 12 | 1167 |
| Nuns' Expiation (Pācittiya) 13 | 1168 |
| Nuns' Expiation (Pācittiya) 14 | 1169 |
| Nuns' Expiation (Pācittiya) 15 | 1172 |
| Nuns' Expiation (Pācittiya) 16 | 1175 |
| Nuns' Expiation (Pācittiya) 17 | 1177 |
| Nuns' Expiation (Pācittiya) 18 | 1179 |
| Nuns' Expiation (Pācittiya) 19 | 1181 |
| Nuns' Expiation (Pācittiya) 20 | 1183 |
| Nuns' Expiation (Pācittiya) 21 | 1185 |
| Nuns' Expiation (Pācittiya) 22 | 1187 |
| Nuns' Expiation (Pācittiya) 23 | 1189 |
| Nuns' Expiation (Pācittiya) 24 | 1192 |
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Nuns’ Expiation (Pācittiya)</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>25</td>
<td>1194</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>26</td>
<td>1196</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>27</td>
<td>1198</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>28</td>
<td>1200</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>29</td>
<td>1202</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>30</td>
<td>1204</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>31</td>
<td>1206</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>32</td>
<td>1208</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>33</td>
<td>1210</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>34</td>
<td>1212</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>35</td>
<td>1214</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>36</td>
<td>1217</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>37</td>
<td>1220</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>38</td>
<td>1222</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>39</td>
<td>1223</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>40</td>
<td>1225</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>41</td>
<td>1227</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>42</td>
<td>1229</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>43</td>
<td>1231</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Nuns’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 63 1269
Nuns’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 64 1272
Nuns’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 65 1274
Nuns’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 66 1276
Nuns’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 67 1278
Nuns’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 68 1280
Nuns’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 69 1282
Nuns’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 70 1284
Nuns’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 71 1286
Nuns’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 72 1287
Nuns’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 73 1288
Nuns’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 74 1290
Nuns’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 75 1292
Nuns’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 76 1294
Nuns’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 77 1296
Nuns’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 78 1298
Nuns’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 79 1299
Nuns’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 80 1301
Nuns’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 81 1303
Nuns’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 82 1305
Nuns’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 83 1306
Nuns’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 84 1307
Nuns’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 85 1309
Nuns’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 86 1311
Nuns’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 87 1313
Nuns’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 88 1315
Nuns’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 89 1316
Nuns’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 90 1317
Nuns’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 91–93 1319
Nuns’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 94 1321
Nuns’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 95 1323
Nuns’ Expiation (Pācittiya) 96 1325
Nuns’ Confession (Pāṭidesaniya) 1 1327
Nuns’ Confession (Pāṭidesaniya) 2–8 1330
Nuns’ Training (Sekhiya) 1–75 1332
Nuns’ Deciding of Legal Questions 1335
Nuns’ Conclusion 1336
At that time the enlightened one, the lord, was staying at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Then Sālha, Migāra’s grandson, became desirous of building a dwelling-house for the Order of nuns. Then Sālha, Migāra’s grandson, having approached the nuns, spoke thus:

“Ladies, I want to build a dwelling-place for the Order of nuns; give me a nun who is an overseer of repairs.”

At that time four sisters had gone forth among the nuns: Nandā, Nandavatī, Sundarīnandā, Thullanandā. Among these, the nun Sundarīnandā had gone forth when she was young; she was beautiful, good to look upon, charming, she was clever, experienced, wise, she was skilled, energetic, she was possessed of consideration for those kinds of things, she was able to build, able to make arrangements. Then the nuns, having chosen the nun Sundarīnandā, gave (her) as overseer of repairs to Sālha, Migāra’s grandson.

Now at that time the nun Sundarīnandā constantly went to the dwelling of Sālha, Migāra’s grandson, saying: “Give a knife, give a hatchet, give an axe, give a spade, give a chisel.” And Sālha, Migāra’s grandson, constantly went to the nunnery to learn what was built

¹ At that time the enlightened one, the lord, was staying at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Then Sālha, Migāra’s grandson, became desirous of building a dwelling-house for the Order of nuns. Then Sālha, Migāra’s grandson, having approached the nuns, spoke thus:

“Ladies, I want to build a dwelling-place for the Order of nuns; give me a nun who is an overseer of repairs.”

At that time four sisters had gone forth among the nuns: Nandā, Nandavatī, Sundarīnandā, Thullanandā. Among these, the nun Sundarīnandā had gone forth when she was young; she was beautiful, good to look upon, charming, she was clever, experienced, wise, she was skilled, energetic, she was possessed of consideration for those kinds of things, she was able to build, able to make arrangements. Then the nuns, having chosen the nun Sundarīnandā, gave (her) as overseer of repairs to Sālha, Migāra’s grandson.

Now at that time the nun Sundarīnandā constantly went to the dwelling of Sālha, Migāra’s grandson, saying: “Give a knife, give a hatchet, give an axe, give a spade, give a chisel.” And Sālha, Migāra’s grandson, constantly went to the nunnery to learn what was built and what was not built. These,¹ through constantly seeing (one another), came to be in love. Then Sāḷha, Migāra’s grandson, through not getting an opportunity to seduce the nun Sundarīnandā, for this purpose gave a meal for the Order of nuns. Then Sāḷha, Migāra’s grandson, having appointed a seat in the refectory, thinking: “Some nuns are senior to the lady Sundarīnandā,” appointed a seat to one side, and thinking: “Some are junior,” appointed a seat to the other side.² He appointed a seat for the nun Sundarīnandā in a concealed place, in a corner, so that the nuns who were elders might conclude, “She is sitting with the junior nuns,” and the junior nuns might conclude, “She is sitting with the nuns who are elders.”

¹ Note by Sujato: Pārājika 1 in I.B. Horner’s edition. ² Mentioned also at AN i.193f. ³ Vin-a 900 says that he was the “grandson of Migāra’s mother”—i.e., of Visākhā. navakammikā, a superintendent. Cf. Vin 2.15 (masculine). Method of entrusting repairs to an overseer, and the qualities he should possess, are given at Vin 2.160. Cf. also Vin 2.172f. ⁵ Cf. Vin 2.172f. ⁶ Cf. Vin 4.259. ⁷ Cf. Vin 4.232, Vin 4.234. ⁸ tatrupāyāya vimanāsāya samannāgatā. Cf. Vin 1.70. Vin-a 900 makes out that she was connected with the investigation or examination of the building or repairs that should be undertaken. ⁹ Cf. Vin 1.70. ⁰ Cf. Vin 3.144.

Then Sāḷha, Migāra’s grandson, had the time announced to the Order of nuns, saying: “It is time, ladies, the meal is ready.” The nun Sundarīnandā, having realised (what was happening), thinking: “Sāḷha, Migāra’s grandson, is not benevolent (although) he gave a meal for the Order of nuns; he wants to seduce me. If I go, there will be trouble for me,”³ ordered her pupil, saying: “Go, bring back almsfood for me, and if anyone asks for me, let it be known that I am ill.”

“Very well, lady,” the nun answered the nun Sundarīnandā.

At that time Sāḷha, Migāra’s grandson, came to be standing outside the porch of the door, asking for the nun Sundarīnandā, saying: “Where, lady, is the lady Sundarīnandā; where, lady, is the lady Sundarīnandā?”

When he had spoken thus, the pupil of the nun Sundarīnandā spoke thus to Sāḷha, Migāra’s grandson: “She is ill, sir; I will take back her almsfood.” Then Sāḷha, Migāra’s grandson, thinking: “This meal which I gave for the sake of the nuns was on purpose for the lady Sundarīnandā,” and having commanded the people, having said: “Offer the meal for the Order of nuns,” he approached the nunnery.

At that time the nun Sundarīnandā came to be standing outside the porch of the monastery waiting for Sāḷha, Migāra’s grandson.

Then the nun Sundarīnandā saw Sālha, Migāra’s grandson, coming from afar; seeing him, having entered the dwelling, having put on her upper robe including over her head, she lay down on a couch. Then Sālha, Migāra’s grandson, approached the nun Sundarīnandā; having approached, lie spoke thus to the nun Sundarīnandā: “What is your discomfort, lady? Why are you lying down?”

“Surely it is this, sir: she who desires is not desired.”

“How can I, lady, not desire you? But I did not get an opportunity to seduce you,” and filled with desire he came into physical contact with the nun Sundarīnandā, also filled with desire.

Now at that time a nun, weakened by age, her feet affected, came to be sitting down not far from the nun Sundarīnandā. That nun saw Salha, Migara’s grandson, filled with desire, coming into physical contact with the nun Sundarīnandā, (also) filled with desire; seeing them, she looked down upon, criticised, spread it about, saying: “How can the lady Sundarīnandā, filled with desire, consent to physical contact with a male person who is filled with desire?” Then this nun told this matter to the nuns. Those who were modest nuns, contented, conscientious, scrupulous, desirous of training, these looked down upon, criticised, spread it about, saying: “How can the lady Sundarīnandā, filled with desire ... with a male person who is filled with desire?” Then these nuns told this matter to the monks. These monks looked down upon, criticised, spread it about, saying: “How can the nun Sundarīnandā, filled with desire ... with a male person who is filled with desire?” Then these monks told this matter to the lord. Then the lord, on this occasion, in this connection, having had the Order of monks convened, questioned the monks, saying:

“Is it true, as is said, monks, that the nun Sundarīnandā, filled with desire ... with a male person filled with desire?”

“It is true, lord,” they said.

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

“It is not fitting, monks, in the nun Sundarīnandā, it is not suitable,

1 Upassaya, doubtless meaning bhikkhuni-upassaya, nuns’ quarters. 2 Cf. Bu-Sk 23, Bu-Sk 67. 3 Cf. BD 1.201, n. 3. 4 caraṇaģilānā. 5 purisa-puggala, see Introduction, p.25ff.
it is not becoming, it is unworthy of a recluse, it is not allowable, it is not to be done. How, monks, can the nun Sundarīnandā, filled with desire, consent to physical contact with a male person who is filled with desire? It is not, monks, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased, nor for increasing (the number of) those who are pleased, but, monks, it is both for displeasing those who are not (yet) pleased and those who are pleased, and for causing wavering in some.”

Then the lord, having in many a figure rebuked the nun Sundarīnandā for her difficulty in supporting¹ herself, for her difficulty in maintaining herself, having spoken in dispraise of great desires, of discontent, of clinging (to the obstructions²), of sloth; having in many a figure spoken in praise of ease in supporting oneself, of ease in maintaining oneself, of desiring little, of contentment, of expunging (evil), of punctiliousness, of graciousness, of decreasing (the obstructions),³ of putting forth energy⁴; having given reasoned talk to the monks on what is fitting, on what is suitable,⁵ he addressed the monks, saying:

“How account of this, monks, I will lay down a rule of training for nuns founded on ten reasons: for the excellence of the Order, for the comfort of the Order, for the restraint of evil-minded nuns, for the ease of well-behaved nuns, for the restraint of cankers belonging to the here and now, for the combating of cankers belonging to other worlds, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased, for increasing (the number of) those who are pleased, for establishing what is verily dhamma, for following the rules of restraint.⁶ And thus, monks, let the nuns set forth this rule of training:

“What ever nun, filled with desire, should consent to rubbing,⁷ or rubbing up against, or taking hold of or touching or pressing against a male person below the collar-bone, above the circle⁸ of the knees, if he is filled with desire, she also becomes one who is defeated, she is not in communion, she is one who touches above the circle of the knees."

¹ dubbharatāya, translated at gs 4.187, “luxury.” ² saṁgaṁika = kilesasaṁgaṁika at Vin-a 222; but at an iv.280, as gregariousness, sociability, it is contrasted with aloofness. ³ apacaya, translated at gs 4.187 “dispersion” (of rebirth). ⁴ Cf. Vin 3.21, Vin 3.171, and Vin 4.142. See bd 1.37, notes. ⁵ Cf. Vin 4.120. ⁶ Cf. Vin 3.21. ⁷ On āmasati see bd 1.1203, n. 6. ⁸ maṇḍala, see above, bd 3.121.

Whatever means: she who is an elder or a junior or one of middle standing, this one, on account of relations, on account of birth, on account of name, on account of clan, on account of virtue, on account of the way of living, on account of the field of activity, is called whatever.

Nun means: she is a nun because she is a beggar for alms, she is a nun because she submits to walking for alms, she is a nun because she is one who wears the patch-work robes, she is a nun by the designation (of others), a nun because of her acknowledgement, a nun (to whom it was) said, ‘Come, nun,’ a nun is one ordained by the three goings to a refuge, a nun is auspicious, a nun is the essential, a nun is a learner, a nun is an adept, a nun is ordained by both complete Orders by means of a (formal) act at which the motion is put and followed by three proclamations, irreversible and fit to stand. In this way is this nun one who is ordained by both complete Orders by means of a (formal) act at which the motion was put and followed by three proclamations, irreversible, fit to stand, and this is how nun is to be understood in this case.

Filled with desire means: infatuated, full of desire, physically in love with.

Filled with desire means: infatuated, full of desire, physically in love with.

A male person means: a human man, not a yakka, not a departed one, not an animal; he is learned, competent to come into physical contact.

---

1 ubbhajānumaṇḍalikā. Not explained in the Old Commentary. Vin-a 901 says, “it is only the name of this one who is defeated, therefore it is not considered in the Padabhājaniya.” 2 Cf. Vin 3.23 (= BD 1.42). 3 akuppa ṭhānāraha; probably meaning that the formal act should not be re-opened for discussion. 4 Cf. Vin 3.24 (= BD 1.42). 5 Feminine. 6 Masculine. 7 = Vin 3.121, Vin 3.128 in definition of otiṇṇa, affected by desire. 8 Cf. definition of “woman” at Vin 3.128, MN iii.192.
Below the collar-bone means: below the collar-bone.¹
Above the circle of the knees means: above the circle of the knees.²

Rubbing means: merely rubbed.³
Rubbing up against means: moving from here and there.⁴
Taking hold of means: merely taken hold of.⁵
Touching means: merely contact.⁶

Or should consent to pressing against means: having taken hold of a limb she consents to pressing against.

She also means: she is so called in reference to the preceding.⁷

Becomes one who is defeated means: as a man with his head cut off cannot become one to live by attaching it to his body, so a nun, filled with desire, consenting to rubbing or to rubbing up against or to taking hold of or to touching or to pressing a man who is filled with desire below the collar-bone, above the circle of the knees, becomes one who is not a recluse, not a daughter of the Sakyans; therefore she is called, she becomes one who is defeated.⁸

Is not in communion means: communion is called one (formal) act, one recital, an equal training; this is called communion. If it is not together with her, she is therefore called not in communion.⁹

If both are filled with desire (and) she rubs the body below the collar-bone, above the circle of the knees with the body, there is an offence involving defeat. If she rubs something attached to the body with the body, there is a grave offence. If she rubs the body with something attached to the body, there is a grave offence. If she rubs something attached to the body with something attached to the body, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If she rubs the body with something that may be cast, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If she rubs something attached to the body with something that may be cast, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If she rubs something that may be cast with something that may be cast, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

¹ adhakkhanaṃ ti hetthakkhanaṃ. ² ubbhajānumaññānaṃ ti uparijānumaññānaṃ.
³ = Vin 3.121. ⁴ = Vin 3.121. ⁵ = Vin 3.121. ⁶ = Vin 3.121. ⁷ Vin-a 901 says, in reference to the group of the four Pārājikas (set forth in the Monks’ Vibhaṅga, but to be observed by nuns also see Introduction BD 3.32). ⁸ Cf. Vin 1.96, Vin 3.28. ⁹ Cf. Vin 3.28. ¹⁰ Cf. Vin 3.123ff.

If she rubs the body above the collar-bone, below the circle of the knees with the body, there is a grave offence. If she rubs something attached to the body with the body, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If she rubs the body with something attached to the body, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If she rubs something attached to the body with something attached to the body, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If she rubs the body with something that may be cast, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If she rubs something attached to the body with something that may be cast, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

If one is filled with desire, and she rubs the body below the collar-bone, above the circle of the knees with the body, there is a grave offence. If she rubs the body with something attached to the body ... If she rubs something that may be cast with something that may be cast, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

If she rubs the body above the collar-bone, below the circle of the knees with the body, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If she rubs something attached to the body with the body ... If she rubs something that may be cast with something that may be cast, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

If both are filled with desire, and she rubs the body of a yakkha or of a departed one or of a eunuch or of an animal in human form, below the collar-bone, above the circle of the knees with the body, there is a grave offence. If she rubs something attached to the body with the body ... If she rubs something that may be cast with something that may be cast, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

If she rubs the body above the collar-bone, below the circle of the knees, with the body, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If she rubs something attached to the body with the body ... If she rubs something that may be cast with something that may be cast, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

If one is filled with desire, and she rubs the body below the collar-bone, above the circle of the knees with the body, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If she rubs something attached to the body with the body ... If she rubs something that may be cast with something that may be cast, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

If she rubs the body above the collar-bone, below the circle of the knees with the body, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If she rubs something attached to the body with the body ... If she rubs something that may be cast with something that may be cast, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

There is no offence if it is unintentional; if she is not thinking; if she does not know; if she does not consent; if she is mad, if her mind is unhinged, if she is in pain, if she is the first wrong-doer.¹

Told is the First Offence involving Defeat in the Nuns’ Analysis

¹ Cf. Vin 3.126.
... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the nun Sundarīnandā became pregnant by Saḷhā, Migāra’s grandson. Until the embryo quickened she concealed it; when the embryo was matured, having left the Order, she gave birth. Nuns spoke thus to the nun Thullanandā: “Lady, Sundarīnandā not long after leaving the Order gave birth. We wonder if she was pregnant when she was a nun?”

“Yes, ladies.”

“But how is it that you, lady, knowing that a nun had fallen into a matter involving defeat, neither reproved herself, nor spoke to a group?”

“Whatever is blame for her, that is blame for me; whatever is disgrace for her, that is disgrace for me; whatever is dishonour for her, that is dishonour for me; whatever is loss for her, that is loss for me. How can I, ladies, speak to others of my own blame, my own disgrace, my own dishonour, my own loss?”

Those who were modest nuns looked down upon, criticised, and spread it about, saying: “How can the lady Thullanandā, knowing that a nun had fallen into a matter involving defeat, neither reprove her herself, nor speak to a group?” Then these nuns told this matter to the monks. The monks told this matter to the lord. Then the lord, on this occasion, in this connection, having had the Order of monks convened, having given reasoned talk, questioned the monks, saying:

“Is it true, as is said, monks, that the nun Thullanandā, knowing

---

¹ Note by Sujato: Pārājika 2 in I.B. Horner’s edition. ² As by Bi-Pj 5, having physical contact with a man.
that a nun ... neither reproved her herself, nor spoke to a group?”

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

“How, monks, can the nun Thullanandā, knowing that a nun ... neither reprove her herself, nor speak to a group? It is not, monks, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, let the nuns set forth this rule of training:

“Whatever nun, knowing that a nun has fallen into a matter involving defeat, should neither herself reprove her, nor speak to a group, but when she may be remaining or deceased or expelled or withdrawn,¹ should afterwards speak thus: ‘Ladies, before I knew this nun, she was a sister like this and like that,’ and should neither herself reprove her nor should speak to a group, she also becomes one who is defeated, she is not in communion, she is one who conceals a fault.”²

-------------

Whatever means: she who ...

Nun means: ... nun is to be understood in this case.

She knows means: either she knows by herself or others tell her or she³ tells (her).

Has fallen into a matter involving defeat means: of the eight offences involving defeat⁴ (she) has fallen into a certain offence involving defeat.

Should neither herself⁵ reprove her means: should neither herself reprimand her.

Nor should speak to a group means: nor should speak to other nuns.

¹ avasaṭā. See Old Commentary, below. Critical Pali Dictionary gives “having entered, having arrived”; Pali-English Dictionary “withdrawn, gone away, one who has left a community and, gone over to another sect.” ² vajjapaṭicchādikā, not explained in the Old Commentary. Vin-a 903 says it is merely the name of this Pārājika offence. Cf. Monks’ Bu-Pc 64. ³ i.e., the nun who has committed the Pārājika offence, Vin-a 903. Cf. Vin 3.265 = BD 2.161. ⁴ Vin-a 903 says, a certain one of the four in common with monks and of the four not in common with monks. The nuns had to observe the Pārājika of the Bhikkhu-Pātimokkha, as well as their own. ⁵ attanā ... sayaṁ.
But when she may be remaining or deceased means: Remaining means she is called remaining in her own characteristic.¹ Deceased means she is called one who has passed away. Expelled means she herself comes to be leaving the Order or she is expelled by others. Withdrawn means she is called one who has gone over to the fold of a sect.²

Should afterwards speak thus: ‘Ladies, before I knew this nun, she was a sister like this and like that,’ and should neither herself reprove her means: should neither herself reprimand her; nor speak to a group means: nor should speak to other nuns.

She also means: she is so called in reference to the former.

Becomes one who is defeated means: as a withered leaf freed from the stalk cannot become green again,³ so a nun, knowing that a nun has fallen into a matter involving defeat (and) thinking, ‘I will neither myself reprove her, nor speak to a group,’ in throwing off the responsibility,⁴ becomes one who is not a recluse, not a daughter of the Sakyans; therefore she is called, she becomes one who is defeated.

Is not in communion means: communion ... is therefore called not in communion.

There is no offence if she does not speak, thinking ‘There will come to be a quarrel or dispute or strife or contention for the Order’; if she does not speak, thinking “There will come to be a schism in the Order or dissension in the Order”⁵; if she does not speak, thinking ‘This one, harsh, rough, will bring danger to life or danger to the Brahma-life if she does not seeingothersuitable nuns; if she does not speak (though) not desiring to conceal; if she does not speak, thinking: ‘It will be evident from her own action’; if she is mad, if she is the first wrong-doer.¹

¹ ṭhitā nāma salīṇe ṭhitā vuccati. ² titthāyatanaṁ saṁkantā. Cf. Vin.1.60, Vin.1.69, referring to one who formerly a member of another sect, titthiya, has gone back to it; Vin.2.279, where it is laid down that nuns who have joined the titthiyas, coming back to the Order of nuns, are not to be ordained again. Titthāyatana occurs at MN i.483, AN i.173, Ds 381, Ds 1003 See Buddhist Psychological Ethics, 2nd. edition p.93, n.9, and LEDI SAYADAW, Journal of the Pali Text Society 1913, p.117. ³ Cf. Vin.1.96, Vin.3.47. ⁴ Cf. BD 1.82. ⁵ = Vin.4.37, Vin.4.128, Vin.4.153. ⁶ karissati, literally will do or make.

Told is the Second Offence involving Defeat in the Nuns’ Analysis

¹ Cf. Vin 4.128 = above, BD 3.9.
... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍīka’s monastery. Now at that time the nun Thullanandā imitated the monk Ariṭṭha who had formerly been a vulture-trainer, and who was suspended by a complete Order. Those who were modest nuns ... spread it about, saying:

“How can the lady Thullanandā imitate the monk ... suspended by a complete Order?” ... “It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

“How, monks, can the nun Thullanandā imitate the monk ... suspended by a complete Order? It is not, monks, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, let the nuns set forth this rule of training:

“Whatever nun should imitate him—a monk suspended by a complete Order, one who is disrespectful towards, who does not make amends towards, one who is unfriendly towards the rule, the discipline, the teacher’s instruction—that nun should be spoken to thus by the nuns: ‘Lady, this monk, suspended by a complete Order, is disrespectful towards, he does not make amends towards, he is unfriendly towards the rule, the discipline, the teacher’s instruction. Do not imitate this monk, lady.’ And if this ¹ Note by Sujato: Pārājika 3 in I.B. Horner’s edition. ² See Monks’ Bu-Pc 68, Bu-Pc 69. ³ See Monks’ Bu-Pc 69. ⁴ apaṭikāra. Cf. Vin 1.97, appaṭikamma and paṭikaroti used with āpatti, an offence. Also AN ii.241ff., yathādhammaṁ paṭikarissati, he (or she) will make amends according to the rule, for having fallen into a pārājika, saṅghādisesa, pācittiya or pāṭidesaniya(ka) offence (dhamma). Paṭikaroti is also “to confess.” ⁵ akatasahāya. Critical Pali Dictionary’s “who has not taken an advocate” cannot be accepted here. ⁶ dhamma.

nun, being spoken to thus by these nuns, should persist as before, that nun should be admonished by the nuns up to the third time for giving up this (course). If, being admonished up to the third time, she should give it up, that is good. But if she should not give it up, she also becomes one who is defeated, she is not in community, she is an imitator of one who is suspended.”¹

Whatever means: ... nun is to be understood in this case.

Complete Order means: belonging to the same communion, staying within the same boundary.²

Suspended means: suspended for not seeing or for not making amends for or for not giving up an offence.³

Towards the rule, the discipline means: towards whatever is the rule, whatever is the discipline.⁴

Towards the teacher’s instruction means: towards the conqueror’s instruction, the enlightened one’s instruction.⁵

Disrespectful means: he does not heed an Order or a group or an individual or a (formal) act.

Does not make amends towards means: he is suspended, not restored.⁶

Unfriendly towards means: monks belonging to the same communion are called friends. He who is not together with these is therefore called unfriendly.

Should imitate him means: if he becomes one of such views, of such indulgence, of such pleasures, she too becomes one of those views, of that indulgence, of those pleasures.

That nun means: whatever nun is an imitator of one who is suspended.

By the nuns⁷ means: by other nuns: these sec, these hear; she should be told by these saying: ‘Lady, this monk, suspended by a complete Order, ... do not imitate this monk, lady.’ And a second time she should be told ... And a third time she should be told ... If she gives it up, that is good; if she does not give it up, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If, having heard, they do not speak, there is an offence of wrong-doing. That nun, having been pulled into the midst of the Order, should be told: ‘Lady, this monk, suspended by a complete Order, ... do not imitate this monk, lady.’ And a second time ... And a third time she should be told ... If she gives it up, that is good; if she does not give it up, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

¹ As in Monks’ Bu-Pc 68, this is more like Saṅghādisesa method and material than Pārājika. ² = above, BD 3.65, below, BD 3.193, and Vin 3.173. ³ = below, BD 3.193. ⁴ = below, BD 3.193. ⁵ = below, BD 3.193. ⁶ = above, BD 3.28, in definition of acaṭānudhamma, “has not acted according to the rule.” ⁷ Cf. Vin 3.178f., Vin 3.185.

That nun should be admonished. And thus, monks, should she be admonished: the Order should be informed by an experienced, competent nun, saying: ‘Ladies, let the Order listen to me. This nun so and so imitated a monk suspended by a complete Order, one who is disrespectful towards, who does not make amends towards, who is unfriendly towards the rule, the discipline, the teacher’s instruction. She does not give up this course. If it seems right to the Order, let the Order admonish the nun so and so in order that she may give up this course. This is the motion. Ladies, let the Order listen to me. This nun so and so ... She does not give up this course. The Order admonishes the nun so and so in order that she may give up this course. If the admonishing of the nun so and so in order that she may give up this course is pleasing to the ladies, let them be silent; if it is not pleasing, then you should speak. And a second time I speak forth this matter ... And a third time I speak forth this matter ... The nun so and so is admonished by the Order for giving up this course. It is pleasing to the Order ... So do I understand this.’

As a result of the motion there is an offence of wrong-doing; as a result of two proclamations there are grave offences; at the end of the proclamations, there is an offence involving defeat.

She also means: she is so called in reference to the former.

She becomes one who is defeated means: as a flat stone broken in half cannot be put together again,¹ so a nun, being admonished up to the third time, not giving it up, becomes one who is not a (true)

¹ Cf. Vin 1.97, Vin 3.74.
recluse, not a daughter of the Sakyans; therefore she is called she becomes one who is defeated.

Not in communion means: communion ... is therefore called not in communion.

If she thinks that it is a legally valid act when it is a legally valid act (and) does not give it up, there is an offence involving defeat. If she is in doubt as to whether it is a legally valid act (and) does not give it up, there is an offence involving defeat. If she thinks that it is not a legally valid act when it is a legally valid act (and) does not give it up, there is an offence involving defeat. If she thinks that it is a legally valid act when it is not a legally valid act, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If she is in doubt as to whether it is not a legally valid act, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If she thinks that it is not a legally valid act when it is not a legally valid act, there is an offence of wrong-doing.¹

There is no offence if she is not admonished; if she gives it up, if she is mad, if she is the first wrong-doer.²

Told is the Third Offence involving Defeat

¹ Cf. Vin 3.174, Vin 3.177, Vin 3.179, Vin 3.186; Vin 4.136, where last clause of Bi-Pj 7.2.2 ends anāpatti instead of, as on these other occasions, āpatti dukkaṭassa.

² Cf. Vin 3.174, Vin 3.177, Vin 3.179, Vin 3.186; Vin 4.136, where last clause of Bi-Pj 7.2.2 ends anāpatti instead of, as on these other occasions, āpatti dukkaṭassa.
... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the group of six nuns, filled with desire, for the sake of following what was verily not the rule, consented to taking hold of the hand of a male person who was filled with desire, and they consented to taking hold of the edge of (his) outer robe, and they stood and they talked and they went to a rendezvous and they consented to a man’s approaching (them) and they entered into a covered place and they disposed the body for such a purpose. Those who were modest nuns ... spread it about, saying:

“How can the group of six nuns, filled with desire, for the sake of following what is verily not the rule, consent to ... and stand and talk and go to a rendezvous ... and enter ... and dispose ...?” “It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying: “Monks, how can the group of six nuns ... consent to ... dispose the body for such a purpose? It is not, monks, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks, let the nuns set forth this rule of training:

“Whatever nun, filled with desire, for the sake of following what is verily not the rule, should consent to taking hold of the hand of a male person who is filled with desire or should consent to taking hold of the edge of (his) outer cloak or should stand or should talk or should go to a rendezvous or should consent to a

¹ Note by Sujato: Pārājika 4 in I.B. Horner’s edition. ² asaddhamma—i.e., Bu-Pj 1. Vin-a 904 calls asaddhamma “physical contact, not sexual intercourse.” Not explained in Old Commentary. ³ kāyam pi tadatthāya upasañharanti.
man’s approaching (her) or should enter into a covered place or should dispose the body for such a purpose, she also becomes one who is defeated, she is not in communion, she is a doer of eight things.”\(^1\)

\(^1\) \text{BD 3.174}

\text{Whatever} means: ... nun is to be understood in this case.

\text{Filled with desire} means: infatuated, full of desire, physically in love with.\(^2\)

\text{Filled with desire} means: infatuated, full of desire, physically in love with.\(^3\)

A male person means: a human man, not a yakkha, not a departed one, not an animal; he is learned, competent to come into physical contact.\(^4\)

\text{Should consent to taking hold of the hand} means: hand means, going up from the tip of the nail as far as the elbow.\(^5\) If for the sake of following what is verily not the rule, she consents to taking hold below the collarbone, above the circles of the knees, there is a grave offence.

\text{Or should consent to taking hold of the edge of (his) outer cloak} means: if for the sake of following what is verily not the rule, she consents to take hold of what he is clothed in\(^6\) or of what he has put on,\(^7\) there is a grave offence.

\text{Or should stand} means: if for the sake of following what is verily not the rule, she stands within the reach of a man’s hand, there is a grave offence.

\text{Or should talk} means: if for the sake of following what is verily not the rule, she talks standing within the reach of a man’s hand, there is a grave offence.

\text{Or should go to a rendezvous} means: if for the sake of following what is verily not the rule, she, being told by a man, ‘Come to such and such a place,’ goes (there), for every step there is an offence

\(^1\) \text{aṭṭhavattukā}, not explained in the Old Commentary, but it means the eight actions here referred to.
\(^2\) = above, \text{BD 3.161}.
\(^3\) = above, \text{BD 3.161}.
\(^4\) = above, \text{BD 3.161}.
\(^5\) = Vin 3.121 (\text{BD 1.203}).
\(^6\) nivattha, referring to his inner robe.
\(^7\) pāruta, referring to his upper robe and outer cloak.
of wrong-doing. In merely approaching the reach of a man’s hand, there is a grave offence.

Or should consent to a man’s approaching means: if for the sake of following what is verily not the rule, she consents to a man’s approaching, there is an offence of wrong-doing. In merely approaching a reach of his hand, there is a grave offence.

Or should enter into a covered place means: if for the sake of following what is verily not the rule, in merely entering any concealed place whatever, there is a grave offence.

Or should dispose the body for such a purpose means: if for the sake of following what is verily not the rule, standing within the reach of a man’s hand, she disposes the body, there is a grave offence.

She also means: she is so called in reference to the former.

She becomes one who is defeated means: as a palmyra tree cut off at the crown cannot become one for new growth,¹ so a nun, completing² the eight courses,³ becomes one who is not a (true) recluse, not a daughter of the Sakyans; therefore she is called she becomes one who is defeated.

Not in communion means: communion ... is therefore called not in communion.

There is no offence if it is not intentional; if she is not thinking; if she does not know; if she does not consent: if she is mad, her mind unhinged, afflicted with pain, if she is the first wrong-doer.

Told is the Fourth Offence involving Defeat

Recited, ladies, are the eight offences⁴ involving defeat; a nun having fallen into one or other of these does not receive communion together with the nuns; as before, so after, she becomes one who is ¹ = Vin 1.97, Vin 3.92. ² paripürenti, accomplishing. ³ vatthu, mode or course—i.e., the eight above specified. ⁴ According to Vin-a 906, four laid down for monks which are also to be followed by nuns, and these (above) four for nuns only; thus eight Pārājika rules are recited for the ladies at the joint recital the Pātimokkha. See BD 3, Introduction, p. xxxii.

defeated, she is not in communion. Concerning them, I ask the ladies: I hope that you are quite pure in this matter? And a second time I ask: I hope that you are quite pure in this matter? And a third time I ask: I hope that you are quite pure in this matter? The ladies are quite pure in this matter, therefore they are silent; thus do I understand this.¹

Told is the Portion on Defeat

These seventeen things, venerable ones, entailing formal meetings of the Order, come for exposition.

At one time the enlightened one, the lord, was staying at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time a certain lay-follower, having given a store-room to an Order of nuns, passed away. He had two sons, one of no faith, not believing, the other with faith, believing. Then he of no faith, not believing, spoke thus to him with faith, believing: “The store-room is ours, let us deal it out.”¹ When he had spoken thus, the one with faith, believing, spoke thus to him of no faith, not believing: “Do not, sir, speak thus; it was given to the Order of nuns by our father.” And a second time he of no faith, not believing, spoke thus to him with faith, believing: “The storeroom is ours, let us deal it out.” Then the one with faith, believing, spoke thus to him of no faith, not believing: “Do not, sir, speak thus; it was given to the Order of nuns by our father.” And a third time he of no faith ... “... let us deal it out.” Then the one with faith, believing, thinking, “If it became mine, I also would give it to an Order of nuns,” spoke thus to the one of no faith, not believing: “Let us deal it out.” Then that store-room being dealt ¹ Ten are given in this section; but seven are the same as those already given in the Saṅghādisesa for monks; see below, BD 3.212, n. 1, and BD 3, Introduction, p. xxxiii.

² uddosita = bhaṇḍasālā (Vin-a 906). Uddosita is sometimes a stable; cf. Vin 3.200, and Vinaya Texts iii.363, n. 2. At Vin 2.278 uddosita is “allowed,” a lay-follower again being recorded to give one to an Order of nuns.³ appasanna, or not pleased (with the master’s teaching).⁴ bhājāma; Sinhalese edition reads bhājema.
out by these, fell to\(^1\) him of no faith, not believing. Then the one of no faith, not believing, having approached the nuns, spoke thus: “You must depart, ladies, the store-room is ours.” When he had spoken thus, the nun Thullanandā spoke thus to that man:

“Do not, sir, speak thus; the store-room was given to the Order of nuns by your father.”

Saying: “Was it given\(^2\) (or) not given?” they asked the chief ministers of justice. The chief ministers spoke thus:

“Who knows, ladies, if it was given to the Order of nuns?” When they had spoken thus, the nun Thullanandā spoke thus to these chief ministers:

“But, masters, was not the gift seen or heard of by you as it was being given, eye-witnesses having been arranged?” Then the chief ministers, saying: “What the lady says is true,” made over the store-room to the Order of nuns. Then that man, defeated, looked down upon, criticised, spread it about, saying:

“These shaven-headed (women) are not (true) recluses, they are strumpets.\(^3\) How can they have the store-room taken away from us?”

The nun Thullanandā told this matter to the chief ministers. The chief ministers had that man punished.\(^4\) Then that man, punished,\(^5\) having had a sleeping-place made for Naked Ascetics not far from the nunnery, instigated the Naked Ascetics, saying: “Talk down\(^6\) these nuns.” The nun Thullanandā told this matter to the chief ministers. The chief ministers had that man fettered. People looked down upon, criticised, spread it about, saying: “How can these nuns have a store-room taken away (from him) and secondly have him punished and thirdly have him fettered? Now they will have him killed.”

Nuns heard these people as they ... spread it about. Those who were modest nuns ... spread it about, saying: “How can the lady Thullanandā be one who speaks in envy?” Then these nuns told this

\(^1\) pāpuṇāti, to reach, attain, arrive at, to obtain to.
\(^2\) Square brackets in text, but Sinhalese edition reads dinnō na dinnō.
\(^3\) Cf. below, BD \(3.257\), BD \(3.275\). The word translated as “strumpets” is bandhakiniyo; cf. Ja 5.425.
\(^4\) danḍāpesum, perhaps beaten with a stick.
\(^5\) danḍika.
\(^6\) accāvadatha. Vin-a 906 says atikkamitvā vadatha, akkosatha, having surpassed them, talk, swear at them.
\(^7\) ussayavādikā.
matter to the monks …

“Is it true, as is said, monks, that the nun Thullanandā is one who speaks in envy?”

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

“How, monks, can the nun Thullanandā be one who speaks in envy? It is not, monks, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased … And thus, monks, let the nuns set forth this rule of training:

“Whatever nun should be one who speaks in envy concerning a householder or a householder’s sons (or brothers)¹ or a slave or a workman² and even concerning a wanderer who is a recluse,³ that nun has fallen into a matter that is an offence at once,⁴ entailing a formal meeting of the Order involving being sent away.”⁵

Whatever means: … nun is to be understood in this case.

One who speaks in envy means: she is called a bringer of law-suits.⁶

Householder means: he who lives in a house.⁷

Householder’s sons (or brothers) means: whoever are sons and brothers.⁸

Slave means: born within, bought for money, taken in a raid.⁹

Workman¹⁰ means: a hireling, a worker.¹¹

Wanderer who is a recluse means: setting aside monk and nun and probationer and novice and female novice, he who is endowed with (the status of) wanderer.¹²

¹ See Old Commentary below. ² kammakāra, or servant. ³ samaṇaparibbājaka.
⁴ paṭhamāpattikaṁ, which in Bi-Ss 1–Bi-Ss 6 is in opposition to yāvatatiyaka, that which is not an offence until a nun has been admonished up to the third time (see Bu-Ss 7–Bu-Ss 10). Cf. Vin 3.186 (= BD 1.328). ⁵ nissāraṇiyaṁ saṅghādisesaṁ; cf. the similar construction, nissaggiyaṁ pācittiyaṁ, and see BD 3, Introduction, p. xxxvi.
⁶ aṭṭakārikā, a maker of law-suits, cases, causes. ⁷ Cf. BD 2.47, BD 2.55, BD 2.148.
⁸ yo koci puttabhātarā. ⁹ = MN-a 3.8. These three are explained at Vin-a 361; four “slaves” mentioned at Mnd 11; cf. DN-a 1.168, DN-a 1.300. The last two, dhanakkīta and karamarāṇīta (feminine) come into the description of the ten kinds of wife at Vin 3.140. ¹⁰ Cf. MN-a 3.8, DN-a 300. ¹¹ aṭṭaka, “one who is beaten,” so Pali-English Dictionary. ¹² Cf. Vin 4.92, Vin 4.285.
If she thinks, “I will bring a law-suit,” or looks about for a companion or goes herself,¹ there is an offence of wrong-doing. If she announces it to one (person), there is an offence of wrong-doing. If she announces it to a second, there is a grave offence. At the end of the law-suit, there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

An offence at once means: she falls through transgression of a course,² not after admonition.³

Involving being sent away means: she is caused to be sent away from the Order.⁴

Offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order means: the Order inflicts the mānatta discipline on account of her offence, it sends back to the beginning, it rehabilitates; it is not several (nuns), it is not one nun, therefore it is called an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order. A synonym for this class of offence is (formal) act, therefore again it is called an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.⁵

There is no offence if she goes being dragged along by people; if she asks for protection; if she explains without reference (to a particular person); if she is mad, if she is the first wrong-doer.

¹ Cf. Vin 3.47 (= BD 1.76). Above it means, according to Vin-a 907, if she looks about for a witness or friend; and if standing where there is a nunnery, or alms-road, she thinks, “I will bring a law-suit,” going from there to the magistrates, there is an offence of wrong-doing for every step that she takes. ² saha vatthujhācārā. ³ Cf. below, BD 3.203. ⁴ saṅghamhā nissāriyati, explained by Vin-a 908 as saṅghato nissāreti. The -sār- causative, “she is made or caused to be sent away.” See BD 3, Introduction, p.xxxvi. ⁵ Cf. Vin 3.112 (BD 1.196).
... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time in Vesālī, the wife of a certain Licchavi came to be an adulteress. Then that Licchavi spoke thus to that woman: “Please desist, else will we do you harm.” But being spoken to thus, she paid no heed. Now at that time a group of Licchavis were assembled in Vesālī on some business. Then that Licchavi spoke thus to those Licchavis: “Let the masters allow me power over one woman.”¹

“What is her name?”
“My wife commits adultery, I will kill her.”
“Take your right,”² they said. Then that woman heard: “My husband wants to kill me,” and taking precious belongings, having gone to Sāvatthī, having approached members of other sects, she asked for the going forth.³ The members of other sects did not wish to let her go forth.⁴ Having approached nuns, she asked for the going forth. Neither did the nuns wish to let her go forth. Having approached the nun Thullanandā, having shown (her) the belongings, she asked for the going forth. The nun Thullanandā, having taken the belongings, let her go forth. Then that Licchavi, searching for that woman, having gone to Sāvatthī, seeing her gone forth among the nuns, approached King Pasenadī of Kosala; having approached, he spoke thus to King Pasenadī of Kosala:

“Sire, my wife, taking precious belongings, has reached Sāvatthī; let the king⁵ allow me power over her.”

¹ ekāṁ me ayyo itthiṁ anujāṇātha. ² jānāhi. ³ pabbajjaṁ yāci. ⁴ pabbājetuṁ. ⁵ devo
“Well now, good sir, having examined (her), explain.”
“Sire, she was seen gone forth among the nuns.”
“If, good sir, she has gone forth among the nuns, there is nothing to do against her. Well preached by the lord is dhamma; let her lead the Brahma-life for the utter ending of ill.”

Then that Licchavi, looked down upon, criticised, spread it about, saying: “How can these nuns let a woman thief go forth?”

Nuns heard that Licchavi who spread it about. Those who were modest nuns spread it about, saying: “How can the lady Thullanandā let a woman thief go forth?” Then these nuns told this matter to the monks...

“Is it true, as is said, monks, that the nun Thullanandā let a thief go forth?”

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying: “Monks, how can the nun Thullanandā let a woman thief go forth? It is not monks, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... let the nuns set forth this rule of training:

“Whatever nun should knowingly receive a woman thief who is found to merit death, without having obtained permission from a king or an Order or a group or a guild or a company, unless she is allowable, that nun also has fallen into a matter that is an offence at once, entailing a formal meeting of the Order

---

1 vicīni tvā. 2 na sā labbhā kiñcī kāṭuṅ, she is not a receiver of anything there is to do. 3 Cf. Vin 1.74–75. 4 The Licchavi appears to lose sight of his wife’s original sin in his effort to recover the property. 5 vuṭṭhāpeti; cf. below, BD 3.361, and Introduction, p. xlvff. 6 vajjhā. 7 anapaloketvā, explained by anāpucchā, Old Commentary, below, and anāpucchitvā at Vin-a 910. 8 Vin-a 910 makes out that this means a group of wrestlers and so on. But, preceded by saṅgha, it might have the usual Vinaya meaning of a group (of two to four monks or nuns). On the other hand, it is followed by two words that have no religious significance, and which denote associations of people “in the world.” 9 pūga = dhammapūga, “a guild under dhamma” (?), Vin-a 910. Probably a guild governed by some rule or law. 10 seṇī, a corporation, company or guild of artisans or traders following the same business or dealing in the same articles. Vin-a 910 says here it is a seṇī of perfumers, of cloth merchants. Number given as eighteen at Ja 6.22. 11 kappā.
involving being sent away.”

Whatever means: ... nun is to be understood.

She knows means: either she knows by herself or others tell her or she tells her.

Woman thief¹ means: she who takes by means of theft (anything) having the value of five māsakas or more than five māsakas that has not been given—she is called a woman thief.

To merit death means: having done that for which she is condemned to death.

Found² means: she becomes known³ by other people, thinking, ‘This one merits death.’

Without having obtained permission means: not asking (for permission).⁴

King means: where a king governs,⁵ the king’s permission should be obtained.⁶

Order means: it is called an Order of nuns; the permission of the Order of nuns should be obtained.

Group means: where a group governs, the group’s permission should be obtained.

Company means: where a company governs, the company’s permission should be obtained.

Unless she is allowable means: having set aside one who is allowable. Allowable means: there are two who are allowable: either she who has gone forth among members of other sects, or she who has gone forth among other nuns.⁷

If she thinks, “I will receive one, unless she is allowable,” and looks about for a group or for a female teacher or for a bowl or for a robe or if she determines a boundary,⁸ there is an offence of wrong-

¹ Here feminine = Vin 3.47 (masculine). ² viditā. ³ ņātā. ⁴ =below, BD 3.360. ⁵ anusāsati, to govern, rule, advise, give instruction. ⁶ rājā apaloketabbo, or “the king should be asked for permission. But in spite of this grammatical construction, I think the two words, apaloketi and āpucchati, should be differently rendered. ⁷ These may be ordained without asking for permission. ⁸ See Vin 1.106 for prescribed method of determining a boundary.
doing. As a result of the motion, there is an offence of wrong-doing.
As a result of two proclamations, there are grave offences. At the end of the proclamations, there is an offence involving a formal meeting of the Order for the female preceptor, an offence of wrong-doing for the group and for the female teacher.¹

She also means: she is so called in reference to the former.

Offence at once means: ... therefore again it is called an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

If she thinks that she is a thief when she is a thief (and) receives her, unless she is allowable, there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order. If she is in doubt ... offence of wrong-doing.
If she thinks that she is not a thief when she is a thief ... no offence.
If she thinks that she is a thief when she is not a thief, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If she is in doubt as to whether she is not a thief, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If she thinks that she is not a thief when she is not a thief, there is no offence.

There is no offence if she receives her, not knowing; if she receives one, she having obtained permission; if she receives one who is made allowable; if she is mad, if she is the first wrong-doer.

¹ With this passage, cf. above, BD 3.13, and below, BD 3.362.
... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time a nun who was a pupil of Bhaddā Kāpilānī,¹ having quarrelled with nuns, went to a family of (her) relations² in a village. Bhaddā Kāpilānī, not seeing that nun, asked the nuns, saying: “Where is so and so? She is not to be seen.”

“My dears,³ a family of her relations are in such and such a village; having gone there, look for her.”

The nuns, having gone there, having seen that nun, spoke thus:

“Why did you, lady, come alone? We hope that you were not violated?”

“I was not violated, ladies,” she said. Those who were modest nuns ... spread it about, saying: “How can a nun go among villages⁴ alone?” ...

“Is it true, as is said, monks, that a nun went among villages alone?”

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

“How, monks, can a nun go among villages alone? It is not, monks,

¹ A pupil (or pupils) of hers mentioned also at Vin 4.268ff. Bhaddā Kāpilānī mentioned with Thullanandā at Vin 4.290, Vin 4.292. Her verses are at Thig.63–Thig.66. Thig-a 68–69 says that, having gone forth under Mahāpajāpati, she soon won arahanship. Called foremost of the nuns able to remember previous lives, An i.25. N.B. that, although nuns address her as “lady,” she otherwise lacks a descriptive title.

² Vism 91 distinguishes between nātikula (as above), a family of relatives, and up-attiṭṭhakakula, a family of supporters. ³ amma. ⁴ gāmantaraṁ, defined at Vin 4.63 = Vin 4.133.
for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... let the nuns set forth this rule of training:

Whatever nun should go among villages alone, that nun also has fallen into a matter that is an offence at once, entailing a formal meeting of the Order involving being sent away.”

And thus this rule of training for nuns came to be laid down by the lord.

________________________

At that time two nuns were going along the high-road from Sāketa to Sāvatthī. On the way there was a river to be crossed.¹ Then these nuns, having approached a boatman, spoke thus:

“Please, sir, take us across.”

Saying, “I am not able, ladies, to take both across at once,” he made one cross alone with him²; one who was across seduced the one who was across, one who was not across seduced the one who was not across. These, having met afterwards, asked (one another):

“I hope that you, lady, were not violated?”

“I was violated, lady. But were you violated, lady?”

“I was violated, lady.” Then these nuns, having arrived at Sāvatthī, told this matter to the nuns. Those who were modest nuns ... spread it about, saying:

“How can a nun go to the other side of a river alone?” Then these nuns told this matter to the monks. The monks told this matter to the lord. He said:

“Is it true, as is said, monks, that a nun went to the other side of a river alone?”

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

“How, monks, can a nun go to the other side of a river alone? It is ¹ Cf. Vin 4.65. ² eko ekaṁ uttāresi. Cf. eko ekāya in the Aniyatas, Vin 3.187ff. meaning, the one (amonk) with the other (awoman); here meaning, a man (eko) and a nun (ekain). They crossed alone together. In Monks’ Bu-Pc 28 it is evidently thought safer to allow a nun to cross a river with a monk than to wait behind on the bank.

not, monks, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... let the nuns set forth this rule of training:

“Whatever nun should go among villages alone, or should go to the other side of a river alone, that nun also has fallen into a matter that is an offence at once, entailing a formal meeting of the Order involving being sent away.”

And thus this rule of training for nuns came to be laid down by the lord.

At that time several nuns, going to Sāvatthī through the country of Kosala, arrived in the evening at a certain village. A certain nun there was beautiful, good to look upon, charming. A certain man came to be in love with that nun on account of her appearance. Then that man, appointing a sleeping-place for those nuns, appointed a sleeping-place at one side for this nun. Then this nun, having realised, “This man is obsessed¹; if I come at night there will be trouble for me,”² not asking the nuns (for permission), having gone to a certain family, lay down in the sleeping-place. Then that man, having come during the night, searching for that nun, knocked against the nuns. The nuns, not seeing this nun, spoke thus: “Doubtless this nun has gone out together with the man.”

Then this nun, at the end of that night, approached those nuns. The nuns spoke thus to that nun: “Why did you, lady, go out together with the man?”

Saying: “Ladies, I did not go out together with the man,” she told this matter to the nuns. Those who were modest nuns ... spread it about, saying: “How can a nun be away for a night alone ...

“Is it true, as is said, monks, that a nun was away for a night alone? ... let the nuns set forth this rule of training:

“Whatever nun should go among villages alone, or should go to the other side of a river alone, or should be away for a night alone, that nun also has fallen into a matter that is an offence at once, entailing a formal meeting of the Order involving being sent away.”

¹ = Vin 4.94. ² = Vin 4.212.
And thus this rule of training for nuns came to be laid down by the lord.

At that time several nuns were going along the highroad to Sāvatthī through the country of Kosala. A certain nun there, wanting to relieve herself, having stayed behind alone, went on afterwards. People, having seen that nun, seduced her. Then that nun approached those nuns. The nuns spoke thus to that nun: “Why did you, lady, stay behind alone? We hope that you were not violated?”

“I was violated, ladies.”

Those who were modest nuns ... spread it about, saying: “How can a nun stay behind a group alone?” ... “Is it true, as is said, monks, that a nun stayed behind a group alone?”

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying: “Monks, how can a nun stay behind a group alone? It is not, monks, for pleasing those who are not” (yet) pleased ... let the nuns set forth this rule of training:

“Whatever nun should go among villages alone, or should go to the other side of a river alone, or should be away for a night alone, or should stay behind a group alone, that nun also has fallen into a matter that is an offence at once, entailing a formal meeting of the Order involving being sent away.”

Whatever means: ... nun is to be understood in this case.

Should go among villages alone means: in making the first foot cross¹ the enclosure of a village that is fenced in, there is a grave offence. In making the second foot cross, there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.² In making the first foot cross the precincts of a village that is not fenced in, there is a grave offence. In making the second foot cross, there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

¹ atikkāmentiyā. Atikkamati is to go beyond, to pass over. ² Cf. Vin 3.52.
Or should go to the other side of a river alone means: having covered up the three circles,¹ it is called a river wherever, as a nun is crossing over, the inner robe is made wet. In making the first foot cross over,² there is a grave offence. In making the second foot cross, there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

Or should be away for a night alone means: at sunrise, if leaving a hand’s reach of a nun who is a companion, there is a grave offence. When she has left it, there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

Or should stay behind a group alone means: if she, in what is not a village, in what is jungle, is leaving the range³ of sight or the range of hearing of a nun who is a companion, there is a grave offence. When she has left it, there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

She also means: she is so called in reference to the former.

Offence at once means: ... therefore again it is called an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

There is no offence if the nun who is the companion has gone away or has left the Order or has passed away or has gone over to (another) side⁴; if there are accidents; if she is mad, if she is the first wrong-doer.⁵

¹ I.e., the navel and the two knees. ² uttarantiyā. ³ upacāra, literally precincts; cf. Vin 4.93. ⁴ Cf. Vin 4.313 below, and Vin 1.60, where these four words occur. Of the last, pakkhasaṁkanta, Vinaya Texts i.178, n. 1 says, “Buddhaghosa can scarcely be right in explaining it by titthiya pakkhasaṁkanta.” The commentarial explanation on the above passage is titthiya-āvānam saṁkantā, gone over to members of another sect (Vin-a 913), a phrase which also occurs at Vin 4.217 (= above, BD 3.167). At the same time, I do not think that pakkha necessarily means “a (schismatic) faction,” as translated at Vinaya Texts i.178, although it undoubtedly has this meaning at Vin 3.173, Vin 3.175. For it can also mean another side or part of the Order, one of its sub-divisions, and in such cases does not imply any hostility, schism or dissension. At Vin 1.307f., we hear of people giving water and robes to one and the same pakkha or to different pakkhas. In the former case the pakkha is said to be the owner, in the latter the saṅgha. Had the pakkha been regarded as schismatic, it would hardly have been considered entitled to receive these gifts. ⁵ Cf. below, BD 3.353.
... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time¹ the nun Caṇḍakālī² was one who made strife, who made quarrels, who made contention, who made brawls, who made disputes in the Order.³ The nun Thullanandā protested when a (formal) act was being carried out against her.⁴ At that time the nun Thullanandā went to a village on some business. Then the Order of nuns, thinking: “The nun Thullanandā has gone away,” suspended⁵ the nun Caṇḍakālī for not seeing an offence. The nun Thullanandā having concluded that business in the village, returned again to Sāvatthī. When the nun Thullanandā was coming, the nun Caṇḍakālī neither made ready a seat, nor put out⁶ water for washing her feet, a foot-stool,⁷ a foot-stand,⁸ nor having gone out to meet her did she take her bowl and robe, nor did she offer her drinking-water. The nun Thullanandā spoke thus to the nun Caṇḍakālī:

“Why did you, lady, when I was coming, neither make ready a

¹ Cf. Nuns’ Bi-Pc 53 below. ² An obstreperous nun, mentioned at Vin 4.276, Vin 4.277, Vin 4.293, Vin 4.309, Vin 4.331, Vin 4.333. ³ Cf. Vin 4.12, Vin 4.150, Vin 4.309. At an iii.252 it is said that five disadvantages are to be expected for such a monk—also probably for such a nun. ⁴ Cf. above, BD 3.58. ⁵ ukkhipi. On ukkhitta, past participle of ukkhipati, see above, BD 3.28, n. 4. ⁶ upanikkhipati, to lay down near, to store. ⁷ pādaipiṭha. Vin-a 913 says a stool (thapanaka) to put the washed feet on. ⁸ pādakathalika. According to Vin-a 913, “a stool to put the unwashed feet on”—i.e., probably another kind of foot-stool. Buddhaghosa on Kd 12.1.1 says that pādakathalika alternatively means a towel to rub the feet with. This word and the two preceding occur also at Vin 1.9, Vin 1.312; Vin 2.22, Vin 2.31; see Vinaya Texts i.92, n., Vinaya Texts ii.373, n. 5.
seat for me nor put out water for washing the feet, a foot-stool, a foot-stand, nor having gone out to meet me, take my howl and robe, nor offer me drinking-water?”

“Surely it is this, lady, that I am without a mistress¹ in regard to this.”

“But why are you, lady, without a mistress?”

“Lady, these nuns, saying of me, ‘She is without a mistress, she is not esteemed, there is no one who can answer for² her,’ suspended me for not seeing an offence.”

The nun Thullanandā, saying, “These are ignorant, these are inexperienced, they do not (even) know a (formal) act or the defect of a (formal) act³ or the failure of a (formal) act⁴ or the success of a (formal) act⁵; but we know a (formal) act and the defect of a (formal) act and the failure of a (formal) act and the success of a (formal) act, and we may make them carry out a (formal) act that was not carried out or we may find fault with⁶ a (formal) act that was carried out,” and having very quickly convened an Order of nuns, she restored⁷ the nun Caṇḍakalī. Those who were modest nuns … spread it about, saying:

“How can the lady Thullanandā, without having obtained permission from the Order which carried out the proceedings⁸ in accordance with the rule, the discipline, the teacher’s instruction,⁹ not having learnt the desire¹⁰ of a group, restore a nun suspended by a complete Order?” …

“Is it true, as is said, monks, that the nun Thullanandā, without having obtained permission … restored a nun suspended by a complete Order?”

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

¹ anāthā, or helpless, deserted, without a protector. ² pativattar. Word occurs also at sn i.222. ³ kammadosa. ⁴ kammavipatti. ⁵ kammasampatti. ⁶ kopeyyāma. Cf. above, BD 3.63, kopetukāma. ⁷ osāreti. Cf. Vin 4.137—above, BD 3.28, q.v. and note. ⁸ kārakasaṅgha. ⁹ Cf. Vin 4.126, Vin 4.152, Vin 4.218. ¹⁰ chanda, desire or partiality, as in the four agatis; consent of an absentee, as in Monks’ Bu-Pc 79, Bu-Pc 80.

1093
“How, monks, can the nun Thullanandā, without having obtained permission ... restore a nun suspended by a complete Order? It is not, monks, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased. And thus, monks, let the nuns set forth this rule of training:

“Whatever nun, without having obtained permission from the Order which carried out the proceedings in accordance with the rule, the discipline, the teacher’s instruction, not having learnt the group’s desire, should restore a nun suspended by a complete Order, that nun also has fallen into a matter that is an offence at once, entailing a formal meeting of the Order involving being sent away.”

Whatever means: ... nun is to be understood in this case.

Complete Order means: belonging to the same communion, staying within the same boundary.¹

Suspended means: suspended for not seeing or for not making amends for or for not giving up an offence.²

In accordance with the rule, the discipline means: according to whatever is the rule, according to whatever is the discipline.³

(In accordance with) the teacher’s instruction means: in accordance with the conqueror’s instruction, the enlightened one’s instruction.⁴

Without having obtained permission from the Order which carried out the proceedings means: not having asked (the permission) of the Order which carried out the (formal) act.

Not having learnt⁵ the desire means: not having known the desire of a group.

If she thinks, “I will restore (her),” (and) looks about for a group or determines a boundary, there is an offence of wrong-doing. As a result of the motion, there is an offence of wrong-doing. As a result of two proclamations, there are grave offences. At the end of the proclamations, there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

She also means: she is so called in reference to the former.

Offence at once means: ... therefore again it is called an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

If she thinks that it is a legally valid act when it is a legally valid act (and) restores her, there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order. If she is in doubt as to whether it is a legally valid act ... If she thinks that it is not a legally valid act when it is a legally valid act (and) restores her, there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order. If she thinks that it is a legally valid act when it is not a legally valid act, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If she is in doubt as to whether it is not a legally valid act, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If she thinks that it is not a legally valid act when it is not a legally valid act, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

There is no offence if, having obtained permission from, the Order which carried out the (formal) act, she restores (her); if she restores (her) having known that it is the desire of the group; if she restores one who is behaving so as to get rid of the fault¹; if she restores (her), there being no Order which carried out the (formal) act; if she is mad, if she is the first wrong-doer.

¹ vatte vattantirī osāreti, one taking steps about, proceeding in regard to, what has been done.
... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the nun Sundarīnanda was beautiful, good to look upon, charming.¹ People, having seen the nun Sundarīnanda in the refectory, were filled with desire (and) gave the very best meals to the nun Sundarīnanda² who was filled with desire. The nun Sundarīnanda ate as much as she pleased; other nuns did not obtain as much as expected. Those who were modest nuns ... spread it about, saying: “How can the lady Sundarīnanda, filled with desire, having accepted with her own hand from the hand of a man who is filled with desire, solid food, soft food, eat it, partake of it?” ...

“Is it true, as is said, monks, that the nun Sundarīnanda, filled with desire ... ate it, partook of it?”

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying: “Monks, how can the nun Sundarīnanda, filled with desire, having accepted with her own hand ... solid food or soft food, eat it, partake of it? It is not, monks, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... And thus, monks ... this rule of training:

“Whatever nun, filled with desire, having accepted with her own hand from the hand of a man who is filled with desire, solid food or soft food, should eat it or partake of it, that nun also has fallen into a matter that is an offence at once, entailing a formal meeting of the Order involving being sent away.”

Whatever means: ... nun is to be understood in this case.

Filled with desire\(^1\) means: infatuated, full of desire, physically in love with.

Filled with desire\(^2\) means: infatuated, full of desire, physically in love with.

Man means: a human man, not a yakkha, not a departed one, not an animal\(^3\); he is learned, competent to be infatuated.

Solid food means: having set aside the five (kinds of) meals\(^4\) (and) water for cleansing the teeth,\(^5\) the rest is called solid food.

Soft food means: the five kinds (of) meals: conjey, barley-meal, food made with flour, fish, meat.\(^6\)

If, thinking, “I will eat, I will partake of,” she accepts, there is a grave offence. For every mouthful there is an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

She also means: she is so called in reference to the former.

Offence at once means: ... therefore again it is called an offence entailing a formal meeting of the Order.

If she accepts water for cleansing the teeth, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

If one is filled with desire (and) she accepts, thinking, “I will eat, I will partake of,” there is an offence of wrong-doing. For every mouthful, there is a grave offence. If she accepts water for cleansing the teeth, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

If both are filled with desire (and) thinking, “I will eat, I will partake of,” she accepts from the hand of a yakkha or of a departed one or of a eunuch or of an animal in human form, there is an offence of wrong-doing. For every mouthful there is a grave offence. If she accepts water for cleansing the teeth, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

\(^1\) = above, BD 3.161. \(^2\) = above, BD 3.161. \(^3\) = above, BD 3.161. \(^4\) Cf. Vin 4.83. \(^5\) See Monks’ Bu-Pc 40. \(^6\) = Vin 4.83.
THE BOOK OF THE DISCIPLINE

If one is filled with desire (and) she accepts, thinking, “I will eat, I will partake of,” there is an offence of wrong-doing. For every mouthful, there is an offence of wrong-doing. If she accepts water for cleansing the teeth, there is an offence of wrong-doing.

There is no offence if neither comes to be filled with desire; if she accepts, knowing, “He is not filled with desire”; if he is mad, if she is the first wrong-doer.
... at Sāvatthī in the Jeta Grove in Anāthapiṇḍika’s monastery. Now at that time the nun Sundarīnandā was beautiful, good to look upon, charming. People, having seen the nun Sundarīnandā in the refectory, were filled with desire (and) gave the very best meals to the nun Sundarīnandā.¹ The nun Sundarīnandā, being scrupulous, did not accept. The nun immediately following her² spoke thus to the nun Sundarīnandā: “Why do you, lady, not accept?”

“He is filled with desire, lady.”
“But are you, lady, filled with desire?”
“I am not filled with desire.”

“What can this man,³ whether he is filled with desire or not filled with desire, do to you, lady, since you are not filled with desire? Please, lady, eat or partake of the solid food or the soft food which this man is giving to you, you having accepted it with your own hand.”

Those who were modest nuns ... spread it about, saying: “How can this nun speak thus: ‘What can this man ... Please, lady, eat or partake of ... having accepted it with your own hand’?” ... “Is it true, as is said, monks, that a nun spoke thus: ‘What can this man ... Please, lady, eat or partake of ... having accepted it with your own hand’?”

“It is true, lord.”

The enlightened one, the lord, rebuked them, saying:

¹ = opening of Bi-Ss 5, above. ² I.e., in the procession for alms. ³ purisapuggala, as at Vin 4.212.
“How, monks, can a nun speak thus: ‘What can this man ... Please, lady, eat or partake of ... having accepted it with your own hand’? It is not, monks, for pleasing those who are not (yet) pleased ... this rule of training:

“Whatever nun should speak thus: ‘What can this man, whether he is filled with desire or not filled with desire, do to you, lady, since you are not filled with desire? Please, lady, eat or partake of the solid food or the soft food which this man is giving to you, you having accepted it with your own hand,’ that nun also has fallen into a matter that is an offence at once, entailing a formal meeting of the Order involving being sent away.”

Whatever means: ... nun is to be understood in this case.

